"Commodore Hotham anchored, the 19th of January, in Chesapeake-Bay, where, by his unexpected appearance, an opportunity offered for seizing a ship, laden with about 500 hogheads of tobacco, intended for Nantz. He failed from Chesapeake-Bay on the 11th of February, and arriving off the Delaware on the 17th, was forced away from that station by strong Northerly winds, which prevented his return until the 11th instant; and an opportunity was thereby afforded for an armed frigate, fitted by the Rebels, with several trading vessels, to put to sea from that river. The Commodore had the good fortune to take an American ship, laden with ammunition and military stores from Nantz, soon after his return, and sent her, under convoy of the Daphne, to this port. Several other captures have been made by the ships of this Southern Squadron, in number from twenty-five to thirty, which have been mostly sunk, or otherwise destroyed. I have reason, from different relations, to believe, that the small squadrons under Capt. Hammond and Capt. Davis have made as many more; but the particulars not having been yet transmitted, none of these captures are added to the general list herewith inclosed.

"The General meditating an attempt by surprise to take or destroy a considerable magazine which the Rebels had formed at Peek's-Kill, about 50 miles up the North-River, a corps of troops, commanded by Col. Bird, embarked in four transports; and proceeding up the North-River the 22d instant, under the conduct of Capt. Ferguson, in the Brune, with the Dependance, and another galley fitted for the occasion, the enemy, upon the sudden discovery and approach of the armament next day, set fire to a part of their magazines and barrack before they retreated. The troops, after they landed, did the same to the rest, whereby this plentiful deposit of provisions, stores, and other necessaries of various kinds, was totally destroyed, with no other loss than two seamen, who were rising
when

when the troops re-embarked the succeeding day."

The list of the vessels seized as prizes, and of re-captures made by the American Squadron, between the 10th of March and 31st of December, 1776, according to the returns received by the Vice-Admiral Viscount Howe, amounting in the whole to 140 captures, and 26 re-captures, are all particularly enumerated in the London Gazette of May 14.

Letter from Carolina, dated Feb. 20.

"On the morning of the 17th instant, Fort Mackintosh, at Stilla, was attacked by a large party from Florida. The garrison of the Stockade consisted of about fifty men, commanded by Capt. Richard Winn, of the South-Carolina rangers. The enemy kept up a smart fire on the garrison for about five hours; after which Lieutenant Col. Thomas Brown, of the Florida rangers, came with a flag, and required the garrison to surrender, threatening, in case of non-compliance, that no mercy would be shewn them. Capt. Winn demanded an hour's time to consider, which was agreed to; in answer to the proposition, he soon informed Capt. Brown, by a Serjeant, "that they were bound in honour not to comply with it, and that, if they should fall into his hands, they expected to be treated as gentlemen, and prisoners of war." The Serjeant returned, bringing with him Lord and General Howe's Proclamation. Capt. Winn bid the enemy defiance; a smart fire immediately ensued, and was kept up on both sides for about an hour. Next day Lieutenant Colonel Frazer of the Royal Americans, the Commanding Officer of the enemy, sent in a message to Capt. Winn, and desired he would send out some of his Officers to see the forces, and the preparations for the attack. This was complied with; all the Officers, except Capt. Winn, going out. On their return, they informed him of the enemy's force being vastly superior to his, and of their being provided with five field-pieces. It was therefore determined to surrender; and at 12 o'clock the enemy were put in possession of the fort. The garrison were allowed to keep their baggage, were disarmed, and, excepting two Officers, Lieutenants Caldwell and Miller, who are sent to St. Augustine, were dismissed on their parole, to be considered as prisoners of war, till an equal number is exchanged. They were escorted some distance, to protect them from the savages, who behave very unruly."

Declaration signed at New-York.

"Whereas certain persons, now Members of what is stiled the Provincial Congress of New-York, do claim and actually exercise power of representing this city and county, and are with such Congress pursuing measures totally subversive, as well of his Majesty's government as of our liberty and happiness; we, therefore, the freeholders and inhabitants of this city and county of New-York, whose names are hereunto subscribed, do hereby, in the most explicit manner, disavow, renounce, and disclaim, such their assumption of power, and all submission or obedience to any orders or resolutions of the said Provincial Congress, and of any Continental Congress, Committees, or Conventions whatsoever, claiming to exercise any unlawful power over us - hereby recognizing and acknowledging our submission to his Majesty's government, under which alone we wish and expect to receive those solid and permanent blessings which are peculiar to the British constitution, and the inheritance of a British subject."

Letter from General Putnam to the Council of Safety of Pennsylvania, dated Prince-Town, Feb. 18, 1777.

"Yesterday evening Col. Nelson, with 150 men, at Lawrence's-Neck, attacked 60 men of Cortland Skinner's brigade, commanded by Major Richard Stockton, routed them, and took the whole prisoners, among them the Major, a Captain, and three subalterns, with 70 stands of arms. Fifty of the Bedford Pennsylvania riflemen behaved like veterans."

P O E T R Y.
An Elegy on the Death of the late Rev. Doctor COLVILL, late Dissenting Minister at Drogheda.

FOR man let man lament! for high and low Let the heart feel, and let the moist tear flow!

From one great God we spring, to one we tend,
All have the same original and end:
All now upon the earth, some years before
Were not, and some years hence will be no more.
Our Colvill was alive, and now is dead!
Here is his body, but his soul is fled;
Fled to the mighty Judge, who only can Award the virtue, or the vice of man:
For us, poor mortals, to decide below,
Is pride at once and ignorance to shew.

Yet where the heart was honest, acts were just,
The word of God the guide, and Christ the trust;
Where useful labours for mankind were borne,
Such as lamented Colvill did adorn;

We humbly may suppose the soul to be,
Freed from the body, holy Lord, with thee.

How are we taught, O Colvill, to admire
Thy vast capacity and heavenly fire:

That fire, that fervent piety, which flung Such wholesome lessons, from a round * grave tongue!

How at thy preaching, will our fathers say,
Was the still audience wont to melt away,
Vice yield to virtue and repentant moans,
And the flesh quiver on the trembling bones,
Redeeming love the bosom to controul,
And dawning mercy play upon the soul!

Great was thy merit, and thy loss is great,
Whatever clouded bigots may conceit;

N O T E.

* This amiable divine was peculiarly distinguished, in his preaching, by a majestic flow of elocution. It is remarkable that his father, who was also a clergyman, died in the pulpit, while he was performing divine service: Himself, after a successful discharge of the same sacred office for above fifty years, was carried off this vain world in an apoplectic fit the 23d of last month, to the great sorrow of his family and congregation, and indeed of all who ever had the pleasure, as well as advantage of knowing him, either in his clerical or companionable capacity.

Let

Let clouded bigots argue all they can,
It is humanity which makes the man.
To Heaven alone perfection doth belong,
And this, and that sect may be in the wrong;
Each has its failings, and for one to blame
Another, sure is folly in extreme.
God knew our state, and that a perfect plan
Of Revelation would not answer man,
He therefore chose to brighten human ways,
By kindly, rather than by potent rays:
And while he opens the golden gates above
Of joyous rest and everlasting love,
By the blest volume of revealed grace,
At liberty he leaves the human race,
To the main point respective ways to find,
And fix the manner as they have a mind.
From every people his elect he draws,
That own a Saviour and obey his laws,
No matter how they differ in the mode,
Provided still they seek the blest abode.

Go, worthy spirit, worthy Colvill, go,
Go to the plains where pleasures ever flow,
Well having past this dreary vale of strife,
Go to the regions of eternal life!
Darkling in doubt, and peril all around,
We yet awhile must tread on hostile ground,
And yet awhile, before we reach the skies,
Lye down in sorrow, and in sorrow rise,
For ever happy could we fare like thee,
From trouble distant, and from danger free.

The ROBIN.

SCARCELY had the dewy morn
Shed her tears upon the thorn,
And the shrilly songster round
Made the earth and air resound;
But the kindly Robin too,
Which erewhile to Cælia flew,
And by her was taken in
From the noisy wintry din;
Mindful of the favour * flew
Once more in poetic view,
And in view poetic paid
Early homage to the maid.

Is the lovely one awake,
Who in winter did me take
In, and gave me crumbs to pick,
Separate from the tough † stick,
And the thing ‡ which, by a blow,
Falls upon us ere we know?
Mild as morning, if you be,
Listen now a while to me,
Who, although my fellows all
On some mighty Power call,
Which, though never by us seen,
Robes the wood with annual green,
First, before I join the throng,
Brings to you the votive song.

Fair inhabitant, the role
No such vivid beauty flows

N O T E S.

* The reader may find the reason of this obligation at large, by recurring to the poetical department of this Miscellany for November last 1776.

† I suppose it means a stick made retentive with bird-lime.

‡ Some boyish contrivance: it may be a door.

As your person, nor the wing
Of the linnet in the spring,
Is so lively as the grace
Smiling on your sprightly face:
Best of all, you are I ween
Like the Power never seen,
Since, like that, you give us food,
And, like that, you do us good,
May you long this feat maintain,
To befriend the tuneful train!
Long as I can use a wing,
By you will I often sing,
In the walk I will you meet,
And will 'poit before your feet,
When I see you in the grove
Looking stedfastly above
To a Power, which you seem Like us likewise to esteem,
Solemn will I hop around,
Proud to be where you are found.
Sweet as musick, do you hear?
Credit me, I am sincere:
By the speck upon my breast,
What I say you shall attest.
Would to the Almighty power,
Ruler of the breezy bower,
Twice as long I light could view
As indeed we Robins do,
That for what you did to me
Twice as long you might me see Grateful: But, for what I know,
Like my fellows I must go
Shortly hence, and be no more,
Ravished by tuneful lore;
Even should it be, no boy
Might me suddenly destroy,
Even should it be, at all
No mischance might me besail.

Grateful as the rays, which spring
From yon pretty twinkling thing*,
Would you would some signal give,
That you hear me, and do live.
That you must indeed submit
To a final doom, is fit;
Since each object I behold
Never looks as well, when old,
And each object, it is found,
Blooms and withers on the ground:
But I fancy, dear as day,
Yet you have not gone away,
Since your nobler kind have powers,
Which far longer last than ours.
Furthermore, a story told
Some way to our tribe of old,
And which story we retain Faithfully among our train,
Lets us know; when you resign
What does only outward shine,
Faculties remain, which may Rise into a better day;
If you live according to
Some rule here, we do not know,
But was given, it is said,
By your Maker for your aid,
And confirmed for † your sake
By your Maker in your make:

N O T E S.

* The morning star, peradventure.

† From these particulars, it is plain the Robin hints at our Sacred Records

Ever since, below the neck
Robins wear this bloody speck,
As a token of the grief
Suffered for your relief.
Add to this, you do not stand
To such perils on the land;
Seldom any of your kind
Going suddenly, I find:
Only that some wicked elves,
Principally like yourselves,
But more brawny, big and bold,
And more dreadful to behold,
Bear some of you now and then,
Each to his † respective den.

Pleasure! pleasure in extreme!
Do I hear, or do I dream?
Hear you! without doubt I do!
Which is all I want. Adieu.

Hillborough.

He's gone, I fear, ne'er to return,
Who reconcil'd thee to thy God.

He from detested vice did bring
My wand'ring heart to virtue's shore,
The hymn of praise he bid me sing,
(Sweet words) he bid me sin no more.

He to the pris'ner joy did give*,
Comforted the afflicted poor,
Nay, under heaven, he bid those live
Who had been doom'd to death before. †

Shall not his soothing words again
With inward bliss my bosom warm,
Banish despair, expel all pain,
Of sin's return avert th' alarm?

Shall not my eyes once more behold
The shepherd tending on his sheep,
With watchful care, that in the fold
Of penitence he may them keep?

Fair Mercy, thee I supplicate,
Sweet Charity, I thee invoke;
Your mutual efforts, ere too late,
May save him from th' impending stroke.

† He was remarkably zealous in the charity for the recovery of persons apparently drowned.

Straight, indignant he attacks him,
Death the combat ends, or flight.
If victorious, how he triumphs,
Struts, and claps his wings, and crows,
Woods, and cheers his merry females,
Scrapes, and chucks, and boons bestows.
But that noble, valiant instinct,
Oft proves fatal, nature gave;
Safety shields secure the coward;
Danger periculates the brave.
Men, miscall'd, of brutal feelings,
Who in barb'rous sports delight,
Joy to make more gen'rous creatures,
Join in fierce, unnatural fight.
Strip'd of all his brightest plumage,
Now half-naked he appears;
On his legs steel'd, martial weapons,
Glitt'ring in the sun, he wears.
How unlike to Chanticleer, that Lately grac'd the farmer's door!
Not ev'n Partlet now wou'd know him,
Whom she knew so well before!
A pit! a pit!—the gaping croud straight,
In the midst, a circle form—
Big with awful expectation,
Now begins the battle's storm.
Heel meets heel, in bloody conflict,
Beak meets beak, and wing meets wing—
'Till or chance, or strength superior,
Down the fated hero bring.
Now the echoing shouts of triumph,
Pierce confus'd the yielding air;
Whilst aloud, the madd'ning rabble
Their disorder'd joy declare.
Fly, my muse, such savage transports;
Hie thee to some secret cell,
Where, secure from frantic folly,
Wisdom, quiet, virtue dwell.

DEATH's conflict's past, and Angels bear away
My Susan's spotless soul to endless day:
Wit, beauty, innocence, each dawning grace,
Sprung with her years, and blossom'd in her face.
Weep not for her, ye parents, cease to mourn;
Since heavenly forms must unto heaven return!
Oft let the Muse her pensive footsteps tread,
Where Susan slumbers with the sacred dead:
Let eve with pearly dew, anoint her grave;
And mourn her elegiac garland weave!
Sweet innocent! you've reach'd the blest abode,
The eternal, beauteous, paradise of God!
Where bliss substantial, joys unfading spring;
And bright arch-angels hallelujahs sing:
There crown'd with glory, rob'd with innocence,
High rais'd honour, and magnificence:
Enthron'd sublime, amid th' angelic throng;
With millions join the universal song,
Sweeping the golden harps, of heavenly frame,
And hymning forth, the great Jehovah's name!

L O N D O N .

26. Last night arrived at Cowes the Syren Pacquet, Smith, from Bengal, with dispatches for the East-India company, and brings an account of the death of General Monson the day before they sailed. Lord Pigot was still under confinement at their departure.

30. By virtue of a commission from his majesty to the Lord Chancellor, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Earl of Dartmouth, they notified the royal assent to the following bills, viz.

The bill for building a new church in Buckingham.

The bill for making a navigable cut or canal from the Trent, in the lordships of Sawley and Long-Eaton in Derbyshire, to or near Langley Bridge in the said county.

The bill for improving and preserving the navigation of the Thames from London-bridge to Staines.

The bill to enable the president and scholars of Magdalen college, Oxford, to grant leases of lands, houses, tenements, &c. their estate, in St. John's, Southwark.

The bill to enable the York-buildings company to sell their estates in Scotland to discharge incumbrances.

The bill for opening streets of communication between Wapping, Ratcliff-High-way, Old Gravel-lane, and Virginia-street.

The bill for better lighting, watching, and paving the streets in Newington, Surry.

The bill to dissolve the marriage of John Braithwaite, Esq; with his wife, and to enable him to marry again.

And also to several road, inclosure, and private bills.

Extract of a letter from Lord Pigot to the Hon. the Court of Directors of the East-India Company, per Gr nville, dated St. Thomas's Mount, Sept. 26, 1776.

"Major Horne, on the 17th inst. was ordered to communicate to me a copy of a letter from Mr. Benfield, to Messrs. Stratton, &c. dated the 8th, with their answer dated the 17th. Mr. Benfield says, "He has arrived at the knowledge of certain transactions of mine, such as obtaining very large sums of money, &c. from Indian princes, which constitute me guilty of an infringement of a late act of parliament, and declares his resolution to commence a prosecution against me, for which he shall have occasion to apply to the board, to obtain certain evidences residing within the bounds of Tanjore, or in places belonging to the Nabob of the Carnatic."

"I shall leave to the issue of the prosecution the proof of the malevolence of this charge. I must, however, take notice, that although this gentleman has been industrious for many months past in propagating his intentions, he has reserved to the eve of the dispatch the bringing forth his accusations, that they may go home unrefuted: but I trust you have that confidence in me, as to be persuaded that my conduct has been strictly honourable, and that you will believe me when I assure you I have received no sum of money, and the only presents of any considerable value are, set of breakfast gold plate; a coach and a pair of mares; a saddle horse; three chaise horses; two cows and a bull.

"And from a northern Rajah's Vakeel, an elephant, for which I gave a horse in return."

May 7. The prince of Orange packet, Capt. Story, from Harwich to Helvoetsluys, was taken by the Surprize privateer, Capt. Cunningham, of four guns and ten swivels, within three leagues of the coast of Holland. It was at night, and the privateer coming close along side the packet, thought she made bad steering, and asked her if she was coming on board her, for that they should soon be foul of each other. The privateer immediately laid her along-side, and took her.—it is imagined she expected to find a quantity of foreign coin on board, as the packet which sailed before the Prince of Orange had to the amount of 10,000l. on board. The passengers and crew were civilly treated (among whom was a king's messenger) their properties were returned them, and they were landed in Holland. The mate arrived in town on Monday night, who says the packet was a fine new vessel, and that he heard she would be converted into a privateer, she being a remarkable swift sailer. The Surprize had 21 hands on board, who, it is said, were mostly smugglers, and it is thought the vessel never was in America, but was fitted out in France for the above purpose, whether a commission from the congress had been sent for her.

Yesterday his majesty went to the house of lords, and gave the royal assent to the bill for granting to his majesty 100,000l. per annum, over and above the sum of 800,000l. granted by an act of the 1st of his majesty's reign, for the support of his majesty's household, and his civil government; and to fourteen other public and private bills.

8. Five commissioners are appointed to go to the East-Indies, to settle the controversies, and depose the council of Madras; they are to go in the Syren packet, and a squadron, under the command of an admiral, will follow them.

16. This day forty-seven public and private bills were signed by commission; the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, and Lord Weymouth, were the commissioners.

22. On Tuesday Capt. Kelly, having obtained a letter from lord Weymouth to the governor of Dunkirk, set out for that place, in order to take charge of his ship, the Joseph, which was taken by Cunningham, the court of France having ordered the said vessel to be delivered up. Captain Kelly will proceed from thence to Hamburgh, to which he was first bound.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

Carlsw, May 28.

LAST Thursday evening a gentleman of Ros, returning from Dublin, was stopped at Painstown, within a mile and a half of this town, by two footpads, who knocked him down, and robbed him of 60 guineas. The gentleman was so confused, that the villains got off without his discerning their shape or diels. On his coming soon after to town, and informing what had happened to him, three gentlemen, armed, immediately pursued the villains, and came up with two men near Kilcullen-bridge, whom they yesterday brought here; but the gentleman not being certain they were the persons who robbed him, they were discharged. It is but just to observe, that the gentlemen who pursued them were remarkable for their tenderness and humanity, when, having no proof of their guilt, and finding them seem innocent of the matter, collected as much money as was sufficient to defray the expenses of their journey.

Corke, June 2. His Majesty's ship Milford took an American privateer of 12 guns, about three months ago, and having shifted the prisoners, put 60 hands on board her with orders to cruise for some time before she proceeded for Halifax. Soon after the ships parted, and a very fresh gale of wind blew right on shore, which obliged the Lieutenant who commanded the privateer, to desire his American pilot to carry her safe into some creek, with promises of being well rewarded if they escaped the rebels. The pilot ran for Portsmouth, where they arrived in the night; but when day appeared, the privateer was at anchor a mile inside the fort, and her crew were made prisoners immediately a ter.

and otherwise attempted much injury to the drivers of the carriages whereon his goods were conveying from the course to his house at Tipperary.

Waterford, June 3. On the 19th ult. after sun-set, upwards of thirty of those lawless miscreants called White Boys, assembled on the high road leading from Ros to Waterford, near the lands of Glanmore, and without the least provocation beat and wounded, in a cruel and barbarous manner, Mr. William Innott of Rattapatic, in the county of Kilkenny. In consequence of which the principal neighbouring gentlemen have offered a spirited reward for apprehending and prosecuting to conviction the persons concerned therein.

D U B L I N.

We hear from Naas, that on last Monday evening, the 19th inst. a man was most cruelly murdered by another (without having given the least provocation) by running a large spit through his body; the unhappy person died in a few minutes after receiving the wound. The murderer escaped; but as strict search is now making for him, it is hoped he will be apprehended and brought to justice, in order to receive the punishment due to the enormity of his crime.

At a farmer's house near Castleknock, a whole family narrowly escaped being poisoned on Monday last, by eating greens which were chopped and heated in a copper saucepan; the lid being close, and there not being any liquid among the greens, it is supposed that the steam extracted the poisonous quality from the copper after the tinning was melted, and that it impregnated with the greens. The poison did not begin to operate for two hours after the people had eaten the food, and then it occasioned the most excruciating pains in the bowels, with a violent head-ach, and frequent inclinations to vomit, which latter it was judged best to promote, and which was in some time effected by taking quantities of melted butter. A little boy who had eaten rather more than any of the rest, still continues very ill, but with proper care there is no doubt of his recovery. The facts as here stated may be relied on, and they are sent for publication, that future ture accidents of the same nature may be prevented, by people being cautious how they create similar causes.

THE arguments on the information being finally finished on Friday, next morning the Lord Chief Justice Annaly delivered his opinion, nearly to the following effect—That the motion which the bench was to take under consideration was, whether the Provost's affidavit came within such a case as should prohibit the information. For this purpose his Lordship stated the transaction, first, as it appeared from the Attorney General's affidavit; and then, as it was related by the affidavit of the Provost. After his Lordship had clearly recited the story as told on the different sides, he took notice, that for such words as were spoken abusively to the Attorney General, the Provost expressed his hearty contrition, and that for such other words as were alleged to have escaped, the Provost said, that they were not directed to nor spoken within the hearing of the Attorney General. And that when Mr. Hutchinson had found these words were reported to the Attorney General, as particularly levelled against him, he applied to a common friend to interfere, and make it known to the Attorney General, that he (the Provost) was ready to make a public apology. His Lordship took notice that the intention of a challenge was sworn to by one party, and positively denied by the other. He said he would not take up the time of the court with apologizing for his own feelings on this unhappy occasion, and that he would divest himself of all partiality. His Lordship prefaced his opinion by declaring, that the information ought to be granted; and what follows was the substance of his reasons for that opinion.—But before his Lordship entered minutely into the question, he took notice, that informations had been called by several gentlemen, who spoke on the part of the Provost, unconstitutional; that they were new and extraordinary, and that they destroyed the power of a grand jury. To those objections his Lordship replied, that informations in the first instance were not unconstitutional, for they were intended to be a check to the partiality and the error of grand juries, by putting it in the power of an injured person to seek redress even after they had ignored his bill, and that therefore they could not be unconstitutional. As to their being new—he said, gentlemen mistook that point, for they were as ancient as the common law, and as old as the time of Edward III. that they answered every end that a grand jury could, by putting a man on his trial before a petty jury, and giving him an opportunity to be judged by his peers, thereby answering the great end of our excellent laws, with this difference only, that the mode of proceeding differed; in this fact, his Lordship said, he was warranted from many cases, some of which he mentioned, 1. Sh. 49. 116. and that from that time they have been continually granted.

But although they were constitutional, his Lordship wisely observed, they were extraordinary, and had been used to bad purposes in the latter end of the reign of Charles II. and the short reign of James II. and he added, that in respect to informations three things should be considered: 1st. Where the crime is enormous. 2d. Where the grand jury reject a bill they ought to find. And 3d. Where challenges are given to provoke to fight. In support of the first, his Lordship quoted an instance of the enormity of a crime where an attempt was made to corrupt a judge or returning officer, 4. Bur. 2501. (Vaughan's case). As to the 3d, he said, the reasons why an information was the proper mode of bringing a person to trial, who had been guilty of sending a challenge, were, that a grand jury, before whom a bill for that offence had been preferred, being in themselves perhaps similar to the party complained against, they might through a mistaken idea of honour ignore the bill, and by rejecting the complaint encourage Duelling; and as a case in point, his Lordship mentioned the affair of Slack, Recorder of Galway, 1. S. 106. where great provocation had been given for sending the challenge. His Lordship, however said in the present matter, if the right hon. defendant's words did not amount to a challenge, or a provocation to send one, the court ought not to interfere. As to words spoken, he said, they were formerly construed in a mild sense, except in actions for scandalum magnatum, where they were always taken in the most severe sense. But he observed, that the law now understood words according to their usual meaning and general acceptance, Buller 4 3. Serj. Saye's Rep. 265. and 3. Bur 1716 in which last he stated the case. As to the words spoken on the 17th of April, his Lordship observed, if the information rested on them alone, he thought it should not be granted, as they were only sworn to on hearsay and belief, and that the Provost might have refused answering that part of the Attorney General's affidavit: he took notice, however, that there was nothing improper in the Attorney General's conduct to warrant the abuse he received on that day from the Provost, and that when the Provost mentioned that Mr. D—n was a retainer of the Attorney General's, the Attorney had no right to answer the Provost any further than what he did, which was, that "he would be answerable only for himself." If the words spoken were either a challenge or a provocation to give a challenge, then, and in that case, the information must go. And that they were either the one or the other was evident. His Lordship said, it had been observed by some gentlemen, that what was said out of the court, must be said in court. The words were spoken; and every gentleman who heard them repeated, considered them as a provocation sufficient to warrant a challenge—and in such light the bench must consider them. As to the prescribed forms of challenges, his Lordship said he was unacquainted with them; but if such words as those now in question had passed between gentlemen less advanced in years, he appealed to the bar if they would not be considered as a direct challenge to fight, or carrying with them a meaning which must be understood in that acceptance. In crimes of this nature, his Lordship said, the intention must be collected from the circumstances of the case; and, from the meaning of the words spoken, otherwise it would be a very easy matter to evade justice—for one man might say to another, “Sir, I wear a sword, and will be at Brentford to-morrow”—which words, in a literal sense, mean no more, than that a gentleman was going to Brentford, and wore a sword; yet, to take them in their real meaning, they implied premeditated murder. Now, in such a case as that, a grand jury would probably ignore a bill, the justice sought for in which bill could only be obtained by an information. But his Lordship observed, that he saw very little occasion to say whether the words did or did not amount to a challenge; for if there was a doubt, the clearing up of that doubt should go to a jury, who were the best judges, and who, from the evidence which would appear, to state the place, the situation, and the manner in which the words were spoken, would be able to form a just opinion of the intention they implied—and therefore the information must be granted. (1. Hawk, 81.) His Lordship cited a remarkable case, where an indictment was laid for an attempt made by a priest to corrupt a girl from her religion, and to carry her to France, in order that she might be bred up a Papist: but as the fact was not committed, and that intention was not a crime, an arrest of judgment was pleaded; yet it was held, that when there is an attempt to do that which is criminal, such attempt is equal to the commission of the fact, and punishable by information, though not by common law; in which light his Lordship saw the crime of sending challenges, and giving provocation to fight.—As to the two affidavits not agreeing in point of fact, his Lordship deemed that to be a very good reason why the determination, which was the true one, should go to a jury, by way of information; and in that opinion, his Lordship said, Lord Mansfield also agreed, in the case already mentioned of the Duke of Grafton against Vaughan. His Lordship took notice, that the case of the King against Darby had more than once been mentioned as a precedent; but he observed, that the decision in that matter was not law, and that it happened in the 3d year of the arbitrary reign of James the second, and was the act of judges particularly chosen by that prince. His Lordship said, that it mattered not whether the words in themselves were indictable—it was sufficient ground for an information, if they were used with an intent to provoke the Attorney General to fight. The words, “old rascal, old scoundrel,” are not actionable, except they were used to do a future injury—such as to provoke a man to fight: for, although words be neither liable to action nor indictment, yet they are subject to an information. (4 Inst. 180, 181.)—The most innocent words, on a particular occasion, might be so spoken, as to intend a breach of the peace; and it is laid down, they are then subject to an information. (Hob. 120, 125. Bar. and Hob. Reps. 62.)—His Lordship mentioned, that a libel sent to a magistrate, although that libel was not published, yet was subject to an information; and the reason was, because such acts tend to a breach of the peace. As to the granting the information affecting the right honourable defendant’s family, his Lordship humanely observed, no man felt more than he did on that occasion; but that, in a judicial capacity, he must divest himself of all partiality, and act merely from that duty he owed to his station as a judge, and which the laws of his country, and the administration of justice, required at his hands. That as to the court not interfering in this matter, farther than an attachment for the offence against the bench, his Lordship said he differed in opinion with the Provost. He said, indeed there was sufficient ground for an attachment, and that the court of Common Pleas could grant an attachment, as well as the court of King’s Bench an information, ad libitum; for the matter happening during the sitting of the courts, was a great aggravation of the offence. His Lordship mentioned the case of a quarrel in a church-yard; and he said, that the place in which the peace was broke aggravated the offence.—Upon the whole, his Lordship was minute in the cases he cited, clear in the opinions he gave; and, though he spoke with the greatest tenderness, yet he did not forget the offence given to the court, nor the offence given to the peace of the King. He said, that if such crimes as these were not punished, people would be afraid to come to the courts on their lawful occasions; and that if the greatest care was not taken to preserve order and peace among mankind, and that the aggrieved did not meet redress, every man who thought himself injured would take the execution of justice into his own hands, and become the avenger, with his own arm, of that crime for which he could not at law receive proper satisfaction. He concluded with expressing his concern for this dispute, and how much he lamented the necessity of his giving it as his opinion, that the information should be granted.

That all offences against good order and government are punishable by information; and he stated the case of Lord Grey, (state trials, 3.)—He mentioned, that all steps prefatory, or preparatory to offences, wherein a breach of the peace seems to be intended, are liable to informations; and on such ground, it was his opinion, challenges stood. He said, that what passed in the court of King’s Bench, and what passed in the court of Common Pleas, must be considered as one continued transaction. That as to the words expressed by the Provost, “I will not use abusive language—you are an old man—but you are to consider me as having said every thing infamous of you,” he would avoid entering into particular distinctions, as to the literal sense of their meaning; for, he said, there was something rather metaphysical in them—but, as to their general acceptance, they must be considered as a provocation to challenge. Words, he observed, were the conveyance of ideas, the instrument by which the speaker was to impress his ideas on the hearer, and they ought to be given in that sense in which the hearer might understand them, so as that words might have their natural natural use. He observed, that if from words, spoken in a doubtful sense, a meaning was taken according to a constructive application, and not the true intent, gentlemen, who were inclined to send challenges, had only to apply to council to know in what words the message for breaking the peace might be sent so as not to be punishable by law, and that the court on a prosecution in that case were to construe the words with the precision of a special pleading. But this mode he hoped would never be practised or countenanced by the bar. As to what was or is a man's intention, it is only known to that man himself: for intention is a secret in the human heart, to the knowledge of which we cannot arrive but by conjecture; and the grounds on which we must form that conjecture are the circumstances attending the case. All this he observed should come before a jury, and the verdict of twelve honest men was the most proper and the only mode by which we could come nearest to what was the intention. After premising those general observations, he took a short view of the Attorney General's situation, character, age, and rank; from which he adverted to that of the Provost, who, he said, was a person appointed to form the manners and morals of youth, who had under his care the tuition of a number of the first young men in the kingdom, whose future conduct in life in a great measure depended on the precept and example, which in their early days were impressed on their minds. He said, as conservators of the peace, in support of the dignity of the court, and in support of the great officer of that court, the bench should take every legal step to punish those who had offended, either the one or the other; and that they should at all times use their utmost endeavours to stop the spreading of erroneous notions, and to prevent the rising generation from being trained up, and sent into the world with such growing errors. He said, if there was a doubt of the criminality of the defendant, the only means to clear up that doubt was to grant the information. As to the distinction of words, he said, that had met a solemn argument; but he thought the cases cited were not applicable to the present case which stands upon its own ground. He said it was best to say as few words as possible on a subject already exhausted, and he would therefore only add, that in duty to his trust, and from what he owed to posterity, he thought the information should be granted. He concluded with saying, that he would never forget the history of the Duella in this kingdom.

Mr. Justice Henn followed Mr. Justice Robinson. He confined himself to what passed in the Common Pleas, and said he did not think the defendant's affidavit shewed any reasonable cause to justify the abuse. He said he would avoid entering into any discussion of words, as that would more properly come before a jury on the day of trial. He said there was one objection made which he would answer; it was that no information could be granted for words which did not convey a precise challenge, and the present was only a constructive one. To which he replied that a challenge might be conveyed in the politest language, and that the apparent meaning is the substance on which the law will decide.

He concluded with giving it as his opinion that the information should be granted—but he said it was his most hearty wish that the right honourable defendant might on the day of trial be able to produce such proofs as would convince a jury that his intention was not to be construed in that sense in which it at present appeared.—The three Judges coinciding in one opinion, the rule was then made absolute, and the information granted.

Thus the matter rested till the next term, when on Wednesday June 11, council on behalf of the Attorney General shewed cause against having the 5th count in the information against the Provost expunged from said information.

Mr. Solicitor General opened the argument, and was followed by Mr. Prime Serjeant. They admitted that an acquittal to this court might be pleaded to any other information for the same offence, and then argued to the following purpose: the words are related according to the best of the prosecutor's recollection; his mind was in a state of agitation. It is not to be expected, nor is it necessary that the whole evidence should be introduced into the affidavit; it is enough if it contains sufficient grounds for the application. It is said that the particular words should be stated,—but why state them? They will come out upon evidence, and it is enough to say they amount to a challenge. The offence which constitutes the challenge, is stated in the fifth count, and the difference is, it is there stated generally, and not in the particular words as it is stated in the 3d c. 4. The case from lord Hardwicke says, "other matter," which means the introducing another offence. In informations in nature of quo Warranto's (which it must be allowed are in the nature of civil actions) the affidavit states particularly; but the charge in the information is general, "as he exercises such an office, and continues to exercise it."

Mr. Hellen cited Cro. Car. 584. and argued from it, that if the information be improper (which is the word in the case, and must mean informal) the mode of proceeding should be by demurrer, not by notice.

Mr. Carleton.—The defendant makes his application thus: strike out this count, on which I may certainly be convicted, and leave these standing to which I can demur, and on which I cannot be found guilty. There are two objections made, 1st, it is a bad count; 2dly, it was not warranted by the court. But the observation comes too late as to the information, too soon to the jury. If the defendant does not chuse to demur, he may have relief by arrest of judgment, or by writ of error; for a verdict in criminal cases cures nothing. There are two things to be attended to, 1st, if the offence appears to be of magnitude to the court, the court will not look into the indictment to see whether it be good or not; and in challenges the court grants the information without inspection for its enormity. Secondly, it is not necessary for the court to determine whether the charge be good or not; but they will leave the defendant to his ordinary course of demurrer, arrest of judgment, or writ of error. The chief objection seems to be, that the count not is good.—The defendant will not demur to it; but says, the court will strike it it out, or he must be indubitably convicted on it. The application is not by affidavit. It amounts to this—I have given many challenges, and the court will put me in such a situation that I shall not be convicted of any one of them. If the 5th count was the only one, it would be a legal count; and if it be unexceptionable alone, it is unexceptionable when coupled with others.

A cause was tried in the court of King's Bench by nisi prius, before Mr. Justice Henn, (Lord Annaly being absent) between a Mr. Dempsey, merchant, as plaintiff, and Mr. Nowlan, sugar baker, as defendant. It appeared that a Mr. Reilly in January 1776, drew a draft on Messrs. Finlay's bank, and that a Mr. Cannon received payment for it; that the same was then taken off the banker's table, and that in August last it was (after passing thro' four or five different respectable merchants hands) passed to defendant, who received it in the course of trade, and who, in a short time afterwards, passed the same in payment to plaintiff, who tendered it at the bank and received the contents; between five and six o'clock on the evening of the same day, the banker's clerk came to the plaintiff and told him the draft was forged, for the number and date were altered since they first paid it, and that they had on discovering the bill was taken away, advertised it, and notwithstanding that, they had in the hurry of business paid it again as aforesaid; the plaintiff's son thereupon went with the clerk to the defendant, who produced the merchant from whom he had it, and who also mentioned the merchant he received it from, upon which the plaintiff's son returned to his father, and after informing him of the result of his enquiry, he returned the money to the bank: no doubt was entertained but the defendant came by the draft in the most fair and honourable manner, and that he attended the prosecution, and prosecuted Cannon, who was charged with the forgery, but for want of the evidence of one Mr. Caddell the charge could not be proved, and he was acquitted—The jury, who were composed of the most respectable set of merchants that have appeared in that court these many years, found a verdict for the plaintiff, and left the defendant to his action against the person he received it from.—Counsellors Kelly, Yelverton, Burgh, and Walker, for the plaintiff; the Solicitor General, and the Recorder for the defendant.

The building of the new marshalsea prison near Dirty-lane, Thomas-street, is almost completed; it consists of a specious quadrangular court, on each side of which are three stories of convenient apartments, in each is a fire-place faced with mountain stone, as are also the rustic doors leading from the court into the lower part of them; in the pediment on the north side is a place for a clock, and underneath an arched gateway faced with stone, leads into another court, where a building is erected to serve as an hospital; on one side of which is a tennis-court, and on the other a skittle alley for the exercise of the prisoners; and contiguous to the quadrangle on the south, there is a large and elegant house for the residence of the marshal and his family. The whole is surrounded on the outside by a wall of rough stone without any aperture, save two doors and two very small windows near them, and reaches to the roof of the buildings.

Mr. Charles Grier of the county of Longford, returning from the fair of Killashee, was met by a Gallion near the town of Kenagh, who seized him by the arm, threw him off his horse, broke his arm in two places, and mangled him so shockingly that his life is despaired of. If the owners of such vicious beasts were accountable for the damage they do, they would be more careful in keeping them secure.

Yesterday being the anniversary of his Majesty's birth day, his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant received the compliments of the nobility and gentry, the right hon. the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, Sheriffs, &c. at the castle on the occasion, where the following ode was performed:

Written by Benjamin Victor, Esq; and the music composed by Richard Hay, Esq; chief composer and master of the music attending his majesty's state in Ireland, and master of the king's chamber concert.

At a post assembly held at the Tholiel, in order to elect sheriffs in the room of James Lane and John Penland, Esqrs. who died, to be excused from serving the office, the following eight persons were elected by the commons, and sent to the lord mayor and board of aldermen, for them to choose two out of said number :

Mr. Howison	—	60
Mr. Tomlinson	—	55
Mr. Saunders	—	52
Mr. H. G. Sankey	—	51
Mr. Worthington	—	50
Mr. Rudd	—	46
Mr. Leet	—	45
Mr. Haughton	—	45

whereupon the lord mayor and board of aldermen elected Henry Gore Sankey and Henry Howison, esqrs. sheriffs for the ensuing year.

Letters from Paris of the 7th of April, give an account of the following very extraordinary affair. About ten days since, a coach stopt at twelve o'clock at night at the door of the executioner of Landau, out of which came two men, who asking to speak with the executioner, were introduced into the house. The men were armed and masked, and said they came to fetch him to execute a sentence of death that had been pronounced the day before. The dead hour of the night, and the disguise of the men, looked very suspicious to the hangman, who began to make many excuses, but they obliged him to dress himself and go with them into the carriage. He was scarce seated there, when they blindfolded him with a hood, and drove furiously the remainder of that night and all the next day till dusk, when the coach stopt, and he was led up a pair of stairs, where, his eyes being unbanded, he beheld himself in a very large hall entirely hung with black, and lighted by several flambeaux held by men masked; in the middle of the hall stood a block, with a scimeter on it. The executioner had scarce recovered himself from the terror and astonishment which these objects had caused, when he saw the door open, and ten men, in judges' robes, with their heads covered with crêpe, came in, followed by a lady, conducted by two like men, who led her to the block. She instantly laid her head upon it, without any complaint, or uttering a single word; and the executioner did his office, by severing her head from her body. After they had suffered him to repose himself, and take some refreshments in an adjacent closet, he was brought with the same ceremonies, and in the same manner, within half a league of Landau, where, having paid him very amply, they left him. As soon as the executioner got to town he went and informed the governor of what had happened. He said, he believed they had travelled by cro's roads, and had relays of horses. That it was easy for him to remark that they crossed several rivers; but for the rest, he could not give the least intelligence of the house or castle whither he had been conducted, having seen no part of it but the great hall and the little closet: he entered his protest, that as for the executing his office in that illegal manner, nothing but the imminent danger of his life, which was menaced by the two masked men, who threatened to blow his brains out if he refused, could have urged him to do it.—It is not impossible but it was the unfortunate Madame de Barre, who was the wretched victim.

A few reflections on the situation of the place from whence the executioner was brought, and of her condition since the death of Louis XV. will afford some light on this dark affair.

Landau is a strong fortified city in Alsace, situated but a few leagues from its northern extremity, where Alsace joins to the dutchy of Lorraine; about fifteen leagues north of Strasburgh, and five leagues south east of Spire, and near the banks of the Rhine. The only sovereign German princes in that neighbourhood are the elector palatine, and the princes of the house of Darmstadt, of Wurtzbourg. But Alsace is bordered on the north and west, solely by the dutchy of Lorraine, which by the death of king Stanislaus devolved to the crown of France. In one hour a person, taking any of the roads to Lorraine from Landau, would be out of Alsace; and the numerous branches of the Rhine and other rivers oblige every traveller, in the course of a few leagues, to traverse many of them. Now, it is certain, after the death of the late French king, Madame de Barre was confined near nine months in a convent, (as is the custom of France with all king's mistresses, after their death, to ascertain whether they are pregnant) after her release she was permitted to go to some lands she had in the neighbourhood of Luneville, between that town and Bacarach, both in Lorraine, which place from Landau is but about sixty English miles, a distance that might easily be run by a carriage between midnight and the evening of the next day.

We are assured by good authority from Holyhead, that a rock which stood on the sea strand near Rossollen two miles from that place, and at low water stood dry, had a few days ago split in two equal parts, one division of which, weighing about 15 tons, was removed from its former situation to the distance of 53 yards, going over other rocks, and up a gradual ascent until it rested in a field near the Beach. The cause of this extraordinary movement is variously conjectured by numbers who have viewed it, but it is generally supposed to have been occasioned by lightning.

Memoirs of Mrs. O'Keeffe. With an elegant Engraving of that admired Actress.

MRS. Mary O'Keeffe is daughter of Mr. Heaphy, manager of the theatres of Cork and Limerick, and was born in the city of Cork the 23d of September, 1757; and was educated at a French boarding-school in Aungier-street, Dublin.

As both her father and mother occupied very respectable walks in the drama, it is no wonder that Miss Heaphy very early imbibed an inclination for the stage; she had constant opportunities of observing the best performers, as her parents constantly played in the theatre royal, Dublin, every winter, occupying the theatres of which Mr. Heaphy was manager only during the summer season. Miss therefore continued to treasure up in her youthful mind the observations she made on others performances, and being happy in a good education and good natural parts, did not treasure them up in vain, but however strong her inclination for the stage, she was not permitted to make any trial till after she was married.

Mr. O'Keeffe, for some years had played comedy with great applause, he was looked upon as a promising young actor, had a very good cast of parts and a decent salary. His playing on the same stage with Mr. and Mrs. Heaphy, and generally accompanying them in their summer excursions, gave him frequent opportunities of seeing Miss Heaphy. Her person was very genteel, and rather tall for her age. She attracted his eye, gained his heart, and then

He told his tale, and was a thriving woer.

In short they were married when she was but about sixteen, and the good private character of Mr. O'Keeffe, with his public reputation as an actor soon reconciled Miss Heaphy's parents to the match, which has been already blessed with two children.

Every obstacle to the young lady's coming on the stage being removed, she made her first appearance on Saturday the 18th of March, 1775, in the character of Juliet at the theatre royal in Smock-alley. Her first essay shewed strong marks of great feelings, and an adherence to nature; she appeared to have thoroughly studied and digested the meaning of her author, which she expressed with propriety: her person was pleasing, and she gained very just applause. Since that time she has continued on the stage, and given great satisfaction in many tragic parts; but in none more than in the character of the Countess of Salisbury, in the tragedy of Sir Thomas Over-bury, which she performed in such a manner as to justify every plaudit she received.

Mrs. O'Keefe hath also played many characters in genteel comedy, but that line of acting does not seem so much adapted to her, at present, as tragedy; which is the more to be wondered at, as in a great number of comic characters, her mother stands unrivalled; but as she is yet very young, there is no doubt but time and experience may enlarge her powers, and extend the circle of her playing; especially as she is known to take great pains to become, what there is reason to believe she will be, a finished actress.

Translation of a Memorial presented by Sir Joseph Yorke to the States General, on the 21st of February, 1777.

"SINCE the commencement of the unnatural rebellion, which has broke out in the English colonies against the legal constitution of the mother country, the undersigned ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary of the king of Great Britain, has had frequent occasions to address himself to your High Mightinesses, in the name of his master, to engage them by all motives of national interest, of good neighbourhood, of friendship, and finally of treaties, to put a stop to the clandestine commerce which is carried on between their subjects and the rebels. If the measures which your high mightinesses have thought proper to take had been as efficacious as your assurances have been amicable, the undersigned would not now have been under the disagreeable necessity of bringing to the cognizance of your high mightinesses, facts of the most serious nature.

"The king hath hitherto borne, with unexampled patience, the irregular conduct of your subjects in their interested commerce at St. Eustatia, as also in America. His majesty has always flattered himself, that in giving time to your high mightinesses to examine to the bottom this conduct, so irregular and so insufferable, they would have taken measures necessary to repress the abuse, to restrain their subjects within bounds, and to make them respect the rights and friendship of Great Britain.

"The complaints which I have orders to make to their high mightinesses, are founded upon authentic documents annexed to this memorial, where their high mightinesses will see with astonishment, and I doubt not at the same time with displeasure, that their new governor, Mr. Van Graaf, after having permitted an illicit commerce at St. Eustatia, hath passed his targetfulness of his duty to the point of con-niving at the Americans in their hostile equipments, and the permitting the seizure of an English vessel, by an American pirate, within cannon shot of that island. And in aggravation to the affront given to the English nation, and to all the powers of Europe, to return from the fortress of his government the salute of a rebel flag. In return to the amicable representations made by the president of the neighbouring island of St. Christopher, on these facts of notoriety, Mr. Van Graaf has answered in a manner the most vague and unsatisfactory, refusing to enter at all into the subject, or into an explanation of the matter with a member of his Majesty's council of St. Christopher's, dispatched by the president for that purpose to St. Eustatia.

"After exhibiting the documents annexed, nothing remains with me but to add, that the king who had read them, not with less surprise than indignation, hath ordered me to expressly demand of your high mightinesses, a formal disavowal of the salute by Fort Orange, at St. Eustatia, to the rebel ship, the dismissal and immediate recal of governor Van Graaf, and to declare further, on the part of his majesty, that until that satisfaction is given, they are not to expect that his majesty will suffer himself to be amused by mere assurances, or that he will delay one instant to take such measures as he shall think due to the interests and dignity of his crown.

Copy of a Memorial delivered under the Orders of the States General, to the King of Great Britain, by the Envoy Extraordinary from their High Mightinesses.

S I R E,

"It is with the most profound respect, that the under-signed envoy extraordinary and plenipotentiary of their high mightinesses, in consequence of the orders which he hath received, hath the honour to represent to your majesty, that the memorial which your ambassador hath presented to their high mightinesses on the 21st of last month, has touched them very sensibly; that they find themselves obliged to make complaint of the reproaches which are contained in it, as if their high mightinesses were to be suspected of a will and intention of amuse your majesty by amicable assurances, which they have falsified by their acts; also of the menacing tone which reigns in that memorial, and appears to their high mightinesses too highly strained, beyond that which is the accorded and accustomed customed manner, and that ought to take place between two neighbouring powers, which have beep of so many years continuance, united by the ties of good harmony and mutual friendship.

" Their high mightinesses trust that on all occasions, and particularly in respect to the unfortunate troubles of your majesty's colonies in America, they have held a conduct towards your majesty, which has been expected from a good neighbour, and a friendly and affectionate power.

" Their high mightinesses, sire, hold your majesty's friendship in the highest estimation, and wish to do every thing in their power (as far as the honour and dignity of their state will permit them to go) to cultivate it still more and more; but they cannot at the same time so far restrain themselves, as to disguise the very poignant sensation, with which that memorial hath impressed them.

" It is alone from the motive of demonstrating to your majesty every possible regard, and to prove that their high mightinesses will not neglect any thing, which may serve to investigate properly the truth of the facts, from whence the complaints made to them seem to have arisen, that they have resolved to institute an enquiry in a manner the most summary, and cut off all trainings of delay.

" To this end their high mightinesses, passing by the ordinary and usual form in like cases, requiring a report in writing from their officers and others employed in their colonies, have already dispatched their orders to the commandant of St. Eustatia, to render himself within the republic without delay, and as soon as possible, to give the necessary information of all that has passed within the island of St. Eustatia, and that which hath come to his knowledge relative to the American colonies and their vessels, during the period of his command, and to lay his conduct, touching that matter, before the eyes of their high mightinesses.

" The under-signed is charged by his orders to bring the information of this resolution to your majesty, as also that their high mightinesses make no difficulty of disavowing, in the most express manner, every act or mark of honour which may have been given by their officers, or by any of their servants, to the vessels of your majesty's colonies of North America, or that they may give hereafter, so far as those acts or marks of honour may be of such a nature, as that any can conclude from them that it is intended thereby, in the least degree, to recognize the independence of those colonies.

" The under-signed is also further charged to inform your majesty, that their high mightinesses have, in consequence, given their orders to their governors and councils in the West Indies, and have enjoined them afresh, in the strongest terms, to observe exactly the placards and orders against the exportation of military stores to the American colonies of your majesty, and to see them executed most rigorously.

Account of the Irish Rebellion, from an historical View of the Civil Wars of Ireland.

ON the 23d of October, 1641, the lords justices declared by proclamation, " that a discovery had been made of a most disloyal, and detestable conspiracy, intended by some evil affected Irish Papists, universally throughout the kingdom." This unfair representation has been either ignorantly, or maliciously adopted, by all the adverse writers on this subject. Sir John Temple, out of his abundant malice to these people, has so notably improved upon it, as to affirm, " that on the 23d of October aforesaid, an universal defection, and general revolt, broke out; wherein, not only all the meer Irish, but almost all the old English, that adhered to the church of Rome, were totally involved." And Mr. Hume, in a warm fit of declamation, confidently asserts, " that from Ulster, the flames of this rebellion diffused themselves, in an instant, over the three other provinces."

The abovementioned proclamation gave a just alarm to the Catholic nobility, and gentry, of the kingdom; who knew themselves to be perfectly innocent, and entirely unconscious, of any such conspiracy. The earl of Clanrickard, who had arrived in Ireland some short time before, tells us, that he " was at first, on a sudden surprised, with the fatal news of a desperate rebellion in the North, and a rumour of a general combination, and conspiracy, all over the kingdom. But we begin," adds his lordship, " to recover our wits, scared away by the first reports; and to discern, that none appears in this detestable conspiracy, or enters into action, but the remains of the ancient Irish rebels in the North, and some of the planted county of Leitrim.

In two or three days after the issuing of this proclamation, the lords and gentlemen of the pale, " doubting," says Temple, " that by those general words of Irish Papists, they might seem to be involved," preferred a petition to the lords justices and council, in behalf of themselves, and other old English of the kingdom; whereupon upon the justices, on the 29th of the same month, sent forth another proclamation, in which "they declared, and published, to all his majesty's good subjects, that by the words "Irish Papists," they intended only such of the old meer Irish, in the province of Ulster, as had plotted, contrived, and been actors in that treason, and others, that adhered to them; and none of the old English of the pale, or other parts of the kingdom."

And although their lordships, in this proclamation of the 29th of October, did "enjoin all his majesty's subjects, whether Protestants, or Papists, to forbear upbraiding matter of religion on this occasion;" yet certain it is, that all our adverse historians, preachers, and libellers, from that time to the present, seem to have thought themselves indispensably obliged, not only to upbraid matter of religion as the chief incentive to this insurrection, but also to represent the insurrection itself, as universal all over the kingdom, on the first day, or two, after its eruption.

These, and other misrepresentations, were no sooner devised, than transmitted to the earl of Leicester, lord lieutenant in England; where they acquired still greater, and more extensive credit. Never, indeed, were fiction and calumny introduced to public notice with more pomp, and dignity, than they seem to have been upon that occasion.

For the earl of Leicester, having received intelligence of this insurrection by the lords justices letter of the 25th of October, 1641, repaired, on the first of the following month, to the house of commons, then sitting; whither he was accompanied by the lord keeper of the great seal of England, the lord privy seal, the lord high chamberlain, the lord admiral, earl March, lord chamberlain, earl of Bath, earl of Dorset, earl of Holland, earl of Berkshire, lord viscount Say and Seal, lord Goring, and lord Wilmot, in grand procession; when his excellency communicated the papers and letters, sent by the lords justices; and told them, that he had information of shedding much blood of the Protestants of Ireland; and that some of the rebels confessed, that all the Protestants were to be cut off; and that they were not to leave any British men, women, or children alive: that the time for putting this bloody design in execution, was upon Saturday, the 23d of October, a day dedicated to St. Ignatius, the founder of the Jesuits; and in short, that their design was to kill the lords justices, and all the king's privy council. The like information was given, by the lord keeper, and other lords, and in the same solemn manner, to the house of lords.

The falsehood of this representation, with respect to the design of these insurgents, is so very notorious, that even a writer, otherwise highly prejudiced against them, could not pass it over uncensured. "Both the lord-keeper in the house of lords, and the lord lieutenant in the house of commons," says Dr. Warner, "did exceed the informations that had been given, either in the letters, or in the examinations transmitted over. No historian," adds he, "hath taken notice of this falsification; and yet one cannot believe that it was owing in both to accident, or mistake. The lord keeper hath said, that the rebels had committed divers murders; and the lord lieutenant, besides affirming that they had information of shedding much blood of the Protestants there, added moreover, that the design of the rebels was to kill the lords justices, and all the king's privy-council; whereas neither in the letters, nor the examinations, is there a single word of any murder being committed; nor was there the least thought among the conspirators, for any thing that appears, of killing, particularly, the lords justices and the king's privy-council. And the council in their letters, after having given an account of several robberies, burning houses and villages, and seizing some forts and castles, expressly say, and this though too much, is all that we yet hear is done by them."

There is but little wonder, that so shocking a calumny, thus solemnly delivered, by persons of honour, to an august assembly, should make a general and lasting expression, on a credulous, and prejudiced people; but the reader will please to reflect, that if so many persons of the first quality, living at a distance from the danger and mischiefs of this insurrection; and therefore, uninfluenced by fear or revenge, could, for their own evil purposes, circulate such horrid falsehoods concerning it, how little stress ought to be laid on the evidence, or testimonies of some of the meanest of the adverse party at home, who were either exasperated by the injuries they themselves had suffered, or scared out of their wits by the shocking stories they had heard of those committed on others, when they were called upon to give such evidence. And yet, the testimony of persons so prejudiced, and otherwise unduly influenced, is the principal, if not only foundation, on which the belief of the Irish massacre has hitherto rested, and has so generally, not to say uncontrovertedly, prevailed.

The Generous Servant: or, Virtue in a low Rank of Life exemplified.

BELMONT and Celfus lived like true friends together; and, as if each thought the other's interest his own, they mutually supplied each other with money, as exigencies on either side required; and neither desired better interest or security than the assurance each had of his respective good offices being placed out to sufficient advantage, by being firmly rooted in the kind memory of each other. At length Celfus was called away to another quarter of the world. Never did friends part with more reluctance than these, and their sorrow was increased by the uncertainty when they should meet again.

Much about this time Belmont's servant, whose name was Fido, having been formerly bred to a trade, and got a little stock by means of his master's generosity and his own frugality, had thoughts of setting up in the world. His master, when he discharged him, added to the salary he paid him a very handsome present, and wished him good fortune in the world with it, with such condescension as made the wish more endearing than the present. "After that wish, I cannot fail of it, Sir," said the generous menial, with tears in his eyes; and, with a polite honesty above his condition, which he had imbibed from his master, he added, "If it be my lot to thrive in the world, amidst all my pleasures, the greatest satisfaction I can have, will be to tell the congratulating friends about me that the good word of my honoured master Belmont was the first source of my reputation and credit, as his favour was the first foundation of my fortune."

After this, poor Belmont met with many cross accidents, which reduced him to narrower circumstances than suited his liberal and large a soul. He, who delighted in extricating others out of troubles, at any expence, was now involved in great difficulties himself. In a word, his affairs were brought to that extremity, that a certain sum must be paid by him on such a day, or he must be exposed to such distress as is painful to think might fall to the share of so generous a man, the being asked for money which he was incapable of paying.

The day drew near, and he had tried every measure, but tried in vain, to make provision for it. He was acquainted with many persons of fashion, who had been lavish of their promises and vows of friendship, profuse in their prodigality, in offering their services at times when they knew they had no room to proceed beyond the bare offer. The unhappy Belmont tried all his professing friends, and to a man found them all false.

At this juncture he was informed that his beloved Celfus was returned to England, blessed with an abundance, and settled within a few miles of London. On him were Belmont's eyes turned for comfort in his distress. Anticipating the pleasure it would give him again to meet the man whose mind he thought the counterpart of his own, he arrives at the house of his friend: he is received with all the warmth he expected, and, after some conversation, opened his complaint, and told the story of the usage he had met with.

Strange as it may sound, gentle reader, Belmont's story was as unprofitable in the ears of Celfus, as if all his present sufferings, and their former friendship, had been a fable. Celfus had been in France, had quite lost the Briton, and had learned, among other fashions, to be complaisantly false.

As Belmont returned home across the fields, loaded with heavy reflections, and thinking that he could have laughed at the disappointments which he had met with from a hundred triflers, had not Celfus proved a trisler too, whom should he meet but his old man Fido, who was walking out with an intention to lie that night at his country lodgings for the benefit of the air. But meeting his master, and observing him to be very melancholy, insisted upon walking back part of the way with him, and implored him to impart the cause of the dejection so visible in his countenance. At length Belmont, half smiling, said, "Thou can't not help me in it, honest Fido!" Then, with a sigh, "Ah! now I think of it, I will tell thee, for thou knowest Celfus; thou must remember him." "Sir," replied Fido, "and ever shall; I cannot forget your best and dearest friend, your other self: I hope in Heaven he is not dead!" "Have patience, honest Fido," said Belmont, and told him the whole story.—Just as he had finished, they reached a little public-house on the road. Fido, without answering, begged him to walk in, called for pen, ink, and paper, and wrote a note for the money, which was something under a hundred pounds, and, giving it to his master, said thus: "I am glad at my heart it was a sum within my power to help you to, without breaking in upon my stock and my credit; because then, though this is nothing, the trial would have been hard: but, speaking sincerely, I believe I should have parted with it all for for you; for, Sir, I owe it all to you."

The contrast between Celsus and Fido is striking! The principles of generosity and gratitude made this menial servant a truly honourable character; while the want of those shining qualities ought to render the man of education and affluent fortune truly despicable.

An Account of the first Voyage of Columbus to the West Indies, from Robertson's History of America.

AFTER all the endeavours and efforts of Isabella and Columbus, the armament was not suitable either to the dignity of the nation by which it was equipped, or to the importance of the service for which it was destined. It consisted of three vessels only. The largest, a ship of no considerable burden, was commanded by Columbus, as admiral, who gave it the name of Sancta Maria; out of respect for the blessed virgin, whom he honoured with singular devotion. Of the second, called the Pinta, Martin Pinzon was captain, and his brother Francis pilot. The third, named the Nigna, was under the command of Vincent Yanez Pinzon. These two were light vessels, hardly superior in burden or force to large boats. This squadron, if it merits that name, was victualled for twelve months, and had on board ninety men, most sailors, together with a few adventurers who followed the fortune of Columbus, and some gentlemen of Isabella's court, whom she appointed to accompany him. Though the expence of the undertaking was one of the circumstances that chiefly alarmed the court of Spain, and retarded so long the negotiation with Columbus, the sum employed in fitting out this squadron did not exceed four thousand pounds.

As the art of shipbuilding in the fifteenth century, was extremely rude, and the bulk and construction of vessels were accommodated to the short and easy voyages along the coast which they were accustomed to perform, it is a proof of the courage as well as enterprising genius of Columbus, that he ventured, with a fleet so unfit for a distant navigation, to explore unknown seas, where he had no chart to guide him, no knowledge of the tides and currents, and no experience of the dangers to which he might be exposed. His eagerness to accomplish the great design which had so long engrossed his thoughts, made him overlook or disregard every circumstance that would have intimidated a mind less adventurous. He pushed forward the preparations with such ardour, and was seconded so effectually by the persons to whom Isabella committed the superintendence of this business, that every thing was soon in readiness for the voyage. But as Columbus was deeply impressed with sentiments of religion, he would not set out upon an expedition so arduous, and of which one great object was to extend the knowledge of the Christian faith, without imploring publicly the guidance and protection of heaven. With this view, he, together with all the persons under his command, marched in solemn procession to the monastery of Rábida. After confessing their sins, and obtaining absolution from them, they received the holy sacrament from the hands of the prior, who joined his prayers to theirs for the success of an enterprise which he had so zealously patronized.

Next morning, being Friday the 3d day of August, in the year 1492, Columbus set sail, a little before sun rise, in presence of a vast crowd of spectators, who sent up their supplications to heaven for the prosperous issue of the voyage, which they wished, rather than expected. Columbus steered directly for the Canary Islands, and arrived there without any occurrence that would have deserved notice on any other occasion. But, in a voyage of such expectation and importance, every circumstance was the object of attention. The rudder of the Pinta broke loose, the day after they left the harbour, and that accident alarmed the crew, no less superstitious than unskilful, as a certain omen of the unfortunate destiny of the expedition. Even in the short run to the Canaries, the ships were found to be so crazy and ill appointed, as to be very improper for a navigation which was expected to be both long and dangerous. Columbus reftit them, however, to the best of his power, and having supplied himself with fresh provisions, he took his departure from Gomera, one of the most westerly of the Canary Islands, on the 6th day of September.

Here the voyage of discovery may properly be said to begin; for Columbus holding his course due west, left immediately, the usual tract of navigation, and stretched into unfrequented and unknown seas. The first day, as it was very calm, he made but little way; but on the second, he lost sight of the Canaries; and many of the sailors, dejected already and dismayed, when they contemplated the boldness of the undertaking, began to beat their breasts, and to shed tears, as if they were never more to behold land. Columbus comforted them with assurances of success, and the prospect of vast wealth, in those opulent opulent regions whither he was conducting them. This early discovery of the spirit of his followers taught Columbus that he must prepare to struggle, not only with the unavoidable difficulties which might be expected from the nature of his undertaking, but with such as were likely to arise from the ignorance and timidity of the people under his command; and he perceived that the art of governing the minds of men would be no less requisite for accomplishing the discoveries which he had in view, than naval skill and an enterprising courage. Happily for himself, and for the country by which he was employed, he joined to the ardent temper and inventive genius of a projector, virtues of another species, which are rarely united with them. He possessed a thorough knowledge of mankind, an insinuating address, a patient perseverance in executing any plan, the perfect government of his own passions, and the talent of acquiring the direction of those of other men. All these qualities, which formed him for command, were accompanied with that superior knowledge of his profession, which begets confidence in times of difficulty and danger. To unskilful Spanish sailors, accustomed only to coasting voyages in the Mediterranean, the maritime science of Columbus, the fruit of thirty years experience, improved by an acquaintance with all the inventions of the Portuguese, appeared immense. As soon as he put to sea, he regulated every thing by his sole authority; he superintended the execution of every order; and allowing himself only a few hours for sleep, he was at all other times upon deck. As his course lay through seas which had not formerly been visited, the sounding-line, or instruments for observation, were continually in his hands. After the example of the Portuguese discoverers, he attended to the motion of tides and currents, watched the flight of birds, the appearance of fishes, of sea-weeds, and of every thing that floated on the waves, and entered every occurrence, with a minute exactness, in the journal which he kept. As the length of the voyage could not fail of alarming sailors habituated only to short excursions, Columbus endeavoured to conceal from them the real progress which they made. With this view, tho' they ran eighteen leagues on the second day after they left Gomera, he gave out that they had advanced only fifteen, and he uniformly employed the same artifice of reckoning short during the whole voyage. By the 14th of September the fleet was above two hundred leagues to the west of the Canary Isles, at a greater distance from land than any Spaniard had been before that time. There they were struck with an appearance no less astonishing than it was new. They observed that the magnetic needle, in their compasses, did not point exactly to the polar star, but varied a degree towards the west; and as they proceeded this variation increased. This appearance, which is now familiar, though it still remains one of the mysteries of nature, into the cause of which the sagacity of man has not been able to penetrate, filled the companions of Columbus with terror. They were now in a boundless unknown ocean, far from the usual course of navigation; nature itself seemed to be altered, and the only guide which they had left was about to fail them. Columbus, with no less quickness, than ingenuity, invented a reason for this appearance, which, though it did not satisfy himself, seemed so plausible to them, as dispelled their fears, or silenced their murmurs.

He still continued to steer due west, nearly in the same latitude with the Canary Islands. In this course he came within the sphere of the trade wind, which blows invariably from east to west; between the tropics; and a few degrees beyond them. He advanced before this steady gale with such uniform rapidity, that it was seldom necessary to shift a sail. When about four hundred leagues to the west of the Canaries, he found the sea so covered with weeds, that it had a resemblance to a meadow of vast extent; and in some places they were so thick, as to retard the motion of the vessels. This strange appearance occasioned new alarm and disquiet. The sailors imagined that they were now arrived at the utmost boundary of the navigable ocean; that these floating weeds would obstruct their farther progress, and concealed dangerous rocks, or some large tract of land, which had sunk, they knew not how, in that place. Columbus endeavoured to persuade them, that the appearance which had alarmed, ought rather to have encouraged them, and was to be considered as a sign of approaching land. At the same time a brisk gale arose, and carried them forward. Several birds were seen hovering about the ship, and directing their flight towards the west. The desponding crew resumed some degree of spirit, and began to entertain fresh hopes.

Upon the first of October they were, according to the admiral's reckoning, seven hundred and seventy leagues to the westward of the Canaries, but lest his men should be intimidated by the prodigious length of the navigation, he gave out that they had proceeded only five hundred and eighty-eighty-four leagues; and, fortunately for Columbus, neither his own pilot, nor those of the other ships, had skill sufficient to correct this error, and discover the deceit. They had now been above three weeks at sea; they had proceeded far beyond what former navigators had attempted or deemed possible; all their prognostics of discovery, drawn from the flight of birds and other circumstances, had proved fallacious; the appearances of land, with which their own credulity, or the artifice of their commander had from time to time flattered and amused them, had been altogether illusive, and their prospect of success seemed now to be as distant as ever. These reflections occurred often to men, who had no other object or occupation, than to reason and discourse concerning the intention and circumstances of their expedition. They made impression, at first, upon the ignorant and timid, and extending, by degrees, to such as were better informed, or more resolute, the contagion spread at length from ship to ship. From secret whispers and murmurings, they proceeded to open cabals and public complaints. They taxed their sovereign with inconsiderate credulity, in paying such regard to the vain promises and rash conjectures of an indigent foreigner, as to hazard the lives of so many of her own subjects, in prosecuting a chimerical scheme. They affirmed that they had fully performed their duty, by venturing so far in an unknown and hopeless course, and could incur no blame for refusing, at last, to follow a desperate adventurer to certain destruction. They contended, that it was necessary to think of returning to Spain, while their crazy vessels were still in a condition to keep the sea, but expressed their fears that the attempt would prove vain, as the wind, which had hitherto been so favourable to their course, must render it impossible to sail in the opposite direction. All agreed that Columbus should be compelled by force to adopt a measure on which their common safety depended. Some of the more audacious proposed, as the most expeditious and certain method for getting rid at once of his remonstrances, to throw him into the sea, being persuaded that, upon their return to Spain, the death of an unsuccessful projector would excite little concern, and be inquired into with no curiosity.

Columbus was fully sensible of his perilous situation. He had observed, with great concern, the fatal operation of ignorance and of fear in producing disaffection among his crew, and saw that it was now ready to burst out into open mutiny. He retained, however, perfect presence of mind. He affected to seem ignorant of their machinations. Notwithstanding the agitation and solicitude of his own mind, he appeared with a cheerful countenance, like a man satisfied with the progress which he had made, and confident of success. Sometimes he employed all the arts of insinuation to soothe his men. Sometimes he endeavoured to work upon their ambition or avarice, by magnificent descriptions of the same and wealth which they were about to acquire. On other occasions he assumed a tone of authority, and threatened them with vengeance from their sovereign, if, by their dastardly behaviour, they should defeat this noble effort to promote the glory of God, and to exalt the Spanish name above that of every other nation. Even with seditious sailors, the words of a man whom they have been accustomed to reverence, were weighty and persuasive. They not only restrained them from those violent excesses, which they meditated, but prevailed with them to accompany their admiral for some time longer.

As they proceeded, the indications of approaching land seemed to be more certain, and excited hope in proportion. The birds began to appear in flocks, making towards the south-west. Columbus, in imitation of the Portuguese navigators, who had been guided in several of their discoveries, by the motion of birds, altered his course from due west towards that quarter whither they pointed their flight. But, after holding on several days in this new direction, without any better success, than formerly, having seen no object, during thirty days, but the sea and the sky, their hopes subsided faster than they had risen; their fears revived with additional force; impatience, rage, and despair appeared in every countenance. All sense of subordination was lost: the officers, who had hitherto concurred with Columbus in opinion, and supported his authority, now took part with the men; they assembled tumultuously on the deck, expostulated with their commander, mingled threats with their expostulations, and required him instantly to tack about and return to Europe. Columbus perceived that it would be of no avail to have recourse to any of his former arts, which having been tried so often, had lost their effects; and that it was impossible to rekindle any zeal for the success of the enterprise among men, in whose breasts fear had extinguished every generous sentiment. He saw that it was no less vain to think of employing either gentle or severe measures, to quell a mutiny so general and so violent.

ON Wednesday, May 28, a new Mock-tragedy called The Taylors, was performed at the theatre in the Hay-market. The art of management, like that of authorship, lies principally in suiting the species of entertainment to the public caprice. That part of the people, which from ennui, from weariness, and from want of materials for thought and conversation, daily resorts to the play-houses, is not very respectable for its judgment and taste, and is variable and capricious in its inclinations. It is now weary of weeping, and its passion is for laughter; and puns and witticisms, and surprizes and situations are the best provocatives to it. We therefore commend the judgment of Mr. Colman in introducing the comic tragedy of The Taylors, which we think a first rate composition and performance, according to the present humour of the theatrical public.

We afterwards attended at a different entertainment at Drury-lane; where a farce of two acts was performed, called St. Helena, or The Island of Love. The muse of Capt. Edward Thompson is not a laughter-loving muse. We thought our circumstances very singular that night; for we laughed as heartily as critics may be allowed to do at a tragedy; and we had almost gone to sleep at a comedy. Capt. Thompson may be a very good officer, and a very good man, but we think he has no chance of acquiring laurels from Apollo.

On Monday, June 9, Goldsmith's comedy of She Stoops to Conquer, and the farce of Midas, were performed at this theatre, and got up in a manner that did honour to the management of Mr. Colman. The young lady (Miss Farren) who made her first appearance in the character of Miss Hardcastle, and Miss Twiss, who performed the part of Nyssa in Midas, were not introduced as young performers have lately been, in any parts which they chose for themselves. A little experience will make them what they now promise to be, very agreeable and useful.

On Wednesday, June 11, Henderson, from the Bath theatre, performed the part of Shylock in the Merchant of Venice, for the first time in London. Mr. Henderson has been mentioned as a man of considerable industry and capacity in his profession by good judges of theatrical merit, and he has been injudiciously extolled by his friends as another Garrick, or another Roscius. This folly might have been fatal to him, if he had made his first appearance in Lear or in Richard. In Shylock he had not a Roscius to overshadow him; for though Macklin be the best Shylock we have lately, or perhaps ever seen, he is far from being unexceptionable in the character. Mr. Henderson, on his first appearance, looked sufficiently Jewish, and seemed to have carefully studied the part he was to act. The same care and industry appeared in the impassioned scenes, in the prison, and at the final decision; but the variation of the passions was not discriminated with sufficient nicety; the poise of his body, and all his action, in violent emotions, were such as an elderly man is incapable of; and he pronounced the several interesting and emphatical passages too much alike. On the whole, however, Mr. Henderson discovers so much capacity, judgment, and attention, that he cannot fail of moving in the first rank among our present performers.

On Thursday, the 19th inst. Polly, an opera, was performed for the first time, being the sequel of the Beggar's Opera, and written by Mr. Gay.

This piece is so well known to our readers (for all our readers must be acquainted with the works of Mr. Gay) that we need not tell them the story of it.

Mr. Gay was one of those very few poets who drew his characters wholly from nature, and never gave them more virtues, or more vices, nay, never more wit or repartee, than might be found in living characters. In the Beggar's Opera he had painted vice as successful and alluring. Every body admired the truth and costume of the piece, and almost every body blamed the morality of the poet, as they sagaciously observed, he might have executed poetical justice on his malefactors. Mr. Gay was too true to manners and customs to have recourse to the tricks of poetical justice; he therefore did as divines have done, he transported his sinners to another world. Convinced that justice could not be done in Europe upon offenders merely as such, and consistent with his accurate idea of probability, he sent them into the West Indies, and there he did not so much as seem to give up his moral. This seems to us to have given rise to the sequel of his Beggar's Opera, which, though much inferior to that model of operatical composition, yet every where discovers the hand of a master. Mr. Colman's alterations are judicious; the music on the whole is good; and the performers did great justice to their parts. The young lady (Miss Boyde) who first appeared peared in the character of Polly, has a good voice; and, what is almost as important, she seems to have a good understanding. Under the direction of Mr. Colman, she may in time be a very agreeable performer.

Rural Masquerade.

On Thursday evening, the 19th inst. Mrs. Cornelys closed her sessions of festivity with a Rural Masquerade, and by a magic touch, peculiar to herself, made the sons and daughters of pleasure view the landscapes of Arcadia in the rooms of Soho. There were above four hundred masks present; the principal of which were—two Jew shoe-blacks; an Israelite money-lender; a gouty old man; a highlander; four sailors; a whole posse of Maie bunters; two Harlequins; a waggoner; a pantaloons; a Welch pauper; a man with a May-day garland; a turnery-ware hawker; a Quaker, and an Italian doctor. In order to preserve the idea of a Rural Masquerade, the great room and the tea room were ornamented with large trees, and bordered with flowers and flowering shrubs, various coloured lamps being carelessly disposed among the branches of the trees. After supper some stuck to their bottle, whilst others retired to the ball-room, and entertained themselves with dancing English country dances, cotillons, allemandes, &c. Some strolled about the rooms finding out adventures and acquaintances. Some males made love under a tree, others under a mask, and some females “unmasked their beauties” to the lamps.

Ranelagh.

The Grand Gala Concert on Tuesday, the 24th inst. did not turn out so brilliant an assembly as was expected. The rain which fell on that day, and had fallen so heavily for some days preceding, not only damped the gardens, but damped the spirit of the public; the consequence was, those who did attend, seemed chagrined and disappointed at there being so few present. Till past eleven, the number of persons in the rotunda did not amount to more than three hundred; and in the gardens there were only a few stragglers, who either just ventured to take the air and a peep at the illuminations of the bridge, &c. at the same time, or were necessitated for a moment to withdraw from the comfortable rotunda. About twelve, at which hour the company seemed most numerous, there might be six hundred in all, and to say the truth, a large party of those were of the first fashion; the duke of Cumberland, duke and duchess of Devonshire, lords Carlisle, Antrim, Lyttelton, Abergavenny, Coleraine, Northington, Sir Ralph Payne, and as many of the long list of noble personages who generally frequent Ranelagh as were in town, being of the company. The rotunda was most beautifully illuminated, and the orchestra filled with a fine, full band, who played various pieces of music, (selected by, and under the direction of Mr. Symphon) and accompanied Messrs. Reinhold, Meredith, &c. in a number of songs, catches, &c. &c. till twelve o'clock, when the great boxes up stairs, in the different parts of the rooms, were occupied by different parties of performers on wind instruments, who played to the catch-fingers till past one in the morning. Not a single dance was to be seen, unless the tedious perambulation of company round the room can be called dancing. The refreshments were tea, coffee, orgeat, lemonade, iced creams, and various sorts of cakes from the oven of the confectioners.

Mr. Temple Luttrell, who planned the above entertainment, is said to have been a considerable loser by it, having only expended six hundred guineas for the use of the gardens, and expences of the concert.

The Natural History of a Macaroni.

THERE has within these few years past arrived from France and Italy a very strange animal, of the doubtful gender, in shape somewhat between a man and monkey, which has generated so much within that time, that they form at present no inconsiderable groupe in most of the public circles about town.

Its natural height is somewhat inferior to the ordinary size of men, though by the artificial height of their heels, they in general reach that standard; the face is quite effeminate, but sometimes distinguished by a little hair growing on it like a beard; the fore legs, or arms, are disproportionably long, the hind legs of a slender make.

Its dress is neither in the habit of a man or woman, but peculiar to itself, and varying with the day; at present it is principally discovered by an Indian flesh-coloured cloth, or silk, clasped all over with broad shining steel, and buttoned at the neck with a large black collar; it can walk on its hind legs but badly, though it has been known to creep upon all-fours, on many occasions, with great quickness and dexterity.

As this animal is apparently of the monkey kind, its actions (when admitted into the company of men) are apt to be exceedingly impertinent; which would often subject them to severe chastisement, did not nature, who is provident in the meanest of qualifying them to discharge their duty in their various allotments in the world.

Marriage implies union and concurrence, as well in spiritual as temporal concerns. Whilst the parties differ in religion, they stand disunited in the main point, even that which should increase and confirm their mutual happiness, and render them meet-helpers and blessings to each other. Where it is otherwise, the reciprocal obligation they have entered into becomes their burthen, and the more so, as it may not be of a short and transient duration. Whatever felicity they might expect, or flatter themselves with, in the beginning, they have found themselves disappointed of, by the daily uneasiness accompanying their minds, and imbittering their enjoyments.

The perplexed situation of the offspring of such alliances is likewise to be lamented. Attached by nature to both parents, the confusion they are in often renders them unfixed in principle, and unsettled in practice; or if, as it is usual, the sons go with the father, and the daughters with the mother, brothers and sisters are trained up in lines of conduct diverse from, and, in some cases, opposite to, each other. Thus, differing in principle, they are frequently divided in affection, and, though so nearly related, are sometimes at the greatest distance from that love and harmony which ought continually to subsist between them.

To prevent falling into these disagreeable and disorderly engagements, it is requisite to beware of the paths that lead to them—the fordid interests and ensnaring friendships of the world, the contaminating pleasures and idle pastimes of earthly minds; also the various solicitations and incentives to festivity and dissipation. Let them likewise especially avoid too frequent and too familiar converse with those from whom may arise a danger of entanglement, by their alluring the passions, and drawing the affections after them.

For want of due watchfulness, and obedience to the convictions of divine grace in their consciences, many amongst us, as well as others, have wounded their own souls, distressed their friends, injured their families, and done great disservice to the church, by these unequal connections, which have proved an inlet to much degeneracy, and mournfully affected the minds of those who labour under a living concern for the good of all, and the prosperity of truth upon earth.

Finally, brethren, that ye may be of those concerning whom the Lord said formerly, by his prophet, “This people have I formed for myself; they shall shew forth my praise;” Isaiah xliii. 21. we beseech you, cleave to him with full purpose of heart, trust in him, be willingly subject to the reproofs of instruction, and the guidance of divine grace, that ye may be kept in brotherly love, and walk in wisdom towards those that are without, giving no occasion of stumbling or offence to any, either in word or deed; but, by a circumspect and savoury conversation, ministering to the help of those whose eyes are upon you, to observe how your conduct answers the holy principle of your profession.

May the God of all grace sanctify your hearts by the effectual operation of his holy spirit, that, in the conclusion, he may receive you into his kingdom of unchangeable purity, peace, and glory!

Signed, SAMPSON LLOYD, Junior.

S I R,

[Notwithstanding the astonishing Success which has attended Inoculation, there are many Persons who, through Fear, or some conscientious Motives, cannot prevail upon themselves to submit to that salutary Practice; altho’ their Terror must be greatly increased, and constantly awakened, by the danger they are every Day exposed to, during the present general Mode of Inoculating.—Such Persons are greatly to be pitied; and, in order to alleviate their distresses, I must beg Leave, through your useful Repository, to lay before them and the Public a most probable Method of preventing their receiving Infection, and the Contagion from spreading.]

IN the year 1772, May the 12th, there appeared in the London Gazette an account from Russia, which contained a new method of preventing the plague, by means of fumigation; dated Petersburg, March 27. It is as follows:

“The commission at Moscow having, in the last year, invented a fumigation powder, which, from several lesser experiments, had proved efficacious in preventing the infection of the plague: in order more fully to ascertain its virtue, in that respect, it was determined, towards the end of the year, that ten malefactors, under sentence of death, should, without undergoing any other precautions than the fumigations, be confined three weeks in a lazaretto; be laid upon the beds, and dressed in the cloaths, which had been used by persons sick, dying, and even dead, of the plague, in the hospital. The experiment was accordingly tried; and none of the ten malefactors were then infected, or have been since ill. The fumigation powder is prepared as follows:

Powder

Powder of the first strength.

Take leaves of juniper, juniper-berries pounded, ears of wheat, guaiacum-wood pounded, of each six pounds; common salt-petre pounded, eight pounds; sulphur pounded, six pounds; Smyrna tar or myrrh, two pounds: mix all the above ingredients together.

Powder of the second strength.

Take southernwood or mugwort cut into small pieces, five pounds; leaves of juniper cut into small pieces, four pounds; juniper-berries pounded, three pounds; common salt-petre pounded, four pounds; sulphur pounded, two pounds and an half; Smyrna tar, or myrrh, one pound and an half: mix together.

Odoriferous Powder.

Take the root called kalmus, cut into small pieces, three pounds; frankincense pounded grossly, one pound; storax pounded, and rose flowers, half a pound; yellow amber pounded, one pound; Smyrna tar, or myrrh, one pound; common salt-petre pounded, one pound and an half; sulphur, a quarter of a pound: mix all the above together.

Remark. If guaiacum cannot be had, the cones of pines or firs may be used in its stead; likewise, the common tar of pines and firs may be used instead of the Smyrna tar or myrrh; and mugwort may supply the place of southernwood.

If such means were powerful enough to prevent the plague, there can be little doubt of their being equally efficacious, with regard to the small-pox; considering how much more subtle and destructive the contagious particles of the one distemper are, than those of the other.—In support of the great probability of preventing the small-pox by fumigation, I give the following matter of fact:—A person in a neighbouring village fell sick with the confluent small-pox; three of his family never had it; they continued in the same house with the sick person, all the time of his illness; they fumigated themselves and the house every morning and evening, and remained free from infection. Two of them received the small-pox from inoculation, about a year after, upon their going out to service.—

Two also, of a family living in a detached but very adjacent house, most probably, escaped the infection by fumigating themselves twice a day. The following is the composition of the powder:—

Take frankincense and * gum olibanum, of each grossly pounded four ounces; myrrh, three ounces; salt-petre, two ounces; sulphur, one ounce; mix into a powder.

N O T E.

* Or storax, two ounces.

A chafing-dish of light wood coals was placed in the middle of the room, into which a quantity of the powder was thrown, sufficient to afford a strong scent and smoke—A piece of juniper-wood was also burning at the same time—Where that cannot be had, it would be as well to add some juniper-berries pounded.

MEDICUS.

Anecdote of a Portuguese Courtesan.

WE have received the following anecdote from a gentleman just arrived from Lisbon, who assures us that the circumstance was so industriously concealed in that city, that it is no wonder it has not made its way into the public prints in other countries: but we are authorized to say that the authenticity of it may be relied on.

During the last winter, a courtesan of the city above mentioned laid out her lure so effectually for a young English gentleman, that he could hardly fail of making an acquaintance with her. When this had taken place, her conduct was so very reserved, that she passed herself upon him, for some time, as a woman of virtue, who had fallen in love with him. After frequent visits, however, he found his mistake, and was admitted to visit her one evening, on terms of more than usual familiarity. The glass had circulated, the lovers were elevated, and preparing to retire for the night, when a man, in the habit of a priest, advanced from behind the bed curtains, produced a sword, claimed the lady as his wife, and threatened to destroy the Englishman, if he did not pay a considerable sum of money, as a compensation for the intended injury. The young gentleman was alarmed: an incensed husband before him, and a drawn sword at his breast, were no very agreeable company: but affecting to feel in his pocket for money, he put by the sword, wrenched it out of the hand of the priest, and producing a loaded pistol, which prudence had provided him with, he said, "Now, Mr. Priest, if you please, jump out of that window. Nay—no hesitations—take the leap, or receive the balls through your head."—The priest begged, prayed, entreated; but in vain—the youth was inexorable, and at length he took the lover's leap. The Englishman immediately retired, happy to have so easily extricated himself from so disagreeable a situation. The next morning it was reported that a priest was found in the street, with both his legs broke; but no one could tell by what accident; and the young gentleman was not forward to discover the secret.

The Life of Oliver Cromwell.

CROMWELL (Oliver) lord protector of the commonwealth of England, was honourably descended, both on his father's and mother's side. His father, Mr. Robert Cromwell, was the second son of sir Henry Cromwell, of Hinchinbrooke, in the county of Huntingdon: his mother was the daughter of Sir Richard Stewart, of the Isle of Ely. He was born in the parish of St. John, Huntingdon, on the 25th of April, 1599, and was educated in grammar-learning at the free-school in that town; from whence, at the age of seventeen, he removed to Sidney-college, in Cambridge. He discovered more inclination to an active, than to a speculative life; and, of consequence, made but small progress in his studies. On the death of his father he returned home, where the irregularity of his conduct gave his mother so much uneasiness, that, by the advice of her friends, she sent him to London, and placed him in Lincoln's-Inn. The study of the law, however, did not long agree with him; and having an estate of between four and five hundred pounds a year left him by his uncle, (which fell to him very seasonably, as he had nearly dissipated all that he inherited from his father) he settled in the country, and became as remarkably sober and religious, as he had been before vicious and extravagant. He married Elizabeth, daughter of sir James Bouchier of Essex, a woman of spirit and discernment. From accident or intrigue, he was chosen member for the town of Cambridge, in the long parliament; but he seemed at first to possess no talents for oratory, his person being ungraceful, his dress slovenly, his elocution homely, tedious, obscure, and embarrassed. Upon the breaking out of the civil war, he raised a troop of horse for the parliament's service; and being endowed with unshaken intrepidity, much dissimulation, and a thorough conviction of the rectitude of his cause, he rose, through the gradations of preferment to the post of lieutenant-general under lord Fairfax; but, in reality, possessing the supreme command over the whole army. After several victories, he gained the battle of Naseby; and this, with other successes, soon put an end to the war. In the year 1649, Cromwell was sent general into Ireland, when in about nine months he subdued almost the whole kingdom, and leaving his son-in-law Ireton to complete the conquest, returned to England. The next year he was appointed general and commander in chief of all the forces of the commonwealth, and set out on his march against the Scots, who had received king Charles II. On the 3d of September, 1651, he totally defeated the royalists at Worcester; after which, he returned in triumph to London, where he was met by the speaker of the house of commons, accompanied by the mayor and magistrates of the city, in their formalities. On the 19th of April, 1653, he called a council of officers, to debate concerning the government; while they were sitting, colonel Ingolfsby came and informed them, that the parliament had framed a bill to continue themselves till the 5th of November in the next year, proposing to fill up the house by new elections; whereupon the general marched directly to Westminster, with a body of three hundred men, placed his soldiers about the house, entered first himself, and having turned out all the members, ordered the door to be locked; then putting the key in his pocket, he returned to Whitehall. On the 16th of December, the same year, Cromwell was invested with the title of Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland. Being thus placed at the head of the government, he exercised his authority with great spirit and vigour. He caused the brother of the Portuguese ambassador, who had killed a man, to be seized, tried, and executed. He made war upon Spain, and took from her the island of Jamaica; and being excellently served by Blake, Montague, and other gallant officers, he raised the glory of England to the highest pitch. He died of a tertian ague, on the 3d of September, 1658, the anniversary of the victories he had obtained at Dunbar and Worcester; and his death was immediately followed by one of the most violent tempests which had blown in the memory of man. His body was interred with regal pomp in Westminster-abbey; but, after the restoration it was taken out of its grave, and buried under the gallows at Tyburn.

“Oliver Cromwell (says an historian) was of a robust make and constitution, and his aspect was manly, though clownish. His education extended no further than a superficial knowledge of the Latin tongue; but he inherited great talents from nature, though they were such as he could not have exerted to advantage at any other juncture than that of a civil war inflamed by religious contests. His character was formed from an amazing conjunction of enthusiasm, hypocrisy, and ambition. He was possessed of courage and resolution that overlooked all danger, and saw no difficulty. He dived into the characters of mankind with wonderful sagacity; while he concealed his own purposes under the impenetrable shield of dissimulation. He reconciled the most atrocious crimes to the most rigid notions of religious obligation. From the severest exercise of devotion he relaxed into the most ludicrous and idle buffoonery. He preserved the dignity and distance of his character in the midst of the coarsest familiarity. He was cruel and tyrannical from policy; just and temperate from inclination; perplexed and despicable in his discourse; clear and consummate in his designs; ridiculous in his reveries; respectable in his conduct: in a word, the strangest compound of villainy and virtue, baseness and magnanimity, absurdity and good sense, that we find upon record in the annals of mankind."

Mr. Granger observes, that "this great man, whose genius was awakened by the distractions of his country, was looked upon as one of the people, till he was upwards of forty years of age. He is an amazing instance of what ambition, heated by enthusiasm, restrained by judgment, disguised by hypocrisy, and aided by natural vigour of mind, can do. He was never oppressed with the weight, or perplexed with the intricacy of affairs: but his deep penetration, indefatigable activity, and invincible resolution, seemed to render him a master of all events. He persuaded without eloquence; and exacted obedience, more from the terror of his name, than the rigour of his administration. He appeared as a powerful instrument in the hand of providence, and dared to appeal to the decisions of heaven for the justice of his cause. He knew every man of abilities in the three kingdoms, and endeavoured to avail himself of their respective talents. He has always been regarded by foreigners, and of late years by the generality of his countrymen, as the greatest man this nation has ever produced."

The Life of William Dampier.

Dampier (William) the celebrated voyager, was born of a good family in Somersetshire, in the year 1652. At seventeen years of age, he was put apprentice to the master of a ship at Weymouth: but having made a voyage to France, and another to Newfoundland, he suffered so much by the severity of the climate, that, on his return, he went to his friends with the resolution of going no more to sea: but soon changing his mind, he entered on board an East-India ship, and sailed to Bantam. In 1673, he served on board the Royal Prince, commanded by Sir Edward Spragge, in two engagements with the Dutch. Afterwards going into Somersetshire, he became acquainted with colonel Hallier, by whose advice he went to Jamaica, and settled there as a planter; but, in about a year, quitted that employment to go with captain Hodfel, to cut logwood in the bay of Campeachy. At length, however, leaving this profitable business, he entered into a company of buccaneers, and made several voyages. In 1699, the earl of Pembroke, lord high admiral of England, sent him, in his majesty's ship Roebuck, to make discoveries; but, after visiting several parts of New Holland and New Guinea, he lost his ship by her springing a leak, and returned to England in an East-India vessel, in 1701. In the year 1708, he engaged in an expedition to the South Seas, concerted by the merchants of Bristol, under the command of captain Woodes Rogers; and, after encompassing the earth, returned in September, 1711. The time of his death is not known. Dampier's voyages are printed in four volumes, octavo.

The Life of Sir William Davenant.

Davenant (Sir William) poet laureat in the reigns of Charles I. and II. was born at Oxford in February, 1605. His father, Mr. John Davenant, kept an inn in that city, where Shakespeare used to lodge in his journeys between London and Warwickshire; and, as Sir William's mother was a woman of great beauty, some have surmised, but without the least foundation, that he derived his very being, and with it his poetical talents, from that inimitable bard. He was instructed in the rudiments of grammatical learning at a school in Oxford; and, in the year 1621, was entered of Lincoln college in that university. He soon, however, quitted that seminary, and became a page to Frances, duchess of Richmond; out of whose family he removed into that of Sir Fulke Greville, lord Brook. In 1629 he produced his first play, entitled Albino King of the Lombards, which met with good success. Upon the death of Ben Jonson, in 1637, he was created poet laureat. In May, 1641, he was accused by parliament of being embarked in a design of bringing up the army for the defence of the king's person, and the support of his authority; and a proclamation being issued for apprehending prehending him and others engaged in that design, he was stopped at Feverham, sent up to London, and put under the custody of the serjeant at arms. In July following he was bailed, and, soon after, found means to withdraw into France, where he staid some time. On his return to England, he offered his service to the earl of Newcastle, who appointed him lieutenant-general of the ordnance. In September, 1643, he received the honour of knighthood from king Charles I. at the siege of Gloucester; but, after the ruin of that prince's affairs he again retired to France. Here he embraced the popish religion, which circumstance probably might so far ingratiate him with the queen, who then resided in France, as induced her to trust him with the most important concerns. She sent him over to the king, as lord Clarendon tells us, to give up the church for his peace and security; but his majesty was so displeased with what he offered on this head, that he forbade him to come again into his presence. In 1650, Sir William was employed by the queen-mother to transport a considerable number of artificers from France to Virginia, for the improvement of that colony: but fortune not being inclined to favour him, the vessel he embarked in had scarcely got clear of the French coast, before she was taken by one of the parliament's ships of war, and carried to England. Our author, on this occasion, was imprisoned in the Isle of Wight; from whence, in the ensuing year, he was removed to the Tower of London, in order to take his trial at the high court of justice. For some time he was thought to be in the most imminent danger: but, by the interposition of the great Milton and some others, his life was happily saved, though we find him a prisoner in the Tower two years after. He was at length set at liberty by the lord keeper Whitelocke. Being reduced, however, to very low circumstances, he, with a view of repairing them, opened a sort of theatre at Rutland-house, in Charterhouse yard, which met with great encouragement. Soon after the restoration, he was entrusted with the management of the duke of York's theatre in Lincoln's-Inn Fields, which he opened with a play of his own, entitled the Siege of Rhodes, wherein he introduced a great variety of fine scenes and beautiful machinery. Sir William wrote a considerable number of dramatic performances, and several poems. He died on the 7th of April, 1668, at the age of sixty-three, and was interred in Westminster-abbey, where, in imitation of Ben Johnson's short epitaph, the following inscription was engraved on his tombstone, "O rare Sir William Davenant!"

"He distinguished himself (says Mr. Granger) by a bold but unsuccessful attempt to enlarge the sphere of poetry. He composed an heroic poem, called Gondibert, in five books, after the model of the drama; applauded himself greatly upon this invention; and looked upon the followers of Homer as a timorous, servile herd, that were afraid to leave the beaten track. This performance, which is rather a string of epigrams than an epic poem, was not without its admirers, among whom were Waller and Cowley. But the success did not answer his expectation. When the novelty of it was over, it presently sunk into contempt; and he at length found, that when he strayed from Homer he deviated from nature."

The Life of Sir John Denham.

Denham (Sir John) an eminent poet, was born at Dublin in 1615, and at two years of age was brought to London, on his father being promoted to the rank of a baron of the exchequer in England. He studied at Trinity college, Oxford, and afterwards at Lincoln's-Inn. In the early part of his life he was much addicted to gaming; but his father having at last reprimanded him in very severe terms, and threatened to disinherit him, he wrote a little Essay against Gaming, which he presented to his father, to shew his detestation of that practice: however, after the old gentleman's decease, he returned to his former habit, and being a dupe to sharpers, soon squandered away several thousand pounds. In 1641 he published an excellent tragedy, called the Sophy: soon after which he was appointed high-sheriff of Surry, and governor of Farnham-castle for the king; but being in possession of no great share of military knowledge, he presently quitted this latter post, and retired to king Charles I. at Oxford, where, in 1643, he published his admirable poem, entitled Cooper's Hill. He adhered to the interest of his sovereign, and was employed by him and Charles II. on several occasions, both in England and France. At the Restoration he was made surveyor-general of all his majesty's buildings, and created knight of the Bath. He was greatly esteemed at court for his poetical genius; but, upon some discontent arising from a second marriage, he had the misfortune to lose his senses: however, being soon restored to the use of his reason, he wrote a fine copy of verses upon the death of Cowley, whom he survived but a few months. He died in March, 1668, and was buried in Westminster-abbey. His poems and translations are printed together in one volume, 12mo.

The Life of John Dennis.

Dennis (John) a famous critic, was born at London, in the year 1657; and having completed his education at Caius-college, in Cambridge, he travelled through France and Italy. Being possessed of a fortune left him by his uncle, he, at his return, set up for a wit and a fine gentleman, desiring every attainment that had not some relation to the Belles Lettres. He kept up an acquaintance with many persons distinguished by their wit and learning, among whom were the earls of Halifax and Pembroke, Walter Moyle, Esq; Dryden, Wycherly, Congreve, Southern and Garth, who were then far from having a contemptible opinion of his talents. Upon his first introduction to the earl of Halifax, having the misfortune to get intoxicated with some rich wines, which rendered him impatient of contradiction, he suddenly rose, rushed out of the room, and, as he passed, overturned the side-board of plate and glasses. The next morning he had quite forgot what had happened, and meeting Mr. Moyle, who had been one of the company, asked in what manner he went away: "Why," said Moyle, "you went away like the devil, and took one corner of the house with you." In 1695, he wrote a poem, entitled the Court of Death, dedicated to the memory of queen Mary; and upon the death of King William III. he published another, called the Monument. He wrote two poems on the battles of Blenheim and Ramillies; for the first of which the duke of Marlborough made him a present of 100l. and soon after, through his grace's interest, he obtained a fine-cure in the customs of about 120l. a year. In 1704 he published his tragedy of Liberty Asserted, in which are so many severe strokes against the French, that he vainly imagined Lewis XIV. would never conclude a peace with England, unless he was delivered up to him; and filled with the idea of his own importance, he waited on his patron the duke of Marlborough, during the congress at Utrecht, to desire that no such article might be stipulated, as the giving up the author of that play. The duke told him, that he was sorry he could not then serve him, as he had then no interest with the ministers; adding, that he fancied his case was not so desperate as he imagined; that he had indeed made no such provision for himself, yet could not help thinking he had done the French almost as much injury as Mr. Dennis had done. This gentle reproof, however, did not cure his vanity; for in a visit which he made at a gentleman's house on the coast of Suffex, he happened to take a walk near the beach of the sea, when espying a ship sailing, as he imagined, towards him, he, not doubting that he was betrayed, made the best of his way to London, without taking leave of his host, whom he proclaimed a traitor, that had decoyed him to his house, in order to deliver him up to the French, who would certainly have carried him off, if he had not escaped as he did.

Indeed pride, envy, jealousy, and suspicion, hurried him into many absurd and ridiculous measures; he criticised the works of much better authors than himself with rudeness and abuse, and was continually engaged in a paper war with one or other of his contemporaries. In 1709, he published a tragedy called Appius and Virginia, which had no success. In 1712 he wrote against Pope's Essay on Criticism, and the next year against Mr. Addison's Cato; which occasioned "The Narrative of Dr. Robert Norris, concerning the strange and deplorable Frenzy of Mr. John Dennis," and produced a literary quarrel that was carried on with great acrimony. In short, he wrote many other pieces, and died on the 6th of January, 1733, in the 77th year of his age.

The Life of William Derham, D. D.

Derham (William) D. D. an excellent English philosopher and divine, was born at Stowton, near Worcester, on the 26th of November, 1657; and was educated at Trinity college, Oxford. In 1682 he was presented to the vicarage of Wargrave, in Berkshire: but he did not continue there above seven years; for, in 1689, he was instituted to the rectory of Upminster, in Essex, which being at a convenient distance from London, gave him opportunities of conversing with the most learned men in the nation, and, at the same time, affording him a retirement suitable to his contemplative and philosophic disposition. He applied to the study of nature, to mathematics and experimental philosophy; in which he became so eminent, that he was soon chosen a fellow of the Royal Society. He proved one of the most useful and industrious members of that learned body; frequently publishing very valuable pieces in the Philosophical Transactions. In his younger years he printed a treatise entitled the Artificial Clock-maker; and in the years 1711 and 1712, preached sixteen sermons at Mr. Boyle's lecture, which having reduced in to to a new form, he published in 1713, under the title of Physico Theology, or a Demonstration of the Being and Attributes of God from his Works of Creation; and the next year he published his Astro-Theology, which was followed several years after by his Christo-Theology. He was made canon of Windsor, chaplain to his late majesty when prince of Wales, and created doctor of divinity. Besides his own works, he published some pieces of that eminent philosopher Mr. Ray, and the Philosophical Experiments of Dr. Hooke: and being skilled in medicine, he was a physician to the bodies as well as the souls of his parishioners. This great and good man died at Upminster on the 5th of April, 1735, in the 78th year of his age, and was interred in the churchyard of that town. He left behind him a valuable collection of curiosities.

Life of Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex.

Devereux (Robert) earl of Essex, a gallant foldier, and a great favourite of queen Elizabeth, was the son of Walter earl of Essex, and was born at Nethewood, in Herefordshire, on the 10th of November, 1567. His father dying in 1576, recommended him to the protection of Thomas Radcliffe, earl of Suffex, and to the care of William Cecil, lord Burleigh, whom he appointed his guardian. In 1578, being then in his twelfth year, he was sent to the university of Cambridge, where he applied himself to learning with great diligence, and at length obtained the degree of master of arts. His first appearance at court as a candidate for royal favour, was in the 17th year of his age, when he was possessed of a fine person, an agreeable behaviour, and an affability which procured him many friends. He by degree so far overcame his reluctance to use the assistance of the earl of Leicester, (who, though his father's enemy, had married his mother) that, in 1585, he accompanied him to Holland, and the next year appeared in the field, with the title of general of the horse; in which capacity he gave such proofs of his personal courage in the battle of Zutphen, that the earl of Leicester conferred upon him the honour of a knight banneret in his camp; and, on his return to England, he was in December, 1587, appointed master of the horse. In the succeeding year, when her majesty assembled an army at Tilbury, for the defence of the kingdom, she gave the command of it, under herself, to the earl of Leicester, and created the earl of Essex general of the horse, whom she also made knight of the garter. In the year 1589, Sir John Norris and Sir Francis Drake having undertaken an expedition for restoring Don Antonio to the crown of Portugal, the earl of Essex, willing to share the glory of the enterprize, followed the fleet and army to Spain; which imprudent step highly displeased the queen, as it was taken without her consent or knowledge. However, at his return, he soon recovered her majesty's favour, from whom he received grants of very considerable value. In 1591 he was sent with a body of forces to the assistance of Henry IV. of France; and, in the beginning of the year 1593, he was sworn a member of the privy council.

In 1596, the queen, in order to prevent the Spaniards from attempting a second invasion, caused a fleet to be equipped for attacking Cadiz; the greatest part of the expences being defrayed by the principal persons engaged in the expedition. The command of the army and fleet was, with joint authority, intrusted to the earl of Essex, and the lord high admiral Howard; with whom went many of the most distinguished officers, both for the land and sea service, that were then in England. On the 11th of June they sailed from Plymouth, but were forced to put back by a contrary wind; which changing, they took the first opportunity of putting again to sea. On the 18th of the same month they arrived at Cape St. Vincent, where they met with an Irish bark, which informed them that the port of Cadiz was full of ships, and that the enemy had no notice whatever of the sailing of the English fleet, or that such an expedition was even intended. After this welcome news they pursued their voyage, and, on the 20th in the morning, they anchored near St. Sebastian, on the west side of the island of Cadiz. It was then proposed by the earl to begin with attacking the fleet, which was a very hazardous enterprize, but, at last, agreed to by the lord admiral. The next day, this gallant resolution was executed with all imaginable bravery, and the engagement lasted from break of day till noon, when the enemy seeing their galleons miserably shattered, and a great number of their men killed, thought proper to retire. Immediately after this action, the earl of Essex landed with 800 men, and advanced against a body of 500 Spaniards, who retreated into Cadiz at his approach. They were so closely pursued, and the inhabitants were in such confusion, that no steps could be taken for the defence of the place, until the English had burst open the gate, and entered the city. After a short skirmish in the streets, the assailants made themselves masters of the market place; and

and the garrison retiring into the castle, soon capitulated, on condition that the inhabitants should have liberty to depart with their wearing apparel, and their other effects be distributed as booty among the soldiers; that they would pay 520,000 ducats for the ransom of their lives, and send forty of their principal citizens to England, as hostages for the payment of the money. Essex being now entirely master of the place, turned out all the inhabitants, and loaded the ships with the money and rich effects which the soldiers had not yet taken in plunder. The earl was of opinion that Cadiz ought to be kept as a thorn in the side of the Spaniards, and offered to remain in person for its defence: but the majority being impatient to return to their own country with the booty they had obtained, his motion was over-ruled, and they set sail for England, after having fired the town and adjacent villages.

On the 19th of March, 1597, the queen appointed Essex master of the ordnance; and, the same year, he was made general, admiral, and commander in chief, in the expedition to the Azores, commonly called the Island Voyage; on his return from which, he was promoted to the office of earl marshal of England. Some time after, the queen consulting with Essex and the lord high admiral about the choice of a proper person for the administration of Ireland, the earl recommended Sir George Carew, in opposition to Sir William Knolles, whom, however, Elizabeth preferred to his competitor. Essex was so provoked at her slighting his recommendation, that he turned his back upon her in a contemptuous manner; upon which the queen, enraged at his insolence, gave him a box on the ear. The earl, clapping his hand to his sword, swore he would not have taken such an affront from Henry VIII. and retired from court in a transport of passion. Notwithstanding all the remonstrances of his friends, he for some time breathed nothing but revenge and defiance; but at length his passion subsiding, he was pardoned, and restored to favour.

In March, 1599, he was appointed lord deputy of Ireland, with a more extensive commission than had ever been granted to any of his predecessors; and setting out immediately for his government, arrived at Dublin on the 15th of April. Instead of advancing directly against the earl of Tyrone, according to the instructions he had received, he led his forces into the province of Munster, where he reduced the castle of Cahir, and performed some inconsiderable exploits against the rebels.

He returned to Dublin in the latter end of June, after having lost a great number of his men by sickness and fatigue. The queen being apprised of his transactions, wrote a severe letter, reproaching him with neglect of her orders. He excused himself by saying he had followed the advice of the council of Ireland, and promised to march into Ulster against Tyrone: nevertheless, he turned his arms against the O'Moors and O'Connors in Leix and Offaly; but by this expedition his troops were so much diminished, that he demanded a reinforcement of 2000 men from England. When these succours had arrived, the earl marched against Tyrone to the borders of Ulster, and obliged him to retire into woods and fastnesses. Then that rebel craved a parley, which he obtained in Louth, where both parties agreed to a cessation for six weeks, to be renewed occasionally for the same term, or vacated on a fortnight's notice from either side. Having concluded this inglorious truce, Essex marched back to Dublin; and leaving the administration of Ireland in the hands of the lord chancellor Loftus and sir George Carew, embarked for England without the queen's permission. He arrived there on the 28th of September, and repaired immediately to court, where he met with a tolerable reception from her majesty; but was soon after confined, examined by the privy council, and suspended from the exercise of all his great offices, except that of master of the horse. In the summer of the year 1600, he recovered his liberty; and, in the autumn following, he received Mr. Henry Cuff, who had been his secretary in Ireland, into the number of his confidants. Cuff laboured to persuade him, that submission would never do him any good; that the queen was in the hands of a faction, who were his enemies; and that the only way to restore his fortune, was to find the means of obtaining an audience, in which he might be able to represent his own case, let that means be what it would. The earl did not at first consent to this dangerous advice; but afterwards, giving a loose to his passion, he began to declare himself openly, and, among other unguarded expressions, let fall this severe sarcasm, "That the queen grew old and cankered, and that her mind was become as crooked as her carcase." In the evening of the 7th of February, 1601, he received orders to attend the council, which he declined: he then gave out that his enemies sought his life, kept a watch in Essex-house all night, and summoned his friends for his defence the next morning. The queen being informed of the

the great resort of people of all ranks to the earl, sent the lord keeper Egerton, the earl of Worcester, sir William Knolles, (his uncle by the mother's side) and the lord chief justice Popham, to know his grievances. Essex, after a short conference, ordered the messengers to be secured; and then, accompanied by the earls of Rutland and Southampton, the lords Sandes and Monteaule, and about 200 gentlemen, he repaired to the city, where he was joined by the earl of Bedford, the lord Cromwell, and some other gentlemen: but his dependance on the populace failed him; and sir Robert Cecil prevailing upon his brother, lord Burleigh, to go with sir Gilbert Dethick, then king at arms, and proclaim Essex and his adherents traitors, in the principal streets, the earl returned by water to Essex-house; which was quickly invested by the earl of Nottingham, lord admiral, with a great force; and, about ten o'clock at night, he, with his company, surrendered at discretion. He and Southampton were immediately conveyed to the Tower. On the 19th of February they were tried and condemned for high treason; and the 25th day of that month was appointed for the execution of the earl of Essex. When that nobleman was brought on the scaffold, which was erected within the Tower, he confessed his sins with marks of uncommon sorrow and contrition, though he protested that he never entertained a thought to the prejudice of her majesty's person. After he had placed his head upon the block, he said, "In humility and obedience, I prostrate myself to my deserved punishment: Thou, O God, have mercy on thy prostrate servant; into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit." His head was severed from his body at the third stroke, but the first took away all sense and motion. Thus died, in the 34th year of his age, the valiant and accomplished earl of Essex. "He was a nobleman possessed of excellent and amiable qualities; brave, liberal, and humane; a patron of learning, in which he himself had made considerable progress; a warm friend, and an avowed enemy. His foibles were vanity, ambition, and an impetuosity of temper, by which he fell a sacrifice to the artful intrigues of those who dreaded his power, and envied his good fortune."

There is a remarkable story current in the world about a ring, which lord Ciarrendon styles a loose report, that crept into discourse soon after the earl's miserable end; yet a foreign writer of great reputation delivers it as an undoubted truth, and that upon the authority of an English minister, who could not but be well informed of what passed at court; and therefore, in the words of that writer, we shall report it. "It will not, I believe, be thought either impertinent or disagreeable to add here what price Maurice had from the mouth of Mr. Carleton, ambassador from England in Holland, who died secretary of state; so well known under the name of lord Dorchester, and who was a man of merit. He said, that queen Elizabeth gave the earl of Essex a ring, in the height of her passion for him, ordering him to keep it, and assuring him, that whatever he should commit, she would pardon him, if he returned that pledge. Since that time, the earl's enemies having prevailed with the queen, who besides was exasperated against him for the contempt he shewed her beauty, which, through age, began to decay, she caused him to be impeached. When he was condemned, she expected that he would send her the ring, and would have granted him his pardon according to her promise. The earl, finding himself in the last extremity, applied to admiral Howard's lady, who was his relation, and desired her to return the ring into the queen's own hands. But her husband, who was one of the earl's greatest enemies, and to whom she told this imprudently, would not suffer her to acquit herself of the commission; so that the queen consented to the earl's death, being full of indignation against such a proud and haughty spirit, who chose rather to die than implore her mercy. Some time after, the admiral's lady was taken ill; and, being given over by her physicians, she sent word to the queen, that she had something of great consequence to impart to her before she died. The queen came to her bed-side; and the countess, having ordered all the attendants to withdraw, returned her majesty, but too late, that ring from the earl of Essex, desiring to be excused for not having delivered it sooner, since her husband had prevented her. The queen retired immediately, overwhelmed with the utmost grief; she sighed continually for a fortnight following, without taking any nourishment, lying a-bed entirely dressed, and getting up an hundred times in a night. At last she died with hunger and with grief, because she had consented to the death of a lover who had applied to her for mercy."

Life of Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex.

Devereux (Robert) son to the former, and the third earl of Essex of this family, was born in 1592, at Essex-house in the Strand,

Strand, and educated at the university of Oxford. In 1603 he was restored to his hereditary honours, and in 1606, when but fourteen years of age, was married to lady Frances Howard; but as they were both too young to cohabit together, the earl was sent on his travels. His lordship returned in 1610, with the reputation of being one of the most accomplished men of his time; but in his absence the young countess of Essex had placed her affections upon the viscount Rochester, and in 1613 entered a public suit against the earl for impotency; when being countenanced by king James I. she obtained a divorce, and was the same year married to the viscount with great pomp and ceremony. The earl of Essex afterwards made several campaigns in the Low Countries; and in 1610, married Elizabeth, daughter of sir William Paulet, by whom he had a son, who died in his infancy. However, when he had lived with this lady about four years, he was divorced from her, on pretence of her familiarity with Mr. Uvedale. In 1635 he was made vice admiral of a fleet fitted out by king Charles I. to protect the trade of England against the French and Dutch; and though he was generally treated by his majesty with indifference, he was, in 1639, made lieutenant general, and sent against the rebellious Scots. In 1641 he was raised to the office of lord chamberlain, and appointed lieutenant general of all the forces to the south of Trent. On account of the disturbances which followed the king's going to the house of commons to demand the five members, his majesty retired from the capital, and ordered his household servants to attend him; but the earls of Essex and Holland pleading their obligations to assist in the deliberations of the house of peers, they were removed from their respective employments. The next year, 1642, Essex was made general of the parliament's army, in which post he distinguished himself by his bravery and conduct on many occasions; but in April, 1645, on the passing of the self-denying ordinance, he was obliged to resign his commission. He died on the 14th of September, 1646; and was interred with great solemnity, on the 22d of October following, in the abbey-church of St. Peter, Westminster. By his death the title of earl of Essex became extinct.

The Life of Sir Kenelm Digby.

Digby (Sir Kenelm) a very famous English philosopher, was the eldest son of sir Everard Digby, who was executed for being engaged in the gunpowder-plot. He was born at Gothurst, in Buckingham-shire, on the 11th of June, 1603. At the time of his father's unfortunate death, he was with his mother at Gothurst, being then in the third year of his age; but he is supposed to have been taken early out of her hands, since he was educated in the Protestant religion. About the year 1618 he was admitted a gentleman-commoner of Gloucester-hall, in Oxford; where having continued between two and three years, he made the tour of France, Spain, and Italy. On his return from his travels, in 1623, he was presented to king James I. who conferred on him the honour of knighthood. After the decease of that monarch, he was appointed a gentleman of the bed-chamber, a commissioner of the navy, and a governor of the Trinity-house. In 1628 he was made commander of a squadron sent into the Mediterranean, to chastise the Algerine pirates, and the Venetian fleet; the former having committed frequent depredations on the vessels of our merchants, and the latter having obstructed their trade. He exerted himself with all the spirit and conduct of a brave and experienced officer; and having brought the Venetians to reason, made reprisals on the Algerines, and set at liberty a great number of English slaves: he returned home with great credit to his country, and honour to himself. In 1636 he embraced the religion of the Romish church; and, in 1638, published at Paris, a piece entitled, A Conference with a Lady about the Choice of Religion. The next year, Sir Kenelm Digby and Sir Walter Montague were employed by the queen to engage the Papists to afford a liberal contribution to his majesty; in which commission they succeeded.

In the beginning of the civil war, Sir Kenelm, by order of the parliament, was committed prisoner to Winchester-house; but in 1643, at the intercession of the queen dowager of France, he was restored to liberty. He then went over to France, where he contracted an intimacy with most of the literati of that kingdom, who entertained a high opinion of his abilities, and were charmed with the sprightliness and freedom of his conversation. It was probably about this time, that, having read the writings of Descartes, who had read some of his works, told him, that "he did not doubt but he was the famous Sir Kenelm Digby!" "And if you; Sir," replied the knight, "were not the illustrious M. Descartes, I should not have come here on purpose to see you." After the king's affairs were totally ruined, Sir Kenelm found himself under a necessity of returning into England, in order to compound for his estate. The par-parliament, however, did not think proper that he should remain here; and therefore not only ordered him to withdraw, but voted, that if he should afterwards at any time return, without permission of the house first obtained, he should lose both his life and estate. Upon this he went again to France, where he was very kindly received by Henrietta Maria, queen dowager of England, to whom he became chancellor. Soon after the restoration he returned to his native country; and died on his birth-day, the 11th of June, in the year 1665. He wrote, 1. A Treatise of the Nature of Bodies: 2. A Treatise of the Nature of Man's Soul: 3. Institutio Peripateticarum Libri Quinque: 4. A Discourse on the Cure of Wounds by the Powder of Sympathy: 5. Observations on Dr. Browne's Religio Medici; and some other works.

"This eminent person (says an ingenious writer) was, for the early pregnancy of his parts, and his great proficiency in learning, compared to the celebrated Picus de Mirandula, who was one of the wonders of human nature. His knowledge, though various and extensive, appeared to be greater than it really was; as he had all the powers of elocution and address to recommend it. He knew how to shine in a circle of ladies, or philosophers; and was as much attended to when he spoke on the most trivial subjects, as when he spoke on the most important. He was remarkably robust, and of a very uncommon size, but moved with peculiar grace and dignity. Though he applied himself to experiment, he was sometimes hypothetical in his philosophy; and there are instances of his being very bold and paradoxical in his conjectures."

The Life of Dr. Philip Doddridge.

Doddridge (Dr. Philip) an excellent dissenting minister, was the son of Daniel Doddridge, an oilman in London, where he was born on the 26th of June, 1702. He was first initiated in the elements of the learned languages at a school in London, and afterwards at Kingston upon Thames. About the time of his father's death, which happened in 1715, he was removed to a school at St. Alban's, under the care of Mr. Nathaniel Wood. Here he commenced an acquaintance with Dr. Samuel Clark, minister of a dissenting congregation; who instructed him in the principles of religion. In 1719 he was placed under the tuition of the reverend Mr. John Jennings, who kept an academy at Kilworth in Leicestershire. He was first settled as a minister at that place: but on the death of Mr. Jennings, he succeeded to the care of his academy; and was soon after chosen pastor of a large congregation of dissenters at Northampton, to which town he removed the academy. He died at Lisbon in the year 1751, where he went for the recovery of his health; and his remains were interred in the burying-ground belonging to the British factory there. A handsome monument was erected to his memory in the meeting-house at Northampton, at the expence of the congregation; and the following epitaph, written by Gilbert West, Esq. was inscribed upon it.

To the memory of

PHILIP DODDRIDGE, D. D.

Twenty-one years pastor of this church,
Director of a flourishing academy,
And author of many excellent writings;
By which

His pious, benevolent, and indefatigable zeal

To make men wise, good, and happy,
Will far better be made known,
And perpetuated much longer,

Than by this obscure and perishable marble;

The humble monument, not of his praise,
But of their esteem, affection, and regret,
Who knew him, lov'd him, and lament him;

And who are desirous of recording,
In this inscription,

Their friendly, but faithful testimony,
To the many amiable and christian virtues

That adorned his more private character;
By which, tho' dead, he yet speaketh,
And, still present in remembrance,
Forcibly, tho' silently, admonisheth
His once beloved and ever-grateful flock.

He was born June 26, 1702,
And died Oct. 26, 1751,

Aged 50.

Dr. Doddridge wrote, 1. Memoirs of the Life of Colonel James Gardiner: 2. Free Thoughts on the most probable Means of reviving the Dissenting Interest: 3. Sermons on the Education of Children: 4. The Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul: 5. The Family Expositor, in six volumes, 4to. 6. A volume of Hymns: 7. Theological Lectures; and other pieces. Several of his works have been translated into foreign languages.

C H I L I.

VAlparaiso, a small town, is situated in 32°. 15. south latitude. The bay or harbour, though greatly exposed in winter to the north winds, which then blow with great violence, is much frequented by ships from Calao and Panama. Though there is a fort here, called Castello Blanco, and other works, they are generally in a bad condition, which is the case of most of the Spanish fortifications in America.

The other places in this province worth mentioning are, Quintero, La Serena or Coquimbo, Guafo, and Copiapo.

Quintero is a small place, five leagues to the northward of Valparaiso, having a port much frequented by shipping, but entirely without defence.

La Serena, or Coquimbo, is a small place, situated a quarter of a league from the sea, on the river Coquimbo, in 30° . of south latitude, according to Dampier. It had the name of Serena from the deliciousness of the climate: for here the sky is continually serene and pleasant, the winters warm, and the summer heats tempered with refreshing breezes. The soil is said to be as fertile as the climate is delightful. Coquimbo gives name to a large bay, the mouth of which is two leagues and a half wide, and the bottom every where good. In the neighbouring country are mines of gold, silver and copper.

Guafo is a sea port, but little frequented, situated on a small river of the same name, thirty miles to the north of La Serena, according to Dampier, but, according to the maps, ninety-five.

Copiapo is an open town, one hundred and seventy-five miles to the north of La Serena, taking its name from a river. There are gold mines directly above the town, and others at two or three leagues distance, whence they bring the ore on mules to the mills within the town. The ounce of gold here is sold for twelve or thirteen pieces of eight, cast. Besides the gold mines, there are about Copiapo many of iron, copper, tin, and lead, with sal gem, saltpetre, sulphur, loadstone, and lapis lazuli.

The province or bishopric of Conception lies to the south of that of St. Jago. The most considerable places in it are, the towns of Conception and Baldivia.

Conception, situated in 36° . 43. 15. south latitude, at the bottom of a bay of the same name, is the oldest European Spanish establishment in Chili, and the second city in point of dignity. The same earthquake that destroyed St. Jago, in 1730, laid this city also in ruins. The harbour is good, and pretty much frequented; but the fortifications of very little importance, though there ought to be a garrison of three thousand five hundred men. That the fortifications in Chili and Peru are in a ruinous condition, and the garrisons scarce half their complement, is owing to the negligence and security, but chiefly to the avarice, of the governors, who think of nothing but enriching themselves. The beauties of the country adjacent to this city are enchanting; and the returns of nature, for the husbandman's toil, exuberant. Some farmers apply themselves wholly to raising corn, others to breeding and fattening of sheep and cattle; some to the breeding of horses, and others to the culture of vines and fruit trees: hence the vallies are filled with cattle, and the fleecy kind; and so numerous is the breed of horses, that one which would cost thirty or forty pounds in the cheapest country in Europe, may be here purchased for a twentieth part of the sum.

The peasants in the neighbourhood of Conception are remarkable for their address in the use of the noose and lance. According to Ulloa, with these weapons they will combat the fiercest bulls, throwing the noose so artfully as to lay certain hold of some part of the body. When a bull is haltered, they draw the knot, at the same time giving spurs to their horses, and hamstringing the animal in an instant, while they ride at full speed, cannot fail of surprizing Europeans. In private quarrels also they fight with the noose and lance, all attacks from which they are taught to parry with such dexterity, that, after a combat of an hour, it is no uncommon case to see the parties separate untouched, notwithstanding both have exerted the greatest alertness.

Conception is the see of a bishop, which was transferred hither at the time that the city Imperial was destroyed by the Indians. The inhabitants are numerous; the fertility of the soil, and the excellency of the climate, having induced a great number of Spaniards and Mestizoes to settle here.

Baldivia, or, as the Spaniards spell it, Valdivia, stands about one hundred and ninety five miles south of Conception, at the bottom of a fine bay, in 39° . 36. south latitude, on a river to which it gives name, as it takes its own from the first conqueror of this country. It is defended by four strong castles, mounting above a hundred pieces of fine-brass cannon; but there is never a sufficient number of gunners and carriages, nor store of ammunition: besides, what dependance can be placed upon a garrison composed of transported criminals, who are sent hither instead of being lashed to the oar on board the galleys? The inhabitants are said to amount to about about two thousand. Ten large ships are employed in the trade between this port and Lima, which consists chiefly in gold, corn, hides, and salt provisions; exchanged for slaves, sugar, chocolate, and European commodities and manufactures. It is said the king of Spain allows no less than three hundred thousand pieces of eight for maintaining the garrison of the town, and keeping the fortifications in repair.

There are several other small places in this province; but none of them of any consideration, except Aranca, where they maintain a garrison of five or six hundred men.

The province of Chicuito, which lies on the opposite side of the Andes, and by some is reckoned a part of La Plata, is said to contain several towns, of which Mendoza, San Juan de la Frontera, Uto, and St. Lewis, are mentioned as the chief.

Off the coast of Chili are a great many islands, the chief of which are Chiloe, St. Mary's, Quiriquina, de la Mocha, or Mocha, Juan Fernandes, Tierra, and Fuera.

The four first lie near the coast: Chiloe at the southern extremity of the province of Conception; St. Mary's and Quiriquina, near the bay of Conception; and de la Mocha, at the mouth of the river Imperial.

Chiloe is a large and beautiful island, containing a town called Castro, and surrounded with a great number of smaller islands, to which it gives name; but the other three are inconsiderable.

The island of Juan Fernandes, of which there is a minute description in Anson's Voyage, lies upwards of one hundred leagues from the continent, in $33^{\circ} 40'$ of south latitude. It is about twelve leagues round, full of hills, interspersed with small pleasant vallies and savannahs, which, if cultivated, would produce any thing proper for the climate. The woods afford cabbage trees, and a variety of others; but none fit for masts. There are only two bays in the whole island where ships may anchor, and these are both at the west end. When commodore Anson touched here, he found no inhabitants, nor any other animals on it, except goats, dogs, and sea lions; but by later accounts we learn, that there is now a Spanish settlement, with a fort, or forts, to command the bays or anchoring places.

The islands Tierra and Fuera lie to the east of Juan Fernandes.

TERRA-MAGELLANICA, or PATAGONIA.

Terra-Magellanica, or Patagonia, comprehends all that country extending from Chili and Paraguay to the utmost extremity of South America, that is from 35 almost to 54° of latitude; being surrounded by the countries just mentioned, the South and North Seas, and the Straits of Magellan, which separate it from the island called Terra del Fuego, and extend about one hundred and sixteen leagues in length, from sea to sea, but only from half a league to three or four in breadth.

This country had the name of Terra-Magellanica from Ferdinand Magellan, a Portuguese officer in the service of the Catholic king, who is reported to have sailed through the Straits, that also bear his name, from the North to the South Sea, in the year 1510.

The lofty mountains of the Andes, which are covered with snow a great part of the year, traversing the country from north to south, the air is said to be much colder than in the north, under the same parallels of latitude. Towards the north it is said to be covered with wood, and stored with an inexhaustible fund of large timber; whereas, to the southward, not so much as a single tree, fit for any mechanical purpose, is to be seen; yet there is good pasture, and incredible numbers of wild horned cattle and horses, which were first brought hither by the Spaniards, and have increased amazingly. The east coast is mostly low land, with few or no good harbours: one of the best is Port St. Julian.

Patagonia is inhabited by a variety of Indian tribes, as the Patagons, from which the country takes its name, the Pampas, the Cossares, &c. of whom we know very little; only it appears, from the account of former voyages, lately confirmed by commodore Byron and his crew, that some of them are of a gigantic stature, and clothed with skins; but it would seem that there are others who go almost quite naked, notwithstanding the inclemency of the climate. Some of them also, that live about the Straits, if we may credit the navigators who have passed that way into the South Sea, are perfect savages; but those with whom commodore Byron and his people conversed, are represented as of a more gentle humane disposition, only, like other savages, they live on fish and game, and what the earth produces spontaneously.

About the middle of the Strait is a promontory, called Cape Froward, which is the most southerly on the continent of South America.

On the coast of Patagonia lie a great number of islands, or cluster of islands. On the west coast are the islands Madre de Dios, Santa Trinidad, Santa Cruz, the the Isles of the Chunians and Hußlans, the Sarmientos, and many others. Of those on the south coast the most considerable are, Terra del Fuego, and Staten Land. The first had its name, which signifies the Land of Fire, from the first discoverers, upon their observing some great fires supposed to be volcanos, upon it, as they passed in the night through the Straits that lie between it and the continent. The southern extremity of this island, or cluster of islands, is called Cape Horn. Staten Land is represented as an island much resembling Terra del Fuego. Betwixt these lie the straits which take their name from Le Maire, one of the circumnavigators of the globe. To the north of Staten Land, in the Atlantic ocean, lie Falkland Islands,

The Isle of Penguins, which lies near the east coast of Patagonia, is remarkable only for taking its name from a white-headed bird, as large as a goose, with which it abounds.

B R A Z I L.

All that tract of country stretching along the sea coast from the mouth of the river La Plata, in 35 degrees of south latitude, to the great river of Amazons, under the equator, that is, upwards of two thousand miles, is denominated Brazil, and subject to the crown of Portugal. It is reported to extend from east to west, or from the Atlantic to Paraguay, about nine hundred miles, though the Portuguese have no settlements in the interior country.

The first aspect of this country from the sea is rather unfavourable, as it appears high, rough, and unequal; but on a nearer view, nothing can be more delightful, the eminences being covered with woods, the trees of which are mostly ever-greens, and the vallies and savannahs with the most refreshing verdure. Far within land, indeed, are high mountains, which separate it from the Spanish province of Paraguay, or La Plata, and in these are innumerable springs and lakes, from whence issue abundance of rivers, that fall into the great rivers Amazon and Paraguay, or run across the country from west to east, and fall into the Atlantic Ocean.

In so vast a tract, it cannot be supposed that the climate is alike, and the seasons uniform. The northern provinces, which lie towards the equator, like other countries in the like situation, are subject to great rains and variable winds, particularly in the months of March and September, when they have such deluges of rain, with storms and tornadoes, that the country is almost quite overflowed, and the air rendered unhealthful. As to the more southern provinces, there is no country between the topics where the heats are more tolerable, or the air more healthful than this; being constantly refreshed with breezes from the sea, and abounding with lakes and rivers, which annually overflow their banks; and in the inland parts the winds that blow from the mountains are still cooler than those that blow from the ocean.

This country breeds a great variety of serpents and venomous creatures; among which are, the Indian salamander, a kind of four-legged insect, whose sting is mortal; the ibibaboka, a kind of serpent, about seven yards long, and half a yard in circumference, whose poison is instantaneously fatal to the human kind; the rattlesnake, which grows here to an enormous size; the liboya, or roebuck snake, which is said to be able to swallow a roebuck whole, with its horns, being between twenty and thirty feet in length, and two or three yards in circumference; scorpions, one sort of which are between four and five feet long; lizards, of three or four feet long; millipedes, both venomous and dangerous; and many others. The pismires here are very large, numerous, and destructive, devouring all that comes in their way.

Among the wild beasts of Brasil are, ant-bears; tygers, or madilloes; porcupines; janonveras, a very fierce ravenous animal, somewhat like a grey-hound; armadilloes; various sorts of monkeys, some of which are very large; that called by the Europeans the sloth, or lazy beast; and the topirassou, a creature between a bull and an ass, but without horns, and harmless, &c. The flesh of the topirassou is good, and tastes like beef. They have great plenty of deer, hares, and other game, and a variety of other animals, wild and tame.

No country on earth affords a greater number of birds; some remarkable for their beauty, and others for their taste. Of the first sort is the humming bird, so called from the noise he makes with his wings, when he sucks the juices of flowers. Coreal, who calls it colubri, says, it is not much bigger than a fly, and has a most melodious voice, like that of a nightingale, and near as loud. Their feathers, which way soever you turn them, appear of a different colour and hue, like those of the sun-beams through a prism, on which account, it is not unfitly called by the natives the sun-beam. The anhma hath a horn two or three inches long growing out of its forehead, and, on that account, is called by Europeans the unicorn-bird. The toucan is of the bigness of a wood-pigeon, and of a perfect jet-black all over, except under the breast and belly, which is of a fine yellow, and a small circle of red about the neck; but what is most extraordinary in this bird is, that its bill is bigger than the rest of its body, yellow without and red within, and about a span long. The guira, called by the Europeans the sea-curlew, and the same with the numonius indicus, and arenata concinea, of the Latin authors, is remarkable for its often changing its native colour, being at first black, then ash-coloured, next white, afterwards scarlet, and last of all crimson, which last grows richer and deeper the longer the bird liveth. The cocoi, a very beautiful bird, parrots, parrots, cockatoos, macaws, and variety of all others, are very common here. Their eatable fowls are turkies, very large and delicious: a sort of white hens, and other poultry; ducks, and other such water-fowl. Their bats are of a prodigious size. It is said, they will go into houses in the night, and if they find any persons asleep, and uncovered, they will fall on them and suck their blood.

The sea-coasts, lakes, and rivers, are stored with great plenty and variety of fish, among which is the globe fish, called by the Latins orbis minor, from its orbicular form, which is so beset all round with sharp spikes, like those of a hedge hog, that bids defiance to all fishes of prey. But of all the living creatures in this sea, the most remarkable is the sea bladder, so called because it greatly resembles one, and swims on the surface of the waves. The inside is only filled with air, except about a spoonful of water, that serves to poise it. The skin is very thin and transparent, and, like a bubble raised in the water, reflects all the colours of the sky.

Of woods, roots, and plants, here is a vast variety. Brazil or red wood is very common here, especially in rocky and barren ground, where it often grows to a great height and considerable thickness. The flowers are of a bright red, and have a strong aromatic and refreshing smell. The wood is of a red colour, hard and dry, and is used in dyeing red; but the red which it produces is far from being of the best kind. It is also in some cases used as a medicine, both as a stomachic and astringent. They have five different kinds of palm trees here, with some fine woods of ebony, citron, cotton-trees, mastick, besides many others, some of which distil excellent balsams, and diffuse a most exquisite fragrant, and others yield the most delicious fruits.

Of the other commodities and products of Brasil, the chief are ambergrease, resin, balsams, indigo, sweet-meats, sugar, tobacco, gold, diamonds, beautiful pebbles, crystals, emeralds, jasper, and other precious stones, in all which the Portuguese carry on a vast trade. The mines of gold and diamonds were first opened in the year 1681, and have since yielded above five million sterling annually, of which sum a fifth belongs to the crown. The diamond minds are farmed at about thirty thousand pounds yearly, which is thought to be scarce a fifth of what they actually produce. The Brasil clayed sugar is much finer and whiter than that we bring home from our plantations; and their tobacco is also remarkably good. Of the last article, they export great quantities to the coast of Africa, where they not only dispose of it to the natives, but even supply the vessels of other nations, who are obliged to purchase it, for the convenience of carrying on the gold-dust and slave trade with any tolerable advantage. The north and south parts of Brasil abound with horned cattle, which are hunted for their hides, of which no less than twenty thousand are annually exported to Europe.

The Portuguese trade hither is so increased, that instead of twelve ships, formerly employed in the Brasil commerce, there are never fewer than one hundred sail of large vessels constantly going and returning from these colonies. The slave trade, from the multitude of slaves annually transported from Africa to Brasil employed a great number of shipping. All the ships employed in the Brasil trade, being under the direction of government, have their appointed seasons for going and returning, under convoy of a certain number of men of war; nor can a single ship clear out, or set sail, except with the fleet, but by a special licence from the king, which is seldom granted. The fleets sail in the following order, and at the following stated periods: that to Rio Janeiro, sets sail in January; that to Bahia, or the Bay of All Saints, in February; and the third fleet to Pernambuco, in the month of March. The cargoes of these fleets, like those of the Spanish to their American colonies, consist of a variety of articles, furnished by several European nations.

Extract from A Methodical Introduction to the Theory and Practice of the Art of Medicine, by David Macbride, M.D.

WHEN this work was first published in London, both sets of Reviewers bestowed high commendations on it; the Critical, in their Review for April 1772, and the the Monthly, in theirs for November of the same year.

At that time the Dublin bookellers had determined to reprint it, and advertised the public of their intention, but the author having requested that they might not proceed, out of deference to him, they relinquished their design. Here the matter might have rested, if the publisher, happening to see a Latin translation lately done in Holland, and observing the estimation in which the book is held abroad, had not resolved on furnishing the Medical readers of this kingdom with a copy, in a more convenient form than the London quarto, and which may be sold at half the price.

The reasons having ceased, which formerly induced the author to wish that his work might not be printed here, he has not only been pleased to consent to the present impression, but has also taken the trouble of revising the whole, and making such alterations and additions as he deemed necessary.

It contains the substance of a course of lectures, that were read in the winter of 1766, and for some seasons afterwards, in Dublin, and consists of two parts. The first, or institutional part, divided into six books, explains the principles on which the art of medicine is founded, and gives a general idea, such as may be sufficient for those who read physic only as a branch of natural philosophy.

A summary view of the Animal Oeconomy, as carried on during the time of perfect health, is given in the first book; and some necessary distinctions are laid down, with respect to the general structure of the human body.

The second treats of the Pathology, or morbid state; and in the course of this inquiry, diseases are analysed, by considering separately, the causes and consequences of their several symptoms.

A General History of Diseases follows, and fills up the third book; and herein is shewn the systematic method of arranging them, into classes, orders, genera and species; so as to bring those that agree in the greater number of circumstances, and demand nearly similar remedies, as much as possible under one point of view.

The fourth book contains the semeiology, or doctrine of signs; the fifth, some general rules for the preservation of health; and the sixth, the general methods of curing diseases.

The second, or practical part, comprises the descriptions of the several species of diseases, together with the methods of treatment.

They are distributed into nine orders, under the denominations of Fevers; Inflammations; Fluxes; or Preternatural discharges; Painful diseases; Spasmodic diseases; Inabilities and Privations; Asthmatic diseases; Mental diseases; and Cachexies, or Humoral diseases.

In the present edition the practical part is considerably enlarged, and among the additions, are certain histories of disorders that may be considered as entirely new; since they are either such as have never been communicated to the public before, or though published, the descriptions lie scattered in different books. There are two of these which particularly deserve the notice of practitioners, the Angina Pectoris and Morbus Vesicularis; the former, of all maladies the most mortal; the latter, one of the most tedious: accordingly, a pretty full account is given of each, and a singular case of the Angina Pectoris, which must be the more acceptable, as it is the only one yet known, wherein a cure has been effected, in a confirmed state of that disease.

The following extract, respecting one of these newly described diseases, is so very interesting to the public, and so necessary to be known by practitioners, that we hope the length of it will not be complained of by our readers.—
[From Vol. II. p. 383.]

BEFORE the publication of the second volume of the Medical Transactions in 1772, the disease which Dr. Heberden has named Angina Pectoris, (from its seat, and the sense of strangling and anxiety that attends it;) was unknown to the faculty at large, as none of the experienced practitioners who must have met with cases, had ever thought proper to communicate their observations, until the very eminent and learned physician just now mentioned, embraced that opportunity, and gave such a description as now leaves people under no difficulty to distinguish this very alarming malady; for such it may be justly termed, as being the most mortal in all the records of physic, with this terrible circumstance annexed, that the patient generally dies in a very sudden manner. Not a single person, (as far as we are informed) out of, at least, four-score (seen at different times * by dis-

N O T E.

* When Dr. Heberden first took notice of this distemper, and could find no satisfaction from books, he consulted a physician of long experience, who told him, that he had known several ill of it, and that all of them died suddenly. The doctor himself says he has seen at least fifty cases, in the course of his practice; Dr. Wall, twelve or thirteen; and Dr. Fothergill, rent gentlemen of the profession) has been cured of this disease, in England, except one young man, in whom the disorder was of no long standing, and the symptoms neither numerous, nor violent; and even the method of cure that was then found successful, though in the hands of an admirable physician, has not, in the course of twenty years, restored another person to health.

In this country, we have heard of no more than eight or ten instances of this distemper; the last of which, accompanied with the most alarming symptoms, and in an advanced state, was conducted on a new plan of treatment, with perfect success; as will appear from the history that we shall annex.

As to the nature of this disease, it appears to be purely spasmodic:

But though it should be admitted, that the whole distress in these cases arises from spasm, it may not be so easy to ascertain the particular muscles which are thus affected.

The violent sense of strangling or choaking, which shews the circulation through the lungs to be interrupted during the height of the paroxysm; and the peculiar constrictive pain under the sternum, always inclining (according to Dr. Heberden's observation) to the left side; together with that most distressing and alarming sensation, which, if it were to increase or continue, threatens an immediate extinction of life; might authorize us to conclude that the heart itself is the muscle affected: the only objection to this idea, and, if it had been constantly observed, it would be insurmountable, is that the pulse is not always interrupted during the paroxysm: the appearances, in two of the dissections, favour the opinion that the spasm affects the heart; as in one subject the left ventricle (and though it be not mentioned, we may presume the right one also) was found as empty of blood as if it had been washed; and in another the substance of the heart appeared whitish, not unlike a ligament; as it should seem in both cases, from the force of the spasm, squeezing the blood out from the vessels and cavities.

If this hypothesis be allowed, we must conclude, that the spasm can only take place in an inferior degree, as long as the

N O T E.

Fothergill, though he does not specify the number, complains that he has met with it but too often. To which we may add the solitary cases observed by Dr. Percival, and Dr. Haygarth, and that of the unknown gentleman who wrote the letter to Dr. Heberden.

patient continues to survive the paroxysm; since an affection of this sort, and in this part, of any considerable duration or violence, must inevitably prove fatal: and accordingly, as far as could be traced, the persons who have been known to labour under this disease, have, in general, died suddenly.

The dissections also shew, that whatever be the true seat of the spasm, it is not necessary for the bringing of it on, that the heart, or its immediate appendages, should be in a morbid state; for in three, out of the six that have been made public, these parts were found in a sound state.

From all that we have hitherto seen published, it does not appear that any considerable advances have been made towards the actual cure of this anomalous spasm.

The very judicious, and attentive Dr. Heberden (to whom the public are highly obliged for first making the disorder known) confesses, that bleeding, vomits, and other evacuations have not appeared to do any good; wine and cordials taken at bed time, will sometimes prevent or weaken the fits; but nothing does this so effectually as opiates: in short, the medicines usually called nervous or cordial, such as relieve, and quiet convulsive motions, and invigorate the languishing principle of life, are what he recommends.

Dr. Wall mentions one patient, out of the twelve or thirteen, that he had seen, who applied to him early in the disease, and was relieved considerably by the use of antimonial medicines joined with the fetid gums; he was still living, at the time the doctor wrote his paper (November 1772) and going about with tolerable ease. Two were carried off by other disorders; all the rest died suddenly.

Dr. Fothergill's directions are chiefly calculated with the view to prevent the disorder from gaining ground, and to alleviate present distress. Accordingly he enjoins such a kind of diet as may be most likely to prevent irritability; in particular, not to eat voraciously: to be particularly abstemious in respect to every thing heating; spices, spirits, wines, and all fermented liquors: to guard most scrupulously against passion, or any vehement emotions; and to make use of all the usual means of establishing, and preserving general health: to mitigate excesses of irritability, by anodynes; or pains, if they quicken the circulation; to disperse flatulencies when they distend the stomach, by moderate doses of carminatives, amongst which, perhaps, simple peppermint water may be reckoned one of the safest. But since obesity is justly considered as a principal epical predisposing cause, he insists strongly on the necessity of preventing an increase of fat by a vegetable diet, and using every other practicable method of augmenting the thinner secretions.

Such then are the only means of relief with which the public has hitherto been made acquainted; for, excepting the instance mentioned by Dr. Wall, it appears that alteratives are very little used in England in these cases, and issues never.

The honour of first making trial of their effects, was reserved for this country, at a time when no history of the disease had been published, by any author, either ancient or modern.

The following case, wherein an alterative course, together with a copious drain, has effected a complete cure, was communicated to the author, by Dr. Smith, who has permitted the publication, to the end, that practitioners may be informed of the means for relieving sufferers in a similar state of distress and danger; and when they consider, that this plan of treatment has been perfectly successful, in the only instance where it has been yet used, it must excite them to make a full trial of it; more especially, since the appearance of the blood, as already mentioned, in some of the dissections, shewed the presence of an acrimony of the sharpest kind.

The person whose case is here related, lives in this city, and has been visited by the author, at the desire of the gentleman who was pleased to furnish the history. He is, at this day, in perfect health, and full of gratitude for his deliverance; the case was read to him, and he agreed, that it contains a most faithful description of his past sufferings; but being somewhat delicate, and fearing that his having an issue might come to the knowledge of his common acquaintances, he has requested that his name might not be inserted.

A. B. a tall, well-made man; rather large than otherwise; of healthy parents, except that there had been a little gout in his family; temperate; being very attentive to the business of his trade (that of a watch-maker) led a life uncommonly sedentary; had, from his boyhood upwards, been remarkably subject to alarming inflammations of his throat, which seized him at least, once in the course of the year; in all other respects well.

In 1767, (then 48 years of age) he was taken without any evident cause, with a sudden and very dispiriting throbbing under the sternum. It soon afterwards increased, and returned upon him every third or fourth week, accompanied with great anxiety; very laborious breathing; choking; a sensation of fulness and distension in his head; a bloated and flushed countenance; turgid and watery eyes; and a very irregular and unequal pulse. The paroxysm invaded, almost constantly, while he was sitting after dinner; now and then he was seized with it in the morning, when walking a little faster than usual; and was then obliged to stop, and rest on any object at hand: once or twice it came on in bed; but did not oblige him to sit up, as it was then attended with no great difficulty in breathing. In the afternoon sits, his great ease was from a supine posture; in which he used to continue motionless for some hours, until, quite spent and worn out with anguish, he dropt into a slumber. In the intervals between these attacks, which at length grew so frequent as to return every fourth or fifth day, he was, to appearance, in perfect health.

Thus matters continued for more than two years; and various antispasmodics were ineffectually tried for his relief. In 1769, there supervened a very sharp, constrictory pain, at the upper part of the sternum, stretching equally on each side, attended with the former symptoms of anxiety, dyspnoea, choking, &c. and with an excruciating cramp, as he called it, that could be covered with a crown piece, in each of his arms, between the elbow and the wrist, exactly at the insertion of the pronator teres: the rest of the limb was quite free. The fits were sometimes brought on, and always exasperated, by an agitation of mind or body. He once attempted to ride on horseback during the paroxysm; but the experiment was near proving fatal to him. The difference of season or weather made no impression on him. Still, in the intervals, his health was perfectly good; except that his eyes, which, before his illness, were remarkably strong and clear, were now grown extremely tender; and that his sight was much impaired: he had no flatulency of stomach; and his bowels were regular.

In this situation, Feb. 22, 1770, he applied to me for assistance. I had seen, I believe, eight or ten of these frightful cases before: two of the patients dropt dead suddenly. They were men between forty and fifty years of age; and of a make somewhat fleshy. The fate of the others I was not informed of; or, at least, cannot now recollect.

Having found the total inefficacy of blisters, and the whole class of nervous medicines, in the treatment of this anomalous spasm, I thought it right to attempt the correcting, or draining off, of the irritating fluid in the case now before us; to this purpose I ordered a mixture of aq. calc. mag. c. with a little of the aq. junip. c. and an alterative proportion of Huxham's antimonial wine; I put the patient on a plain, light, perspirable diet; and restrained him from all viscid, flatulent, and acrimonious articles. By pursuing this course, he was soon apparently mended; but, after he had persisted regularly in it for, at least, two months, he kept for some time at a stand. I then ordered a large issue to be opened in each of his thighs: one only was made; however, as soon as it began to discharge, his amendment manifestly increased; the frequency and severity of the fits abated considerably; and he continued improving gradually until, at the end of eighteen months, he was restored to perfect health; which he has enjoyed without the least interruption till now, except when he has been tempted (perhaps once in a twelve-month) to transgress rules, by making a large meal on salted meat, or indulging himself in ale, or rum-punch, each of which never failed to disorder him from the beginning of his illness; and, even on these occasions, he has felt no more than the slightest notice of his former sufferings; inasmuch that he would despise the attack, if it did not appear to be of the same stock with his old complaint. No other cause has had the least ill effect on him.

Though rum was so constantly hurtful, yet punch made with a maceration of black currants in our vulgar corn spirit, is a liquor that agrees remarkably well with him.

He never took any medicine after the issue began to discharge; and I have directed that it shall be kept open as long as he lives. The inflammations of his throat have disappeared for five years past; he has recovered the strength and clearness of his sight; and his health seems now to be intirely re-established.

Oct. 25, 1776.

The Publisher of this Magazine is authorised by Dr. Macbride to inform the faculty, that since his work was printed off, three other cases of the Angina Pectoris (under management of the above-mentioned physician) have come to his knowledge, which prove the efficacy and success of the practice here recommended, beyond all doubt.

up the papers I send you by the bearer; I carried them home and read them carefully over—I made every possible enquiry for some time in London after the writer, but in vain; who he was or what countryman? I recollected the mention of a Mr. Carrack in one of the letters, and thereupon enquired if such a gentleman was to be met with?—So far I was successful—I went to his house, and informing him with the subject of my visit, received the following account in August, 1775: “There was a man of the name you mention, came to this country on board the Calcutta Indiaman, from Canton, having letters from our factors there to me; he seemed a sensible, agreeable man, but the story of his country, his countrymen and their manners, was so very romantic, that I believe he strove to impose on me; this gave me a dislike for him, and lest he should imagine I was weak enough to credit his reports, I was not at all inquisitive; his stay at my house was but short, and at his departure he told me he intended making the tour of England; all I can call to mind was that he said he was a native of an island in the South Seas, called Pine’s Island, that it was well cultivated, full of people, who were industrious and the most strict observers of the Christian religion; he continually affected a great surprize at our manners, and expressed a great concern at the decay of morality: I have often heard him give an account of his ancestor George Pine’s shipwreck, and several other strange tales, but as I doubted his veracity, they made so small an impression on me, they have totally escaped my memory.” Mr. Carrack here ended, and hoped I would excuse him, as he was obliged to attend change. I took my leave, and believe me, more uneasy and unsatisfied than before—I was obliged, however, to content myself with the following circumstance, which I since learned, and which somewhat corroborates Ebenezer’s account to Mr. Carrack.

In the year 1569, 3d of April, O. S. one English having fitted out a vessel for the India trade, embarked with his wife and daughter, three female servants, one black, the others white, taking George Pine as his factor, and sailed same day on his intended voyage. They never returned, nor was there any account of them until Van Slotten, a Dutchman, touched at an island whereon this ship had been wrecked, and found the descendants of Pine and of the four women, to wit, the daughter and maid-servants, the only people saved, increased to twenty thousand souls, divided into four names,—the LETTER I.

EBENEZER Phill to Jonadab Travers, greeting—Peace and happiness I sincerely wish thee—O my friend, how trifling were the rolling waves, and distance which I traversed to China, compared with what I have met, journeying through the great deep, to this still more strange and far distant country—For many moons we were deprived of all sight of land, and experienced no variety but what the tempestuous changes of the sea produced, after the tedious rocking of a calm—or sometimes the pleasing motion of a soft breeze—Shall I say I am recompensed for my travels and great toil? I know not what to say—I have doubtless met, even since my arrival, with many, many strange customs, far differing from ours—but I cannot boast of gaining any new pleasure to carry back to our happy isle—but an addition to what most of our countrymen happily enjoy—a contentedness in our land, and a sincere love for it.—Although I now sojourn among men professing the same religion with us, alas, they differ widely;—alas, I may say, more widely than the Heathens of China, whom I have so often mentioned to thee, from us!—a Christian may be bad—they have them here good and bad—our masters commands are talked of—but you find them as publicly broke through—they assemble on the first day of the week as we do, some of them, not all, and of these some to follow the antient usage of the land, which they term for fashion sake—they that come in first, if men, discourse of the news—if women, they generally tell the scandal of their neighbourhood, and talk of what they term the fashion of their dress—the word fashion here, I do not yet fully comprehend, for if it meant antient usage, as I take it in the former sense to mean, they would habit themselves plainly, like our forefathers, and like us, but they are not—they are quite other looking beings—all gaudy and gorgeous; the priest comes in when he thinks they are all assembled, and prays according to our prayers—but if some coldly repeat the words after him, the greater part are gazing about; or if acquaintance whispering with each other, they generally complain when the discourse is finished of the preachers insufferable tediousness—although give many of their priests their due, they seem to preach with much carelessness, and give sermons short enough!—The congregation then retire;—the rich go in machines composed of leather and wood, like huge chests, with doors on their sides, suspended over a carriage, with four wheels—two of which are as large as those of our carts, the foremost wheels are smaller;—these machines are termed coaches and chariots—in them they go to visit—but not to pay visits of charity to the poor, the sick, or the imprisoned,—nor yet of friendship to the rich and honourable, their equals;—but they drive from door to door, and leave slips of thick doubled paper, with their names written thereon with the porter, so proceed to kill, (as they themselves say) time, until dinner calls them to luxury, perhaps excess and debauchery, if the two last do not ensue, they have stiff square pieces of paper, named cards, on which are poorly delineated the figures of men and women—of squares—of hearts—of something resembling our chavis-leaf—and of the blade of a spade—various numbers from two to ten, sit at different tables, with certain portions of these cards in their hands, which they throw down, and gather in heaps according to certain regulations, and he who has the most heaps gains considerable sums of money; some men are ruined by it in their worldly affairs—and no one at the end, I think, is much enriched. I have heard but of two instances where fortunes by this means were accumulated and kept, but the characters and ends of the possessors were so vile, that I fancy they would deter any man from following so baleful a practice:—thus they mispend the day intended for the Lord's service, and continue their revels the whole night, until the returning sun of the next morning puts an end to their follies and wickedness for a short space.

O my friend, were you to behold some of the fairest faces among women, disfigured by the marks of different passions—envy, covetousness, distrust, anger and despair! how would you shudder? or to see their lately rosy lips turn pale and quiver, as if convulsed, or bit until the blood started out;—how would you pity, nay despise, those, so lately to be admired creatures?—But can I think of the blasphemy and imprecations of the men and write?—All providence is taken away from from heaven, and bestowed on those daubed papers!—You will say do they never reflect on an hereafter; although love and gratitude cannot make them obedient, are their fordid hearts not alarmed with the apprehension of punishments?—alas, no!—Given up to vice, they blindly and stupidly shut their eyes against danger, their ears against reproof, run headlong in the roads of destruction, and too often conclude all by self-murder!—The poor, uninformed of their duty, get drunk, or stupidly devote the day to sauntering up and down, or perhaps prepare for some worldly affairs, or drive bargains; you perceive how I suffer for my desire of seeing the country of our fathers—you may learn how it is fallen if ever virtuous—but I shall be more minute in a future letter about their customs and manners; for they have some which seem commendable, and I would have thee know there are good men here—I live in the house of one John Carrack—he is one one of the company which trades to India; direct your epistles there for me.—Fare thee well.

BELIEVE me, gentlemen, the way still before you is intricate, dark, and full of perplexed and treacherous mazes. Those who think they have the clue, may lead us out of this labyrinth. We may trust them as amply as we think proper. But as they have most certainly a call for all the reason which their stock can furnish, why should we think it proper to disturb its operation by inflaming their passions? I may be unable to lend an helping hand to those who direct the state; but I should be ashamed to make myself one of a noisy multitude to hollow and hearten them into doubtful and dangerous courses. A conscientious man would be cautious how he dealt in blood. He would feel some apprehension at being called to a tremendous account for engaging in so deep a play, without any sort of knowledge of the game. It is no excuse for presumptuous ignorance, that it is directed by insolent passion. The poorest being that crawls on earth, contending to save itself from injustice and oppression, is an object respectable in the eyes of God and man. But I cannot conceive any existence under heaven, (which, in the depths of its wisdom, tolerates all sorts of things) that is more truly odious and disgusting, than an impotent helpless creature, without civil wisdom or military skill, without a consciousness of any other qualification for power but his servility to it, bloated with pride and arrogance, calling for battles which he is not to fight, contending for a violent dominion which he can never exercise, and satisfied to be himself mean and miserable, in order to render others contemptible and wretched.

I hope there are none of you, corrupted with the doctrine taught by wicked men for the worst purposes, and greedily received by the malignant credulity of envy and ignorance, which is, that the men who act upon the public stage are all alike; all equally corrupt; all influenced by no other views than the sordid lucre of salary and pension. The thing, I know by experience to be false. Never expecting to find perfection in men, and not looking for divine attributes in created beings, in my commerce with my cotemporaries, I have found much human virtue. I have seen not a little public spirit: a real subordination of interest to duty; and a decent and regulated sensibility to honest fame and reputation. The age unquestionably produces, (whether in a greater or less number than in former times, I know not) daring profligates, and insidious hypocrites. What then? Am I not to avail myself of whatever good is to be found in the world because of the mixture of evil that will always be in it? The smallness of the quantity in currency only heightens the value. They, who raise suspicions of the good on account of the behaviour of ill men, are of the party of the latter. The common cant is no justification for taking this party. I have been deceived, say they, by Titius and Mævius. I have been the dupe of this pretender or of that mountebank; and I can trust appearances no longer. But my credulity and want of discernment cannot, as I conceive, amount to a fair presumption against any man's integrity. A conscientious person would rather doubt his own judgment, than condemn his species. He would say, I have observed without attention, or judged upon erroneous maxims; I trusted to profession, when I ought to have attended to conduct. Such a man will grow wise, not malignant, by his acquaintance with the world. But he that accuses all mankind of corruption ought to remember that he is sure to convict only one. In truth I should much rather admit those, whom at any time I have disrelieved the most, to be patterns of perfection, than seek a consolation to my own unworthiness, in a general communion of depravity with all about me.

That this ill-natured doctrine should be preached by the missionaries of a court, I do not wonder. It answers their purpose. But that it should be heard among those who pretend to be strong assertors of liberty, is not only surprising, but hardly natural. This moral levelling is a servile principle. It leads to practical passive obedience far better, than all the doctrines, which the pliant accommodation of Theology to power, has ever produced. It cuts up by the roots, not only all idea of forcible resistance, but even of civil opposition. It disposes men to an abject submission, not by opinion, which may be shaken by argument or altered by passion, but by the strong ties of public and private interest. For if all men who act in a public situation are equally selfish, corrupt, and venal, what reason can be given for desiring any sort of change, which, besides the evils which must attend all changes, can be productive of no possible advantage? The active men in the state are true samples of the mass. If they are universally depraved, the common-wealth itself is not sound. We may amuse ourselves with talking as much as we please of the virtue of middle or humble life; that is, we may place our confidence in the virtue of those who have never been tried. But if the persons who are continually emerging out of that sphere, be no better than those whom birth has placed above it, what hopes are there in the remainder of the body which is to furnish the perpetual succession of the state? All who have ever written on government, are unanimous, that among a people generally corrupt, liberty cannot long exist. And indeed how is it possible? when those who are to make the laws, to guard, to enforce, or to obey them, are by a tacit confederacy of manners, indisposed to the spirit of all generous and noble institutions.

I am aware that the age is not what we all wish. But I am sure, that the only means of checking its precipitate degeneracy, is heartily to concur with whatever is the best in our time; and to have some more correct standard of judging what that best is, than the transient and uncertain favour of a court. If once we are able to find, and can prevail on ourselves to strengthen an union of such men, whatever accidentally becomes indisposed to ill-exercised power, even by the ordinary operation of human passions, must join with that society, and cannot long be joined, without in some degree assimilating to it. Virtue will catch as well as vice by contact; and the public stock of honest mainly principle will daily accumulate. We are not too nicely to scrutinize motives as long as action is irreproachable. It is enough, (and for a worthy man perhaps too much) to deal out its infamy to convicted guilt and declared apostacy.

To act on the principles of the constitution, with the best men the time affords, has been from the beginning the rule of my conduct; and I mean to continue it, as long as such a body as I have described, can by any possibility be kept together. For I should think it the most dreadful of all offences, not only towards the present generation but to all the future, if I were to do any thing which could make the minutest breach in this great conservatory of free principles. Those who perhaps have the same intentions, but are separated by some little political animosities, will, I hope, discern at last, how little conducive it is to any rational purpose, to lower its reputation. For my part, gentlemen, from much experience, from no little thinking, and from comparing a great variety of things, I am thoroughly persuaded, that the last hopes of preserving the spirit of the English constitution, or of re-uniting the dissipated members of the English race upon a common plan of tranquillity and liberty, does entirely depend on the firm and lasting union of such men; and above all on their keeping themselves from that despair, which is so very apt to fall on those, whom a violence of character, and a mixture of ambitious views, do not support through a long, painful, and unsuccessful struggle.

There never, gentlemen, was a period in which the steadfastness of some men has been put to so sore a trial. It is not very difficult for well-formed minds to abandon their interest; but the separation of fame and virtue is an harsh divorce. Liberty is in danger of being made unpopular to Englishmen. Contending for an imaginary power, we begin to acquire the spirit of domination, and to lose the relish of honest equality. The principles of our forefathers become suspected to us, because we see them animating the present opposition of our children. The faults which grow out of the luxuriance of freedom, appear much more shocking to us, than the base vices which are generated from the rankness of servitude. Accordingly the least resistance to power appears more inexcusable in our eyes than the greatest abuses of authority. All dread of a standing military force is looked upon as a superstitious panic. All shame of calling in foreigners and savages in a civil contest is worn off. We grow indifferent to to the consequences inevitable to ourselves from the plan of ruling half the empire by a mercenary sword. We are taught to believe, that a desire of domineering over our countrymen, is love to our country; that those who hate civil war abet rebellion; and that the amiable and conciliatory virtues of lenity, moderation, and tenderness to the privileges of those who depend on this kingdom, are a sort of treason to the state.

It is impossible that we should remain long in a situation, which breeds such notions and dispositions, without some great alteration in the national character. Those ingenuous and feeling minds, who are so fortified against all other things, and so unarmed to whatever approaches in the shape of disgrace, finding the principles, which they considered as sure means of honour, to be grown into disrepute, will retire disheartened and disgusted. Those of a more robust make, the bold, able, ambitious men, who pay some part of their court to power through the people, and substitute the voice of transient opinion in the place of true glory, will give into the general mode. The superior understandings, which ought to correct vulgar prejudice, will confirm and aggravate its errors. Many things have been long operating towards a gradual change in our principles. But this American war has done more in a very few years than all the other causes could have effected in a century. It is therefore not on its own separate account, but because of its attendant circumstances, that I consider its continuance, or its ending in any way but that of an honourable and liberal accommodation, as the greatest evils which can befall us. For that reason I have troubled you with this long letter. For that reason I intreat you again and again, neither to be persuaded, shamed, or frightened out of the principles that have hitherto led so many of you to abhor the war, its cause, and its consequences. Let us not be amongst the first who renounce the maxims of our forefathers.

I have the honour to be,
Gentlemen,
your most obedient,
and faithful humble servant,

Beaconsfield, EDMUND BURKE.

Description of the Market Towns of Antrim and Randalstown.

ANTRIM is situated about 81 miles N. of Dublin, on a small river, which falls into Loughneagh, over this river is a pretty good stone-bridge. This town contains about 400 houses, the greater number of which are built with stone and thatched; a few in the market-place are pretty good slated houses of brick.—The market-house is a large quadrangular building, containing five arches of hewn stone; on each of the largest sides three arches in another, and on the front a great flight of steps project into the street: these steps reach to a large and handsome room, where the sessions of the co. Antrim are held, but the assizes are held in Carrickfergus. The church of Antrim is a very ugly building, without a steeple, and is covered with wood, which is a common covering for houses in this province, and is called shingles.—There are handsome quays or walks along the river-side, and a fine seat and demesne near the town, belonging to the earl of Massarene, now a prisoner in France.—Antrim is a potwalloping borough, sending two members to parliament. Two miles N. W. of Antrim, on the edge of Loughneagh, is situated Shane's-castle, a small village, and seat of John O'Neil, Esq. This house is one of the best in the county, built on the edge of the lough, which beats against the house. The demesne is very beautiful, and so large, that we ride near two miles along the side of the walls, and then enter the little village of Randalstown.

This town contains about 100 houses, almost all thatched, and built of stone. In the middle of the town is a handsome market-house, with a large assembly-room over it. A very great linen market is held here the first Wednesday in every month, the night before which an assembly is held for the linen-draper, who come to the market; on which occasion they dance in their boots and spurs, to the detriment of the lady's aprons, but as the destruction of the aprons increases the demand for fine linen, the patriotic ladies do not complain. This town belongs to John O'Neil, Esq; and is a potwalloping borough, returning two members to parliament. The church of this village is a handsome little building, with a tall spire of wood.

SIR ROBERT WALPOLE.

I Much question, whether an impartial character of Sir Robert Walpole will or can be transmitted to posterity: for he governed this kingdom so long, that the various passions of mankind mingled and in a manner incorporated themselves with every thing that was said or written concerning him. Never was man more flattered or more abused—and his long power was probably the cause of both. I was much acquainted with him both in his public and private life. I mean to do impartial justice to his character, and therefore my picture of him will perhaps be more like him, than it will be like any of the other pictures drawn of him.

In private life he was good-natured, cheerful, social; inelegant in his manners, loose in his morals, he had a coarse strong wit, which he was too free of for a man in his station, as it is always inconsistent with dignity. He was very able as a Minister, but without a certain elevation of mind, necessary for great good, or great mischief. Profuse and appetent, his ambition was subservient to his design of making a great fortune—He had more of the Mazarin than of the Richelieu—He would do mean things for profit, and never thought of doing great ones for glory. He was both the best parliament-man, and the ablest manager of parliament, that I believe ever lived. An artful rather than eloquent speaker, he saw, as by intuition, the disposition of the house, and pressed or receded accordingly. So clear in stating the most intricate matters, especially in the finances, that, whilst he was speaking the most ignorant thought that they understood what they really did not. Money, not prerogative, was the chief engine of his administration; and he employed it with a success, which in a manner disgraced humanity. He was not, it is true, the inventor of that shameful method of governing which had been gaining ground insensibly ever since Charles the Second, but with uncommon skill and unbounded profusion he brought it to that perfection which at this time dishonours and distresses this country, and which (if not checked, and God knows how it can be now checked) must ruin it.

Besides this powerful engine of government, he had a most extraordinary talent of persuading and working men up to his purpose—A hearty kind of frankness, which sometimes seemed imprudence, made people think that he let them into his secrets, whilst the impoliteness of his manners seemed to attest his sincerity. When he found any body proof against pecuniary temptations, which alas! was but seldom, he had recourse to a still worse art: for he laughed at and ridiculed all notions of public virtue and the love of one's country, calling them "The chimerical school-boy flights of classical learning"; declaring himself at the same time "No Saint, no Spartan, no Reformer." He would frequently ask young fellows at their first appearance in the world, while their honest hearts were yet untainted—" Well, are you to be an old Roman? a patriot? You'll soon come off of that and grow wiser. And thus he was more dangerous to the morals, than to the liberties of his country, to which I am persuaded that he meant no ill in his heart.

He was the easy and profuse dupe of women, and in some instances indecently so—He was excessively open to flattery, even of the grossest kind, and from the coarsest bunglers of that vile profession; which engaged him to pass most of his leisure and jovial hours with people whose blasted characters reflected upon his own—He was loved by many, but respected by none, his familiar and illiberal mirth and raillery leaving him no dignity—He was not vindictive, but on the contrary very placable to those who had injured him the most—His good humour, good nature, and beneficence in the several relations of father, husband, master, and friend, gained him the warmest affections of all within that circle.

His name will not be recorded in history amongst the Best Men, or the Best Ministers, but much less ought it to be ranked amongst the worst.

Review of the Character of Sir Robert Walpole.

SIR Robert Walpole had so open a countenance, and such expressive features, that it was almost impossible for a skilful painter not to draw an exact likeness of him.

The noble writer, though he has kept to the general idea of his character, has not been so exact in his delineation of it as might have been expected from one who professes to have been long and well acquainted with it. He tells you, that his sole view was to make a great fortune: how does that appear? Sir Robert Walpole did not die a rich man; it is plain then that he disdained the accumulation of riches, which could not be obtained but by the oppression of his country.

In the view of his public character, the noble Lord is not very distant from the truth. He was the first minister that taught corruption systematically. Corruption was ashamed, ashamed, and held down her head, till he gave her courage, and taught her to stare the world in the face. He maintained, that every man was venal, and had his price; he asserted openly, that all the world was governed by interest. So good-natured a man as Walpole, was in this more guided by judgment and experience, than any motive proceeding from malice or corruption. Long practice with the world had taught him how ill-founded were the pretensions of those men who boasted of being influenced by virtuous and patriotick motives*.

Yet, though we must own he ruled this country by general corruption, and succeeded in his plans of government by temporary expedients, there was a decency in his parliamentary conduct, of which we now lament the total absence.

Every motion during his administration was treated with respect, and every question discussed with seeming fairness and impartiality. The parliamentary chiefs were ranged on both sides, according to their supposed merit; and engaged each other, not only with vigour, but with that liberality which becomes citizens. There was then no rude and boisterous uproar, no boyish and tumultuous clamour of The question! the question!

Sir Robert was not only an artful but an eloquent speaker; he generally reserved himself for the close of a debate; he wished to take off the edge of the most powerful of his opponents. This compliment he paid frequently to Pulteney, but more often to Sir William Wyndham, whose consummate knowledge of parliamentary business, and happy talent in speaking, rendered him extremely formidable, and worthy such an answer as the Minister.

He was too apt to be alarmed at any attack upon his character or administration from the press, in a poem or a pamphlet; his constant practice, on such occasions, was to get a friend to invite the author to dine at a tavern or at his friend's house, and he himself to be of the party, as if by chance. Such meetings generally ended in a conversion of the patriotic author, by the powerful eloquence of a bank note.

No minister was ever so liberal in rewarding his authors as W. It has been said, and I believe proved beyond contradiction, that Arnall, the writer of The British Journal, at different times, had sums from him to the amount of ten thousand pounds. The slightest favour from the press was sure to be amply rewarded: An anecdote at the bottom of the page will give a striking proof of this*.

In private life he was certainly a most desirable companion; and though Lord Chesterfield was too delicate in his notions of convivial pleasures, and could not bear any thing above a simper or a smile, more open and generous natures were highly pleased with Walpole's genuine flow of good-humour and honest mirth, which his Lordship calls illiberal, and below the dignity of his rank and station.

There is one honourable part of his character that I wish all ministers would imitate. He never forgot the smallest act of friendship that he received from the greatest or meanest man in the kingdom: the gratitude as well as munificence of his temper are so well known, that it is needless to produce any instances in support of this assertion.

Mr. PULTENEY.

MR. Pulteney was formed by nature for social and convivial pleasures—Resentment made him engage in business. He had thought himself slighted by Sir Robert Walpole, to whom he publicly avowed not only revenge, but utter destruction. He had lively and shining parts, a surprizing quickness of wit, and a happy turn to the most amusing and entertaining kinds of poetry, as epigrams, ballads, odes, &c. in all which he had an uncommon facility. His compositions in that way were sometimes satyirical, often licentious, but always full of wit.

He had a quick and clear conception of business, could equally detect and practise sophistry—he could state and explain the most intricate matters, even in figures with the utmost perspicuity. His parts were rather above business, and the warmth of his imagination, joined to the impetuosity and restlessness of his temper, made him incapable of conducting it long together with prudence and steadiness.

N O T E.

* About the year 1735, several very severe pamphlets were published against Walpole's administration. Among the rest was a poem called—"Are these things for?" A young gentleman of about nineteen years of age, took it into his head to write an answer to this piece, to which he gave the title of, "Yes, they are!" Sir Robert was so pleased with it, though but a flimsy performance, that he sent for Roberts, the publisher, and expressed his great satisfaction at the compliment paid him, by giving a bank note of a hundred pounds; which he desired the publisher to present with his compliments to the author.

He was a most compleat orator and debator in the House of Commons, eloquent, entertaining, persuasive, strong, and pathetic, as occasion required; for he had arguments, wit, and tears at his command. His breast was the seat of all those passions which degrade our nature and disturb our reason. There they raged in a perpetual conflict, but avarice, the meanest of them all, generally triumphed, ruled absolutely, and in many instances, which I forbear to mention *, most scandalously.

His sudden passion was outrageous, but supported by great personal courage.

Nothing exceeded his ambition but his avarice: they often accompany and are frequently and reciprocally the causes and the effects of each other, but the latter is always a clog upon the former.

He affected good nature and compassion, and perhaps his heart might feel the misfortunes and distresses of his fellow-creatures, but his hand was seldom or never stretched out to relieve them.

Though he was an able actor of truth and sincerity, he could occasionally lay them aside to serve the purposes of his ambition or avarice.

He was once in the greatest point of view that I ever saw any subject in. When the opposition of which he was the leader in the House of Commons, prevailed at last against Sir Robert Walpole, he became the arbiter between the Crown and the People: the former imploring his protection, the latter his support. In that critical moment his various jarring passions

N O T E.

* One instance, if he had known it, the characterizer might not have thought beneath his notice. Vanity had often loudly insisted that the Earl of Bath should have a burial-place amongst the illustrious dead in Westminster Abbey, and had as often been called to order by avarice for the extravagant idea. But at length she carried her point by a lucky opportunity of not only bringing her adversary over, but of animating her in a cause, which she now looked upon as her own, from the flattering prospect of extending her triumph, which she was already assured would be felt "strong in death," even beyond death itself. It was discovered that in this receptacle of fallen grandeur there was a vault belonging to the family of Hatton, of which there was but one life remaining. Lord Bath purchased the reversion of this vault, which soon after became his property, and then sold a division of it for the full sum he had given for the whole, with the unspeakable happiness to foresee that his Right Honourable remnants would rot with Royalty at free-cost.

were in the highest ferment, and for a while suspended his ruling one. Sense of shame made him hesitate at turning courtier on a sudden, after having acted the patriot so long, and with so much applause, and his pride made him declare that he would accept of no place, vainly imagining, that he could by such a simulated and temporary self-denial preserve his popularity with the people and his power at court. He was mistaken in both. The king hated him almost as much for what he might have done, as for what he had done: and a motley ministry was formed who by no means desired his company.

The nation looked upon him as a deserter, and he shrunk into insignificancy and an earldom.

He made several attempts afterwards to retrieve the popularity he had lost, but in vain—his situation would not allow it—he was fixed in the House of Lords, that hospital of incurables, and his retreat to popularity was cut off—For the confidence of the people, when once given, and once lost, is never to be regained—He lived afterwards in retirement with the wretched comfort of Horace's miser;

Populus me sibilat, &c.

I may perhaps be suspected to have given too strong colouring to some features of this portrait; but I solemnly protest, that I have drawn it conscientiously and to the best of my knowledge, from very long acquaintance with and observation of the original. Nay, I have rather softened than heightened the colouring.

Review of the Character of Mr. Pulteney.

WILLIAM Pulteney was happy in having every advantage of birth and fortune.

The brilliancy of his parts excited the admiration of men celebrated for their eminence in the republic of literature, at a very early period of his life. We are told, from the best authority *, that Congreve submitted his Way of the World, one of his most finished pieces, while in MS. to the criticism of young Pulteney when a boy of seventeen years of age.

As he advanced to maturity, he became acquainted with the members of the famous Kit-Kat club. He was intimate with Addison and Steele; had the honour of a dedication of their periodical Essays †; and received about the same period an honourable testimony of his integrity from a masterly writer, to whose political principles he was professedly an enemy †.

When he aspired to rise in the state, and became a speaker in parliament, the ministers of George the first soon distinguished him by employment. United with Walpole, and apparently in the strictest bonds of friendship, he was looked upon as his firm support and coadjutor. But ambition soon broke through the ties that were cemented only by interest. The minister, who could brook no rival in power, saw plainly that Pulteney was too great to act an inferior part in administration, and quarrelled with him at once to get rid of him.

The country-party, who did all in their power to foment the difference between the two friends, received Pulteney with open arms. They rejoiced to have for their leader a man of his fortune, consequence, and intrepidity. His abilities as an orator were of the first rank. From his constant perusal of the classics, he seemed to have derived a kind of inspiration. When he spoke, he had the art to persuade all who heard him, that he felt every sentiment which he uttered.

He was pointed, gay, facetious, pathetic, or diffuse, as the argument required; whatever rhetorical weapon he chose to brandish, he was sure to come off victorious, for he was master of them all.

He conducted the opposition with skill and vigour, for the long term of seventeen years. During the conflict, his animosity to Walpole led him into that most scandalous practice of betraying private conversation *. However, he lost his aim; for the king graciously took the part of the person betrayed; and, to shew his indignation against the informer, with his own hand he struck his name from the list of privy counsellors.

It must be confessed, that since the pensionary parliament of Charles the second, when corruption first began to shew its head, no scheme to overthrow a minister had been so well planned, and regularly pursued, as that which began in 1725, and ended with Walpole's dismissal in 1742.

* P. in a pamphlet which he published about the year 1735, and which contained a particular defence of himself against a ministerial work called "Scandal and Defamation displayed," declared upon his honour, that Sir Robert Walpole had spoken in very slight terms of the king when prince of Wales; he quoted the very words which were supposed to be made use of by the minister, and which conveyed great marks of contempt.

Hib. Mag. July, 1777.

The fall of the minister was fatal to the popularity of his rival. When he had reached the summit of his wishes, he was dazzled with his situation;—the prospect made him giddy.—He was for a few days uncertain what to do—an accident, which happened during the adjournment of parliament, might possibly accelerate his determination.

As he was riding in Hyde Park, he had an accidental fall from his horse, which gave him a slight bruise; the king happened to come by at the very instant, and being informed of Mr. Pulteney's misfortune, he immediately went to him, took him into his coach, and shewed such concern for him, as could not but soothe and affect the mind of a person so publicly distinguished by his sovereign at so critical a time.

Pulteney's conduct soon became decisive; the prey, that had been fairly hunted down, was suffered to shelter itself under the wing of royalty.—Walpole, instead of being punished, was rewarded with a peerage.—His great enemy soon followed him into that place, where great abilities and honest principles are of no service to the owner of them, or to his country—

*"Lasciate ogni speranza, voi chi intrate ."

Pulteney hoped, that, by giving up all lucrative employments, and barely accepting a title, he had silenced obloquy, and removed suspicion.—But the avarice of his temper was so well and universally understood, that it was vulgarly supposed he had accepted large sums for making the compromise between the crown and the leaders of the opposition;—this was indeed looked upon to be equally an idle and groundless surmise. However, it is very certain that a great part of Piccadilly, which produced a very large income, and which till that time had belonged to the crown, became all of a sudden the property of Mr. Pulteney. I will not here indulge conjecture, nor endeavour to draw back the veil which time has thrown over a very equivocal transaction: I wish not to throw unmerited reproach on the dead, or to disturb the repose of the living. Pulteney, when he obtained a peerage, thought himself that his ambition had been satisfied; but he was mistaken; for we are told that, upon the death of lord Wilmington, he applied to George the second, to succeed him in his office of first lord of the treasury. The king silenced him at once, by assuring him that he had promised that place to Mr. Pelham.

Lord B. was one of those noblemen whom Lord Carteret recommended to the king in 1744, as a proper person to serve his majesty in a considerable employment. The sudden resignation of the Pelhams and all their friends prevented the scheme of a new ministry from taking place. At the same time we must not forget, that the E. of B. suffered most egregious mortifications upon that event. The earl of Pembroke, an honest and intrepid man, but rough and intractable in his disposition, resigned his place of chamberlain, in such a manner as conveyed the most insulting reproach to the E. of B.*.

Upon the death of George the Second, the E. of B. made a tender of his services to his present majesty.—The offer was accepted, so far as to the hearing of his advice; but the Great Person knew his character was so disagreeable to all parties, and so odious to the people in general, that he could not think of giving him any post in the administration. It is affirmed with great confidence, that, whenever his opinion was asked relating to state-matters, he constantly gave it against the popular side of the question.

If we take a view of Pulteney in private life, we shall see him exhibit a character as truly inconsistent and contradictory as in his public conduct. In a long and violent struggle between those two master-passions, Ambition and Avarice, the latter generally, if not always, gets the better. Though Ambition may have its bounds, Avarice has none: when the decaying faculties of the human mind render the love of fame but feeble, and almost extinct, Avarice predominates as powerfully as ever, and flourishes in full vigour to the last moment of life.

The world is pretty well convinced, that however Pulteney's ambition, after various disappointments, might be stifled, or even annihilated, his love of money did not forsake him to his last hours.

But what shall we say to the character of this nobleman, as given us by two eminent prelates†? The one proclaims him a disinterested patriot; and the other avers, that, to his knowledge, he bestowed ed the tenth part of his income in charitable uses!

His patriotic virtues are well known; but his charities were a secret, till bishop Pearce divulged them. Can the noblest munificence dwell under the same roof with the most sordid parsimony?—When we take a large and comprehensive view of human nature, we find it so various and so eccentric, that we may grant that the thing is not impossible; for not only fools, but the wise, sometimes lie hid in inconsistencies.

But if the Earl of B. had his list of pensioners, how comes it that Amhurst was forgotten? The fate of this poor man is singular:—he was the able associate of Bolingbroke and Pulteney, in writing a celebrated weekly paper called The Craftsman. His abilities were unquestionable; he had almost as much wit, learning, and various knowledge, as his two partners; and when these great masters chose not to appear in public themselves, he supplied their places so well, that his essays were often ascribed to them. Amhurst survived the downfall of Walpole's power, and had reason to expect a reward for his labours. If we excuse Bolingbroke, who had only saved the shipwreck of his fortunes, we shall be at a loss to justify Pulteney, who could with ease have given this man a comfortable income.—The utmost of his generosity to Amhurst, that I ever heard of, was a hoghead of claret!—He died, it is supposed, of a broken heart; and was buried at the charge of his honest printer, Richard Franklin.

The most agreeable part of Pulteney's character was, his fondness for convivial pleasures; in which he bore a very agreeable and shining part.—But though he loved company, and gave dinners, the splendor of his entertainments was always sullied by the sordid economy of the treasurer*.

His method of discharging bills was curious.—It must be owned, that he was punctual in paying his tradesmen; but his custom was, to amass a great number of Portuguese coin of all sorts, from the four shillings and six-pence to three pound twelve; all which he was extremely ready in telling, to an exact nicety of value. But the person who was to receive the money, not being so quick and skilful as his lordship, was directed to dispatch, or to call another time. Those tradesmen who had the candour to trust to his lordship's reckoning, were sure to repent their confidence; for there was generally a mistake in his favour.

The Editor of L. Chesterfield's Characters has sufficiently apologized for his mistake, relating to L. B's scheme of getting a burying place for himself and posterity, gratis, in a royal chapel. But he should have told the public, that the sum of seventy pounds was really paid for the ground; and that it is customary, whenever it is opened, to pay stated fees to the clergy.

Description of the City of Dublin.

DUBLIN, the capital of the kingdom of Ireland, and second city in the British dominions, is situated in a county of the same name, at each side the river Liffey or Anna Liffey, in 53°. 20. N. lat. and 6°. 15. W. long.

In extent and number of inhabitants this city bears proportion to London and Westminster, and their suburbs as three to ten. The exact number of houses are not known, but the inhabitants are generally estimated at 300,000. The city is nearly a square being about three English miles in length, and near the same in breadth, and about nine or ten miles in circumference. The river Liffey, which divides the town into two nearly equal parts, is banked in the whole length of the city at each side, forming spacious quays, where vessels load and unload before the merchants doors and warehouses. Over the river are five bridges of stone; of these Essex-bridge merits the most notice. It consists of five arches of white free-stone, the chord of the middle one is forty-eight feet; the whole is about two hundred and sixty feet long and fifty-one wide, and after the manner of Westminster-bridge, is ornamented with a stone ballustrade at each side, convenient places to shelter from rain, and a wide flagged foot-path. 'Twas built in 1756, at the expence of 24,000l. Queen's-bridge was rebuilt in 1767 after the same plan, consists of three elegant arches, being about one hundred and fifty feet long, and 40 wide.—The other bridges are not remarkable for the elegance of their architecture.

This city much resembles London, the houses universally of brick; many of the old streets are indeed narrow and mean, but several new streets have been built much more elegant and on better plans than those in the metropolis of Great Britain, some of which I shall take notice of in their proper places.

The square called St. Stephen's-green, is by much the largest in Europe, being a full mile in circumference; the outer walks are gravelled and planted with trees, after the manner of St. James's Park, and is the most frequented public walk in the city: In fine weather may be seen here as much gaiety and beauty as in any public place in England. The walks are separated from the coach road by a low wall; the inside is a lawn, in the midst of which is a fine equestrian statue of king George II. of brass, erected in 1758. The houses in this square are generally elegant, but a want of uniformity is observed thro' the whole; ample amends will be made for this irregularity in a new square nearly finished near the Green, called Merrion's-square, the houses are lofty, elegant, and uniformly built; being carried on with free-stone as far as the first floor, which will give the whole an elegance not to be equalled.

In this city are two cathedrals and eighteen parish churches; the cathedral church of St. Patrick is the largest church in Ireland, built in the ancient Gothic taste; the steeple is a great height, far exceeding any other in the kingdom. On it, in 1750, a spire upwards of one hundred feet high was erected; in this steeple are a small ring of bells. The most remarkable and most elegant monument in this church is that lately erected to the memory of Dr. Smith, Archbishop of Dublin, a plate of which is given in this Magazine, for 1775. In the liberty of this cathedral, is situated the palace of St. Sepulchre belonging to the see of Dublin, and the city library, containing about 12,000 volumes.

The cathedral of the Holy Trinity or Christ Church, is situated near the center of the city; here the lords lieutenants go in state to church: It is more elegant, tho' hardly so large as St. Patrick's; like the other 'tis built in form of a cross. In the great ayle are several monuments; the most remarkable are the following. (It has a fine ring of bells.) That erected in 1370, to the memory of Earl Strongbow, who died in 1177. His effigy at full length is to be seen on the tomb.—That of Thomas Prior represents his bust between two boys of white marble, they were sculptured in 1756; this monument is inclosed by iron pallisades.—That of the late lord chancellor Bowes, who died in 1767, a statue of Justice sitting, of white marble, as large as the life, holds a medallion with his head in basso relievo. This is likewise inclosed within pallisades of iron.—The monument of the late earl of Kildare, grandfather of the present duke of Leinster, ster, is situated near the chancel of the church, and was erected in 1743. It consists of four figures of the natural size, of white marble. The earlies extended, his lady weeping over him, another lady behind her, and his late grace of Leinster in a dejected posture at his feet.

Besides the liberties of those two cathedrals, there are in this city eighteen parishes, four North of the river and fourteen South.

St. Thomas's parish, the most eastern at the north side, is mostly inhabited by nobility and gentry, yet the parish church situated in Marlborough-street has no steeple, otherwise 'tis a handsome building, with a modern front of hewn stone. As this parish is large, there is another church or chapel in it called St. George's, which has a pretty good steeple. In this parish is situated the Lying-in Hospital, esteemed by many, the most elegant charitable building in Europe; 'twas erected in 1750 at the expence of 15,000*l.* contains eleven windows in front in each story, and is three stories high; at each side is a portico supported by nine handsome pillars; over the center of the building is a handsome clock and cupola: the apartments are very elegant. The stucco work and stained glass windows of the chapel of this hospital are admired by all who see them. Behind this hospital are public gardens and rotunda capable of holding 3,000 people, where concerts of music are performed three times a week in summer, the profits arising therefrom are applied to the support of the hospital. Sackville-street, the finest in Dublin, and many say in Europe, is likewise situated in this parish, had it been carried up to the front of the hospital, it would be without parallel. In the midst of the street is a mall inclosed with a low wall, with many obelisks for lamps; the buildings, all of brick, are elegant and uniform.

St. Mary's parish adjoining is larger than St. Thomas's, and likewise great part of it inhabited by nobility and gentry, and many eminent traders, yet the church steeple was never finished, and the whole building is far from elegant. This parish is so large that it might well be divided into three; the foundation of a new church was laid in the Little Green in this parish some time ago, but never finished nor the parish divided.

St. Michan's parish joins St. Mary's, it is very large, but mostly inhabited by inferior traders; the church is a large and good ancient building, with a good steeple and elegant organ, and a fine ring of bells. To save myself much writing, I may inform the reader that most of the churches have organs. Another church seems wanting here. In this parish is situated the House of Industry, in which are about seven hundred of the vagrant poor.

St. Paul's is a large parish; the church in Oxmantown Green is small, but handsome, without a steeple: In this parish is situated the Barrack, the largest building in Dublin, consisting of four large squares, one of which is entirely built of hewn stone, and is above three hundred feet square, and four stories high; in the principal front is a handsome clock and cupola: the other three courts are large open squares built only on three sides. In this barrack are usually quartered six regiments of foot and one of horse. A chapel seems wanting in this building, that which was intended for a chapel, being converted into a riding house.

Opposite St. Paul's parish at the South side of the river, is situated the parish of St. James, which contains but about half a dozen streets, and a few lanes, being much smaller than those before mentioned. The church is a small building, the steeple is built of brick, over the gate at the entrance into the church-yard. As this parish, besides the streets, has a pretty considerable extent of country in it, several of the principal hospitals are situated in it, the first of which is:—The Royal Hospital of Kilmainham, it is finely situated on a rising ground near the river, in a park called the Hospital Fields, beautifully planted with rows of elms, and much frequented by the town class of people in this part. This hospital is a large and elegant quadrangular building, with a fine spire steeple in the principal front: In this hospital four hundred disabled and superannuated soldiers are decently maintained.

Stephen's Hospital, is a large quadrangle, and capable of holding three hundred beds. Dr. Swift's hospital for lunatics is in this parish, and likewise the Work-house, or Foundling Hospital, well known all over the kingdom. There are in this hospital constantly between eight hundred, and one thousand children. a far greater number are at nurse in country; this charitable institution is tirely supported by the city, tho' the nation are benefited by it.

The whole number of hospitals in Dublin are about twenty, a few of which will be enough to mention, which I shall in this place.

The Blue Coat Hospital in the parish of St. Paul, was founded for the support of the orphans or children of reduced citizens. The present number of boys in this hospital is about two hundred; the old hospital tal being in bad repair, a new one was begun in 1773, and is nearly finished; when finished, it will be one of the most elegant buildings in the city. There are besides about twenty principal hospitals, several alms-houses or lesser hospitals in the city, and in each parish one, two or more charity-schools, supported by private subscriptions, and annual charity-sermons; the Dissenters have likewise their charity-schools and alms-houses. The Quakers have a poor-house in the city, as have the Methodists, and French Protestants; and the Roman Catholics several.

St. Catharine's parish is by much the largest in Dublin, but mostly inhabited by weavers and other manufacturers; 'tis supposed to contain upwards of 40,000 inhabitants. The church, built in nine years, from 1760 to 1769, is a large and beautiful building, with an elegant modern front of hewn freestone. The steeple is not yet finished; a fine ring of bells are intended for it. Two new churches seem wanting in this parish; the reader will not think it strange that so many new churches are wanting in Dublin, if he considers that in Q. Anne's reign, an act passed to build 50 new churches, in the western part of London.

St. Audeon's parish joins St. Catharine's and St. James's, and is so much indented by the former, as to need little trouble to divide into two, which would be requisite, and the proper suite for a new church in the parish would be the quay called Usher's-island. The parish church of St. Audeon is a large gothic building, with a pretty high steeple.

C O P Y.

I DAVID HUME, second lawful son of Joseph Home, of Ninewells, Advocate, for the love and affection I bear to John Home, of Ninewells, my brother, and for other causes, Do, by these presents, under the reservations and burthens after mentioned, give and dispose to the said John Home, or, if he die before me, to David Home, his second son, his heirs and assignies whatsoever, all lands, heritages, debts and sums of money, as well heritable as moveable, which shall belong to me at the time of my decease, as also my whole effects in general, real and personal, with and under the burthen of the following legacies, viz. To my sister, Katharine Home, the sum of twelve hundred pounds sterling, payable the first term of Whitsunday, or Martinmas, after my decease, together with all my English books, and the live-rent of my house in St. James's Court, or in case that house be sold at the time of my decease, twenty pounds a year during the whole course of her life: To my friend, Adam Ferguson, professor of moral philosophy in the college of Edinburgh, two hundred pounds sterling: To my friend, M. Dalember, member of the French academy, and of the academy of sciences in Paris, two hundred pounds: To my friend, Dr. Adam Smith, late professor of moral philosophy in Glasgow, I leave all my manuscripts without exception, desiring him to publish my Dialogues on Natural Religion, which are comprehended in this present bequest, but to publish no other papers which he suspects not to have been written within these five years, but to destroy them all at his leisure: And I even leave him full power over all my papers, except the Dialogues above-mentioned; and though I can trust to that intimate and sincere friendship, which has ever subsisted between us, for his faithful execution of this part of my will, yet, as a small recompence of his pains in correcting and publishing this work, I leave him two hundred pounds, to be paid immediately after the publication of it; I also leave to Mrs. Anne and Mrs. Janet Hepburn, daughters of Mr. James Hepburn, of Keith, one hundred pounds a piece: To my cousin, David Campbell, son of Mr. Campbell, minister of Lillisleaf, one hundred pounds: To the infirmmary of Edinburgh, fifty pounds: To all the servants who shall be in my family at the time of my decease, one years wages; and to my housekeeper, Margaret Irvine, three years wages: And I also ordain, that my brother, or nephew, or executor, whoever he be, shall not pay up to the said Margaret Irvine, without her own consent, any sum of money which I shall owe her at the time of my decease, whether by bill, bond, or for wages, but shall retain it in his hand, and pay her the legal interest upon it, till she demand the principal: And in case my brother above-mentioned shall survive me, I leave to his son, David, the sum of a thousand pounds to assist him in his education: But in case that by my brother's death before me, the succession of my estate and effects shall devolve to the aforesaid legacies, with the payment of the sums following: To his brothers, Joseph and John, a thousand pounds a piece: To his sisters, Catherine and Agnes, five hundred pounds a piece: All which sums, as well as every sum contained in the present disposition (except that to Dr. Smith) to be payable the first term of Whitsunday.

and Martinmas, after my decease; and all of them without exception, in sterling money. And I do hereby nominate and appoint the said John Home, my brother, and failing of him by decease, the said David Home, to be my sole executor and universal legatee, with and under the burthens above-mentioned; reserving always full power and liberty to me at any time in my life, even on my death-bed, to alter and innovate these presents, in whole or in part, and to burthen the same with such other legacies as I shall think fit. And I do hereby declare these presents to be a good, valid, and sufficient evidēt, albeit found in my custody, or in the custody of any other person, at the time of my death; consenting to the registration hereof in the books of council and session, or other judges books competent therein to remain for preservation, and thereto I constitute Mr. David Rae, Advocate, my procurator.

"In witness whereof these presents, consisting of this and the preceding page, are written and subscribed by me on this fourth of January, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-six, at Edinburgh, before these witnesses, the Rt. Hon. the Earl of Home, and Mr. John M'Gowan, clerk to the signet.

"(Signed) DAVID HUME.

"Home, witness;

"John M'Gowan, witness.

"Day and date as above.

"I also ordain, That if I shall die any where in Scotland, I shall be buried in a private manner in the Calton church-yard, the south side of it, and a monument be built over my body, at an expence not exceeding a hundred pounds, with an inscription containing only my name, with the year of my birth and death, leaving it to posterity to add the rest.

"(Signed) DAVID HUME.

"At Edinburgh, 15th April, 1776.

"I also leave, for rebuilding the bridge of Chirnside, the sum of a hundred pounds, but on condition that the managers of the bridge shall take none of the stones for building the bridge from the quarry of Ninewells, except from that part of the quarry which has been already opened. I leave to my nephew, Joseph, the sum of fifty pounds to enable him to make a good sufficient drain and sewer round the house of Ninewells, but on condition that if that drain and sewer be not made, from whatever cause, within a year after my death, the said fifty pounds shall be paid to the poor of the parish of Chirnside: To my sister, instead of all my English books, I leave her a hundred volumes at her choice: To David Waite, servant to my brother, I leave the sum of ten pounds, payable the first term after my death.

"(Signed) DAVID HUME."

History of the British Parliament.

COL. Barre held a paper in his hand, which he informed the House he had cut out of the London Gazette, and which he said contained the only account or reason assigned for the troops quitting Boston; therefore he moved, "That an humble address be presented to his Majesty, that he will be pleased to give directions to the proper officers to lay before this House the copies of the last dispatches, and of all dispatches received from the 1st of March last from General Howe, and Vice Admiral Shulldham, in order that this House may have full and authentic information of the present state of the war in North America, before they proceed to grant any further supplies for the carrying on the said war." He had been informed, that there was a capitulation concluded between General Howe and General Washington, through the intervention of the select men, by which General Howe was to leave his stores, and not to burn the town; but the Gazette did not mention this circumstance; nor gave the public any reason for General Howe's quitting Boston. He said the only paper published by authority was become a disgrace to the nation: that the most shameful efforts had been made to mislead the people without doors, but what was of infinitely worse consequence to the nation at large, that House had been grossly misled in every communication which had come from his Majesty's servants, and whenever any degree or species of information had been desired, it was constantly refused. He appealed to the candour and feelings of the two noble Lords in office, if ever such a conduct, in any situation of things, or upon any pretext or emergency whatever, was before adopted by any administration. He was certain such a procedure could not continue much longer to be endured. Here, says he, we have already voted upwards of nine millions. We are going to give a vote of credit for another million. I dare say, inaccurate as the minister is in his general assertions, he will hardly venture to rise and pledge himself to the House, that five millions more will defray the expences of the present campaign : what then in the name of decency, are we about ? Shall we vote fifteen millions of the public money, without knowing whether there is the least prospect of success ? No, it is impossible : I think I see the noble Lord relent, and tacitly confesses at once the propriety and necessity of informing the representatives of the people what they are to expect, and what are the obstacles on one hand, and the prospects of success on the other, in the further prosecution of this burthensome, cruel, and unnatural war. I know the noble Lord's power is great, and his influence extensive ; but however willing the majority of this House may be to obey his mandates, I trust that the noble Lord, as well for the sake of saving common appearances, as for his own eventual personal safety, will vouchsafe to give this House some more satisfactory information than what is contained upon this flimsy scrap of paper.

Lord North asserted, that the contents of the London Gazette were true. The army was not compelled to abandon Boston ; that as the British troops met not the least interruption from the rebels, neither did the general come into any compromise whatever. He said, the stores, ammunition, &c. were not abandoned ; that the army suffered no loss either immediately before or in its embarkation ; that the troops embarked with all possible coolness and regularity, and even perfectly at their ease ; but that nevertheless it would not be proper, in his opinion, to lay all the dispatches before that House, because it might be the means of defeating, at least of impeding, the measures adopted, and the operations meant to be carried into execution, in the course of the present campaign. He affirmed that the evacuation of Boston was no loss of glory, it was only a change of place. He saw no connexion between General Howe's letter and the vote of credit. He saw no disgrace in leaving Boston ; we had the same men and the same ships : only in another place.

Lord John Cavendish observed, that the House had proceeded in the beginning of this business on actual misinformation. This was done to draw the nation imperceptibly into the war. When that favourite point was obtained, then every kind of information was refused. It was owned the information was false, or in the more mild language of administration, government was deceived ; but what of that ? The nation had been insidiously led into a war ; when once embarked, it was too late to recede ; and from the very first day the sword was drawn, his Majesty's ministers have refused to impart a single tittle relative to the conduct of the war ; and the minister, with a confidence hitherto unexampled, comes down day after day to this House, and expects an implicit obedience and assent to whatever demand he pleases to make, without any other pretensions to favour, than that under his administration the whole British empire has been lost, at the national expence of twenty millions of money, precisely in eleven months from day to day, that is, from the date of the defeat at Lexington, to the evacuation of Boston.

Mr. Byng contended, that the public ought to be informed what was doing in America, and to what purposes their money was applied ; and though there may be a pretence of withholding future plans, there could be none for refusing to lay before Parliament an account of what had been done.

Sir George Yonge said, it was impossible but the consequences of the present war must be the destruction of the nation : In any hands the event would be doubtful ; but in such hands, the disgrace and ruin of the nation, and the loss of America, were inevitable.

Mr. Hartley said, the Americans were averse to any notions of independency, unless driven to it by necessity, as they were determined never to submit to be taxed by the British Parliament. He contended, that America desired no more than a security and recognition of those rights she enjoyed before, to the year 1763. He insisted that notwithstanding the unequalled assertions of the noble Lord at the head of the treasury, that General Howe was driven from Boston, and that nothing but a dread of having his whole army cut to pieces, or made prisoners, induced him to make so precipitate and unexpected a retreat. He said, we had closed the first book of the American war ; shall we proceed to the second, with our eyes open ? Before, we were in ignorance of America ; now, we see and know something of her. He concluded, that the great chain which held both countries was now broken by our late harsh, impolitic, and he would add cruel proceedings ; that he feared America was for ever lost ; yet a gleam of hope still broke in on his mind sufficient to make him believe that America was still recoverable, if the management of public public affairs was entrusted into other hands.

Mr. Burke took a short view of the conduct of the war from its commencement, and jocularly observed, that if he had not the highest opinion of the integrity and probity of the noble Lord and his colleagues in office, he should be inclined to suspect that they were secret friends to America, and had been bribed to betray the honour and military reputation of this country; for from the first embarkation of troops from Ireland, every measure which had been adopted or pursued was directed to the impoverishing this country and emancipating America. He observed, that the noble Lord had disclaimed any intention of giving false colours to the account which appeared in the London Gazette; but there was not room left for a possibility of misrepresentation, for though the Boston extraordinaries for 8000 men, in the course of twelve months had amounted to one million and a half, or nearly two hundred pounds a man, for salt beef and four crout, he would affirm, and called upon the noble Lord to contradict him, that the troops could not have remained in that town ten days longer, if the Heavens had not rained down manna and quails; and in a similar expectation, he presumed, the troops were embarked for Halifax, a land flowing with milk and honey.

Right hon. W. Ellis said, the evacuation of Boston was a diminution of credit, and a very great calamity. It was an event that would give great eclat to the American cause; for though a part of the plan for the future operations, it was at that time, the effect of harsh necessity: it was a reflection upon General Howe to say it was any thing else but harsh necessity.

Mr. Lyttleton insisted, that any communication would be exceedingly improper in the present critical situation of affairs.

General Conway said, the British arms had been dishonoured, the British councils were fallen into contempt, and the honour of the nation deeply wounded. The evacuation of Boston was dishonourable. He condemned the conduct of administration without reserve, and said, the army, which was destined for the conquest of America, was now lying inactive, part stuffed into transports waiting at Spithead; another part was still in Germany, and none of them where they should long since have been. That he always thought the measure of coercing America for the purpose of raising a revenue, an unjust one; he always looked upon it to be impracticable; but was certain it was to the last degree cruel, and oppressive. It was destructive of the commerce, importance, and dearest interests of this country, if in case it should miscarry, which he thought more than probable. It was destructive of what was still, if possible, more valuable, its liberties, if it should succeed.

Lord George Germain said, by what he had seen of the correspondence, he never understood that general Howe intended to begin his operations from Boston. His opinion was well known: it was the opinion of the majority of the House, as long therefore as the House thought it proper to support the war, he thought it would be right to pursue it, and no longer. When he came into office, the nation was already engaged in it; he did not begin it. Orders were sent by Admiral Shuldham for General Howe to leave Boston whenever he thought proper. But he supposed the general had prepared his winter quarters, and thinking he should remain quiet had resolved to winter there. But he would certainly have left Boston in the spring. His lordship asserted, that there was no agreement between general Howe and Washington: that general Washington had changed his position, which no doubt obliged general Howe to change his; and that there was so much of our force thrown into circulation.

Colonel Barre observed, that the embarkations were all made too late last year; that convoys were neglected; that the provision, ammunition, and stores, by that means, had fallen into the hands of the Provincials. That the naval force was inadequate to the service; and that unequal as it was to the service, it was still worse provided, and more improperly directed. He should be glad to know to whom those delays, mismanagements, if not malversations in office, were to be imputed. He took a view of the conduct of administration, since Christmas last, and desired to know, how it happened, that now, on the 6th of May, the greatest part of the army should be lying at Spithead, or what was the reason that some of the Hessians, who ought to have been in America, had not yet left Germany.

The question was put, and the House divided: ayes 54; noes 171.

Went into a committee on the king's message. Voted one million.

February 7, 1777.

Lord George Germain presented to the House, a bill to empower his majesty to seize and detain persons charged with, or suspected of the crime of high treason committed in North America, or on the high seas, or the crime of piracy.

John Johnstone, esq; said, that he thought the power of calling out the militia of the kingdom, without the consent of parliament, and the immense armament we have on foot, both by land and sea, sufficient to answer every end of government, in bringing back the Americans to their allegiance, without the dangerous, and at this time inexpedient measure, of attacking the grand Palladium of the British constitution, the freedom of men's persons; and he considered it as the last rigorous step effectually to prevent all possibility of reconciliation between the colonies and the mother country.

The question however was put for the second reading, and the speaker declared the ayes had it; but it was replied, the noes had it; when Mr. Dunning arose and prevented a division, by moving that a bill of such importance should be printed, and the second reading put off to the 10th, which was agreed to.

Adjourned to February the 10th.

AS soon as Nancy Pelham got home, she went up stairs, and desired Mrs. Wilson to step up to her, to whom she related her interesting interview with Mr. Trenchard. They settled a plan for detecting him, if he was not sincere—Nancy was to sit in the little parlour, and when he should come in, Mrs. Wilson was to say, she was going out, and so desire her to sit below till she returned. Then she was to go out with her bonnet and cloak, and place herself in a china room adjoining, where she could hear all that passed.

At candle light Mr. Trenchard came in, and said to Mrs. Wilson, that he would not go to club that night, for he was not well. She guessed his design, and proceeded with her plan. On her leaving the room to go out (as he thought) he said, "Go, you had better, for you are confined a great deal. I'll take care of the house, and I don't want much supper." Mrs. Wilson shutting the door, slipped softly into the china room. She soon heard him address himself to Nancy, with zealous expressions of regard; owning a long esteem of her, the honourableness of his views, and the impossibility of detaching his affections. All which was replied to by the modest girl in a way that neither implied full credit on the one hand, nor affected disbelief on the other. She desired him to withstand all thoughts of such a thing, for cooler reflections must lead him to see its impropriety. He said it was not improper or impracticable. "It is, sir, asking your pardon, and I can demonstrate it." How, said he? "Improper with respect to your alliances and just expectation. Impracticable with regard to your friends." "Do you think, said he, I can forfeit my happiness for shadows?" "No, sir, Mr. Trenchard can do no such thing: therefore, I say, he will see it to be improper and impracticable: 'tis improper because a fleeting passion is only the shade and figment of happiness. 'Tis impracticable, because if your passion is abiding, you have a father who can and will frustrate it."

On his trying to remove this plea, she added, "Sir William will never consent to see his son, his heir, and his family thus degraded; and to act counter to him in your situation, will be ruinous to your happiness. Sir, if nothing else prevented me from thinking of the proposal, this one thing would be an inevitable bar. I wonder, Sir, if you have that esteem of Nancy Pelham you profess, and founded on what you call her virtuous principles, that you can think her capable of such base meanness, such foul ingratitude, as to break the peace of a family to whom she is, and will for ever, be so deeply indebted. Trust me your mother did not so bestow her pains in vain." "Noble-minded creature, he replied, how you wound me by suggesting a degradation? If to be allied to qualities, to accomplishments like yours, is not exaltation, I know not in what it consists. Give me but hope of acceptance, and leave the management of all to me. My father will not deny his son a thing his heart is set on. I doubt not, if I gain your assent, and go prudently to work, but I can gain his: if not, it can be no bar—only a temporary hindrance. I am of age; I ought to, and will make my own choice in this article, or I never will marry." She persisted that it was in vain to think of it, on his father's account, on his relations, friends, &c. but confined herself chiefly to Sir William, and this was all he could get from her.

To remove her fears (for he saw she was yet frightened) and demonstrate his sincerity, he desired her to tell her father and mother all that had passed; and on that condition he promised she should go the next day; saying, "my sincerity shall not be suspected." After saying something more of this kind, she offering to go out, he caught her hand, saying, "don't go, unless you will return to supper. I beg you would not serve me as you did last night: you broke your word then, but if you will return now, I'll forgive that."

She withdrew, and Mrs. Wilson went in and asked for Nancy. He was sitting in a musing posture, and told her, up stairs, he believed, and desired her to hasten supper. She gave orders accordingly; and when it was ready, she went up stairs for Nancy, and found Katy with her laughing, and Nancy trembling: but telling her she must go down, or it would have an odd appearance, they all went: he was peculiarly complaisant to Nancy—took a tender notice that she did not eat but a morsel; seemed very solicitous about her journey; desired they would not go before he was up, chusing to see them well fixed, and said he had given directions to Billings, and hoped they would meet with no accident. It should have been noted, that in the morning, after he had spoken his mind to her in the yard, he gave ten guineas into her hand, wrapt up in the form of a letter, which he told her was to purchase some little trifles to carry her sisters: she refused to take them at first, but such was his address that she could not well avoid it, unless she affronted him; especially as he told her “he meant it not as an obligation on her, but on himself; and should think she despised him, if she refused so small a request.” After supper they withdrew to their chambers.

Nancy then asked Mrs. Wilson whether she heard what passed; she said, yes, very distinctly. What she thought? who answered, I was highly pleased with your part, and I’ll tell you to-morrow what I think of the rest. Go to sleep, for we will set out early; but not before Mr. Trenchard is up. Don’t let us give him offence needlessly. Nancy had but little sleep that night. What she had feared, what he had said, what Miss Harmel had said, &c. caused such a conflict as made her perceptions too various to allow that balmy quietus of nature which used to refresh her nocturnal hours. Sometimes she thought that he was artful and designing in his methods to decoy her; but then his insinuating that she should tell her parents, seemed honest and open, and as if he meant it for her safeguard. Sometimes she thought that he was beside himself, but then he seemed to talk consistent with his late conduct to her. At best it was all an inexplicable riddle. She blest herself that she was so near getting to an asylum; and the thoughts of this was all that could compose her: yet she seemed willing to keep Mr. Trenchard in her mind: his looks, when she could look on him (which was but very little) while he was alone with her, had a tenderness and earnestness that she had never before seen.

In the morning she was up with the day — put up all her linen and clothes, dressed for her journey, and called Mrs. Wilson. They begged Mr. Billings to see the chaise was ready, Mrs. Wilson saying, “Nancy is impatient to be gone,” which words Mr. Trenchard heard, for he was just then in the passage leading from the stairs to the steward’s room. It seemed like a sword to him to think he was so eager to leave him, when he thought he had said enough to convince her, that her presence was essential to his comfort: however, he said nothing. They breakfasted together, when he asked Nancy how long she intended to stay? She said, she could not tell till she got home. Mrs. Wilson would return in two days. After breakfast, he went out to see whether things were in order, and very complaisantly handed her into the chaise, taking the opportunity, by speaking low, to say, remember the condition of your going, and tell your papa and mama all I have said. The modest girl only bowed, and bidding farewell to the girls and men servants, away they drove, and Mr. Trenchard, with hasty steps, withdrew to his chamber. Little did he or the servants think it was the last time Nancy Pelham would ever be at Trenchard manor! none but Nancy herself had that apprehension. Soon as she was out of the gate, a sigh and a tear made Mrs. Wilson ask her what ailed her? who answered, “O! Mrs. Wilson, I shall never enter those gates again!”—The other smiled, and said, “yes you will, Nancy, my word for it.”

While riding, Nancy begged Mrs. Wilson to tell her freely her whole mind, and if she thought amiss of any part of her conduct, to let her know it—adding, nothing less than a full persuasion I have not erred, can support me under the weight of my own apprehensions of the event of these things. Mrs. Wilson replied, “I know of nothing you have said or done amiss, dear child; don’t be so anxious—I think you have no need; you are going home, you have prudent parents; let them know the whole, and no doubt they will properly advise. You will soon know what to depend on; and let it be one way or other, neither Mr. Trenchard nor Sir William, nor any one else can blame you. As to his proposal I know not what to make of it: my opinion of him will not allow me to suspect his honour, and yet it is so new, so sudden, and what I could not have thought of him, that I’m nonplussed. I must wait and see how he proceeds before I can form a judgment. In the mean time I would have you think as little of it as you possibly can; for if he drops it, ’twill be best for you not to harbour the thought. If he renews and pursues it, this conduct can do you no harm." This was the substance of what passed on the road. That afternoon they got to C——n, which was about 30 miles from W——n B——h. Mrs. Pelham was rejoiced to see her daughter, and made Billings and Mrs. Wilson very welcome.

Nothing passed that eve upon the subject; but the next morning Mrs. Wilson told Mrs. Pelham, that Nancy had something which lay on her mind, and was of importance, and wished her to found her daughter, saying she is so modest she can't begin with you; yet she will be easier when you and her father know it. Mrs. Pelham asked what it was about? Had Nancy behaved amiss? No, madam, she has behaved worthy of your daughter, of Lady Trenchard's Nancy, of every body's Nancy, of your fond wishes. But her uneasiness arises from without herself. Has she a suitor? I heard such a report, but Mrs. Butler told me not to be anxious, for Nancy would not entertain any body till she lived at home. I was glad to hear that. But is this her trouble? To whom Mrs. Wilson replied, "I had rather she should tell you as she was desired, and has promised a certain gentleman (whom you little think of) to do. I'll withdraw, madam, and take a walk in your garden with Miss Dolly, while you talk with Miss Nancy. But pray be tender, she is not to be blamed." [To be continued.]

The Fortune Hunter. A Matter of Fact.

THE gentlemen of the kingdom of Ireland have long been distinguished in the line of fortune-hunting; but there are a set of people, though less talked of, who have not been less successful, namely, the foreigners who settle in England. Not satisfied with the common advantages of trade, in which they have generally more than their share, they are continually laying traps for rich widows and thoughtless heiresses. A disappointment, in such selfish pursuits, is always heard with pleasure, by every one but the sufferer. Mr. M——x's disappointment was truly mortifying.

From being foreign clerk to a Portugal merchant, (in which capacity he acquitted himself with equal fidelity and ability) he was admitted partner in the business. From that moment his thoughts ran upon some method of becoming rich of a sudden; so true it is that the acquisition of wealth only creates an appetite for more, as the thirst of the dropsical man is said to increase by drinking.

In consequence of this thirst, though his business was in a flourishing condition, Mr. M——x, after dreaming of the transmutation of metals, and many other precious secrets, which have, at different times, exercised human ingenuity, (though hitherto in vain) engaged in the mystery of the stocks, with which he was better acquainted. But fortune is not always favourable to those who court her favours with the greatest ardour, even though accompanied with the greatest skill. Mr. M——x was unsuccessful in his transactions in the Alley; and in order to repair his losses, he began to turn his thoughts towards what, to him, seemed a more certain method of acquiring property, and in which he had known many of his countrymen succeed.

Being of French extraction, he spoke that language fluently, and had perfect command of those graces and accomplishments for which the Gallic nation is celebrated. By these he found his way into the politest companies, where he was every way qualified to acquit himself; and there he met with some Irish adventurers, who penetrating his plan, and understanding his condition, made it their business to introduce a lady to him, whose fortune, as represented, was equivalent to his most sanguine wishes.

This introduction was brought about at Bath; where the lady was said to be partaking of the amusements of the place, as well as the benefit of the waters. Mr. M——x took the bait; and, in order to prevent all suspicion, the two Hibernians appeared as brothers to the fair female whom they recommended, and whose favours they had occasionally shared. The lady assumed the character of a colonel's widow; and so artful were the replies of the two pretended brothers, that the merchant never entertained the least suspicion of deceit. On the contrary, he considered himself as honoured by being admitted to their alliance; while they gave broad hints, that the elegance of his accomplishments only could have made such a thing possible, with a person of such inferior rank. But their sister, they said, had once already sacrificed her feelings to wealth and shew; they could not, therefore, blame her for pleasing herself now, by honouring so agreeable a man with her hand, though not in a situation equally elevated.

The same appearances which lulled Mr. M——x into security, in regard to the reality of the widow's character, also prevented him from making any particular inquiry concerning the amount of her fortune. He had every reason, however, to believe it was upwards of twenty thousand pounds; the colonel, a wealthy old fellow, and a nobleman's brother, having left her his sole heir. She appeared to keep her carriage, and had every thing conformable to such a rank; to which Mr. M—x's fortune, especially in its reduced state, was by no means equal. Both parties, therefore, agreed to the match, without entering upon particulars.

The happy day, appointed for the celebration of the marriage, arrived; the ceremony was performed with the usual solemnity, and with a more than common degree of satisfaction in the looks of the fond couple; the entertainment that followed was splendid; and harmony, for a time, reigned among the guests. But, towards the close of the evening, the two supposed brothers quarrelled, about nobody could tell what; and every thing upon the table, bottles, glasses, bowls, were sacrificed to their vindictive rage. At length Mrs. M—x, in a greater rage than either, caught one of them by the hair, and gave him a blow in the face with all the dexterity of a professed bruiser; then made a stroke at the other, who seemed much afraid of her fury; and these violences were followed by the most horrid oaths, imprecations, and reproaches.

Mr. M—x, who had never in his life been present at such a scene, was equally astonished and alarmed at this behaviour; but as several of the bride's most virulent expressions seemed to intimate, that her brothers had been obliged to her, he had still hopes, that, however he might be deceived in the woman, that he should meet with no deception in regard to the fortune, which was his principal object. These hopes led him to bed; where he is not supposed to have been disappointed, whatever his paramour might be, as he appeared next morning better pleased, than when he left the company, and remarkably attentive to his other half.

That day, however, being passed over, and the day following, the raptures of love began to cool;—the merchant, at least, began to wish for something more solid than such fleeting pleasures. Accordingly on the third morning, as they lay in bed, he hinted his necessities to his loving spouse, and her ability to relieve them. She at first affected ignorance; but was given to understand, in plain English, that he had occasion for a sum of money (only a few hundreds) to discharge some urgent demands, and expected she would assist him.

"Money!"—exclaimed she:—"do you think, my dear honey, if I had been worth any money that I would have married you?—No, indeed! if there had been a handsome fellow between here and the holy city. When you married me, you got more than money—a fine woman; and that, let me tell you, is a fine thing. You would have cheated yourself, if I had not taken care to do you justice by deceiving you."

What reply to make, to such a speech, Mr. M—x was perfectly at a loss. He had no turn for abuse, and the subject was too serious for pleasantry. He attempted, however, to give it that air; but finding, on the most minute inquiry, that he had been the dupe of two Irish fortune-hunters, who had imposed upon him a woman of the town, by whom they had occasionally lived, he was almost frantic, and still continues a prey to the most corroding spleen, while madam entertains him with all the polite indifference of the ton.

Those who consider only his present unhappy condition, will pity Mr. M—x, but such as reflect on his situation in life—how little necessity he was under of pursuing money in any other line than that of his business, will be apt to amuse themselves with imagining the foolish figure he must now make; and the daughters of business, I doubt not, to a woman, will think him justly punished for attempting to go out of his sphere; while the girl, whose beauty is her only wealth, will wish that such may be the fate of every Fortune Hunter.

From the LONDON GAZETTE.

Whitehall, June 5, 1777.

Extract of a Letter from the Hon General Sir Wm. Howe, to Lord George Germaine, dated New York, April 24, 1777, & received by the Mercury Packet.

LORD Cornwallis, ever watchful to take advantage of the enemy's situation, surprized and defeated, on the 13th instant, at break of day, a corps of the rebels at Bound-Brook, killed 30, and took between 80 and 90 prisoners, including officers, with three brass field-pieces. The general officer commanding there very narrowly escaped being of the number. The loss on our part was only 3 yagers, and 4 soldiers of the light infantry slightly wounded.

[Earl Percy, who arrived in the above packet from Rhode-Island, brought the first account of the enterprise, under the command of major general Tryon, for the destruction of one of the enemy's magazines of provisions and stores, collected at Danbury, in Connecticut; of which general Howe has since transmitted the particulars to lord George Germaine, and are as follow:

I have now the honour of reporting to your

lordship the success of that expedition, and to inclose a return of the stores destroyed.

The troops landed without opposition in the afternoon of the 25th of April, about four miles to the eastward of Norwalk, and 20 from Danbury.

In the afternoon of the 26th the detachment reached Danbury, meeting only small parties of the enemy on their march; but general Tryon having intelligence that the whole force of the country was collecting, to take every advantage of the strong ground he was to pass on his return to the shipping, and finding it impossible to procure carriages to bring off any part of the stores, they were effectually destroyed; in the execution of which the village was unavoidably burnt.

On the 27th in the morning the troops quitted Danbury, and met with little opposition until they came near to Ridgefield, which was occupied by general Arnold, who had thrown up entrenchments to dispute the passage, while general Wooster hung upon the rear with a separate corps. The village was forced, and the enemy drove back on all sides.

Gen. Tryon lay that night at Ridgefield, and renewed his march on the morning of the 28th. The enemy, having been reinforced with troops and cannon, disputed every advantageous situation, keeping at the same time smaller parties to harass the rear, until the general had formed his detachment upon a height within cannon-shot of the shipping, when the enemy advancing, seemingly with an intention to attack him, he ordered the troops to charge with their bayonets, which was executed with such impetuosity, that the rebels were totally put to flight, and the detachment embarked without further molestation.

The inclosed returns set forth the loss sustained by the king's troops, and that of the enemy from the best information; but I have the satisfaction to inform your lordship our wounded officers are in the fairest way of recovery.

The enemy's army in Jersey has been encamped some days near to Boundbrook. Lord Cornwallis is also encamped at Brunswick on each side of the Rariton, and upon the communication between that place and Amboy; major general Vaughan's corps being encamped at the latter place, making use of the tents of last year, the camp equipage of the present not being yet arrived. His lordship has also thrown a bridge over the Rariton at the town of Brunswick.

By various accounts received from the neighbourhood of Albany, there is reason to believe some advanced parties from the Northern army have appeared at Crown Point, and that Sir Guy Carleton will be upon the Lake early in June.

Return of the stores, ordnance, provisions, &c. as nearly as could be ascertained, found at the rebels stores, and destroyed by the king's troops, at Danbury, &c. in Connecticut, April 27, 1777.

A quantity of ordnance stores, with iron, &c. 4000 barrels of beef and pork; 1000 barrels of flour; 100 large tierces of biscuit; 89 barrels of rice; 120 punchcons of rum.

Several large stores of wheat, oats, and Indian corn, in bulk, the quantity thereof could not possibly be ascertained; 30 pipes of wine; 100 hogheads of sugar; 50 ditto of molasses; 20 casks of coffee; 15 large casks filled with medicines of all kinds; 10 barrels of salt-petre; 1000 tents and marquees; a number of iron boilers; a large quantity of hospital bedding, &c. engineers, pioneers, and carpenters tools; and a printing-press complete; tar, tallow, &c. 5000 pair of shoes and stockings.

At a mill between Ridgeberry- and Ridgefield:

100 barrels of flour, and a quantity of Indian corn.

At the bridge at the West brace of Norwalk river, and in the woods contiguous:

100 hogheads of rum; several chests of arms; paper cartridges; field forges; 300 tents.

Return of the killed, wounded, and missing:

One drummer and fifer, 23 rank and file, killed; three field-officers, six captains, three subalterns, nine serjeants, 92 rank and file, wounded: 1 drummer and fifer, 27 rank and file missing.

Royal artillery. Two additional, killed; three matrosses, one wheeler, wounded; one matross missing.

(Signed)

W. HOWE.

4th regiment, capt. Thorne, wounded. 15th, capt. Dirmas, lieutenant. Hastings, of the 12th regiment, acting as a volunteer, wounded. 27th, major Conran, capt. Rutherford, ensign Minchin, wounded. 23d, second lieutenant. Price, volunteer Vale, wounded. 44th, major Hope, wounded. 64th, Capt. Calder, ensign Mercer, wounded. Prince of Wales's American volunteers, colonel Browne, capt. Lyman, capt. Seon, wounded. 71st regiment, capt. Simon Frazer, a volunteer, wounded.

Return of the Rebels killed and wounded.

Killed. General Wooster, col. Gould, col. Lamb of the artillery, col. Henman, Dr. Atwater, a man of considerable influence, capt. Cooe, lieutenant. Thompson, 100 privates.

Wounded. Col. Whiting, captain Benjamin, lieutenant. Cooe, 250 privates.

Taken. 50 private, including several committeemen.

The following Address was unanimously voted and presented to Earl Percy on his leaving Rhode Island:

"To his Excellency Hugh, Earl Percy, Lieutenant General commanding his Majesty's forces on Rhode Island, &c. &c. &c.

"May it please your Excellency,

"We, the subscribers, inhabitants of the town of Newport, hearing with the utmost concern that your excellency intends soon to leave us, beg permission to approach your excellency with those sentiments which a deep sense of the great happiness we have enjoyed under your excellency's cy's protection naturally excites on such an occasion.

"We cannot help looking on your excellency's departure as a great public loss, when we reflect upon that extraordinary activity and vigilance wherewith your excellency has protected us from surrounding dangers; and that justice and impartiality, that humanity and tenderness, with which you have moderated the exercise of unlimited power.

"With gratitude we acknowledge, that in your excellency's hands military government has uniformly worn the fair form of parental authority; that no unnecessary rigour hath been used; no oppression tolerated; and that, during the noise and tumults of a civil war, the troops under your excellency's command have been kept under such order and discipline, as would have done honour to themselves and their commander, in times of public peace, and settled government.

"The fear of offending (not insensibility) prevents us at present from attempting to express how much we are affected with your excellency's great and amiable private virtues; with that spotless integrity of manners, and uniform regard to religion and decency, which would add dignity to the meanest station; with that condescending affability, which stoops without any view to private advantage; and, above all, with that unbounded and well-directed generosity, which has so often procured for your excellency the blessings of those who were ready to perish.

"Great virtues, my lord, in an elevated station, are like the sun; there is nothing hid from the heat of them: they have necessarily endeared your character to all the inhabitants of this place; and it is but justice to say, that during your residence among us you have never given any cause for uneasiness or sorrow, but when you declared your intention of departing from us.

"With great reluctance we submit to the painful necessity which deprives us of your Excellency's benign patronage, and sincerely wish you a safe and pleasant passage to your native land, and a long continuance of perfect health; your excellency's illustrious rank and character renders it unnecessary to wish you any other blessings of life: particularly we reflect with pleasure, that your excellency's early and great public services have gone home long before you, and have there secured you that great reward peculiarly reserved for British worthies, and highly suitable to your excellency's generous principles, the warmest approbation of the best of princes, and of a brave and free people."

"Rhode Island, May 3, 1777."

His Excellency's Answer.

"Gentlemen,

"Allow me to return you many thanks for your very affectionate address.

"This testimony of your approbation of my conduct, since I have had the honour to command here, at the same time that it reflects the highest honour upon me, is most particularly pleasing to me, as it is a proof that I have been fortunate enough to fulfil the intentions of our gratious sovereign in sending his troops to this island.

"The compliments you are pleased to pay those troops for their regularity and good conduct, since they have been amongst you, are justly their due. As it is the duty, so it is the wish, of every British and Hessian soldier, to protect all peaceable and innocent inhabitants.

"Permit me, gentlemen, to assure you, that I shall not without regret quit this island, whose inhabitants I shall ever remember with gratitude and esteem. And be assured, that, when I have the honour to return into the Royal Presence, I shall not fail to do them that justice which their behaviour has highly merited at my hands."

East-India Intelligence.

On Wednesday, June 18, was held a general court of East India proprietors, at their house in Leadenhall-street. The court had been advertised the preceding evening to be on special affairs, which drew together the scattered friends of the different parties, and a small army of observation of the ministerial troops, though the court was otherwise very thin.

The court of directors laid before the proprietors the several accounts and estimates of the situation of the Company's affairs, and recommended a continuance of the same dividend of 3 and a half per cent, for the half year, ending at Midsummer next, which was unanimously agreed to.

But whether the figures of those accounts and estimates were to be considered as the certain signs of permanent prosperity, remained to be judged of from the proceedings of the court of directors in settling the affairs of Madras, to which every person was ready to listen with anxious ears.

After some debate on the propriety of reading the dispatches, the chairman, in a fair manly way, said he could see no objection to it. They were accordingly read to the court, and consisted of the following letters, viz.

A letter to lord Pigot, Mr. Rumbold, and the other members of the new council jointly; a letter to lord Pigot himself; a letter to Mr. Russell, and the other adherents of lord Pigot; a letter to Mr. Stratton, and his coadjutors in the usurpation; and a letter to the nabob of Arcot.

The substance of the whole was to restore lord Pigot to the full exercise of his functions as governor and president of Fort St. George, till seven days after the dispatch of the first ship, to censure his lordship for some parts of his conduct that were reprehensible, and utterly to condemn in every part, and in the severest language, the conduct of his lordship's opponents; also to suspend col. Stuart for six months.

The letter to the nabob, instead of answering any of the points on which he complains, is (as Mr. Crichton happily called it) a string of gentle generals, without elegance either in the turn of thought or expression, rendering to his highness a most humiliating, tedious account of what the company have done respecting their servants, altho' the nabob in his letter declares he is perfectly indifferent on that subject, and never intermeddles. But touching those matters to which the nabob required an answer, the directors directors have carefully avoided saying one word.

Mr. Fitzgerald now made a motion, "That the temporary government appointed by the directors was now, unprecedented, not warranted by the occasion, and contrary to one of the by-laws." He was seconded by Mr. Elliot. Governor Johnstone then rose, and paid Mr. Fitzgerald many friendly compliments, but hoped to be excused for not supporting a motion of legal censure, as not having had any previous communication of the proposition moved and seconded by his friends, therefore was not qualified to give a deliberate opinion, whether the temporary government appointed by the directors was contrary to the by-laws; but abstracted from the question of legality, he had no scruples to condemn the policy and expediency, and most heartily concurred in disapproving of the exorbitant salaries annexed to the offices.

Notwithstanding the several censures he passed on some material passages of the dispatches, which were felt by the court to be just and pertinent, especially as to 1500*l.* a year for life, which the directors, in their letter to the nabob, permit general Joseph Smith to accept, at the instant of their reprobating with such severity a trifling present of breakfast plate, not worth 300*l.* received by lord Pigot; yet the governor admitted the ability displayed in making up the dispatches out of such a mass of contradictory matter, as was contained in Sir Herbert Mackworth's motion; but perceived, that the whole was tinctured with a bias to favour the views of the minister next year, when he brings the company's affairs into parliament.

The governor was answered by Mr. Redhead and col. Capper. The first defended general Smith, by laying that 1500*l.* a year could not influence his opinion, (here the court laughed) and blamed the governor for attacking an absent man.

Col. Capper told the court that he believed their orders would be disputed, as the seal of the company was not affixed to the duplicate commission sent over land, and that the Morattas and Hyder Ali would attack us: In the mean while, if lord Pigot was restored before Mr. Rumbold and col. Monro arrived, as col. Stuart was suspended, and the two officers next in rank, on whom the command devolved, had been twice superseded by the company as unfit to succeed, he offered his services to go and stop the messengers over land, whom he would find whenever they might be. He said this offer was made out of pure love to the company, and not with any view to continue Mr. Stratton in the government; for though he loved Mr. Stratton, yet he said if he had 100,000*l.* he would give the half of it to see Mr. Stratton in England, as he could gain no reputation from continuing in the government.

At this juncture a whisper ran through the court, that Mr. Loughlan Maclane had set off before the messengers to prepare their reception in Egypt.

Mr. Watton and Mr. Rous very sensibly retorted on col. Capper's apprehensions of the invalidity of the company's dispatches, by asking him what seal or sanction Mr. Stratton acted under, and stated that the letter, if signed by 13 or more of the directors, was a sufficient order.

Admiral Pigot remarked on the folly and partiality of suspending col. Stuart for six months, with a view of bringing him to a military trial, when all the principal evidences have left the country: He gave this proceeding some harsh epithets, and observed further on the neglect in not putting the company's seal to the duplicate commission sent over land.

Mr. Fitzgerald's motion was then withdrawn by consent, and a motion made to adjourn; but before the question was put, Mr. Crichton got up, and intreated the directors to pay that attention they deserved to the very judicious remarks made by governor Johnstone, and the other gentlemen who had spoke on the various matters of the dispatches, which though not reduced into a motion of disapprobation, he trusted had been minuted by the secretary. Col. Capper's tears for the safety of Madras he said, had been previously removed by that gentleman himself, who, in a letter to the court of directors, had assured them that all such apprehensions were mere bugbears, for that our army was well disciplined and appointed, and our fortifications in a respectable state of defence. The court then adjourned, all parties being dissatisfied with some part of the dispatches, and yet none chusing to move a censure.

PROLOGUE to the new Comedy of the SCHOOL. FOR SCANDAL.

Written by Mr. Garrick.

Spoken by Mr. King.

A School for Scandal!—tell me, I beseech you, [you?] Needs there a school this modish art to teach No need of lessons now, the knowing think, We might as well be taught to eat and drink; Caus'd by a dearth of scandal, should the va-pours Distress our fair ones—let 'em read the papers: Their powerful mixtures such disorders hit, Crave what they will there's quantum sufficit.

"Lord!" cries my lady Wormwood, (who loves tattle.

And puts much salt and pepper in her prattle) Just ris'n at noon, all night at cards, when thrashing

Strong tea and scandal, blest me, how refreshing!

"Give me the papers, Liip—How bold and free!—(lips)

"Last night lord L.—(lips)—was caught with lady D.

"For aching heads what charming sal volatile.—(lips)

"If Mrs. B. will still continue flirting,

"We hope she'll draw, or we'll undraw the curtain.—

"Fine satire, po2—in public all abuse it, "But by ourselves—(lips)—our praise we can't refuse it.

"Now,

"Now, Liss, read yor—there, at that dahl

"Who lives not many miles from Grofvenor
"For should he lady W— find willing,
"Wormwood is bitter."—"O that's me—the villain !

"Throw it behind the fire, and never more,
"Let that vile paper come within my door."
Thus at our friends we laugh, who feel the dart;

To reach our feelings, we ourselves must smart.
Is our young bard so young, to think that he
Can stop the full spring tide of calumny ?
Knows he the world so little, and its trade ?
Alas ! the devil's sooner rais'd than laid !
So strong, to swift, the monster there's no gag-

Cut Scandal's head off—still the tongue is wag-
Proud of your smiles, once lavishly bestow'd,
Again your young Don Quixote takes the road ;
To shew his gratitude, he draws his pen,
And seeks this hydra Scandal in his den ;
From his fell gripe the frightened fair to save,
Tho' he should fall, th' attempt must please the

For your applause all perils he would thro',
He'll fight—that's write—a cavalliero true,
'Till ev'ry drop of blood—that's ink—is spilt for you.

EPILOGUE to the SCHOOL for SCANDAL.

Written by George Colman, Esq.

Spoken by Mrs. Abington.

I, Who was late so volatile and gay,
Like a trade-wind, must now blow all one way ;
Bend all my cares, my studies, and my vows,
To one old rusty weather-cock—my spouse ;
So wills our virtuous bard, the pye-ball'd Bayes.
Of crying epilogues, and laughing plays.
Old bachelors who marry smart young wives,
Learn from our play to regulate your lives ;
Each bring his dear to town—all faults upon her—

London will prove the very source of honour ;
Plung'd fairly in, like a cold bath, it serves,
When principles relax, to brace the nerves,
Such is my case, and yet I must deplore
That the gay dream of dissipation's o'er ;
And say, ye fair, was ever lively wife,
Born with a genius for the highest life,
Like me, untimely blasted in her bloom,
Like me, condemn'd to such a dismal doom !
Save money, when I just knew how to waste it !
Leave London, just as I began to taste it !
Must I then watch the early-crowing cock ?
'The melancholy ticking of a clock ?
In the lone rustic hall for ever pounded,
With dogs, cats, rats, and squalling brats surrounded ?

With humble curates can I now retire,
(While good Sir Peter boozes with the 'squire)
And at backgammon mortify my soul,
That pants for loo, or flutters at a vole ?
Seven's the main, dear sound ! that must expire !

Lost at hot-cockles round a Christmas fire !

The transient hour of fashion too soon spent.
"Farewell the tranquil mind—farewell content !
"Farewell the plumed head, the cushion'd tete,
"That takes the cushion from its proper seat !
"The spirit-stirring drum!—card-drums I mean— [queen !

"Spadille, odd trick, Pam, Balto, King and
"And you, ye knockers, that with brazen throat

"The welcome visitors approach denote,
"Farewell !—all quality of high renown,
"Pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious town,

"Farewell !—your revels I partake no more,
"And lady Teazel's occupation's o'er."
All this I told our bard ; he smil'd, and said t'was clear

I ought to play deep tragedy next year :
Meanwhile he drew wise morals from his play,
And in these solemn periods stalk'd away—
"Blest were the fair, like you her faults who stop,

"And clos'd her follies when the curtain dropt !
"No more in vice or error to engage,
"Or play the fool at large on life's great stage !"

An old Song written by K. Henry VIII, when he conceived love for Anne Boleyn, and set by Bird.

"THE eagle's force subdues each byrd that flies ;
What metal can resist the flaming fyre ;
Dothe not the sunne dazle the clearest eyes,
And melte the ice, and make the froste retyre ?

Who can withstand a puissant king's desire ?
The hardest stones are pierced thro' with tools :
The wisest are with princes made but fools."

To the Memory of Dr. William Dodd.

WHAT mean those tears which flows from every eye ?

Why grieve the just, what makes the righteous sigh ?

Fair candour weeps and mildness droops her head,

And ev'ry virtue mourns that DODD is dead.
He's gone, alas ! whose soul the sacred cell,
Where piety and wisdom lov'd to dwell ;
He's gone alas ! whose hours no pleasure knew,
But what his mind from virtuous actions drew :
He's gone alas ! whose hand so often bore,
The gen'rous portion to the friendless poor :
He's gone alas ! the patron of distress,
The friend and father of the fatherless :
He's gone alas !—but O let pity here
Breathe the soft sigh and drop the gen'rous tear ;
Let censure cease and henceforth fear to blame,
Nor scandal ever violate his fame ;
But let this sentence claim a just pretence,
The best have err'd in more than one offence ;
His was but one one crime alas ! was all,
This seal'd his doom and this assign'd his fall ;
Yet such his virtues, in th' extreme we find
As render saints superior to their kind.

Vienna,

Vienna, May 8.

WE learn from Moravia, that some troubles had arisen in the circle of Hradich, where 20,000 inhabitants had declared themselves Lutherans. Our court, however, has given orders to treat them with lenity.

Petersburgh, May 13. The count Ribotzini, who killed the Count de Byland in a duel, is condemned to be confined in his apartment for six months, reckoning from the day he was taken up; after which he will be conducted to the frontiers, with orders never to set foot in the territories of this empire.

Lisbon, May 21. On the 13th of this month the ceremony of the proclamation of her most faithful majesty, the queen of Portugal, was performed in the most brilliant manner:—A large gallery was built for this purpose on the west side of the great square, called Real Prada de Commercio, (where the equestrian statue of the late king, Joseph I. is erected) with several apartments adjoining, connected with the principal building belonging to the tribunals, and prepared for the reception of the queen, the king, and the royal family. The whole was magnificently furnished with tapestry and damask, and adorned with gold fringes and gold lace, in an elegant manner. The inside of the gallery is about 304 English feet long, and about 33 English feet wide.

Brussels, May 26. According to authentic letters from Lisbon, all the persons of quality who were imprisoned during the ministry of the Marquis de Pombal, have obtained permission of the queen to manifest their innocence, and commissioners are already nominated for that purpose.

Paris, May 29. The wife of des Rues, whose husband before his execution declared her to be innocent, begins to shew herself guilty, by the equivocal and inconsistent answers she makes to the questions put to her; but there are not sufficient proofs against her to bring her to trial, nevertheless it is thought she will never be set at liberty again.

Vienna, June 1. Letters from Constantinople, of the 3d of last month, bring advice of the death of the Sophy, or king of Persia; and that the Bashaw, who commands the Ottoman army, was preparing to drive the Persians out of Bassora.

HISTORICAL CHRONICLE.

ADVICE is received by express from Madrid, that the fleet and army under Mr. de Tilly and Monf. de Cevalos had taken the island of St. Catherine on the coast of Brazil, and had made the whole garrison, consisting of 4000 men, prisoners of war. The same account adds that they proceeded from thence to the continent, by which means the Rio Grande and the Rio Janeiro will soon fall into their hands. The Spaniards landed at St. Catherine's the 22d of February last.

The following horrid crime was committed at Pantin. A young widow who was left with four children, was in love with a young man of fortune, who said he had no other objection to marry her, but that he did not chuse to maintain four children who did not belong to him. This woman, listening to the force of her passion only, resolved to get rid of her children by poisoning them, which she actually did to three of them very soon; but the fourth being of too strong a constitution struggled with the horrid dose; and one day his mother being out, he asked a person to assist him, for he was poisoned; but help came too late, and he died the next day, and when opened, it was found that he had been poisoned; the mother was immediately taken up, and confessed the whole.

A man was examined, touching the buying of six 20l. forged bank notes of Crompton, for half a guinea each; and as positive proofs were produced against him, he was committed to Tottenhamfields bridewell.

Yesterday Mr. Recorder made his report to his Majesty of the prisoners under sentence of death in Newgate, viz.

Doctor William Dodd, for feloniously forging a certain bond or obligation, purporting to be the bond of the right hon. the earl of Chesterfield, and publishing the same, with intent to defraud messrs. Fletcher and Peach; Joseph Harris and

James Lucas, for feloniously stopping the Hington stage coach on the highway, near the Shepherd and Shepherders in the city road, and robbing Robert Hughes, a passenger therein, of two half guineas, and about seven shillings; when Doctor Dodd, and Joseph Harris were ordered for execution on Friday the 27th instant.

Yesterday the Lord Chancellor, Lord Maasfield, Lord North, Lord Hertford, Lord Hillsborough, Lord Carlisle, with several other Lords, and Sir William Meredith, attended the council at St. James's, and debated upwards of an hour, on the necessity of suffering the law to take its course with the unfortunate Dr. Dodd.

Lord Weymouth attended the privy council yesterday, when Dr. Dodd's fate was to be argued, and carried in with him a bundle of petitions in behalf of the unfortunate criminal.

If this instance of such a man (with all his weight of influence) falling a sacrifice to the rigour of the laws, does not preach more loudly and forcibly than ever the preacher himself could against every vice, and in praise of every virtue, he will appear to have died, though he did not live, in vain.

May this fatal example teach an obedience to those laws, which, with undiscriminating impartiality, consider the crime only, while they forget the man! Let him who shall hereafter hesitate on a forgery, remember that death follows the stroke of the pen; and that his blood will be spilt with the ink!

Galway, June 30.

LAST Friday was committed to the county goal, Patrick Rowley, otherwise Ryan, otherwise Johnson, for the wilful murder of corporal Barry, belonging to the troop of the 4th regiment of horse, now quartered at Loughrea, by giving him, on the preceding evening, such a stab in the belly, with a knife, that his bowels issued from the wound, of which he died the next morning in great agony.

Clonmell, July 5. Yesterday morning about two o'clock, Maurice, John and Henry Mullooney, Christopher Loughlin and William Heffernan, all sentenced to die, but pardoned; Robert Farrell accused of being one of the wretches who assassinated the late Ambrose Power, Esq; Owen McCarthy, for killing a sheep and taking the fat thereof, and John Daniel detained for his feet, broke out of a dungeon in this goal; they effected their escape by sawing off their fetters and breaking a hole through the side wall of the dungeon (which is of a prodigious thickness) into a lane contiguous to the goal.

D U B L I N.

The robbery committed by lord G——d's servant is perhaps the most extraordinary and unaccountable in the register of modern Times. In the manner of its perpetration it carries a strong similitude to ancient barbarism, and would be an excellent subject for a romantic ballad. The story is told in two or three different ways, but the most authentic account we can collect is as follows;—Lady G——d being in bed and asleep, was awake in a dead hour of the night by a violent knocking at the door, which was succeeded by an attempt to force it open; enquiring the meaning of the noise, she was answered by the person without, that he must have immediate admittance; that he knew there was a gentleman in the chamber (whose name he mentioned) that his lord was dishonoured, and he would search the room to be satisfied. Her ladyship knew by the voice that this was one of his lordship's confidential servants, and was the only man then in the house. Affrighted and amazed at such a visitor, she rung the bell for a considerable time, to rouse the female servants, but none of them answered, and the fellow continuing to force the door, her ladyship was obliged to dress and let him in. He appeared with a pistol cocked, and having searched the apartment, even to the chimney, he then desired her ladyship to deliver her money; she immediately complied and gave him ten guineas. When he had got the money, he forced her ladyship to sign a discharge, giving him a good character, and then retired. As soon as the villain departed, the lady again rung the bell; but no servant appeared. The fellow soon returned with one of her ladyship's children in his arms (which he had brought down from the nursery) and with the most dreadful imprecations swore, that he knew his lord had left more money in the house, and that unless it was instantly delivered to him, he would dash the infant from the upper bannister down upon the steps of the Hall, at the same time holding the innocent creature by the heels. Being made sensible by the protestations of his lady that there was no more money, he compelled her to give him a draft upon the bank, and promise secrecy; he also insisted upon her ordering the servants to give him his trunk, which was complied with, and the fellow left the house without interruption. It is very surprising that when this villain had made his terms with the lady, the other servants were immediate in their attendance to the summons of the bell, though every effort of her ladyship to warn them before was ineffectual.

Thursday, the lord mayor, aldermen, sheriffs, and commons, and the representatives of this city in parliament, waited upon his excellency the lord lieutenant at the castle, to request that his excellency would please to transmit to his majesty, a petition under the seal of the corporation of this city, praying that the custom-house may be rebuilt in its present situation, which must be of the highest advantage to the trade of this city.

The answer given by his excellency the lord lieutenant on Thursday, to the corporation of the city, when they presented the address against the removal of the custom-house, was, that he (lord Buckinghamshire) would use his utmost interest to coincide with the city in this and every other matter which they in their corporate body would judge expedient.

A gentleman fishing on the grand canal last Saturday, killed a white trout, which measures from the head to the tail three feet two and a half inches, and is supposed to be the largest of the kind ever taken in this kingdom. It had in its maw, several salmon fry, and sprats quite whole, and was killed with a single hair foot-link, taking the Fletcher fly which was a lousy black.

On the 3d inst. a large brig from Archangel, name unknown, was stranded on Tory Island, on the northern coast of this kingdom, and beat to pieces. Before day-break, the crew, eleven in number, with great difficulty got ashore in their boat, and having lost their chests and clothing, were great objects of distress. The country people behaved with the greatest humanity, and made a handsome collection, which was equally distributed amongst the sufferers, to enable them either to return home, or wait the first opportunity of getting into some employment. The cargo, consisting chiefly of dry goods, it is thought will be recovered.

About ten o'clock on Monday morning the Lexington American privateer anchored within less than half a league of the pier of Balbriggan; the captain sent one of his boats on shore to inform the inhabitants that he was in very great distress for fresh water, which if they would suffer him to take peaceably no violence should be offered, otherwise he was determined to insist upon it. Consent being given, he sent two boats well manned to the river that runs through that town, where they remained an hour and an half filling their casks, in the presence of a prodigious number of people collected from the neighbourhood of the town; at one o'clock the privateer, having got her water on board, weighed anchor, and stood away to the southward.

Certain advice is received of an American privateer being in our channel; she mounts 26 guns 2 six and four nine-pounders, and is very full of men; and it is evident from the grassy appearance appearance of her bottom, that she has been a long time at sea.

WHEN the Court gave leave to file an information, they granted leave to frame it as law warranted; and if the general charge of challenging would make a good indictment, it would not make a bad information. If the generality be an objection it is a demurrable objection, and should not come by motion. If the Court be good the Court will not make it bad, to enable the defendant to evade punishment. He cited 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. Ca. 45. 34. and 1 Salk. 385. to shew a distinction as to having the place where the crime is charged to be committed.

The court will not interfere with its discretion, where there is a probability of an offender's eluding, or where its interference may circumscribe the evidence to be given at the trial. In information it will leave to the person applying the procuring of proper evidence for the jury; and where the court do circumscribe the evidence of the prosecutor, that evidence must be particularized. The court have been put to this trouble merely to create delay, from a consciousness of the defendant that he must be convicted. There never was an instance where the court quashed an information, merely because it is possible that the jury may convict upon improper evidence.

It has been said that the precise words spoken should have been stated, and the case of a libel has been cited. In the case of a libel there must be a copy, but in the case of a verbal challenge there can be no copy.

Mr. Fred. Flood cited 1 Sidr. 54. 1 Salk. 370. and Stubbs. 102. and insisted that the expunging any one Count amounted pro tanto to quashing the information. He also mentioned the case of Wood, attorney, ver. Webb, where the defendant was charged with winking the prosecutor's nose, and pleaded that he did not wink it but pulled it.

Mr. Mr. Mullin said, "the conduct of this man pervades through every situation of age, honour and profession, and amounts to what in law is termed a mischief."

Mr. Bennet observed, that there were no cases in point on the other side, he went largely into the case, and illuminated it with several new lights. Cited 2 Strange, 1026, Hardw. 192, Eng. Edit. 209 Irish. He repobated Lilly, which had been quoted on the other side as useful, and a mere compilation from indexes, and of cases unsupported by any legal authority. That there was no such case as the King against Lamb, as mentioned by Lilly; but that the case was, the King against Lambert, and properly reported in 12 Mod. He said, that Styles, from whom a case had been cited in favour of the defendant, made against him; and laid it down, that informations could not be quashed. He then entered largely, and with legal accuracy, into the doctrine of special pleading; and cited Lord Coke, who, in his advice to young pleader, says, "You must not always plead according to the truth of facts, but according to the operation of law: As when A's tenant for life, with remainder to B. in fee, and they make a lease, you can't, during the life of A. plead this to be the lease of A. and B. which is the fact—but must plead it to be the lease of A. with B.'s confirmation." He said, pleading was the least honest part of the law, and instanced it from the experience of his own practice. "The pleading stated facts, amounting to a surrender, I demurred; and it was overruled in the Exchequer; that the surrender should have been pleaded. The party amended and pleaded the surrender. I foiled them by another trick; for I then insisted, (and it was so ruled) that by pleading the surrender, they were excluded from going into evidence of the facts." He then quoted the earl of Devonshire's case, Comb. 49. 11amere 188. And upon the court's saying the earl had been fined 30,000l. he said he omitted mentioning the fine for fear it would appear like reminding the court, that the only legal challenges he knew of were those given in the trial by battle, where the life was always given, and an oath taken against forcery, upon which Mr. J. R. observed that trials by battle on a writ of right were always fought in the Common Pleas; and L. A. —y said he heartily wished this battle had been fought in the same place.

Mr. Bennet continued, that as to the words in which the challenge was conveyed it made no difference, the elegance of the Provost's language and politeness was known and admired, and it could not be supposed that he would challenge with the rusticity of antiquity; he would not say in the phrase of a blackguard, come to the Fifteen Acres till I cut off your head.

Mr. Sejeant Coppinger's reasons why the information should stand, and the motion be rejected were, that the application appeared to be unprecedented, and contrary to the principles of law, and the rule of practice; that, in this stage of the prosecution, the court had no materials to determine upon, except the prosecutor's affidavit; that that was the foundation of the rule for liberty to file the information, and was grounded upon probable evidence; that the same evidence was sufficient to support the 5th count. The notice contains two objections—that the counts are unnecessary, and that they are improper. The court cannot at this day determine them to be unnecessary, without the evidence being disclosed; that the reasoning on indictments is applicable to informations. He cited Hawk. Pleas of the Crown. The court may quash an indictment for such insufficiency, as may make the judgment thereon erroneous, but that does not apply here. He also cited Salceld in support of these arguments, and from it, that the court will not quash any information whatever. If the counts be improper, they ought to demur to them, and not ask in this manner to expunge them. No other offence can be given in evidence on this count, upon the trial, because the place is laid as part of the description of the offence. He cited Charles Leighton's case.

Mr. D. Hufsey.—The three first counts are for three specific offences—1 Hawk. says 'tis an enormous enormous offence to provoke to fight; a high offence to endeavour to do it; on this the two first counts are grounded. In an indictment for forgery there may be several counts as with intent to defraud A, to defraud B and C, and a general one for uttering new; it may appear in evidence that the intent did not go to defraud A, yet the prisoner may be found guilty on any of the other counts.

Mr. H. Burgh—The books swarm with authorities to shew that the court cannot quash informations by motion. The case cited from Siddons is denied to be law in 2 Hawk. see Salk. 372. The case in 3 Burrow, 1270. was to stay proceedings. The quashing an indictment before verdict is discretionary; after verdict the court cannot refuse it by arrest of judgment. Sayer 161. 128. 12 Mod. 420. The court would not interfere by quashing the indictment, as the crime was contra bonos Mores; but whether the court can or cannot interfere, here they will not. It is clear law that the words in which a challenge is conveyed are only matter of evidence. In Stubbs, Feverthire's case, The words are not set out though the challenge in one was by letter. The words are not a constituent part of the crime but matter of evidence, if the court were to determine what words were not a challenge, these would be the very words used to convey a challenge; a man need only say the words, and add, "put your construction on this." There is no reason can be shewn why the defendant in this case, should have any greater indulgence than any other subject; and though he may suffer an inconvenience from being put on his trial, yet there will be no injustice. But should the application be complied with it would be doing what never was done. He mentioned a case from the assizes of Armagh.

The court adjourned the further hearing till next day, Thursday, June 12. when Mr. Plovoest replied nearly in substance and words as follows:

I must apologize to your Lordships for the liberty I take, in making an humble request that I may speak in reply to the council who were yesterday heard in this cause. I would not, my Lords, take upon myself this matter, but that my council have been-harrassed by an attendance of six different suits promoted against me, on very unaccountable motives.

It has been mentioned, my Lords, that the arguments of my council tended to support a rehearing of the cause. My Lords, that is not the case, they tended to prove that there was a probability of a demurrer, that by the fifth count of the information standing, I should be prevented the benefit of that demurrer, and for that reason, my Lords, the authority of Prideaux and Arthur was laid before the court.

My Lords, in reply to those arguments which were yesterday urged against striking out a count from an information, I shall beg leave to make some observations. They shall be under three heads. First, whether a court has a right to strike out a count from an information. Second, whether it was agreeable to the court that the fifth count should stand or be struck out; and third, as to the right of demurring, and whether that right is precluded by the act with which this information is framed; and under what inextricable difficulties it will place the defendant, as well as the inconsistencies that must arise to the court, if this 5th count be not struck out. As to the first, my Lords, I shall take the liberty to say, that informations for misdemeanours have been restrained by the court, under the authority of many acts of parliament. Informations, my Lords, are of a very old date in England, they have not indeed been much practised in this country. There were some existed before, and many since the revolution. In the 1st W. M. Com. Jour. we find that the bill of rights was framed to abolish them, but they were, in some measure new modelled upon a more constitutional principle, and so that design was laid aside. My Lords, I do insist upon it, that in a prosecution, under the direction of the court, the court have a discretionary power to quash a count in an information which may seem to wear the appearance of oppression, because by such power they may relieve the subject from a vexatious and litigious suit, which a person so highly connected in law and office as the present prosecutor, might without any expence to himself carry on, to the total destruction of any private individual. And, my Lords, for this reason, and for the power, for the honour of the court, and for the liberty, peace and security of the subject it ought to be so. My Lords, precedents are asked for, but they are demanded because it is well known that the informations in this country are confined to a few. They are little practised; and except by the court they are less understood. I do not recollect in 29 years practice to have met with a litigated point on any information, and I believe I have been concerned in every one during that time, which has come before this court. My Lords, although precedents are not to be found in this kingdom, yet I hope there can be no objection to state the practice of Westminster Hall: And if I can clearly shew to your Lordships that the courts in Great Britain have adopted the mode of striking counts out of an information, I shall hope that the same mode will not be looked upon as illegal in this kingdom. My Lords, in many cases it is the custom of the courts here to follow the practice of the courts in England. Lord Hardwicke has been mentioned to your Lordships more than once. But he, my Lords, only objects to striking counts out of an indictment, in informations it is stated as the common practice. The case quoted was an indictment with 21 counts, and the application was made to strike out some, but as an indictment was the work of a Grand Jury, the Bench could not interfere. Sir John Strange 1026, has also been mentioned, but there it is said, the court cannot do it on indictments, being the finding of a Grand Jury. Therefore, it follows by that authority your Lordships can strike a count out of an information, because it is the act of yourselves. Indeed where the information is ex Officio, the Bench cannot interfere, because in that case the Attorney General puts himself in the place of a Grand Jury. My Lords, it has been argued, Strange 185. that an information is not to be quashed on motion, and the reason given is because the court itself has granted that information. Now I shall observe

to your Lordships, that as the whole cannot be quashed, the only relief to the defendant arises from striking out one or more of the counts. But if gentlemen will contend that striking out one is quashing the whole, then I say that the authority they have quoted from Strange is directly contrary to law and reason. My Lords, in Holt, 361. and Lily's practical Register, 59, it is said if the information be faulty or uninformed the court will not quash, but the defendant may demur. But, my Lords, if I shew that no such information as is contained in the 5th count should go, then it follows that the 5th count should not stand. My Lords, I will shew that it was not the intention of the court that such count should stand, for the information is not agreeable to the order of the court, and therefore, my Lords, that part which disagrees should be struck out. My Lords, give me leave to observe that in a case of quo Warrants, the court postponed from time to time to prevent a collusion; and as in the present case there is an actual abuse, I hope your Lordships will go as far as your predecessors to prevent oppression. By striking this count out, there cannot be any injury done to the prosecutor, for where he finds any defect he may amend his information. It has been objected, my Lords, to the defendant's motion, that a count in an information cannot be quashed, because informations are always granted for heinous offences,—I deny the principles, my Lords, and call upon gentlemen to contradict me if they can. Indictments, indeed, are formed upon that principle, but it is a different case with an information.

The case in Hardwicke, which has been mentioned to your Lordships, means not an illegal but an unnecessary count. The court, I hope, my Lords, will consider whether the proceedings will answer the end of justice; whether the mode adopted gives to the defendant the free exercise of the laws of his country, and if it does not, whether the Court of King's Bench is not in such case empowered to relieve him—if not—God help the subjects of this country. Matters relative to information, my Lord Hardwicke observes, are not little matters of practice, they are great constitutional questions; and Lord Hardwicke mentions his words to be a matter clearly settled on that point. It has been argued strongly, my Lords, that you have it not in your power to quash any count in this information—I contend for it, my Lords, that you have. It has been said, my Lords, that you cannot restrain the prosecutor—the law is not so, my Lords; I insist upon it that it is not so, nor has any case been shewn to corroborate such assertions. I beseech your Lordships to consider what would be the consequences of permitting a prosecutor to roam at large,—innumerable mischiefs would ensue. Suppose he was allowed to make 100 counts, must they all stand?

It has been said, my Lords, that the rule is a general rule—I say the rule is a conditional rule for an information founded upon an affidavit. It is a rule to file an information for an offence, such as the words spoken might create, and not for a challenge; and, my Lords, the counts against which I complain are of such a nature that they convey a charge of any offence which the mind of man may suggest; and the 5th count, my Lords, is not supported by affidavit.

My Lords, it is said, this motion is made with a view to oblige the prosecutor to disclose his evidence; but I do assure your Lordships it is not. The evidence, my Lords, is not here necessary. The prosecutor himself is the principal witness; but, my Lords, he has complicated the charge in such a manner, as makes it apparently evident he was afraid to mention the words spoken as far as truth might warrant.

The restraint I mention, my Lords, will not deprive the prosecutor of the benefit of his rule; but I will first consider this 5th count. I will consider it in two lights: the one referring to words in the prosecutor's affidavit; the other referring to facts or circumstances not disclosed by the prosecutor. And first, to shew the defendant will be deprived of the benefit of the laws of his country. Suppose he made a demur to the first four counts, and a plea of Not Guilty to the fifth, it is said the demurrer must be decided first. But the law is here mistaken by the gentlemen; for in either case the defendant suffers. If upon the plea, then the evidence given will to the jury anticipate the judgment upon the demurrer, for the court must declare whether the words are criminal or not; and if upon the demurrer, he may be acquitted here and convicted on the other side. If a jury find a verdict, and judgment is given, the defendant brings his demurrer; the court here are of the same opinion with the jury; he then moves in arrest of judgment, the matter is carried to England, and the court there differ in opinion with the court here—I ask you, my Lords, if in that case, and it is a probable one, if the 5th count stands, will not the defendant then appear to be both innocent and guilty? and will not that remain on record as a very great oppression? My Lords, suppose this court, seeing the opinion of the supreme court, that the words were not criminal, that the demurrer was determined, and that your Lordships in consequence had an application to set aside the verdict, I ask your Lordships must not the defendant stand a second trial? But, my Lords, the 5th count, it seems must stand—like the laws of the Medes and Persians, it must remain for ever. Indeed, my Lords, the case of a second trial would be very hard—for what would the jury say? Twelve men of our county have already found him guilty, and so will we. My Lords, if it be in the power of a prosecutor to take which means he judges most proper, these inconveniences and inconsistencies must follow.

Suppose, my Lords, that the demurrer be decided first, I pray you, must the defendant go to the first part of the British Empire to shew that he is an innocent man? Must he search for the benignity of the laws of his country in Great Britain? And then, my Lords, although he is acquitted on that demurrer, yet on the plea he may afterwards be found guilty? My Lords, the striking out the 5th count can be of no injury to the prosecutor, but may be of great disadvantage to the defendant; for the material words sworn to are in the other counts. Informations of another kind have been relied on, but quo Warrants's are not in point.

My Lords, I must ask, did your Lordships ever intend that an information should go for a challenge without words? Evidence, indeed, might might be given of a different nature to words, but your Lordships without a knowledge of that evidence must refuse the information. You would not proceed upon facts that were not contained in the affidavit. My Lords, the nature of this 5th count is, that the prosecutor may apply evidence from it to any words I have spoken every day of my life. My Lords, in 2 Hawk. 46, 32, and 34, it is a rule laid down in all cases capital or not capital, that the day laid is not material; you may give evidence of any other day, and this appears from Sir H. Vane's case, who was indicted in the reign of Charles II. for treason committed on one day, and he was convicted of treason committed on another day previous to that: So that, my Lords, you see what a tendency this 5th count has.

As to the place being an aggravation of the offence, as stated from Hawk. 46, 54, it may be so; but it is no crime, my Lords—it is not a part of the fact. My Lords, I have spent, for 29 years past, near seven months of each year in this hall; and pray, my Lords, are all my words, for that space of time, to be collected, to be accumulated, and sent up to the judgment seat against me, without any intimation when and where they were spoken?—It puts me in mind, my Lords, of one of Mr. Addison's beautiful imaginations; where he supposes words, in a cold season of the year, to be frozen as soon as they part from the lips, and when the warm weather returns, that they are then thawed into sound, and produce an irregular jumble of strange sentences. My Lords, such a situation seems to threaten me: My words, in an hour of conviviality with a friend, in common conversation, are to be accumulated for a space of time, and then thawed into sentences at a proper season. I will carry the simile still farther—and I must beg your Lordship's indulgence. Virgil represents Eolus confining the winds in a cavern, that they may be swelled out into a tempest;—so, my Lords, my words are collected into accumulated circumstances, that they may afterwards be swelled out into a challenge. Suppose, my Lords, that a man upon his sick bed, worried with persecution, should, when his imagination was warmed with resentment, utter a groan against his persecutor, or that in a dream he might express some harsh word, some acrimonious epithet against his enemy; suppose, I say, my Lords, if this was the case, and that his old servant, who had attended him for years, and to whom he had been particularly kind, should overhear those unguarded expressions, and inform the persons of them against whom they were spoken, would it not be a hard case that this old servant should be desired to write them down, to bring them into court, and to become an ungrateful evidence, on the day of trial, against his friend and master? Is this, my Lords, the benignity of the law?—Is this a spectacle to be held up to the people—and by whom?—by one who is his Majesty's Attorney General, his Secretary of State, who comes armed with that tremendous word, prerogative, an authority that has been seldom used during the mild reign of our present most excellent Sovereign—a Judge too of the Ecclesiastical Court;—and indeed this prosecution favours more of the persecuting spirit of that court, than it does of the benignity of the common law.

Mr. Burgh, my Lords, has candidly acknowledged that this 5th count is for the purpose of proving a challenge, at any time, or any place. But, my Lords, how can I be prepared against such charges, or against what is not mentioned in the affidavit?—The council themselves vary about what is the intention of the count; and if they understand it in different lights, in what manner is the unfortunate defendant to understand it?—My Lords, there may be unknown hostilities shut up in this 5th count, with which I am as little acquainted, as the Trojans were with what was concealed in the body of the Wooden Horse. I am told it has fallen from your Lordships, that the defendant has a power of demurring, or of moving in an arrest of judgment, or writ of error: But if it appears to your Lordships that I am excluded the benefit arising from any of those pleas, by the manner in which the 5th count is drawn up, the justice of the court will remove the obstacle. My Lords, it is said that the defendant is afraid to come before a jury. That I deny;—he has lately received, through the milks of prejudice, a most honourable testimony of the impartiality of 12 men—nor has he any fear of submitting the trial of this matter to the integrity of a jury of the county of Dublin. But, my Lords, though I admit injuries, I greatly respect the opinion of judges. My Lords, I am not afraid of what a few newspapers may occasion. I spend a large income, under the eyes of my fellow citizens; and I do not think that such prejudices, as anonymous productions may occasion, will ever injure an honest man in their opinion.

My Lords, in the 5th count are contained the most opprobrious epithets, such as “the defendant did provoke to fight—that he threatened to challenge with fire and sword;” and my Lords, from the affidavit, it appears that the word challenge was never used. I will ask your Lordships, are there no degrees in an offence? Are not warm words, which people may construe differently, to be taken in the most generous, in the mildest sense?

My Lords, this information is a new case; it is the first upon a constructive provocation to fight. When there is a letter, or an express challenge, then indeed there is no occasion to say the words. But, my Lords, if they are not words that do immediately tend to fight, they cannot be construed into an intention to break the peace. This, as I said before, is a new case; we have no precedent for it; there has not been any authority produced to prove the laying of challenges generally. The case out of Stubbs will not apply; for in that there was an assault, and there were two counts; one that he provoked him to fight a battle, the other that he provoked him to a duel. The question, my Lords, is not whether the count be good, but whether it be fairly and ingenuously stated, so that the defendant may be able to defend himself, and that a demurrer is not prevented? One objection more, my Lords: What does the prosecutor mean?—A written or a verbal challenge; for from the mode in which the count is drawn up it is impossible to divine which. The case contains five different counts; and the prosecutor has a count for words he did hear, and for words he did not hear, for words he did understand and and for words he did not understand. He charges the defendant with giving a verbal challenge, which he did not hear; and my Lords, I will take upon me to say, that there never was an information for a challenge granted upon words which were not spoken within the prosecutor's hearing. But, if they can shew any precedent, I may safely say I will give up the cause. My Lords, the 5th count is formed with a view of overlaying the defendant, it is replete with the epithets of a quarreller, a duellist, &c. and they are repeated merely with an intention that the prosecutor should load his adversary with opprobrious language: But he may say, with a character drawn by a certain dramatic writer, My great revenge has stomach for them all.

The court on the conclusion of the Provost's speech deferred giving their opinion till Saturday, as they said they would not be prepared until then—Mr. Justice Robinson excepted, who said he was now ready to deliver his sentiments. A rule was then made to oblige the defendant to plead under the direction of the court; but to this the Provost objected, insisting that there should be due notice served according to the rule of court. The officer said the rule was to plead in four days or judgment. The Provost still insisted that the court could not make a rule, and that according to the established law the matter must lie over until next term. An altercation then ensued for about half an hour, and it appearing that the Provost was right—the rule was ordered to be struck out, and so this matter stands over until next term.—Mr. Justice Henn not being prepared to give his opinion until Monday, the Bench have deferred theirs until that day.

July 10.] Accounts came in by different persons, that an American privateer of 20 guns was in the channel, and had taken two or three vessels, names yet unknown; and, a notice was sent to the right hon. Theophilus Jones, collector of Dublin, by the commissioners, desiring him to apprise the merchants and masters of ships, of the same, and that he was seen last Thursday at noon, about five leagues from Skerries.

Thursday, James Fegan, butcher, on the galebe, Thomas-street, was tried and convicted at the commission, for the robbery of counsellor Morgan's house at Newcastle, county of Dublin, as formerly mentioned, and received his sentence to be executed this day fortnight.

A very curious matter came on to be tried Saturday, July 12, at the commission. It was an indictment against — Bloomer, a hair-dresser, for a fraud, in passing the notes of one man as if they were the notes of another man, by which the person who was induced to accept them lost fifty-one pounds. The story of the affair made the transaction appear in a very fraudulent light, but the chain of circumstances attending it were so intricately woven, that it was with great difficulty the court could get at the truth. The trial took up a considerable time, and there was a strong bar of lawyers on both sides; — Bloomer was found guilty.

13.] Two colliers in ballast, for Whitehaven, was brought to off the mouth of the harbour, by an American privateer, when after taking from them what cash they had on board, the produce of their cargoes of coals sold in this port, together with such provisions as they found on board, suffered them to proceed on their voyage home.

14.] Thomas Delany and John Easton were tried and found guilty of a robbery on Drumcondra-bridge, and received sentence to be hanged on Saturday next. A person appearing at the time of the trial, who, we hear, intended to prove an alibi, was taken into custody, and is to be tried on Wednesday next on some indictments that are against him.

Monday being quarter day of the guild of merchants, the right hon. lord Grantham, ambassador at Spain, was unanimously voted the freedom of that corporation, for his great services to this kingdom, in respect to the linen trade; also to captain William Hall, town major, for his readiness and activity in attending the magistrates, &c. upon all occasions.

16.] D. Lenhan was tried for the murder of one Walker, by stabbing him with a knife in the belly. It appeared by the evidence on both sides, that this unhappy youth, with several others, had met the deceased and his company in Fishamble-street, about six o'clock in the morning; that upon some words passing between them, the prisoner struck one of the persons who was with the deceased, and soon after fled, with his brother; that finding they were pursued, ran up into a house, and rapped at a shoemaker's door, who supposing it was his journeymen that we came to work, let them in; they informed the shoemaker of their situation and fear—and he having looked out of his window, told them that he knew one of the persons below, and believed they (the prisoner and his brother) were in great danger. The younger Lenhan then went up the chimney, and the elder attempted to get under the bed; but finding that impracticable, armed himself with one of the shoemaker's working knives. The door was soon forced open. Lenhan warned Walker and the others not to come in; but they pushed forward, and one of them struck him on the head with a stick so violently, as to break the stick, and cut him. Walker then rushed in upon him, and upon the instant received the mortal stab—The jury, after being out an hour and an half, brought the prisoner in Guilty of man-slaughter, for which he will be burned in the hand.

Sunday, a boat with several ladies and gentlemen sailed from Tralee, in the county of Waterford, on a party of pleasure, and about four leagues to the south east, fell in with a vessel schooner rigged, which fired a gun, to bring the boat along side. The company immediately complied and were ordered to get on board the vessel. They were conducted to the cabin, and informed by an officer that they were prisoners to capt. Jeremiah Heydon, of the Oliver Cromwell privateer, of Marblehead, in New-England, from whence they sailed the 9th of April, in company with two others, of 16 guns and 80 men each. After some farther conversation, in which the captain and his officers made themselves very merry with the confusion of the ladies and gentlemen, they were entertained with cold ham and excellent Madeira, and then dismissed, with many expressions of mutual civility. The privateer privateer took leave, with three cheers, and stood to the S. W. towards Bristol channel.

At the last quarter sessions for the county of Dublin came on at Kilmainham, the trial of Mr. James Doran, an eminent dealer in Thomas-street, for having in his possession a silver snuff-box, belonging to John Trail, an engineer. It appeared during the course of the evidence, that the snuff-box had been sold, on the 7th of June last, by a very genteel looking man to Manly, silversmith and jeweller, in Dame-street. at the rate of old silver, and that it had been stolen from Trail the day preceding. On the 9th of the same month Mr. Doran being at Manly's and in want of a box, asked if he could get a cheap one; Manly produced Trail's box, and sold it to Mr. Doran for 15s.—Mr. Doran shewing the box to some person in his shop, was told that it belonged to Trail who had lost it. On this Mr. Doran went to Trail's house, but not meeting him at home, left word that he had the box. Trail went and demanded the box, which the other refused to give unless he paid him what it cost him. This Trail would not do, and so Mr. Doran retained the box to Manly. Trail then indicted Mr. Doran for robbery, on which indictment he was tried and most honourably acquitted.

by parliament for the two brothers of his Majesty, the dukes of Gloucester and Cumberland, which was supported by Mr. Fox in a very spirited speech, Sir Edward Ashley, &c.

It was observed by sir James and his friends, that nothing could be more disgraceful to the present government than keeping two amiable princes, so nearly related to the crown, in a state of indigence, which entirely struck them off from appearing with that state, dignity, or even ease which became their rank and consequence in the state. That nothing could be more disgraceful to the crown and kingdom, than having the first prince of the blood resident, a fugitive through poverty, at Rome, subsisting upon a revenue insufficient to support him, while the most enormous sums were granted to the king, and spent in a manner that did no credit either to the splendor, or intentions of the court; that there was nothing in the application now made in the least contrary to precedent; their ancestors had often had similar applications, and some which were made proved successful; — that there never were greater, or more decisive reasons for coming into such a proposal than at present. All these arguments were fruitless; they were answered in a light desultory manner, and the question called for with impetuosity; the previous one being moved for.

Majority, 85

After the above business was over, a most unexpected and as curious a debate perhaps as ever was known within that house, came on, relative to the following speech made by the speaker to his majesty in the house of peers on the 7th instant, when he presented the bill for paying off the civil list debts, and for increasing the royal income.

“ The bill I now present to your majesty is passed by your faithful commons with the greatest dispatch the nature of their proceedings will admit, having set aside all other business. It grants to your majesty a very considerable sum for the discharge of the civil list debts, and also provides a great addition to your majesty's present income; great, beyond example of former times, and the utmost wants of your majesty; and at a time too, sir, of great public danger and difficulty; this country already loaded with heavy taxes. Your commons however trust, that your majesty will expend well what they have liberally granted, and are conscious that the glory and splendor of the crown adds dignity and honour to the people.”

We do not absolutely ascertain how the controversy began, but we believe it arose from some question put to the chair by Mr. Rigby, concerning the speech which had been ordered to be printed, and it was expected would have been ready to deliver to the members this day. Reasons were assigned by the speaker for its not being yet in print; amongst others it is reported, that he had delivered it extempore without notes, and upon the house having ordered it to be printed, he had delivered the substance to the clerks as near as he could remember to enter on the journals; and he was willing to take the sense of the house before it appeared in public, whether what was entered by the clerks, agreed with what the members who attended him in the upper house had heard him deliver. The speech being then read, some of the honourable body declared, that if not in the express words, it was the same in substance as that delivered viva voce. The contest now began; Mr. Rigby seemed to think the speaker had taken an unwarrantable liberty, in delivering what he thought was the sense of the house, without knowing their sentiments at all upon the matter; he thought it affected the honour and dignity of the house, and that the opinion of the house ought to be now collected, before they suffered the speech to go forth, under the stamp of their authority and approbation.

The speaker justified himself, as thinking he had delivered the sense of the house to his majesty; he supported himself on precedents of his predecessors; declared that he must and would act the part of an honest man; that he was the keeper of his own honour, as well as that of the house, which he would maintain to his dying day. In the course of the debate something fell from the same member, which the speaker construed as a personal attack, and declared, that till he received reparation from the house, would not sit in that chair again.

About nine o'clock the above extraordinary debate or conversation was amicably terminated without a division, the house having confirmed their former approbation of the speech in question.

Wednesday 14.

The lobby and all the avenues to the house of commons were full of strangers by one o'clock; the speaker came at two, and after prayers the house proceeded to the admission of strangers, under the restriction of permitting each member to introduce one friend, upon giving in his name in writing, with the name of the member annexed. As the Irish members and peers had a right to go in without this ceremony, it easily may be imagined that the gallery was partly filled before prayers; and in less than half an hour after the strangers introduced by the members according to the above regulation overflocked the gallery, so that the speaker was obliged to order that no more should be admitted.

Those gentlemen, whose friends did not come to the house till three o'clock, were by this circumstance totally excluded.

At near four o'clock, after a great deal of private business had been gone through, the house went into a committee of supply and ways and means; when lord North rose, and in a concise, eloquent, and able speech, entered into the state of the nation in general terms. His lordship neither insured peace with foreign powers, nor hinted at any rupture; he lamented the stubbornness and ingratitude of the Americans, which forced the mother country, after every other means had been tried, to the necessity of prosecuting a war at the expence of the blood and treasure of their fellow subjects. He shewed how reluctantly government had entered into it; and at the same time observed that it had in a great measure answered the end proposed by it. Some of the colonies had already returned to their allegiance; others, it was not doubted, would soon follow so good an example, especially as they saw that his majesty's arms were crowned with success.

After lamenting the heavy but necessary expence the nation had been put to, in order to assert and maintain its just authority over the dependencies of the British empire, and to shew foreign powers that we were in a state of defence to resist any unexpected attacks from them, his lordship proceeded to state the estimate of the supplies voted by parliament for the service of the current year, and the produce of the ordinary revenues of the kingdom; by which it appeared, that the sum of five millions were wanting to make good the amount of the supplies exceeding the ordinary revenue, which his lordship proposed to raise in the following manner:

The said capital sum of five millions by a loan, the subscribers to be intitled to an annuity of four per cent. per annum for ten years, the interest to commence from Lady Day last: the same interest to be continued after the ten years, till the principal is paid off; the said annuities to be transferable at the bank.

His lordship supposed these annuities to be worth 95*l.* therefore every subscriber of 100*l.* is to have another annuity of 10*s.* per annum for ten years, which he estimates at 4*l.* and a lottery ticket at 10*l.* which he imagined might sell at 13*l.* in which case the subscribers will have two per cent. premium.

The mode of providing for the interest of the five millions was stated nearly as follows:

A tax on all male servants, except such as are employed in husbandry, trade, and manufactures, of one guinea per head per annum, supposed to produce 100,000*l.*

To be put under the direction of the commissioners of the land-tax, and the collectors to require gentlemen to give them lists of their men servants within a certain time, and in case of neglect to assess them; if over-rated, they are to appeal to the commissioners.

An additional excise of 9*s.* 4*d.* per cwt. on crystal glass; of 14*s.* on crown glass; of 7*s.* on plate glass; of 3*s.* on bottles; and double duty on all glass imported, estimated at 45,000*l.*

An additional stamp duty on all deeds of two shillings and sixpence, on deeds above 1000*l.* value; also on certain deeds with hard names in the kingdom of Scotland; also of 5*s.* on every policy of assurances or insurances on goods and houses from fire; estimated at 55,000*l.* A duty of 3*d.* in the pound on all lands and shipping sold by public auction, and of 6*d.* in the pound on all plate, jewels, household furniture, and other goods, so sold by auction; estimated at 37,500*l.* Total 237,500*l.*

The plate act to be repealed, which produced 12,000*l.* and being deducted from the above there remains 225,500*l.* which creates a surplus of 25,500*l.* after paying the interest of the new loan, to allow for deficiencies in any of the above taxes.

Lord North declared there were 199,000 houses in England with ten windows, and therefore drew a conclusion that the tax on men servants must produce 100,000*l.* per annum.

Upon these taxes he remarked, that the duty upon servants had been long called for by the public, as an object of that sort of luxury which was very properly within the sphere of taxation, and is actually so in several other countries; that it was perfectly proportional, since there was, perhaps, no part of a man's expenditure which was more equally marked than in the number of his servants; that the classes it would fall upon were by much the most able to contribute to alleviate the burthens burthens of the public; and he apprehended, at the same time, that it would be very productive to the revenue, and be a very light burthen to the individual.

Glass he represented as a proper object for an excise, especially as it was not a considerable article in our foreign trade, nor in the consumption of any classes of our people, who were not exceedingly able to bear it.

Stamps he adhered to upon the fact, which was his guide, that they are an increasing revenue, notwithstanding their having been often raised.

The duty upon auctions he was of opinion would in its operations prove rather a benefit than a loss to the public, for they were multiplied in all parts of the kingdom to that excess as to be mischievous to every fair trader; that they had proved in many cases the parent of frauds and impositions; and where their effects were harmless, still they were as proper an object of taxation as any that could be devised, since the tax would be paid when the person taxed was best able to pay it, that is, just when he was receiving the ready money of the auction; that he apprehended the tax would be considerably more productive than he had taken it at; but to be under rather than over the mark, had been his aim in every one of them.

His lordship assigned as a reason for repealing the plate tax, that it was paid honestly by those who rather ought to be exempt from it, while those who were best able to pay it evaded it.

Mr. Fox in reply said, on the same ground the American tea tax ought to have been repealed long since, which would have prevented the war, and the taxes now to be laid upon the people of this kingdom; for only those Americans who were called loyal subjects and friends to government had paid it, who assuredly ought to have been exempted from it as a reward for their loyalty, while the major part who were called rebels, and who were intended to bear the burthen of it, had constantly refused to pay it.

Thursday 15.

Received the report of the resolutions of yesterday, on the ways and means.

That 5,000,000*l.* be raised by annuities, and 500,000*l.* by a lottery

That 1,500,000*l.* be raised by loans on Exchequer bills.

That 193,963*l.* in the Exchequer, out of the sinking fund, be applied towards the supply.

391*l.* the produce of the duties on rice, towards the supply.

1393*l.* surplus of grants for protecting America, towards the supply.

1391*l.* the produce of the duties on gum Senega, towards the supply.

That 20*s.* per year be paid by every auctioneer in London and Westminster.

That 3*s.* per year be paid by every auctioneer in the country.

That 21*s.* per year be paid for every male servant, those employed in trade, manufactures, commerce, husbandry, arts, and sciences, excepted.

And to several other resolutions for additional duties on stamps, glass, sales by auction, &c.

The speaker took the chair about half an hour after two; and many of the members who went away on Wednesday night before the resolution for the absolute exclusion of strangers, came down early with their sons and friends to introduce them, but the resolution was too positive to be waved. Lord Lisburne and others were refused their sons, and Mr. T. Townshend pleaded in vain for a son of lord Chatham. The house finds it, we suppose, easier to come to a resolution than to manage so as to make unpopular resolutions unnecessary. The disgust was taken at the strangers crowding about the door, so as to prevent the members getting in or out—but if they would, rail off passages for themselves by temporary iron bars to be hooked on from pillar to pillar when the lobby was crowded, they might then be perfectly at their ease, and strangers called for by name till the gallery was full.

A sudden change, however, happened after this; for several members being disappointed as above, moved the house for a relaxation of the last night's order, which, after a desultory conversation of near an hour, ended not in reversing the order, but leaving it in the breast of the speaker to relax it according to the occasion; upon which the members, with his permission, carried in their friends.

The debate on the report of the budget then opened.

Mr. Hartley, in a speech which lasted near two hours, followed Lord North through his calculations of finance: he in particular dwelt upon the great danger to which the landed interest was exposed from the sad situation of public affairs. He represented, that they had no prospect but of seeing the land tax mortgaged; that nothing could be more fallacious than judging of the taxes in the great line of policy from the objections which might be made to individual burthens. It might be said, that no great fault could be found with a tax upon servants or glass.—Neither did he see any ruin that was to follow a tax upon wheat, or cloth; but was it therefore to be concluded, that such taxes were to be carried an unbounded length?

The Life of Robert Doddsley.

DODSLEY (Robert) an eminent bookseller and ingenious author, was born at Mansfield, in Sherwood forest, Nottinghamshire, in the year 1703. He was not indebted to education for his literary fame; for he had but little knowledge of the learned languages, as he himself informs us in the following passage.

“ O native Sherwood! happy were thy “ bard, “ Might these his rural notes, to future “ times, “ Boast of tall groves, that nodding o’er “ thy plain,
 “ Rose to their tuneful melody. But ah!
 “ Beneath the feeble efforts of a muse, “ Untutor’d by the lore of Greece or “ Rome;
 “ A stranger to the fair Castalian springs,
 “ Whence happier poets inspiration draw,
 “ And the sweet magic of persuasive song,
 “ The weak presumption, the fond hope “ expires.”

At his first setting out in life, he was a livery-servant to a person of quality: but his excellent natural genius, and his eager thirst after knowledge, soon raised him to a higher sphere. His dramatic entertainment called the Toy-shop, was exhibited at Covent-garden theatre, in 1735, with very great applause; and the merit of this piece recommended its author to the notice of Mr. Pope, who continued from that time his warm friend and zealous patron. In the year following, he produced the King and the Miller of Mansfield, which was received with equal favour. From the success of these attempts, he was enabled to take up the business of a bookseller; in which station, Mr. Pope’s recommendation, and his own merit, soon procured him not only the countenance of persons of the first abilities, but also of those of the first rank, and in a few years raised him to the greatest eminence in his profession. His success and elevation only served to display the amiableness of his character in a fairer light; for he still retained his native modesty, humility and integrity, the warmest gratitude to his benefactors, and the most active zeal to encourage genius and learning. He died at Durham in 1764, at the age of sixty-one. He wrote six dramatic pieces, viz. the Blind Beggar of Bethala Green; the Toy-shop; Cleone; * the Triumph of Peace; the King and the Miller of Mansfield; and Sir John Cockle at Court. He published a collection of his own works in one volume, 8vo. under the modest title of Trifles; also a collection of Poems by different hands, in six volumes, 12mo. and a collection of old Plays, in twelve volumes of the same size.

The Life of Dr. John Donne.

Donne (Dr. John) styled by Mr. Dryden “ the greatest wit, though not the greatest poet of our nation,” was born in the city of London, in the year 1573. He studied at Oxford and Cambridge, and afterwards at Lincoln’s-Inn. His parents were of the Romish religion, and used their utmost efforts to keep him firm to that persuasion; but, having carefully examined the points in controversy between the protestants and the papists, he chose the religion of the former. In the years 1596 and 1597, he accompanied the earl of Essex in his expeditions against Cadiz and the Azores. He did not return with that nobleman, but staid some years in Italy and Spain, learning the languages of those countries, and making observations on the laws, government, and manners of the people. Soon after his return to England, he was appointed secretary to the lord-keeper Egerton, and continued in that employment five years; during which time he privately married Anne, the daughter of Sir George More (chancellor of the garter) and niece to the lord-keeper’s lady. Sir George, however, so much resented his daughter’s marrying without his consent, that he most earnestly solicited the lord-keeper to remove Mr. Donne from his place; which request was granted. Mr. Donne was soon after committed to prison; but, Sir George being at last reconciled, he was set at liberty, and that gentleman not only forgave his daughter, but allowed her a competent fortune.

In 1614, Mr. Donne entered into holy orders, was made chaplain to king James I. and took the degree of doctor in divinity. In the latter end of the year 1617, he was elected preacher to the society of Lincoln’s-Inn; and two years after, by his majesty’s appointment, attended lord Doncaster in his embassy to Germany. In November 1621, he was advanced to the deanery of St. Paul’s; and, in 1624, was chosen prolocutor of the convocation. He died on the 31st of March, 1631,* in the fifty-ninth year of his age, and was buried in the cathedral church of St. Paul, where a monument of white marble was erected over him. He wrote, 1. Pseudo-Martyr: 2. Devotions upon emergent Occasions: 3. A volume of Poems: 4. Paradoxes, Problems, Essays, Characters, &c. 5. Three Volumes of Sermons, in folio: 6. Essays in Divinity, &c. 7. Letters to several Persons; and, 8. Biathanatos. He also translated from the Greek the ancient History of the Septuagint. His Pseudo-Martyr, in which he has effectually confuted the doctrine of the papal supremacy, is the most valuable of his prose writings.

Dr. Donne, as Mr. Walton informs us, ⁴ was of a stature moderately tall, of a straight and equally proportioned body, to which all his words and actions gave an inexpressible addition of comeliness. The melancholy and pleasant humours were in him so contempered, that each gave advantage to the other, and rendered his company one of the delights of mankind. His fancy was inimitably high, equalled only by his great wit; both being made useful by a commanding judgment. His aspect was cheerful, and such as gave a silent testimony of a clear knowing soul, and of a conscience at peace with itself. His melting eye shewed that he had a soft heart, full of noble compassion; he was of too brave a soul to offer injuries, and too much a christian not to pardon them in others. He was by nature highly passionate; yet exceedingly humane, and of so merciful a spirit, that he never beheld the miseries of mankind without pity and relief."

The Life of Sir Francis Drake.

Drake (Sir Francis) one of our most distinguished naval heroes, was the son of a sailor, and was born near Tavistock in Devonshire, in 1545. He was the eldest of twelve sons, and was educated at the expence, and under the care, of Sir John Hawkins, who was his kinsman. At the age of eighteen, he was purser of a ship trading to Biscay; at twenty he made a voyage to Guinea; and, at twenty-two, was appointed captain of the Judith. In that capacity he was in the harbour of St.

N O T E.

* Some time before his death, when he was emaciated with study and sickness, he caused himself to be wrapped up in a sheet, which was gathered over his head, in the manner of a shroud; and having closed his eyes, he had his portrait taken; which was kept by his bed-side, as long as he lived, to remind him of mortality.

John de Ulloa, in the gulph of Mexico, where he behaved with great gallantry under Sir John Hawkins. Returning to England in extreme poverty, he projected a design against the Spaniards in the West-Indies, which he no sooner made public, than he had numbers of volunteers ready to accompany him. Accordingly he undertook an expedition in 1570, with two ships, and the next year with one only, in which he returned safe, if not with all the advantages that he expected. He made another expedition in 1572, wherein he did the Spaniards great damage, and gained a very considerable booty. In these expeditions he was assisted by a nation of Indians, who were engaged in war with the Spaniards. The prince of these people was named Pedro, to whom capt. Drake presented a fine cutlass from his side, which he saw the Indian greatly admired. Pedro, in return, gave him four large wedges of gold, which Drake threw into the common stock, saying, "he thought it but just, that such as bore the charge of so uncertain a voyage on his credit, should share the utmost advantages the voyage produced." Then embarking his men, with all the wealth he had obtained, he set sail for England, and arrived at Plymouth on the 9th of August, 1573.

Captain Drake's success in this expedition, together with his honourable behaviour towards his owners, gained him a high reputation; and the use he made of his riches a still greater: for, sitting out three frigates at his own expence, he sailed with them to Ireland, where, under Walter earl of Essex, he served as a volunteer, and performed many glorious actions.—After the death of that worthy nobleman, he returned into England, where Sir Christopher Hatton took him under his protection, introduced him to her majesty, and procured him her countenance. By this means he acquired a capacity of undertaking that grand expedition which will render his name immortal. He proposed to undertake a voyage into the South Seas through the Straights of Magellan, which was what no Englishman had ever hitherto attempted. This project was well received at court, and in a short time Drake saw himself at the height of his wishes; for in his former voyage, having had a distant prospect of the South-Seas, he put up an ardent prayer to God, that he might sail an English ship in them, which he now found an opportunity of attempting, the queen's permission furnishing him with the means, and his own fame quickly drawing to him a sufficient force. The fleet with which he sailed on this extraordinary undertaking, consisted of the following following ships, viz. the Pelican, commanded by himself, of the burthen of 100 tons; the Elizabeth, vice-admiral, 80 tons, under captain John Winter; the Marygold, a bark of 30 tons, commanded by captain John Thomas; the Swan, a fly-boat of 50 tons, under captain John Chester; and the Christopher, a pinnace of 15 tons, under captain Thomas Moon. In this fleet were embarked 164 able men; and the ships were plentifully furnished with all kinds of provisions and necessaries for so long and dangerous a voyage. On the 15th of November, 1577, about three in the afternoon, Drake sailed from Plymouth; but a violent storm arising as soon as he was out of the port, forced him in a very bad condition into Falmouth to refit; which having expeditiously performed, he again put to sea on the 13th of December following. On the 25th of the same month, he fell in with the coast of Barbary, and on the 29th with Cape Verd; on the 13th of March, 1578, he passed the equinoctial; the 5th of April he made the coast of Brazil, and entered the river Plata, where he lost the company of two of his ships; but meeting them again, and taking out their provisions, he turned them adrift. On the 29th of May he arrived in the port of St. Julian; where he continued two months, for the sake of laying in provisions. He departed thence on the 17th of August, and on the 20th entered the Streights of Magellan. After a difficult navigation of sixteen days, he came out, on the 6th of September, into the great South-Sea. But here he met with such tempestuous weather, that he was forced back to the westward near an hundred leagues; and one of his ships, the Marygold, was lost. Near the 57th degree of southern latitude, he entered a bay, where he found a naked people ranging from one island to another, in canoes, to seek provisions. Sailing thence to the northward, on the 3d of October, he found three islands, in one of which was an extraordinary plenty of birds. On the 8th, he lost another of his ships, the Elizabeth, commanded by captain John Winter, which returned thro' the streights, and arrived safe in England on the 2d of June in the year following, being the first ship that ever came back that way. Drake, proceeding along the coast of Chili, arrived at an island called Moncha; where he had intelligence from an Indian, that a large Spanish ship lay laden at Val Paraiso, which he immediately sailed in search of. He easily took this vessel, in which he found a vast quantity of Baldavian gold. He then plundered a neighbouring town, and afterwards landed at Tarapasa, or Tarapaxa, where finding a Spaniard asleep upon the shore, with thirteen bars of silver by him, to the value of four thousand Spanish ducats, he caused them to be carried off, without waking the man. Then entering the port of Arica, he found there three ships with not a man on board; in which were, besides other merchandize, fifty seven wedges of silver, each weighing twenty pounds. Hence he proceeded to Lima, the capital of Peru, where he seized twelve ships, and in them great quantities of silk, with a chest full of coined money. Drake, continuing his course to the northward, sailed along the coast of Mexico, and landing at Aguatulco, sacked that town. He afterwards endeavoured to find a passage into England by North America, sailing to the latitude of forty-two degrees on that coast; but meeting with nothing but severity of cold, and open shores covered with snow, he came back into the latitude of thirty eight, and putting into a convenient harbour in the north parts of California, met with a very kind reception from the Indians there; who by many significant tokens offered, we are told, to make him their king. To this country Drake thought fit to give the name of New Albion; and raising a pillar, put an inscription thereon, containing the name of queen Elizabeth, the date of the year, and the time of his arrival there. Leaving this coast, he sailed to the westward, and at length arriving at the Moluccas, he was kindly entertained by the king of Ternate, one of those islands; whence departing, he prosecuted his voyage thro' those dangerous seas; but his ship striking upon a rock, stuck fast for seven and twenty hours, which threw his men into despair: however, when they had lightened the ship, by throwing over-board eight of her guns, and some merchandize, a bearing gale of wind fortunately took her in the quarter, and heaved her off. Then touching at Java, where he received great civility from one of the kings of the island, he continued his course for the Cape of Good Hope, and thence to Rio Grande in Negroland; where taking in water, he made the best of his way to England. On the 11th of September, 1580, he made the island of Tercera, and, on the 3d of November, entered the harbour of Plymouth; having, in less than three years, sailed round the globe, to the great admiration of all ranks of people. On the 4th of April, 1581, queen Elizabeth going to Deptford, dined on board captain Drake's ship, conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and declared her absolute approbation of all that he had done. Her majesty likewise gave directions for the preservation of his ship, that it might remain a monument of his own and his country's glory.

In

In 1585, Sir Francis Drake, who was now an admiral, was sent on an expedition against the Spaniards to the West-Indies, with a fleet of one and twenty ships. In his passage he took the capital town of the island of St. Jago; whence proceeding to Hispaniola, he made himself master of the town of St. Domingo. He also took Carthagena; and sailing along the coast of Florida, burnt St. Augustine and St. Helen's, two small towns that the Spaniards had abandoned. In 1587, the queen sent him with a squadron to cruise against the Spaniards, and particularly with a view to interrupt the preparations they were making to invade England, and to destroy, if possible, the Spanish shipping, ammunition, and provisions, in their own ports. On the 19th of April, he arrived in the bay of Cadiz, where he was opposed by twelve galleys, of which he sunk two, and forced the others to retire under the castles. He then, though exposed to a dreadful fire from the forts and batteries, burnt one ship of 1500 tons, another of 1200, and thirty-one more from 1000 to 200 tons; besides carrying away four ships laden with provisions, designed for the expedition against England. Drake afterwards demolished several forts on the coast of Spain, without the least molestation from the Spanish admirals, whom he insulted in their harbours. After these exploits, Sir Francis sailed to the Azores, and in his way took the Don Pedro, a carrack of enormous bulk, returning from the East-Indies, richly laden: he not only gained an immense booty, but also found papers on board which served to instruct the English in the nature of the East-Indian commerce.

In 1588, Sir Francis signalized himself in the defence of his country against the Spanish Armada, being appointed vice-admiral under the lord high admiral Howard. And here his good fortune attended him as remarkably as ever; for he made prize of a large galleon, commanded by Don Pedro de Valdez, who yielded on the bare mention of his name. In this vessel he found fifty thousand ducats, which he generously distributed among the seamen and soldiers. It must not, however, be concealed, that through an oversight of his, the lord admiral ran the utmost hazard of being taken by the enemy; for Drake being appointed, the first night of the engagement, to carry lights for the direction of the English fleet, he, being in full pursuit of some hulks belonging to the Hanse Towns, neglected it; which occasioned the lord admiral's following the Spanish lights, and remaining almost in the centre of their fleet till morning. However, Drake's succeeding services sufficiently effaced the memory of this mistake, the greatest execution done on the flying Spaniards being performed by the squadron under his command. The next year Sir Francis commanded, as admiral, the fleet sent to restore Don Antonio, king of Portugal; the command of the land-forces being given to Sir John Norris. But this expedition proved abortive, through the disagreement of the commanders. In 1595 Drake was joined in commission with Sir John Hawkins, and sent with a fleet to distress the Spaniards in the West-Indies. Hawkins dying on the 21st of November, Sir Francis, the next day, made a desperate attack on the shipping in the harbour of Porto Rico. This was performed with all the courage imaginable, but with little advantage to the English, who meeting with a more resolute resistance, and much better fortifications than they expected, were obliged to sheer off. Admiral Drake afterwards burned the towns of Rio de la Hacha, Santa Martha, and Nombre de Dios. Sir Thomas Baskerville, commander of the land forces, then marched with seven hundred and fifty men towards Panama; but returned soon after, finding the design of taking that place absolutely impracticable. This disappointment greatly chagrined Sir Francis Drake: however, he resolved to proceed towards the island of Escondo, and from thence to Porto Bello; but before he could put his designs into execution, he was seized with a bloody flux, which carried him off on the 28th of January, 1595-6, in the fifty-first year of his age. He was buried in the element where he acquired his fame.

Thus ended the life of Sir Francis Drake; one of the most able, active, and courageous seamen, that England ever produced. He was of a low stature, but well-proportioned; and had a cheerful, engaging countenance. As navigation had been his chief study, so he understood it thoroughly, and was a perfect master in every branch of it. His enemies alledged, that he was of an ostentatious temper, self-sufficient, and an immoderate speaker.—But it is acknowledged, that he spoke with much gracefulness, propriety, and eloquence: and it appears that he always encouraged and preferred merit, where-ever he found it, and was affable and easy of access. He was prone to anger, and too fond of flattery; yet he was a steady friend, and extremely generous. His voyage round the world will ever remain an incontestible proof of his courage, fortitude, public spirit, and capacity.

The Life of Michael Drayton.

Drayton (Michael) a poet of great renown

noun in the reigns of Elizabeth, James I. and Charles I. was born at Harthull, in Warwickshire, in the year 1563; and was some time a student in the university of Oxford. His love of poetry discovered itself very early; for at ten years of age, he desired his tutor, that, if he could, he would make him, above all things, a poet. In 1593, he published a collection of pastorals; and upon the accession of king James I. he wrote a congratulatory poem to that prince; though he seems afterwards to have been very little satisfied with the encouragement given by his majesty to the votaries of Apollo, who, he plainly insinuates, were now much less respected than during the Muse-nursing Maiden-reign, as he terms it, of queen Elizabeth. In 1626, we find him styled, before a copy of his own verses, poet-laureat; an appellation, which appears to have been originally given to all eminent poets, and was not confined, as it is at present, to his majesty's servant, known by that title. He wrote, 1. A work entitled Poly-Oibion: 2. The Barons Wars: 3. England's Heroical Epistles: 4. The Battle of Agincourt: 5. The Miseries of Queen Margaret: 6. Nymphidia, or the Court of Faïres, a master-piece in the grotesque kind: 7. The Quest of Cynthia: 8. The Moon Calf; and many other poems. His character among his friends was that of a modest and amiable man. He died in the year 1631, aged sixty-eight, and was buried among the poets in Westminster-abbey, where a monument was erected to his memory, with the following inscription:

Michael Drayton, Esq. a memorable poet of this age, exchanged his laurel for a crown of glory, Anno 1631.

Do, pious marble, let thy readers know
What they, and what their children owe
To Drayton's name; whose sacred dust
We recommend unto thy trust:

Protect his memory, and preserve his story,
Remain a lasting monument of his glory:

And when thy ruins shall disclaim
To be the treasurer of his name;

His name, that cannot fade, shall be
An everlasting monument to thee.

The Life of John Dryden, Esq.

Dryden (John) Esq. an illustrious English poet, was the son of Erasmus Dryden, of Tichmarsh, in Northamptonshire; and was born at Aldwincle, near Oundle, in that county, on the 9th of August, 1631. He was educated in grammar-learning at Westminster-school, under the famous Dr. Busby; and during his continuance at this seminary, he translated the Third Satire of Persius for a Thursday-night's exercise, and wrote a poem on the death of lord Haltings. In 1650, he was elected a scholar of Trinity college in Cambridge, where he prosecuted his studies with great ardour. In 1658, he published Heroic Stanzas on the late lord Protector; and about two years after, his Atiræa Redux, a poem on the Restoration, made its appearance. In 1661, he wrote a panegyric to the king on his coronation. On the 1st of January, 1662, he presented a poem to the lord-chancellor Hyde; and, the same year, published a satire on the Dutch. Some time after appeared his Annus Mirabilis, or the Year of Wonders, an historical poem. In 1668, upon the death of Sir William Davenant, Mr. Dryden was appointed poet-laureat and historiographer to king Charles II. and in the same year he published his Essay on Dramatic Poetry. His first play, entitled The Wild Gallant, was acted at the Theatre Royal in 1669; after which he wrote several other dramatic pieces, which are generally reckoned the most faulty of his works, though some of them are truly excellent, particularly the Spanish Friar, All for Love, and Don Sebastian.

In 1671, Mr. Dryden was publicly ridiculed on the stage, in the duke of Buckingham's celebrated comedy, called the Rehearsal, under the character of Bayes. This character, as we are informed in the Key to the Rehearsal, was originally intended for Sir Robert Howard, under the name of Bilboa: but the representation of the piece being prevented by the breaking out of the plague in 1665, it was laid by for some years, and not exhibited on the stage till 1671; in which interval, Mr. Dryden being advanced to the laurel, the noble author changed the name of his poet from Bilboa to Bayes; and made great alterations in his play, in order to ridicule several dramatic performances that appeared since the first writing of it. Those of Mr. Dryden which fell under his grace's lash, were, the Wild Gallant, Tyrannic Love, the Conquest of Granada, Marriage A-la-Mode, and Love in a Nunnery. Whatever was extravagant in them, or too warmly expressed, or any way unnatural, the duke ridiculed by parody. Mr. Dryden affected to despise the satire levelled at him in the Rehearsal, as appears from his dedication prefixed to the translation of Juvenal and Persius; where, speaking of the many lampoons and libels that had been written against him, he says, "I answered not to the Rehearsal, because I knew the author sat to himself when he drew the picture, and was the very Bayes of his own farce; because I also knew my betters were more concerned than I was in that satire; and lastly, because Mr.

Smith

Smith and Mr. Johnson, the main pillars of it, were two such languishing gentlemen in their conversation, that I could liken them to nothing but their own relations, those noble characters of men of wit and pleasure about town."

In 1679 came out an essay on satire, said to be written jointly by Mr. Dryden and the earl of Mulgrave. This piece, which was handed about in manuscript, contained some very severe reflections on the duchess of Portsmouth and the earl of Rochester: who suspecting Mr. Dryden to be the author, hired three ruffians to cudgel him in a coffee-house. In 1680 was published a translation of Ovid's Epistles into English verse, by several hands; two of which were translated by Mr. Dryden, who also wrote the preface. The year following, our author published his Abraham and Achitophel, in which, with great energy of style and poignancy of satire, he has lashed the duke of Buckingham under the name of Zimri. In the same year, 1681, his Medal, a satire against sedition, made its appearance; and in 1682 came out his Religio Laici, or a Layman's Faith, intended as a defence of revealed religion, and the excellence and authority of the scriptures, as the only rule of faith and manners, against deists, papists, &c.

In 1684, he published a translation of M. Maimbourg's History of the League, which he had undertaken by the command of king Charles II. Upon the death of that prince, he wrote a poem sacred to his memory, entitled Threnodia Augustalis. In the beginning of the reign of James II. our author embraced the Roman catholic religion; and, in 1686, wrote "A Defence of the Papers written by the late King of blessed Memory, and found in his strong Box," in opposition to Dr. Edward Stillingfleet's "Answer to some Papers lately printed, concerning the Authority of the Catholic Church in Matters of Faith, and the Reformation of the Church of England." Upon this, Dr. Stillingfleet wrote a Vindication of his Answer, in which he animadverted, in severe terms, upon Mr. Dryden's change of his religion, as grounded on his indifference to all religion. In the year 1687, Mr. Dryden published his Hind and Panther, in defence of the Romish tenets; which occasioned an admirable piece of ridicule, written by Mr. Charles Montague (afterwards earl of Halifax) and Mr. Matthew Prior, and entitled, "The Hind and Panther transferred to the Story of the Country Mouse and City Mouse." The year following, he published the Life of St. Francis Xavier, translated from the French of Father Dominic Bouhours.

Upon the accession of king William and queen Mary, our author, on account of his newly-chosen religion, was dismissed from the office of poet-laureat, in which he was succeeded by Mr. Thomas Shadwell, against whom he soon after wrote his Mac Flecknoe, one of the severest satires in our language. In 1693, came out a translation of Juvenal, and Perseus; the first, third, sixth, tenth, and sixteenth satires of Juvenal, and Perseus entire, being done by Mr. Dryden, who prefixed a long and ingenious discourse, by way of dedication, to the earl of Dorset. In 1695 he published his prose version of M. Du Fresnoy's Art of Painting, with a preface containing a parallel between painting and poetry; and in 1697 his admirable translation of Virgil's works came out. Besides the original pieces and translations already mentioned, Mr. Dryden wrote many other things, such as prologues, epilogues, epitaphs, songs, &c. His last work was his "Fables, ancient and modern, translated into verse from Homer, Ovid, Boccaccio, and Chaucer." His Ode on St. Cecilia's day is justly esteemed one of the most perfect pieces in any language. It is impossible for a poet to read this without being filled with that sort of enthusiasm which is peculiar to the inspired tribe, and which Dryden largely felt when he composed it. The turn of the verse is noble; the transitions surprising; the language and sentiments just, natural and heightened. We cannot be too lavish in praise of this ode; had Dryden never written any thing besides, his name had been immortal. This great poet died on the first of May, 1701, in the seventieth year of his age, and was interred in Westminster-abbey. He married the lady Elizabeth Howard, daughter of Thomas earl of Berkshire, who survived him eight years; and by whom he had three sons, Charles, John, and Henry. Charles was some time usher of the palace to Pope Clement XI. and wrote several pieces: John was the author of a comedy, entitled, The husband his own Cuckold, printed in 1696: Henry entered into a religious order.

The day after Mr. Dryden's death, Dr. Sprat, then bishop of Rochester and dean of Westminster, sent word to Mr. Dryden's widow, that he would make a present of the ground, and all other abbey-fees for the funeral; lord Halifax likewise sent to the lady Elizabeth, and to Mr. Charles Dryden, offering to defray the expences of our poet's funeral, and afterwards to bestow five hundred pounds on a monument in the abbey: which generous offers were accepted. Accordingly on the Sunday following, the company being assembled, the corpse was put into a velvet hearse, attended by eighteen mourning coaches. When they were just ready to move, lord Jefferies, son of the lord-chancellor Jefferies, with some of his rakish companions, riding by, asked whose funeral it was; and being told it was Mr. Dryden's, protested he should not be buried in that private manner; that he would himself, with the lady Elizabeth's permission, have the honour of the interment, and would bestow a thousand pounds on a monument in the abbey for him. This put a stop to the procession; and lord Jefferies, with several of the gentlemen, who had alighted from their coaches, went up stairs to the lady, who was sick in bed. His lordship repeated what he had said below; but the lady Elizabeth refusing her consent, he fell on his knees, vowing never to rise till his request was granted. The lady, under a sudden surprise, fainted away; and lord Jefferies, pretending to have obtained her consent, ordered the body to be carried to Mr. Russel's, an undertaker in Cheapside, and to be left there till further orders. In the mean time the abbey was lighted up, the ground opened, the choir attending, and the bishop waiting some hours for the corpse to no purpose. The next day, Mr. Charles Dryden waited upon lord Halifax and the bishop, and endeavoured to exculpate his mother by relating the truth: but they would not admit of any excuse. Three days after, the undertaker, having received no orders, waited on lord Jefferies, who turned it off as a jest, pretending that he remembered nothing of the matter, and telling him he might do what he pleased with the body. Upon this, the undertaker waited on the lady Elizabeth, who desired a day's respite to consider what must be done. Mr. Charles Dryden immediately wrote to lord Jefferies, who returned for answer, that he knew nothing of the matter, and would be troubled no more about it. He then applied again to lord Halifax and the bishop of Rochester, who absolutely refused to do any thing in the affair. In this distress, Dr. Garth, who had been Mr. Dryden's intimate friend, sent for the corpse to the college of physicians, and proposed a funeral by subscription; which succeeding, about three weeks after Mr. Dryden's decease, Dr. Garth pronounced a Latin oration over the body, which was conveyed from the college, attended by a numerous train of coaches, to Westminster-abbey. When the funeral was over, Mr. Charles Dryden sent a challenge to lord Jefferies, who refusing to answer it, he sent several others, and went often himself; but could neither get a letter delivered, nor admittance to speak to him; which so incensed him, that, finding his lordship refused to answer him like a gentleman, he resolved to watch an opportunity, and brave him to fight, tho' with all the rules of honour; which his lordship hearing, quitted the town, and Mr. Charles never could meet him afterwards.

“Mr. Dryden (says Congreve) had personal qualities to challenge love and esteem from all who were truly acquainted with him. He was of a nature exceeding humane and compassionate, easily forgiving injuries, and capable of a prompt and sincere reconciliation with those who had offended him. His friendship, where he professed it, went much beyond his professions. As his reading had been very extensive, so was he very happy in a memory tenacious of every thing he had read. He was not more possessed of knowledge than he was communicative of it; but then his communication of it was by no means pedantic, or imposed upon the conversation, but just such, and went so far, as, by the natural turns of the discourse in which he was engaged, it was necessarily prompted or required. He was extremely ready and gentle in the correction of the errors of any writer who thought fit to consult him, and full as ready and patient to admit of the reprehension of others in respect of his own overlooks or mistakes. He was of a very easy, I may say of a very pleasing access: but somewhat slow, and, as it were, diffident, in his advances to others. He had something in his nature that abhorred intrusion into any society whatever; and, indeed, it is to be regretted that he was rather blameable on the other extreme. He was, of all men I ever knew, the most modest, and the most easy to be discountenanced in his approaches, either to his superiors or his equals.—As to his writings, I may venture to say, in general terms, that no man hath written, in our language, so much, and so various matter, and in so various manners, so well. Another thing, I may say, was very peculiar to him; which is, that his parts did not decline with his years, but that he was an improving writer to the last, even to near seventy years of age; improving even in fire and imagination as well as in judgment; witness his Ode on St. Cecilia's Day, and his Fables, his latest performances. He was equally excellent in verse and prose. His prose had all the clearness imaginable, together with all the nobleness of expression, all the graces and ornaments proper and peculiar to it, without deviating into the language or diction of poetry. I have heard him frequently own with pleasure, that, if he had any talent for English prose, it was owing to his having often read the writings of the great archbishop Tillotson. His verification and numbers he could learn of no-body; for he first possessed those talents in perfection in our tongue. In his poems, his diction is, wherever his subject requires it, so sublime, and so truly poetical, that its essence, like that of pure gold, cannot be destroyed. Take his verses, and divest them of their rhimes, disjoint them of their numbers, transpose their expressions, make what arrangement or disposition you please in his words; yet shall there eternally be poetry, and something which will be found incapable of being reduced to absolute prose. What he has done in any one species or distinct kind of writing, would have been sufficient to have acquired him a great name. If he had written nothing but his prefaces, or nothing but his songs and his prologues, each of them would have entitled him to the preference and distinction of excelling in its kind."

Some years after Mr. Dryden's decease, a monument was erected to his memory in Westminster-abbey, by John Sheffield, duke of Buckingham.

Proceedings of the present Sessions of Parliament.

F. (Continued from our last, p. 497.)

February 10.

A Petition of the governors, bailiffs, and commonalty, of the company of conservators of the Great Level of the Fens, and of the several persons whose names are thereunto subscribed, owners of free lands within the Middle and South Levels, part of the said Great Level, was presented to the House, and read: setting forth, that the Great Level of the Fens, called Bedford Level, is a part of that great plain which extends into, and is bounded by, the counties of Northampton, Norfolk, Suffolk, Lincoln, Cambridge and Huntingdon, containing upwards of 300,000 acres; and that the rain and spring waters that fall on and issue out of the greatest part of the above counties, and also from parts of the counties of Buckingham, Hertford, and Essex, together with the downfall on the plain itself, having their course through the same, to the outfalls into the sea at Lynn and Wisbich, did for ages overflow and drown the same, insomuch that no advantage redounded therefrom to mankind, but river fish, water fowl, and reeds; and that, Francis earl of Bedford, after many fruitless attempts by others, actuated by principles of public spirit, did, in the sixth year of king Charles the first, undertake the great and public work of draining the same, as appears by a law of sewers made at a session of sewers held on the 13th day of January, in that year, at King's Lynn in Norfolk; and that, by the same law, the earl and his adventurers, were to receive from the proprietors 95,000 acres, being nearly a third part of the whole, for draining the same, of which 95,000 acres, when drained, 55,000 acres to be adjudged to the earl and his adventurers, as a consideration for having drained the whole, and the residue thereof, being 40,000 acres, were to remain as a fund, from the annual profits of which the works for draining were to be supported and maintained; and that the said earl and his adventurers made a good progress therein, with expence of great and vast sums of money, and so far proceeded as that the greatest part of the said 95,000 acres was divided by twenty lots and shares amongst the said Francis earl of Bedford and his adventurers, and their assigns, and 40,000 acres, part of the said 95,000 acres, set out and specifically allotted the maintenance and preservation of the works; and that, by reason of some interruptions, the works by them made being fallen into decay, so that the intended benefit to the public had been in a great measure prevented, in 1649, William earl of Bedford, his son, and the adventurers, applied to the then parliament sitting at Westminster, who, by an act of that year, setting forth, "that the said Great Level, by reason of frequent overflowing of the rivers Welland, Nene, Grant, Ouse, Brandon, Mildenhall, and Stoke, have been of small and uncertain profit, but (if drained) may be improved and made profitable, and of great advantage to the common wealth, and to the particular owners, commoners, and inhabitants, and be fit to bear coleseed and rapeseed in great abundance, which is of singular use to make soap and oils within this nation, to the advancement of the trade of cloathing and spinning of wool, and much of it will be improved into good pasture for feeding and breeding of cattle, and for tillage to be sown with corn and grain, and for hemp and flax in great quantity, by making all sorts of linen cloth and cordage for shipping within this nation, which will increase manufactures, commerce, and trading at home and abroad, will relieve the poor by setting them on work, and will many other ways redound to the great advantage and strengthening of the nation," thereby gave such powers to the earl of Bedford and his participants, as were necessary for compleating and continuing the said work on the plan of the law of sewers, made at King's Lynn, in the sixth year of his late majesty king

Charles the first, excepting that, by the said act, instead of 40,000 acres being specifically allotted for the maintenance of the works, the whole 95,000 acres were made liable to a tax for the said purpose; and that from the time the land in the said Great Level was adjudged to the adventurers, the said 95,000 acres liable to a perpetual tax for draining, have been called or known by the name of Adventure Land, and the remainder, being double that quantity, and not liable to be taxed for the general works of draining, called the Free Lands; and that both the said Adventure Lands and Free Lands are equally liable to be overflown, lying intermixed, and nearly on the same level; and that, by none of the laws of sewers, or acts of parliament herein stated, hath any tax or toll been laid on the navigation through the said Great Level, for any damage done to the great river banks or other works by horses haling thereon, by means whereof the navigation is in general carried on; and that, by an act passed in the 15th year of king Charles the second, intituled, An act for settling the draining of the Great Level of Fens, called Bedford Level, in part stating the law of sewers made at King's Lynn, in the 6th year of Charles the First, as also the act of 1649, and that William earl of Bedford, son and heir of earl Francis, with divers of his adventurers and participants, had proceeded in the compleating and finishing of the said works, but that the same could not be preserved without constant care, great charge, and orderly government; it was therefore (amongst other things) enacted, that the said William earl of Bedford, and the adventurers and participants of the said earl Francis and earl William, their heirs and assigns, should be a body politic and corporate in deed and name, and have succession for ever, by the name of the governor, bailiffs, and commonalty, of the company of conservators of the Great Level of the Fens; and the governor, bailiffs, and conservators of the said corporation, were thereby empowered to lay taxes on the 95,000 acres (12,000 acres whereof had been designed and intended for his late majesty king Charles the first, and had been set forth and allotted by bounds in fealty) for the support, maintenance, and preservation of the said Great Level, and to levy the same with penalties for non-payment, and do all other things in order to the support, maintenance, and preservation of the said Great Level, and works, made, and to be made, in such manner as therein is mentioned; and the said governor, bailiffs, and conservators, were thereby enabled and empowered to use and exercise the power and authority of commissioners of sewers within the said Great Level of the Fens, and of the works made, or to be made, without the said Great Level, for conveying the waters of the said Great Level by convenient out-falls to the sea; and the said corporation was thereby empowered, from time to time, to erect new works, within or without the said Great Level for conveying the waters thereof by convenient out-falls to the sea; and that, by another act made in the 20th year of the said king, intituled, An act for taxing and assessing of the land of the adventurers, within the Great Level of the Fens, it was enacted, that 83,000 acres, parcel of the said 95,000 acres, should, from time to time, be taxed and assessed by a gradual acre tax of different sorts and values of land; and to the end that the said 83,000 acres might be more equally taxed by a gradual acre tax, certain persons in the said act named were appointed surveyors and valuers of the said 83,000 acres, and were within a time limited by the said act to digest the said 83,000 acres, into a number of sorts and degrees not under the number of seven sorts and degrees, and to rate and tax such degrees, and digest the same into schedules in writing, and make returns thereof upon their oaths into the then Fen Office, in such manner, as by the said act was prescribed; and the said 12,000 acres, residue of the said 95,000 acres, were to be rated and taxed by a medium of the tax at which the said 83,000 acres were taxed; and that, in pursuance of the said act, the said 83,000 acres were valued and set out into eleven sorts or degrees of land, to be rated and taxed in manner following, that is to say, for a single tax four pence per acre on the first sort of land, eight-pence per acre on the second sort, and so increasing four-pence upon every sort, the eleventh sort to be taxed at 3s. 8d. per acre, which valuations were returned into the Fen-Office, as by the said last-mentioned act was directed, and the said 83,000 acres have always since been taxed by a gradual acre tax, according to the degrees and proportions thereby set out and allotted, and the said 12,000 acres at a medium of such tax; and that, at a court of the said corporation, held the 10th day of March, 1697, the said corporation declared, that the said Great Level should be distinguished by the several names of the North Level, Middle Level, and South Level; and that all that part of the said 95,000 acres that lies on the north side of Moreton's Leame, and south side of Welland's River, should be accounted that part of the the 95,000 acres lying within the North Level; and all that part of the said 95,000 acres that lies on the north side of Old Bedford River, and the south side of Moreton's Leame, was that part of the 95,000 acres belonging to the Middle Level; and that all part of the said 95,000 acres that lies on the south side of Old Bedford River, was that part of the said 95,000 acres belonging to the South Level, and that, by an act passed in the twenty-seventh year of his late majesty king George the second, intituled, An act for discharging the corporation of the governor, bailiffs, and commonalty, of the company of conservators of the Great Level of the Fens, commonly called Bedford Level, from a debt due to the duke of Bedford and earl of Lincoln; and for enabling the proprietors of lands in the North Level, part of the said Great Level, to raise money to discharge the proportion of the said North Level in the debts of the said corporation, and for ascertaining and appropriating the taxes to be laid on the said North Level, and for the more effectual draining and preserving the said North Level, and divers lands adjoining thereto, in the manor of Crowland; it was (amongst other things) enacted, that the said North Level, and the revenues thereof, should be freed and discharged from all debts then owing by the said corporation (except the sum of 1800*l.* for the raising of which, provision was made by the said act) and that the said North Level, or the revenues thereof, should not be liable to the payment of any debts which should at any time thereafter be contracted or borrowed by the said corporation, for, or on account of the said Middle and South Levels, or either of them, and that the said Middle and South Levels, or either of them, or the revenues thereof, should not be liable to the payment of any debt borrowed by the said corporation, for or upon account of the said North Level; and that, under the said acts, and the powers thereby given, the governor, bailiffs, and conservators, have laid out great sums of money, arising from taxes imposed on, and raised by, the owners of adventure lands; and that, in the progress of such taxation, some of the adventure lands have been so high taxed, in proportion to their values, that the owners have, at times, abandoned the same, thinking it more for the interest to give up all property therein, than to retain the same by payment of the taxes, insomuch that nearly one sixth part of the whole hath been, at different times, abandoned, and no taxes paid for the same, to the great loss of the adventurers; and that, from this cause, the decrease of the value of money, the increase of the value of labour, and materials necessary for carrying on and supporting their works, and from other causes, they have been obliged, for the maintenance and support of the works of draining, besides the taxes so expended, to contract a considerable debt; and that, from the late improvements in agriculture in the inland counties, and those which surround the Great Level, the downfall is conveyed to the several brooks in the highlands, which communicate with the rivers; and that, by the great number of new turnpike roads in the said counties, and the amendments of the highways in general, great quantities of water are conveyed into the rivers, the greatest part of which waters before stagnated where they fell, and partly carried off by the sun and winds, and partly soaked into the earth, but are now conveyed, and have their course through the Great Level to sea; and that the commerce on the rivers running through the Great Level is of late years greatly increased; and that the burden of the barges and lighters, navigating through the same, as also the horses haling the said barges and lighters, are increased in their number and size, by means whereof, the banks on which they hale, containing upwards of one hundred miles in length, are trod down and greatly damaged, for which no compensation is, or ever hath been made for more than a century, to the governor, bailiffs, and conservators; and that numbers of large engines or mills have, within the last thirty years, been erected for throwing the waters of the fens into the rivers, which, throwing great quantities of the moor which comes into the mill drains dissolved by the water, as well as the said water, into the rivers, hath occasioned the beds of the said rivers to grow up, and hath much decreased the depth of the same; and that there have, within these few years, been made two new navigations, one from Thrapton to Northampton, by widening and deepening the Nene, the other from Biggleswade into the Ouse, through the river Ivel, and by means of the said navigations, the floods are greater in quantity, more rapid in their progress to the Great Level, and raise the waters therein to a greater height than was formerly known; and that, from the causes above stated, and others, the works already made are now insufficient for carrying the waters through and off the Great Level; and that the same is continually liable to be overflowed, and the great river banks in general want deepening, repairing, heightening, and strengthening, and will, from time to time, require great sums for the continuing them in a proper state to preserve the Great Level from being overflowed, as also to furnish proper haling ways for the navigators through the said rivers, and other considerable works are still wanting for the preservation of the same; and that the petitioners apprehend that the loss of the great river banks, and in consequence the loss of the whole Level, will be attended, in a great measure, with the loss of the navigation through the same, from the ports of King's Lynn in Wisbich, into Northamptonshire, Bedfordshire, Cambridgeshire, Huntingdonshire, Norfolk, and Suffolk, inasmuch that the expence of carrying on the same, after such melancholy event shall have happened, will, from the hazard and difficulty thereof, raise the price of goods and merchandize carried into the inland counties to a much greater height than any toll that may be now laid for the preservation of the same can do, and also be attended with a total loss of all their great and important national objects particularized in the preamble above set forth to the act of 1649, many of which are the great sources of commerce to those who at present carry on the said navigation, for that, when the said banks are destroyed, all the haling ways will be lost, and the water flowing at large over the whole level will cause the beds of the rivers, for want of a proper scower, in a great measure to grow up; and, not being restrained, take from the ports of Lynn and Wisbech that back water, by the restraint of which within its banks, and the velocity thereby given it, these several harbours are kept open and preserved to the degree they at present are; and that, if all the works of the said Great Level should be suffered to go to a total decay, four times the sum which will now preserve it will scarcely be sufficient to recover the same; and that the petitioners, having exerted every means in their power for the preservation of the said Level, and finding it impossible to proceed therein, did publickly advertise a meeting of the country at Ely, to take into consideration the distressed state of the said Levels, arising from the causes and facts herein by the petitioners stated; and that, in consequence thereof, a meeting was held at the Shire Hall in Ely, the 3d day of November, 1774, and several subsequent meetings have been since had, pursuant to publick advertisements, as well at the Fen Office in the Inner Temple, London, as at the Shire Hall in Ely aforesaid, for that purpose; and it hath at such meetings been deemed expedient and necessary, that application should be made to parliament, for imposing a temporary tax, to be continued for seven years, on the free lands within the said Middle and South Levels; and also for a further tax, for the like time, on such parts of the said 95,000 acres of adventurers lands as lie within the said Middle and South Levels; and likewise for imposing and collecting tolls, or tonage, on goods which shall be navigated in the said levels, in order, by those means, to raise necessary additional funds, as well for preserving and improving the drainage, as the navigations of the said levels; and therefore praying, that leave may be given to bring in a bill, for preserving the drainage of the Middle and South Levels, and the several navigations through the same; and for imposing taxes on the lands within the said levels, and laying tolls on goods conveyed by the said navigations, in order to raise further necessary funds for that purpose."

Order of the day; 'the second reading of the bill to empower his majesty to secure and detain persons charged with, or suspected of, the crime of high treason, committed in America, or on the high seas, or the crime of piracy.

John Johnstone, Esq; said, this measure would increase the animosity between the two countries of Great Britain and America. The confinements, commitments, massacres, and the whole train of consequences which would arise from such a system of punishment, revenge, and retaliation, probably on both sides of the Atlantic; he said, filled his mind with horror and anxiety: add to this, the total suspension of all the functions of the constitution, seemingly pro tempore, and for particular purposes; but which, by the same influence, might be extended to any duration, and directed to any purpose, gave a complexion to the whole, of the most dark, despotic, arbitrary, cruel, and diabolical colour. By the present bill, no man, he contended, would be exempt, however innocent, peaceable, dutiful, and loyal, from being sacrificed at the shrine of the bloody ministerial mandate; whether in America or Britain, it was all the same; whether guilty, or not guilty, he lay not only at the mercy of his private enemies, but of every tool in office, from the highest to the lowest. The wide circuit of the human mind was not more various and extensive than man's suspicions, nor more numerous than the motives which provoke him to public oppression and private ill. Bad, however, as the bill was, and big with mischief, he would rest contented in some measure, if ministers would pledge themselves for the due performance of what the title and preamble of the bill seemed obviously to import.

LETTER II.

EBENEZER Phill to Jonadab Travers, sendeth greeting.—The people of this country are fond of strangers, and like the Athenian men of old, spend their time in hearing and telling news,—therefore, John Carrack, whose house I live at,—had no sooner informed his acquaintance of my arrival in the Calcutta India ship,—than numbers daily flocked in to see me, to discourse with me, and to inform themselves of the policy of our country—of our trade, and manners.—Some of these men seemed warmed with my answers, and sighed for the same customs—wishing, they were established among them,—others I could perceive treated me as a fool, and contemned our laws and our adherence to the Christian Faith, and our forefathers ordinances.—All have invited me to their houses, where I perceive I am more for the entertainment of their friends curiosity, than for hospitality,—another powerful motive urges them to it—fashion—which word allow me to explain to thee now, my most excellent friend.

Know then, I led thee quite astray concerning it, in my former epistle—for the meaning of it is as follows:—any mode however strange, ridiculous, or wicked, which has met with the countenance of a few men, or women, in high life, constitutes a fashion, and is imitated, and pursued by every person in the kingdom, although entirely contrary to the foregoing fashion—or quite improper for the generality of people—the great ones take up these changes in their dress, from the lowest, and most despicable orders of either sex, the men from the effeminate or dishonest, the women from unhappy wretches, who publicly make a profession of prostitution—nay, O Jonadab! pluck thy garment in the street, and loudly solicit thee to uncleanness, yet females of the highest rank habit themselves conformable to these poor abandoned prostitutes,—exposing their necks and breasts, and shewing a great deal of their legs—their heads are swelled to an huge size with hair and wool, over which they comb their own natural hair, to the height of near a cubit—and I dare affirm the breadth at top is as great—on this hair they rub a quantity of fat and wax mixed—on which they shake meal of rice, or wheat, beside they stick great numbers of iron pins therein to keep up the pile—over this nauseous composition, they place a flat piece of fine linen strained on wires—fine as the spiders web, which can neither shade from the sun—or protect the head from cold—and on this they heap the representations of flowers and roots—also feathers of a cubit and an half in height—So that you perceive a pretty little face appear, towards the middle of a figure thus composed—which neither possesses proportion or symmetry—but fashion is not thus confined alone to dress, gaming is fashionable,—loving pictures and musick is fashionable—keeping prostitutes is fashionable—and horrid to relate, adultery is fashionable—a love of foreigners, and a pretended relish for the enquiry after foreign manners, and customs, is also fashionable.—Thus it is, O my friend, that thy Ebenezer getteth admittance into all houses, let the motive be what it may, I glory in the opportunity, as it enables me to remark these people—to benefit by their examples,—whether in pursuing certain virtues or shunning numberless vices.—I often think how happy our father's shipwreck proved, which saved him from more fearful dangers in his native country—but I get away from my subject.—I told thee, Jonadab, news engrosses much of the time and thoughts of these people—and so it does—for you are always accosted by them, with a demand of what news to-day—and to make this so much sought an article, general, they have printers—who daily print it,—and disperse papers filled with it;—but this last mentioned set of men do not confine themselves to truth—and although frequently detected—still find people credulous enough to believe their most out of the way reports,—the men here frequently wager about this or that piece of intelligence—Now to wager, or as it is sometimes called, to lay bets—two men agree—that one of them shall pay to the other a certain stipulated sum of money if such a piece of news is true, the other agrees to pay a like sum, if the intelligence turns out false, large sums are thus lavished, and prove the adventurers, knaves, or fools. News and gaming hand in hand, possess the royal Exchange, the place where the business of this large city, and opulent country is chiefly transacted—for here they make good news one day, and evil news another, concerning events which have never happened, and by that means raise or lower the value of certain sums, due of government and certain company to various people, called funds and stocks—Newspapers also contain abuse of certain good characters, and eulogiums on as undeserving—however it has happened they have told truth sometimes—but very seldom—thou mayest likewise find an account of the several things different traders have to sell, and a wondrous deal of medicines which cure all diseases, nevertheless people die very fast here.—In this city likewise there are houses, where coffee, tea, sometimes meat and

and various wines are sold, called coffee-houses, in these there is no other topic but news—here according to caprice or interest the states of all the world are altered—the jurisdiction of one applauded, another condemned—whispers between the closest connexions perfectly known and divulged.—The most secret springs of government laid open for the inspection of the most vulgar eye—thou must perceive what folly here is, nay madness—for the person who thus relates these secrets, or thus reverses all—is perhaps, scarce able to purchase one cup of coffee—or probably is a person, a bankrupt in consequence of mismanaging his own trifling circumstances,—who thus undertakes the guidance of the most diffusive interests,—he is perhaps some moneyed citizen—who to allow the greatest scope of mental acquirements, understands his own trade or profession—ignorant of the most trifling article besides, except what he gleans from a news-paper, or the confused seditious harangues of aldermen and city officers,—without judgment to chuse the good from the bad, or candour to do it if capable;—over-run with avarice and pride—perhaps he is some young fellow of the town, ignorant of every thing that could render him useful to society,—and nothing to prove his being a man, but the practice of vices confined to humanity; or perhaps he is a person who is base enough to commit any crime for pay,—but disappointed by some courtier of the place he sought;—thus states the characters of men, and strives to introduce confusion, suspicion and violence into his country.—Now, O Jonadab, thou perceivest what some characters are here, but I must make thee more acquainted with them—and introduce thee to new.—The time I can afford myself before I go to rest at night—after viewing the sights of curiosity here by day, I dedicate to thee,—and thus write a paper for thy information, intending to send as many as I can have ready to thee upon the departure of the next ships to India.—Fare thee well.

LETTER III.

EBENEZER Phill to Jonadab Travers, greeting.—The trade and luxury of this people, would surprize thee.—As I have been here some time, and experienced the readiness of mankind to impose lies on each other,—I begin to fear letting thee know of it—lest thou doubt my truth—the value of the goods imported and exported is almost incredible, and the profits high; yet the luxury, unbounded luxury of the people is such, that what might be esteemed a large sum, is considered here as but hardly supplying the necessaries of life.—Hence arises a shocking inconvenience, that disinterestedness is banished, and a man must be paid to do his duty, or a virtuous action—vain-glory is subservient to wealth;—wealth alone is considered as the only motive or principle of actions; thus the reason—if I act not in this manner, I shall lose my place—I need go no farther—I cannot be compelled—what necessity is there for giving myself any trouble about it—I could do it to be sure, but my office does not require it; however give a fee (a bribe more properly) and I will see what can be done for you.—Thus a man in business, or office, reasons with a fellow subject, and countryman in distress, perhaps, soliciting as a favour what he has a right to demand; if morality had footing in England—but from their cradle, O Jonadab, they are trained up very badly.—A man in business does not care how his offspring are educated, provided, they are not expensive to him, and that they are taught to be what he calls sensible, but what I esteem cunning and over-reaching, capable of seeing an advantage, and hardened to seize it.—Their infancy is but little attended to; the mother brings them forth—and immediately they are delivered to a strange woman to nurse—who is only solicitous for the wages agreed to be paid her; careless about every other circumstance—of the health, or nutriment of her charge—when weaned from the breast—or brought home—for the children are suffered to go sometimes to the nurses habitation, it is sent into an upper apartment of the father's dwelling, and there resigned to the management of a silly, careless girl,—unless by an exertion of attendance, the maid teaches it some unseemly actions, or when it begins to prattle, teaches it some filthy words—nay cursing and swearing—the parents then notice it—and have it more with them, for they say it is pure company—all their acquaintance and neighbours applaud its readiness to learn, and its sense in applying this abominable speech to different subjects and conversations—it is daily more grounded in this horrid education—and every one takes pride in administering to the poor babe's unhappy knowledge; but grown older—the parents watch what ideas of property it exhibits—and if—unfortunately for the child's quiet—it shews a generous, and disinterested conduct, with respect to its food and playthings, sharing with others—it is continually branded with the epithets of fool and dolt—but if peevish, crabbed, and tenacious, then the sense of the child becomes the topic of the parent's whole circle of acquaintance,—and they pride themselves on the prospect of their child, one day becoming a rich wise man;—when older, he is sent to school, and

and there learns to spell, read, write, and to keep accounts, there is little care taken to inform him of the duties of religion; he is taught the ceremonious part, and perhaps his catechism—but no more—he lives, probably during his existence here, ignorant of the attributes of God—the truly spiritual part, is totally neglected,—so that to use an expression of their own, he conforms to this or that Church;—for numberless almost are the sects here, but more of that in a future letter.—If taught the dead languages of Greece and Rome's former inhabitants, he bids fair, of being minutely instructed in their Pagan Mythology, and manners totally contrary to the Christian Faith; were I to write these my opinions for the perusal of the people of this country, they would all attack me, for attempting to destroy the taste of the nation. For a well-bred man here, shall run into lavish praises of an Heathen Philosopher's most cruel reverie, and never mention the least encomium on the great volume of wisdom, purity, and truth. Such is their understanding and polite reading.—But suppose our youth intended for business; he is taken from school the minute he can write tolerably, and initiated into some particular business, as the inclinations of the parents point: here he learns to make the most of every article he possesses, and not to dispose of them according to a conscientious profit; but according to the demand, be the market ever so high. Thus, destitute of the glimmering morality of the Heathens, and the true morality of Christians, should he turn out idle, through ignorance, and want of an enlarged mode of thinking, he becomes the most dissolute, despicable wretch the earth can bear, until the gallows end this infamy; and, if not earlier put an end to, by inflammatory liquors, and the impure intercourse of prostitutes.—Should he thus uninformed, turn out careful, he amasses, he knows not why, sums on sums,—equally ignorant and selfish, he despises every man, unincumbered with wealth, and envies every man, who approaches his bulk in money; fearless he indulges every passion that assails him, provided, it does not intrude on, or hurt his schemes of heaping up riches; he boasts of abstaining from such and such vices, for which he has no relish, or from which his penury turns him, he fears to eat, to drink, or to bestow, and falls at length desponding and lamented. Yet amidst this defection from morality, good and truly respectable men, shine forth, doubly bright by the infamous and gross darkness which surrounds. There are men who with true frugality manage their affairs, not ignorant of the finest sensations of generosity and compassion, whose purses are open to the necessitous and distressed; but shut to extravagance, vain pomp and luxury.—Noble creatures truly, who resist the torrent of irreligion, vice and disorder, which seems to have broken in on this country.

Hib. Mag. August, 1777.

Some characters have appeared here, that under the shew of the most sordid penury, have borne the most extensive liberal souls, and virtues; which remained hid from mankind, so obscure, scarce to be supposed known to the possessors. For instance, a man possessed of vast sums, which in the course of many years, he had collected honestly by trade, retired to a mean and cheap lodging. Here he confined himself, and suffered his money to increase by accumulating interest, his diet corresponding with the place of his residence, barely sufficed the immediate calls of nature: He became the object of contempt of such as heard of him. He heard unmoved the shafts of ignorant malice fall beside him,—he remained indifferent.—At length summoned by his Creator, the disposition of his effects here, partly announced to the world—what account he could give at the great tribunal of justice, how he had negotiated his talent;—he left his entire savings (for which he debared himself of every comfort) to pour oil and wine, and joy, into the bleeding wounds, of his distressed fellow travellers through this world:—and endowed his hospital with a princely revenue, to support his humane intention, to the latest times.

To the Editor of the Hibernian Magazine.

S I R,

AS I have been in most parts of Great Britain and Ireland, I think myself qualified to correct a mistake in the computation of the number of houses in the different cities in Ireland, as published in Mr. Watson's Almanack. Mr. Watson makes the number of houses in Dublin, to be in 1767, 13,194, since which time, if 806 houses were built, the number at present is 14,000. In London and suburbs, it is computed there were 146,000 houses in 1776: whereas Dublin is at least one fourth as populous, and stands on more than one-third as much ground, as appears by a survey made a few years ago. Bristol, by the lowest computation, contains 10,300 houses, some say 13,200; and it is said only to be one-third as large as Dublin. The number of houses in Dublin, must therefore certainly exceed 30,000. Cork and Waterford is by Mr. Watson, said to decrease considerably from 1751 to 1767,

when 'tis well known they have encreased in that time; Kilkenny is said to contain more houses than Waterford; the contrary is well known. Belfast is said to contain 5295 houses, which are almost as many as in Limerick and Waterford, either of which exceeds it in size and number of inhabitants; perhaps he means 2595, which is more likely; or perhaps by Belfast is meant the barony of Belfast, which contains several other parishes and villages. Were I to risque a conjecture from a perfect knowledge of all those towns, I should imagine the city of Dublin to contain between 30,000, and 35,000 houses, Cork above 9000, Limerick nearly 4000, Waterford about 2,800, Belfast 2,600, and Kilkenny 2,200 houses. If you would insert the above observations in your Magazine, you'd much oblige a correspondent, and perhaps Mr. Watson would inform the public, from what authority he has the computation inserted in his Almanack.

ST. Luke's Parish is S. W. of St. Catherine's. The Church is situated at a pretty considerable distance from the street, from which there is a long walk planted with trees at each side; opposite the gate is situated the Weaver's Hall, the handfomest Corporation Hall in Dublin, over the entrance of the Hall, is a full length gilt statue of his late majesty, and adjoining is the weaver's alms house, for reduced weavers.

The parish church of St. Nicholas Without adjoins St. Patrick's church, and is reckoned part of the building. The parish is moderately large, and the streets of it not very elegant, being inhabited by the lower class.

St. Nicholas's Parish Within is the smallest in Dublin, scarce containing 100 houses, and being hardly the 40th part of the size of St. Catherine's. The church however is pretty large, with a tolerable steeple. Adjoining the parish church is the tholsel or town house, where the city courts are held: 'tis a large stone building, over the principal entrance are two full length statues of stone.

St. Michael's parish joins St. Nicholas's Within and St. Audeon's, and is likewise a small parish, as are most in this part, viz. the centre of the city, the church is large, with a pretty good steeple.

St. Werburgh's parish is moderately large. The church is the most elegant in the kingdom on the outside, having a most beautiful front of hewn stone, and a high steeple, on which in 1770, a fine spire like that of St. Mary le Bow in London, was erected. The castle adjoins this parish, but is of itself a fort of a parish, having a church or chapel of its own, and being exempt from the civil jurisdiction of the city. 'Twas anciently a place of strength moated and flanked with towers, but the ditch was long since filled up, and all the towers taken down but two; at present it consists of two modern courts. The upper court or palace of the lord lieutenant, is a large oblong square, built on all sides in an elegant manner of brick, and far exceeding either St. James's or Kensington palaces. Over the principal gate is a full length statue of justice in white stone, and over the old gate an ancient warrior in armour, with a lion at his feet, a handsome clock and cupola on the building between the two gates adds greatly to the beauty of the square. The apartments in the castle are very elegant. The chapel which on Sundays is as full of people as a parish church, is a handsome tho' old building; all the seats are lined with crimson. In the lower court is the treasury office, the king's foundery, work shops, guard houses, stables, &c. and an arsenal, and small armoury for 40,000 men. A guard of 100 men, and the lord lieutenant's body guard, do constant duty at the castle.

The new Exchange now building, is situated outside the castle gate at the head of the chief street leading to Essex-bridge: This building is now nearly finished, and promises to be one of the greatest ornaments to the city. 'Tis almost square, extending 120 feet in front, and reaching 80 feet back, being built entirely of Portland stone, in the highest taste, the dome, which is covered with copper, is decorated with twelve fluted semi columns of the Corinthian order. 49,000*l.* is said to have been already expended on this building.

St. John's parish is situated N. of St. Werburgh's between that parish and the river. 'Tis but a small parish. The church in Fishamble-street was finished in 1773, is moderately large, the inside work is very neat, of oak; the front is of hewn stone, very elegant, but without a steeple, at the other side of a narrow lane called John's-lane, is a small protestant chapel called St. Mary's chapel, which joins Christ Church.

In Christ Church-lane, near this church, is situated the four courts of justice, which are not remarkable for the elegance of the architecture.

St. Andrew's parish is E. of St. Werburgh's. 'Tis very large, inhabited by gentry, and principal traders. The church is built of brick in a circular or amphitheatrical form, whence it is usually called the the round church. The parliament house is in this parish, 'tis a noble pile of building, adorned with a grand arcade of Ionic columns: 'Twas ten years in building and cost 40,000*l*. The house of lords is a large elegant room with a grand throne for the lord lieutenant. The house of commons is much larger, of an octangular form: The manner in which the whole is lighted, is by all admired.

The street in which the parliament house is situated is called College-green, and is of a triangular form, the college forming one side of the triangle, in the midst is an equestrian statue of king William the third, inclosed by iron palisades.

The college is deservedly esteemed the finest building in Dublin, and except the barrack is the largest. It consists of four square courts; one side of the first square forms the front, which appears from the street, and is one of the finest buildings in Europe, extending about 300 feet, being 4 stories high and 23 windows broad, and ornamented with many Corinthian semicolumns. The whole entirely of Portland stone, which is next to marble for beauty and durability. The chapel is in the middle of the second square, 'tis adorned with a fine dome in which is the largest bell in Ireland, and a cupola. The library is the largest and handsomest of the kind in Europe, 'tis three stories high, and forms one side of the largest square. It contains many thousand volumes and 19 marble busts. There is in the college a very fine collection of wax work, but the other curiosities are inconsiderable. The Provost's house adjoining the college is a handsome hewn stone building. In this college 7 senior and 13 junior fellows, and 70 scholars of the house are maintained on the foundation: exclusive of those there are at present, about 500 students in the college.

To the eastward of this college is a fine park, with gravel walks planted on each side, and a bowling green for the amusement of the scholars. The park is greatly frequented as a public walk. The fellows have a garden elegantly laid out, into which no students (fellow commoners and masters excepted) are admitted.

In the parish of St. Andrew's in William-street, the society of artists have a large circular room, in which the beginning of every summer is an exhibition of paintings and drawings by the best Irish artists.

The parish of St. Mark's is east of St. Andrew's, being the most eastern parish in Dublin: 'Tis large, and inhabited mostly by the lower class of people. The church was built in 1757; 'tis a plain building with a small steeple. In this parish is a very fine building called the hospital for incurables, and a school for the boarding and education of 200 children of sailors, who are brought up to the sea. The building cost 6000*l*.

Characters of eminent Personages; written by the late Earl of Chesterfield.

LORD HARDWICKE.

LORD Hardwicke was perhaps the greatest magistrate that this country ever had. He presided in the court of Chancery above twenty years, and in all that time none of his decrees were reversed, nor the justness of them ever questioned. Though avarice was his ruling passion, he was never in the least suspected of any kind of corruption—a rare and meritorious instance of virtue and self-denial, under the influence of such a craving, insatiable, and increasing passion!

He had great and clear parts; understood, loved, and cultivated the Belles Lettres.

He was an agreeable, eloquent speaker in parliament, but not without some little tincture of the pleader.

Men are apt to mistake, or at least to seem to mistake their own talents, in hopes perhaps of misleading others to allow them that which they are conscious they do not possess. Thus lord Hardwicke valued himself more upon being a great minister of state, which he certainly was not, than upon being a great magistrate, which he certainly was.

All his notions were clear, but none of them great. Good order and domestic details were his proper department. The great and shining parts of government, though not above his parts to conceive, were above his timidity to undertake.

By great and lucrative employments, during the course of thirty years, and by still greater parsimony, he acquired an immense fortune, and established his numerous family in profitable posts and advantageous alliances.

Though he had been solicitor and attorney general, he was by no means what is called a prerogative lawyer—he loved the constitution, and maintained the just prerogative of the crown, but without stretching it to the oppression of the people.

He was naturally humane, moderate, and decent, and when by his former employments he was obliged to prosecute malefactors, he discharged that duty in a very different manner from most of his predecessors, who were too justly called the blood-hounds of the crown.

He was a cheerful and instructive companion, humane in his nature, decent in his manners, unstained with any vice (avarice excepted) a very great magistrate, but by no means a great minister.

Review of the Character of Lord Hardwicke.

THE elegant sketch of lord Hardwicke's character by Chesterfield is so just, that little can be added to it. But, though the out-line is well drawn, the resemblance may be heightened by re-touching some of the features.

When lord Raymond chief justice of the King's Bench died, and Sir Peter King the chancellor retired, the minister was apprehensive of a dispute which might probably arise from the pretensions of the two great officers of state, Sir Philip Yorke the attorney general, and Mr. Talbot the solicitor. The latter was supposed to be much more conversant with chancery-business than common law. The claims of Yorke were allowed to be superior on account of his place. The compromise was made to the satisfaction of both parties. Sir Philip accepted the post of chief justice of the King's Bench, with an advanced income; and the amiable Mr. Talbot had the seals given to him. On the death of the latter, Hardwicke had the honour to preside on the same day in the supreme courts of law and equity.

Lord Hardwicke was an agreeable and persuasive speaker; his matter was weighty, and he delivered it with an air of dignity. His manner however, was not striking, nor had he the skill to move the passions. Lord Chesterfield has observed, that he never could totally divest himself of the pleader. This is a defect incident to the gentlemen bred to the bar; a defect which too generally increases in proportion to the pleader's eminence. They acquire a formality in the courts of law, which they never can shake off in the senate.

Hardwicke's avarice subjected him to much obloquy: his general parsimony, and the mean economy of his table even on days of festivity, procured him the vulgar appellation of Judge Gripus.

The marriage act was a thing of his own creating, and which he espoused with all his might and vigour: it met with great opposition in the House of Commons, and was thought, by all impartial people, a very improper law in a commercial country, where all possible methods should be taken to encourage a legal commerce between the sexes. However, by his great power and influence, the chancellor carried this bill triumphantly through both houses. Those who pretended to know his real intentions gave out, that in the prosecution of this business, he had nothing so much at heart as the securing his own children from rash and imprudent marriages.

He was eminently distinguished for his professional abilities; he discharged the two great offices of chief justice and chancellor with universal approbation. In politics, he was cautious, timid, and indeed utterly deficient; averse to vigorous measures, he wished for peace at all events. It is said, that he was weak enough to apprehend an invasion from the French in flat-bottomed boats.

He was for spinning out business by negotiation and treaty, and in this too he was unskillful and unexperienced.

Some time after he was obliged to resign the seals, he went to court, to pay his duty to the king; but he was dressed so very plainly, and so much like a country gentleman, that his majesty conversed with him a few minutes without knowing him. But the moment the king discovered his mistake, he caressed him in a manner very unusual to one of his disposition.

Mr. F O X.

MR. Henry Fox was a younger brother of the lowest extraction. His father, Sir Stephen Fox, made a considerable fortune, some how or other, and left him a fair younger brother's portion, which he soon spent in the common vices of youth, gaming included. This obliged him to travel for some time. While abroad, he met with a very salacious Englishwoman, whose liberality retrieved his fortune, with several circumstances, more to the honour of his vigour than his morals.

When he returned, though by education a Jacobite, he attached himself to Sir Robert Walpole, and was one of his ablest elevés. He had no fixed principles either of religion or morality, and was too unwary in ridiculing and exploding them.

He had very great abilities and indefatigable industry in business, great skill in managing, that is, in corrupting, the House of Commons, and a wonderful dexterity in attaching individuals to himself. He promoted, encouraged, and praised their vices; he gratified their avarice, or supplied their profusion. He wisely and punctually performed whatever be promised, and most liberally rewarded their attachment and dependance. By these and all other means that can be imagined, he made himself many personal friends and political dependants.

He was a most disagreeable speaker in parliament, inelegant in his language, hesitating and ungraceful in his elocution, but skilful in discerning the temper of the house, and in knowing when and how to press or to yield.

A constant good humour and seeming frankness made him a welcome companion in social life, and in all domestic relations he was good-natured.

As he advanced in life, his ambition became subservient to his avarice. His early profusion and dissipation had made him feel the many inconveniencies of want, and, as it often happens, carried him to the contrary and worse extreme of corruption and rapine. Rem, quocunque modo rem became his maxim, which he observed (I will not say religiously and scrupulously) but invariably and shamefully.

He had not the least notion of, or regard for, the public good or the constitution, but despised those cares, as the objects of narrow minds, or the pretences of interested one. And he lived, as Brutus died, calling virtue only a name.

Review of the Character of Mr. Fox.

THE noble characterizer has been convicted, by his honest editor, of a gross error, relative to the family of Mr. Fox. So palpable a mistake, where the means of information were open and obvious, is scarce excusable, and borders upon the propagation of falshood.

Mr. Fox, by marrying into the noble family of Lenox, enriched the blood of his descendants, without enlarging their fortune.

The early part of this gentleman's life was spent in pleasure and dissipation; and this, I suppose, is common enough to men who enjoy sound health with strong passions.

When he applied to business, he proved himself equal to any employment. He studied his great master Walpole with success; drew from what was useful in his ministerial capacity; and copied him in the joyous part of his character, which best suited his future views of gaining friends. He softened the broad staring mirth and licentious festivity of Walpole into a conviviality more agreeable, into wit more relishing, and gaiety more palatable.

With Chesterfield we must own, that

Fox was not a graceful speaker*, though an acute and discerning manager of a debate; and this is that part of oratory, and no more, which, Clarendon tells us, distinguished the senatorial abilities of the great Hampden. He had the skill and patience to watch his time when to carry his point, and to lead the house into his opinions. He had the courage, when detected in acting with impropriety, to disengage himself without much embarrassment.

George the second had often experienced his abilities, as well as a constant and ready submission to his will. In a very critical time, he trusted to him the management of his business in the House of Commons. Fox was so far intoxicated with royal favour, that his natural caution forsook him; he sent cards to the members of parliament, importing, that the king had trusted to his care the management of the House of Commons.—The glaring absurdity of such a behaviour disgusted every body;—his power was immediately lost, and he was obliged to resign his place. His influence with his master continued still as great as ever, and he gained a more lucrative employment under a minister who hated him.

Fox, like Walpole, had a sovereign contempt for all who pretended to act on patriotic and virtuous principles. He knew the world too well to be duped with pretences.

His art in managing elections was superior:—a late contest for the county of Oxford will not be soon forgotten, nor his skill in managing for the party he espoused. He knew beyond all men the true method of gaining votes. A tradesman in the Strand, who has since figured in Germany as a commissary, was well rewarded for understanding and obeying the commands of his friend and patron, upon this and other similar occasions.

Like his great exemplar, Walpole, he took particular care to reward all who were connected with him and employed by him.

He could bear no opposition to his will under any pretence; he would gratify his resentment without coming to an éclaircissement, and make his enemy feel the weight of his displeasure, without giving him the chance of escaping it.

The most exceptionable part of his character, was his engaging young noblemen in the practice of gaming; this was not done with a view to his own profit, but to render them subservient to the ministry, by involving them in difficulties. This odious custom was not peculiar to Mr. Fox; it seems to have been a branch of ministerial business. Lord Oxford was one of the few ministers who detested gaming. Pelham and Anson were such true slaves to the love of play, that dispatches were often brought to them at White's. The young heirs of noble families and great estates must have been wonderfully edified by such examples!

N O T E.

* The speeches of C. Fox, the son of this gentleman, are equally distinguished for acuteness of argument, and elegance of expression.

Fox was an excellent husband, a most indulgent father, a kind master, a courteous neighbour; and, what the world in general has little known, but which I now tell them on the best authority, a man whose charities, demonstrated that he possessed in abundance the milk of human kindness.

Highly and justly as he was incensed against an ungrateful dependant, who he had gradually raised from obscurity to the summit of opulence; who presumed, even before the sovereign, to impute to his benefactor the infamous falsehood himself had fabricated; Mr. Fox, satisfied with spurning the scorpion from his bosom, very prudently declined all further revenge—it was sufficient for him that the monster of ingratitude was left to his own reflections, and that universal contempt which he merited.

In his person Mr. Fox was of the middle size; he was, like Ulysses, more graceful in his seat than when he stood up. His features were strongly marked, his brow large and black, his aspect more penetrating than pleasing.

Thoughts on the Criminality of Lord Bacon. By the late David Hume, Esq.

SOME persons have taken great pains to insinuate, that my lord St. Albans was more suspected than guilty; that he was sacrificed to the court, and the safety of Buckingham, and not a victim to public justice. They allege that he would have delivered himself, by a prudent and circumspcct defence, had he not been actually restrained by king James, who, say they, was afraid to trust him before the house of peers, lest, in the course of such defence, he should have been forced to lay open and unfold the many scenes of bad administration he had been privy to, and to divert the odium from himself on Buckingham: for some of the charges against the chancellor were of a mixed nature, and obliquely glanced at the king and his minister. Therefore, by absolutely commanding him to forsake his defence, James abandoned him to the fury of the house of commons. The pretence is plausible.

But whoever will take the trouble to examine deeply into this matter, will find little foundation, in truth, for such allegations; or, at least, that to call my lord St. Albans a court-sacrifice, is highly unjust. The greatest number of the charges concerned the chancellor only. With these, neither James nor his favourite, had the least connection. No one will deny, that he was criminal as to these. Can we suppose he would have confessed the charges, and avowed them to be true in the most solemn manner, if they had not been actually so? Such persons should consider, that by supposing any thing like this, they are not befriending, but loading with infamy my lord St. Albans character. "But," say they, "we do not suppose him absolutely innocent, but less guilty than is generally imagined." If he was guilty at all how was he a court-sacrifice? He did, often and extenuate many of the charges. That was making a defence in writing. Would he have confessed the others to be true, if there had been any room for extenuation? Had he not the like power to soften, mitigate, or even deny all, as well as some, if that could have been done consistently with veracity? Many more questions like these might be asked, very difficult to be answered. These things duly considered, it is manifest, that the viscount of St. Alban's was not made the scapegoat of Buckingham, nor sacrificed to the arts of a court, or the weakness of a sovereign: a prince, who, with all his follies, surely doth not deserve the treatment he has met with from certain persons who have wrote of the lord chancellor Bacon, but that the whole was entirely owing to a strict and steady pursuit of justice. An author who transmits the actions of great men to posterity, ought, undoubtedly, to have no servile complaisance, no party views, in favour of a court; because that would be inconsistent with a regard for truth, the great and chief thing required in an historian. But then, as a like regard ought always to be paid to truth, there can be no merit in sacrificing courts, kings, and nations, to any favourite character of a man, though ever so great, in respect to parts, or high, in reference to his station.

A Description of the Town of Moira.

MOIRA is situated 67 miles N. W. of Dublin, and 14 miles of Belfast; it consists of one long street about three quarters of a mile long, and about 80 good houses, some brick and some stone: There is a fine market-house in it with five arches, there is no market in it but a little fair once a month, and very little business done in it, but a very fine pleasant country about it

it. The present church of Moira being 20 feet by 40 in the clear, and is situated about a quarter of a mile from the right hon. the earl of Moira's castle. The present rector of the town died, who wasthe rev. Mr. Thomas Waring; not one in his place as yet, but the present parson is the rev. Mr. Sampson.

A Cure for the Bite of a Mad Dog.

FOR the bite of a mad dog for either man or beast: Take six ounces of rue, clean picked and bruised; four ounces of garlick, peeled and bruised; four ounces of Venice treacle, and four ounces of filed pewter, or scraped tin: Boil these in two quarts of the best ale, in a pan covered close over a gentle fire for the space of an hour, then strain the ingredients from the liquor. Give eight or nine spoonfuls of it warm to a man or woman, three mornings fasting; eight or nine is sufficient for the strongest, a lesser quantity for those younger, or of a weaker constitution, as you may judge of their strength. Ten or twelve spoonfuls for a horse or bullock, three, four, or five, to a sheep, hog, or dog. This must be given within nine days after the bite; if you can conveniently bind some of the ingredients to the wound it will be so much the better.

Memoirs of the (soy disant) Chevalier D'Eon, alias Mademoiselle Beaumont.

THIS very extraordinary character has for some time made a great noise in the world; and considering her sex, at length judicially proved, she may be pronounced the phoenix of the age.

This lady (we may now be allowed to say) is descended from a good family in the south of France, and was born in the year 1734; but it seems somewhat mysterious, that even her own relations should wink at the deception she put upon the world, as her letters published some time since clearly evince, in a correspondence she kept up with her mother, whom Miss D'Eon advised not to enter into politics, but to attend to the cultivation of her kitchen-garden.

We find her many years past in a public character at the court of Russia, and afterwards a bold enterprizing captain of dragoons in the last war in Germany.—At the conclusion of that war she came over here as secretary to the duke de Nivernois, who was appointed ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to this court, at the time that the late duke of Bedford ratified the treaty of Paris, at Versailles.—On the departure of the duke de Nivernois, she remained here as chargé d'affaires, and was afterwards appointed minister, in which capacity she continued till the arrival of the count de Guerchy, as ambassador from France.

Soon after that nobleman's appearance here, a rupture ensued between them; Miss D'Eon still claiming her rank as envoy, and the ambassador refusing it.—She was recalled, but would not comply with the orders of her court: upon which she was refused admission at St. James's, and declared to have no character whatever here. This declaration produced several sarcasms in the prints; but probably the then minister knew that she was precisely in that predicament; or at least he was truly prophetic.

A paper war commenced, and a M. Goddard was the advocate of count Guerchy; but though he was the author of the Chinese Spy, a work in esteem, and several others, he was no way capable of contesting with Mademoiselle—elle étoit si adroite et si bien lettrée. Those celebrated letters now came forth, which will ever establish her reputation as a scholar, a politician, and a philosopher. They are in the possession of every gentleman of taste in literature, therefore we need only refer to them.

A certain adventurer (De Vergy) listed under the Chevalier's banner, and made affidavit, at the quarter sessions, that he was applied to by count Guerchy to assassinate D'Eon; nay, upon his death-bed, he made this same declaration in the most solemn manner.—The bill was, however, thrown out at the quarter sessions; but the public may probably have received some impression from so bold an accusation, made with such perseverance.

A rumour began to prevail that the Chevalier D'Eon was of the female gender; and, in this gambling age, as every opportunity affords occasion for wagers under any specious appellation, insurances were opened upon the doubt of her sex, as well in London as at Paris and Amsterdam, to a very considerable amount.—The Chevalier took these manœuvres in great dudgeon, threatened some, and challenged others. He thought it advisable to make a public affidavit, that he had no interest or concern whatever in these insurances; and that he never would make a judicial disclosure of his sex, though proposals had been offered him to the amount of 25,000l.

In the mean time, overtures were made him from the court of Versailles to give up certain papers in his possession of a political nature; to which he consented, on the promise of 500l. a year regularly paid in London. To obtain these papers there had had been forcible entries made at his apartments in Scotland yard, but it happened they were not there.

Soon after this transaction he took apartments in petty France; from whence he thought it advisable to make a precipitate retreat, and it was then surmised he had been kidnapped and carried to France.—Advertisements appeared in the papers, with rewards for discovering where he was. At the expiration of a few weeks, the nominal Chevalier returned; but it is now generally believed that he made a temporary retreat, to give posterity a younger Chevalier—male or female, we find, signifies not.

From this time till very lately the Chevalier remained in obscurity; but a dispute which arose between her and M. Morande, concerning this gentleman's giving out he knew her to be a woman, made her come again upon the tapis. The Chevalier challenged M. Morande, but he declined fighting her, on account of her sex; upon which the Chevalier made application to the court of king's bench. This affair brought on the late trial, the following abstract of which will satisfy our readers of the authenticity of what we have said.

Guildhall, Tuesday, July 1, 1771.

HAYES against J A Q U E S.

This cause was opened by Mr. Buller, stating the pleadings, that it was a certain discourse held between the parties, whether the Chevalier D'Eon was a man or a woman.—The defendant undertook to prove that he was a man; when in fact, plaintiff avers he is a woman; shall call our witnesses to prove that he is a woman, and then you will find a verdict for the plaintiff, with 700*l.* damages; on which opening, the court was thrown into a prodigious fit of laughter.

Mr. Wallace said, that he would not go so far as his learned friend had undertaken to prove, but his client would content himself with proving, that she was not he.

Policy read: That in consideration of 100*l.* the defendant undertook to pay 700*l.* in case at any time hereafter it shall be proved that the Chevalier was a female.

Mr. La Goue. I am a surgeon and man-midwife; I have been acquainted with the Chevalier several years; I know it is a woman. The witness was then cross-examined by Mr. Mansfield. He said he had known her a great many years; became acquainted with her when she was fourteen; between four or five years ago I first knew she was a woman; she was complaining of some disorders, and it was necessary for me to know, before I applied proper medicines; he then told me that he was a woman; I examined, and found it to be a real woman; he told me not to mention it to any person. The plaintiff applied to me about three weeks ago; I told him I did not chuse to be examined, but if he sent me a subpoena, I must come. He told me he should want my assertion; I said, I did not like it, as it might be discovering the secrets of my profession. He said he was told I was the person who could tell. Many people have applied to me before, but I never discovered it. After I knew it he passed for a man. I do not know Michael Taff, Emsley, nor Hayes. Swanston told me three years ago, he would be glad if I would appear as a witness; I told him I would not, I did not like it; I did not tell him the secret.—Hayes the plaintiff did not mention any person that recommended him to me.

Mr. de Morande. It is a woman; I say so within my own knowledge. The defendant's counsel, not satisfied with this, Mr. Lee took up this witness, and on his cross-examination he said, about four years ago she was very lively in her conversation, and spoke to me with great freedom on the subject. She one day shewed me her woman's cloaths, ear-rings, and shewed me her breasts. Some time after I was one morning (being myself a married man) introduced into her bedchamber; she was in bed, and with great freedom bid me satisfy myself of what we had so often been jocular about, for she had often used to say I was to be godfather. I put my hand into bed, and was fully convinced she was a woman. In consequence of this last demonstration, I mentioned it to several of my acquaintance, and wrote to Monsieur de Mouchier in France. There was a treaty on foot to get some papers of consequence out of her hands, and 500 guineas were and are settled upon her.—In winter, 1771, Madame de Couchie told me, if I had a mind to lay any wager, to lay on the woman side. I never knew Hayes till last November. It was necessary for me on a former occasion* to say something of this transaction, but not to be so particular as you now oblige me to be. I thought it would be indecent and not necessary.

N O T E.

* This was an application by the Chevalier to the court of king's bench, which was argued for an information against the witness for a libel in a morning paper, insinuating, that the Chevalier was not a man, but a woman; which the witness in shewing cause of that rule satisfied the court was the fact; they discharged the rule, after having a very long argument on both sides, and some papers written by the Chevalier to De Morande being read.

M. de Morande was then sworn, as interpreter to a French physician, whose evidence was—It is a woman; I know it of my own knowledge. The defendant's counsel compelled this witness likewise to be particular. He then said, he was a physician, had attended the lady about two years ago: he knew she was a woman by sight and touch.

Mr. Mansfield then said, it was a gambling wager, and very unfit to be brought into a court of justice, and rested his client's defence on the ground, that the plaintiff was satisfied at the time of the wager, and knew that the Chevalier was a woman; and therefore contended it was in the nature of a fraudulent insurance; and Hayes not discovering all he knew at the time, ought not to maintain the action; and read the defendant's answer in chancery, wherein he disclosed the grounds he went upon in making the insurance, That the court of France had discovered and treated with her as a woman.

Mr. Wallace replied, that his client, as at Newmarket, was not bound to disclose the ground he went upon. No doubt each party thought themselves right. But Mr. Jacques thinks it an indecent action; and because it is such, he thinks the court and jury are to kick the cause out of the court, and let him keep the root of our's he has had in his pocket these five years, for he has not paid a penny of the premium into court. But for his part, he thought it was a fair wager, and the only question was, who had won it: which he hoped the jury were by that time fully satisfied of in favour of his client.

Lord Mansfield said, it was a mere gambling policy, and wished it was in his or the jury's power to make both lose, but it was not; and there was no objection to the legality of the wager; the only question was, who had won it? It was truly said by Mr. Wallace, that this was not to be compared to the case of a fraudulent policy; it had no relation to the laws touching legal insurance, but was a mere wager, and the parties not bound to disclose the ground he stands upon; for each party takes and abides by his own judgment and information; and I myself remember a wager about the circumference of the statue de Medicis, or something abroad, the parties laid; and the one says I know I am right, because I have myself actually measured it:—says the other, do you think I would lay if I had not also measured it? and notwithstanding you have, I will lay. —There was no ground to lay any intentional fraud to Mr. Hayes, or any contrivance connected with the Chevalier to take people in; for she writes challenges, and is angry when it is proposed to her to discover her sex; and perhaps if it had not been for quarrels and misunderstandings, the plaintiff would never have been able to prove the fact, which might still be well known, and not capable of legal proof before a jury, for there is no compelling her to submit to an inspection.—But here is a person employed by the court of France, in a civil and military capacity, as a man; and by and by there is a buzz—it is suspected but remains a matter of doubt, what sex he is; wagers are laid, and policies opened; some think one way and some another. It would be very much our wish if we could prevent the plaintiff from recovering on this wager, but I am afraid we cannot; and of the two, he has the fairest side, for all the indecencies were pressed out by the defendant: all the plaintiff's witnesses swear to the positive fact, and without going further, the defendant might have been satisfied.

The jury found for the plaintiff 700l.

Reasons why Poets should not shew their Plays to their Acquaintance before the Representation of them.

By Lord Lansdown. (Not printed in his Works.)

THE reputation a poet obtains from the public applause, is not altogether imaginary, for the number of those who are not influenced by it is so very small, that he is out of fear of danger from them. Nay, those very men who, on a private perusal of some plays, entertained but an indifferent opinion of them, fondly debauched by their success, run their approbation up to bigotry; never reflecting that as a man's name often subserves to his public reception, without regard to the performance; so the gracefulness of the action, and the pomp of the theatre, joined to the injudicious claps of the audience, as often give the greatest applause to the worst plays, and for a while preserve the general esteem of the town: for when once a play has got that on its side, a great many men of sense rather swim down than stem the tide, or oppose the vogue, at the expence of the imputation of singularity.

But before the action, a moderate character of a play, from a man of tolerable sense, shall by his parsimonious praise damn it, tho' ever so meritorious; for the judgment of the audience being not yet past in its favour, the town is ready to take the first impressions from any man whose plausible assurance has got him the reputation of a critic; because people hope, by falling in with his censure, to give a sufficient proof of their understandings.

A a a a

A poet,

A poet, therefore, in submitting his play, before action, to a perusal, runs as many hazards, as he confides it to men who want either candor or judgment: and among those that the vulgar voice allows wits, a man with such qualifications is not very easily to be found. One of these wits always overvalues himself, and believing that he is a master of a great deal of sense, when his portion, perhaps, just seasons him from fool, and so only finishes a coxcomb, who thinks the only way to establish himself a wit is by finding faults, and the town, which is not over nice in distinguishing betwixt merit and pretence, is often imposed on by the coxcomb it mistakes for a man of sense; and biassed by the general malice of mankind, (that inclines most men rather to believe ill than good of another) it strikes in with his injudicious, as well as unjust censures.

There is another sort of wits (tho' of somewhat a higher class) whom a small flock of learning, and the flattery of some of their acquaintance has confirmed in the self-opinion of being good critics, and with these the poet yet runs a greater risque; for it is impossible to please them with any thing modern except their own. These critics have a very contemptible opinion of the age they live in, and think fortune extremely severe in not casting them into the times of Euripides, Horace, or, it may be, Shakespeare; and they are angry with providence, for planting them so far northward, who might have made a figure in a more southerly clime among the first rate wits of old Greece and Italy. They think so meanly of all they know, that they would sooner admire a scribbler they never saw, than a man of the best sense of their own acquaintance. They censure the wit by the countenance, and the man whose face they are disgusted with, must never hope to please them with his understanding. If ever they happen to think well of any man's wit for a while (for their good opinion of any one is of a very short duration) it is when they meet with one as ill-natured and vain as themselves; then their spleen at the merits of others being gratified with railing, blinds them to a momentary satisfaction in the defamer; but that being over, their native pride looks down on him too; for all their talents and time are expended in speaking well of themselves, and ill of every body else; but then the world is often even with them, for they generally are pleased with themselves without a rival.

Indeed there is often a magisterial pride and ill nature in men of a great deal of wit and learning, which almost overthrows all their merit, or, at least, makes one angry to find things so valuable in such ill hands: for when praise, or success, has once debauched a man's judgment into obstinacy, he is but a fool of his own making, ten times more intolerable than a fool of God's making.

Again, there are some who are but lately established wits by a lucky hit, and hope to keep up that character by depressing others, or damning what they write with faint and affected praise.—These are for keeping fame chaste, (tho' themselves are an instance of her prostitution) that is, for their own use only; never reflecting that she, like those of whose sex she is painted, is capable of satisfying more than one: nay, that like a pretty woman, it is almost impossible to keep her to one's self.

Mr. Wycherly's couplet reaches abundance of our current wits and critics:

Those who write ill, and those who ne'er durst write,
Turn critics out of mere revenge and spite.

Yet all these have it in their power to do a great deal of mischief to a poet who is so bold as to venture his reputation in their hands, because the undiscerning town never considers that as a critic is the last refuge of a pretender to wit; so he that is full only of the faults of an author, is less deserving, even of that name, than he who sometimes rises up to a taste of his excellencies. Nor does the town consider that a great many men have no other way of keeping within the pale of wit, but by excluding those who are only capable of excluding them.

There are another sort of men who pass for wits with the town that are far from being so; and these are your laughers, merry rogues, who have a mortal aversion to thought: and as they laugh at every thing, even what they say themselves, it is not to be expected they should spare the most serious performance.

Lastly, the judgment most men make of books is generally very erroneous, in judging the performance by the author, and not the author by the performance. If a man, thro' inexperience, or any accidental misfortune, has ill luck not to please in one thing, some will, by no means, allow him a capacity of pleasing at all; tho' many eminent poets have been proofs of the contrary; while some, successful to a wonder in their first attempts, have mouldered away, and dwindled in a little time to less than a shadow of those mighty men their first setting out promised: and, indeed, popular applause is too common a test of the writer's merit. The ignorant as well as the learned share the applauses of the town, and there has scarce appeared a scribbler so despicable in reality as not to have been, at some time or other, the favourite of a day.
the

Trial of Mr. Horne for a Libel.

As the trial of Mr. Horne has greatly engaged the public attention, our readers will doubtless expect to find an account of it; accordingly we present them with the following:

FRIDAY, July 4th, it came on before Lord Mansfield, and a special jury, at Guildhall, London.

Mr. Buller opened on the part of the crown, and briefly stated to the jury the subject matter of information, which was an advertisement, dated King's-Arms tavern, Cornhill, June 7, 1775, and purporting to be an account of the constitutional society's having met on the said 7th of June, and agreed, "that the sum of 100l. should be raised, to be applied to the relief of the widows, orphans, and aged parents of our beloved American fellow-subjects, who, faithful to the character of Englishmen, preferring death to slavery, were for that reason only, inhumanly murdered by the king's troops at or near Lexington and Concord, in the province of Massachusetts, on the 19th of last April;" which advertisement was signed by John Horne, the defendant.

As soon as Mr. Buller had concluded, the attorney general arose, but was prevented from proceeding, to inform the jury more fully of the case, by the defendant, Mr. Horne, who addressed himself to the court, and declaring he thought that the proper moment to urge an objection which struck him as exceedingly essential, desired to be heard: the court assenting, Mr. Horne turned to the jury, and began speaking, when he was told by lord Mansfield, that he must make his objection to him, and not to the jury. Mr. Horne replied, that his lordship had stopped him before he had heard what he meant to offer, and which his lordship when he heard would have found to be altogether regular; the words he was about to say to the gentlemen of the jury being of no other purport than to intreat them to attend particularly to his objection; a circumstance exceedingly necessary, as the matter he wished to urge was very material, and as juries had of late but too frequently been considered as out of court, when any point of law was debated. Lord Mansfield again desired him to proceed, when he began objecting to the practice of the court, on the late trials of the printers (convicted of publishing the advertisement, of which he was charged in the present information as the author) in admitting the attorney-general to reply, although the defendants called no witnesses. Lord Mansfield observed, that this objection was premature, and that, if necessary, the time to urge it was, when the attorney-general should attempt to reply. Mr. Horne shewed why it was of importance to him, that the matter should be settled in this stage of the trial, urging that he was aware the attorney-general would take all advantages, fair and unfair, to convict him, and that he should shape his defence agreeable to a knowledge of the circumstance; whereupon lord Mansfield declared that he would consent to it, if Mr. Attorney had no objection. The attorney-general declared his acquiescence, and Mr. Horne proceeded, beginning with observing, that altho' he thanked the court, and Mr. Attorney General, for acceding to this motion, he was not so well pleased with accepting that, as a matter of favour, which he had demanded as a matter of justice. He then proceeded to descant on the usage of the courts, endeavouring to shew, that although the practice he objected to was not without precedent of late years, it was nevertheless injurious and oppressive to the subject, as well as inequitable, unjust, and contrary to every principle of that protection and safety, which the reason of the laws, and the antient modes of dispensing justice, were calculated to afford to innocence. In the course of his argument, Mr. Horne took occasion to mention, as one proof of the injurious tendency of this practice, the consequence which had attended his acquiescing in it, upon his own trial some years since at Guilford, where the present lord Onslow was plaintiff, and was entering into an ample detail of that affair, when he was again stopped, (both by my lord Mansfield and the attorney-general; who informed him that he must confine himself to such matter as had an analogy to the subject before the court and jury.

Mr. Horne persisted in his argument, asserting, that what he was about to say was a case in point, which corroborated the doctrine he was holding out, and that as he knew little more of law than what he had derived from his having for some years frequently attended the court in which his lordship presided, he hoped he might be indulged in quoting a precedent which concerned himself, and of which he was consequently a perfect master. He then went on to shew, that in his case tried at Guildford in 1771, he was advised by his counsel to forsake the advantage of examining witnesses, in order to disprove the having spoken certain words stated in the declaration as defamatory, but rather to admit them as true (altho' he could have proved their falsity) than afford the leader on the other side an opportunity of replying; that he acquiesced in this advice; the consequence of which was, that the leading counsel for the plaintiff did reply, that his counsel rose to object, and that his lordship (who then also tried the cause) over-ruled the objection, and suffered the reply, upon which the jury had given a verdict against him with 400l damages. Mr. Horne urged a variety of arguments to shew that the practice he objected to was contrary to law.

Lord Mansfield, in answer, told him, that nothing was more clear, than that the attorney-general had a right to reply, if he chose it; that there was not a doubt of this right; that it had been often exercised, and might be exercised again, when Mr. Attorney thought it necessary.

Mr. Horne complained that his lordship, by taking upon himself the duty of the attorney-general, had deprived him of hearing from that officer's mouth such arguments as he doubted not the attorney was able to have offered, and which he would have endeavoured to have refuted; he observed, that at all hazards his situation was a very disadvantageous one, but that he was particularly unfortunately circumstanced, if the judge, who was to try him, took upon himself to do the business of the attorney-general; for between the two he should find it extremely difficult to obtain a verdict in his favour.

Lord Mansfield replied shortly, and after repeating that the practice in question was not only consonant to usage, but founded in justice, as matter might arise from a defendant's answer which it might be exceedingly necessary for the plaintiff's council to speak to, desired the trial might go on, and told Mr. Horne, that if there was any informality in the proceeding in the trial, or if he thought either the judge or counsel did him injustice, he had a remedy by a subsequent appeal to the court, who would set aside any verdict obtained irregularly.

Mr. Horne warmly answered this, and said, "Oh! my lord, my lord, let me not hear of remedies of your lordship's pointing out; that poison is the most baneful of all, which poisons the physick; your lordship's remedies are worse than the diseases of the patients who apply them; and it is but a poor satisfaction for a man who receives a wound to receive a plaister from the same hand. At Guildford your lordship talked to me of a remedy, I submitted, and tried it; it is true I set aside the verdict, but it cost me two hundred pounds. The verdict was but 400l. and the remedy cost half as much; it was therefore a pretty dear remedy!" Mr. Horne's heat carried him so far just in this part of the trial, and he was so hasty in his animadversions on the conduct of the judge and the attorney general, treating each with a degree of unexampled severity and rudeness, that lord Mansfield was provoked to a declaration, that if he did not behave more decently, he should be under a necessity of committing him.

Attorney-general, for the king. Unless the defendant will be more pointed, I shall appeal to every one that hears me, whether I am not justified in not replying to loose slander, not pointed at any particular fact or object, and when attempted to be pointed only disgraces itself. It is the duty of my office to prosecute libellers, with firmness and clearness, to conviction; and I challenge the calumniator to point any particular fact or matter in which I deviate. I shall take no advantage of the aspersions I have heard to-day, they are below reputation to make; consequently not becoming the dignity and character of the office I hold, to make the least reply to; they are out of the present cause, for in it there is no complication in the case I am about to lay before you. The defendant is the original criminal, and as such differs from those who have gone before him: he puts his name to it only to try how far he can transgress and trample on the laws of his country. The publication is scurrility and abuse, and low and Billingsgate language to the last degree. I don't say this as derogatory to the gentleman's talents; I know he can write better; but the intention is avowedly to transgress the laws of his country, and to know how far he can or dare go in defiance of them. The persons employed, and the employers, are certainly connected; and when guilt is applied, they both share the slander. This is a contrivance to introduce a subscription for the relief of who? "The honest and brave Americans, who, not forgetting the spirit of Englishmen, and not submitting to be slaves, were cruelly murdered by the king's troops at Lexington." How is this palliated! by a public advertisement, which contains a charge of murder in the troops employed, and the constitution, and defending its legal authority by which only legal liberty can be obtained and supported. And these men, and this government are to be vilified and abused by those in a public news paper, who have not courage to face them in the field. This is surely the only means men could possibly take to suppress liberty, rather than support it: and a man must be blind indeed who does not see that to support legal government is the only support of liberty. A man cannot be more free by reviling and traducing the character of the country he lives in; and in the plainness of all plainest simple cases, I shall content myself with proving the fact of writing and publishing the libel in question, without any comments upon it. It is my duty to lay it before you. It is your duty, bound by the oath you have taken, to judge between us; and by that judgment you will pronounce such publications are not to be tolerated. I have no malice against any man, much less against Mr. Horne; I shall commit him to you, who are to judge of him according to his merit.

Mr. Wilson proved buying the papers which contained the advertisement, dated King's Arms tavern, June 7, 1775, signed John Horne, which being proved, were again read by the officer of the court.

Henry Sampson Woodfall.—I first got the advertisement from Mr. Horne to publish; I did, and sent it to the other papers to publish, and the bill for it, by his desire. These papers are published by me.

Being cross examined by Mr. Horne, he said he was never desired to conceal the name of Mr. Horne, and that in 1768 he first published for him on election matters. When we were at the house of commons, I believe you told if they wanted any evidence of the fact of who was the author, they should be fully satisfied.

Do you remember the contents of a paper of your's in May 77?

It is impossible for me to do that. I was myself convicted; and because I was told it might be better for me, and as I had your permission, without being applied to by the attorney general, I gave in your name as the author. I believe this was done in consultation with my brother. I never saw lord Bute in my life, nor had any conversation with or about lord Mansfield, or of keeping any opinion out of the papers, and was not asked to come here as a witness; only I thought, as I said before, it might be better for myself.

William Woodfall. Mr. Horne gave me the paper to put into the London Packet and Morning Chronicle, which I did. On his cross examination, he answered the same as his brother did, to the questions asked him, and then Mr. Horne began his defence.

Gentlemen of the Jury,

I am happy in addressing myself to you, in hopes I shall meet with more candour and a better fate, than in addressing myself to my judge. I am sure you will make allowances for my peculiar situation, when opposed to the ablest and most ingenious at the bar. I stand before you, charged as a culprit of the very first impression. But when the attorney general began his speech to you, he boasted so much of his own honour, worth, and integrity, that any one just coming in at that moment, would have taken him for a culprit making his own defence, instead of accusing another. I have heard and attended to the attorney general. The letter I acknowledged, and am sure he is not serious in thinking to obtain over a London jury, without law, reason, or argument. I have only to request your particular attention; because, by that and the oath you have taken, you are to judge of me, and all I require is, to be judged of accordingly, and while I have such judges, by the facts before stated, I am sure you will be bound by your oaths to acquit me of any criminal intention. And as long as the king's troops in America, or any other part, continue to commit murder, I will declare it, and publish it.

Gentlemen, in these days, murder and treason meet favour, but libellers and printers are followed to the utmost severity; and true or false, the doctrine of our day is, it is still a libel. But when murder is committed, I ever dare and will call it so; and if any crime is in the paper read to you, I avow it, and will most clearly prove the contents. I will ever say, write, and think it was an inhuman murder committed on our fellow-subjects in America.

If informations are to do the business, what occasion for a grand jury, whose business is first to inquire of them sufficient grounds of accusation? To say, a man is to be brought to his trial. Business of ex officio informations are filed without the form of an oath. All my law is derived from the State Trials, and I am not sorry for it, because they are said to be libels on the judges. The fact must therefore be true. It is said in them, that judges are against the prisoner, because the attorney is appointed and promoted by the king, who has an interest in the conviction of the defendant; and the court of King's Bench have assumed the power of passing judgment. My crime, therefore, is to have a temporary death; to take what little I have, and then shut me up in confinement, which is only genteelly murdering a man; and while I am thus seriously pleading, the judge judge and Mr. Wilkes are laughing together. But if you are pleased to put me there, I will ever publish what I think, even there, or go where I will ; and if the attorney general pleases to follow and file informations every time I write, I promise him business enough ; and before I am shut up, I am sure you'll suffer me to take a little excursion.

I was present, when, before my judge, the attorney general De Grey moved that Mr. Wilkes be committed to the King's Bench. The judge now on the bench hastily told him, he might choose his prison ; all are the king's. A Scotch author (Mannet) says, the attorney general may prosecute and convict, in spite of all truth, honour, and justice ; and the worst of murders are those committed under colour of justice ; yet he was never prosecuted. The attorney general is the officer of the minister of the day, not of the king ; for when by a change of circumstances out goes the minister, follows the attorney general. An instance of this is now before me (looking at Mr. Dunning) a gentleman who was not turned out for want of abilities. The attorney and solicitor general, those two brazen figures, sit in the house, one on each side the minister, to support and defend, and speak to all his measures ; tho' this may make a smile, yet it is of serious consequence, especially when the known honour and integrity of those gentlemen are called in question : and though prosecution, at two years distance, is commenced at the request of the most corrupt house of commons that ever disgraced this or any other country.

If these observations draw your attention to be careful of the verdict you give, the end will be fully answered ; and as the administration is good or bad, it produces less or more prosecution for libels ; and this is one in 77 for a harmless advertisement in 75. But it is said to have an attendance to evil ; times, situation, and circumstance, are material to attendance and intention ; and what might be fairly deemed a libel in 1777, could not in 1775, before the Americans were proscribed or declared rebels to this country ; and if it was or could be deemed a libel in 1775, the attorney general has lost his time in prosecuting. Simple contract debts are prosecutable to six, treason to twenty years, but it seems none to libels, and if once a crime, always so. I hope this will produce an act to oblige the attorney general to prosecute in a certain given time, otherwise I am sure I may be prosecuted to-morrow, for libels wrote in 1768 ; and I now look at a gentleman (the worthy member for Bristol) who is as liable as myself to be prosecuted for a libel ; and if no line is drawn, I tremble for the consequences, not to myself ; and an appeal for rape or murder is prescribed within a year and a day, no prescription for libels. And the gentleman I allude to may be expelled, and that followed by many others ; and I confess I believe change and circumstances produced the prosecution ; for I was no sooner entered and commenced commons in the Temple, than this information was filed. And since this was wrote, a civil war has commenced, much blood spilt, and I wish much more may not ensue. To prove this I subpoenaed general Gage, but he will not attend ; because long after this, the proclamation was issued, desiring the Americans in so many days to come in, do so and so, or they would be deemed rebels. It is clear they were not then so, and consequently the advertisement cannot fairly be deemed a libel. Not that I did not then, and now, and will ever think and call it a murder. But I shall be told, if it was, why not prosecute in a court of justice ? I wish I could ; but that was prior foreseen, and cured by act of parliament, screening the offenders from trial on one hand, and inviting them to acts of cruelty and murder, on the other.

He called the attorney general to be examined, which he positively refused.

Lord George Germaine was next called, who did not appear.

Mr. Lacey proved the cool. paid to the order of Franklin.

Capt. Gould of the 63d regiment, wounded at Lexington, said, he was sent upon the expedition by the order of general Gage, delivered to him by the adjutant ; we went in the dusk by silent march, without drums beating. I was taken prisoner. [Mr. Horne. Sir, I don't wish to ask you any question that may give you pain, if I do, you are not to answer me. I made that affidavit, and the contents of it are true.] As soon as we began our march, alarm guns were continually fired by the Provincials ; from this we supposed they meant to obstruct our march, and attack us. The guns were to collect the people together. The first we saw were in arms ; on our approach they dispersed ; the second we saw were in arms, our men pushed on, and kept shouting and huzzaing ; I can't tell who fired first ; the firing continued as long as there were any Americans to be seen. We drew up at Lexington bridge ; they came down upon us, and drew up ; they charged, and we gave the first fire, and then the action continued all day.

I was

I was wounded at the bridge. I heard the Americans scalped some of our men, but did not see it.—Here closed the evidence for the defendant.

Alderman Oliver acknowledged his being one of the society, and subscribed part of the money.

Attorney general in reply. The gentleman certainly for the sake of popularity and applause has made so long and elaborate an harangue. I believe it will meet with little applause from those who are to judge of it; I will not trouble you with remarks on the long stories and anecdotes he has chosen to entertain you with; I despise such game; I shall stand justified before you on the plainest of all plain questions; I set out upon that of causing and procuring to be published a libel on the king's troops, that they were guilty of murder, which libel needs not to be commented upon to make it understood; you have only to read it, and when applied to the troops, it is certainly applicable to the king and government who employed them. What's the defence? He sets out with abusing me, the judge and the jury; and then, for the first time that ever I heard such a defence, he is suffered to call witnesses to prove the fact of actual murder: so that in place of trying whether he is guilty of the libel, we in fact are on the trial of, whether the troops were guilty of murder. I am not sorry such a defence has been admitted, because that turns against him; the troops were in a hostile country, surrounded and interrupted, and you heard the evidence cannot say who fired first, but the Provincials were hostile and in arms. I shall follow my friend to St. George's-fields; I may applaud his conduct in bringing, as he thought, offenders to justice; but if he by any means or publication inflamed the minds of the country who were to try those supposed offenders, he did a most fatal and unjustifiable act, in open defiance of all law and justice.

The attorney general defended himself from the aspersions of Mr. Horne, and said it was his own fault the information was not tried sooner, for it was filed at Michaelmas 76; and again adverted to the libel, and the terms, and plain intention, and meaning, and common sense of them; and despised the calumny thrown against him.

Lord Mansfield. If ever there was a simple plain question in narrow compass, this is one: it is an information for causing and writing a libel, which we have only to look at and read, and the conclusion follows. Our beloved American fellow subjects! Beloved! for what! To be reclaimed and brought back, but not to be abetted in open rebellion, and open defiance of legal government. I was glad Gould was examined; for what does he say? His evidence is clear and decisive; the unhappy dispute has cost much blood and treasure, and is much to be regretted by all good men. As to the libel, you will read it, and judge of it; and that is all I shall say to you by way of charge. His lordship then, for the sake of the audience, explained the nature of the attorney general's right to reply; and which was clear, and never doubted of or disputed. The jury went out, and soon returned their verdict, Guilty.

This we give as the most material part of Mr. Horne's trial, as the whole of it would far exceed the limits that could be allotted for it in a Magazine.

A Parallel between Lucian and Dean Swift.

AMONGST the few authors who have united humour with genius, learning, and knowledge of human nature, none hold a more distinguished rank than Lucian, and the celebrated Dr. Swift. The latter appears to have taken the former as his model, and the hint of Gulliver, which is universally allowed to be his master-piece, is evidently taken from Lucian's true history; but in this work he has greatly surpassed his original; though it must be owned, that the Greek author is, in general, superior to our countryman. He has surpassed all the ancients and moderns, in conveying the most serious lessons of morality, blended with the most exquisite pleasantry, and the keenest satire upon the foibles and follies of mankind. But in most of the humorous works of Swift, the chief design of the writer appears to be the raising of a laugh. He tells us himself, indeed, that they were written with a moral view, in order to cure the vices of the mind; yet it is the opinion of many judicious critics, that his satire is carried to excess; and that it is by no means calculated to reform the vicious. The Tale of a Tub, which contains great humour, has been thought by many, and, perhaps, not without reason, to be injurious to the cause of religion, as it places subjects, deemed sacred, in the most ludicrous light. However, if we consider it merely as a work of genius, we cannot deny its being an admirable composition. There cannot be more complete caricatures, than the characters of Martin, John and Peter; and the conversations which passed between them, breathe the true spirit of Lucian. The pencil of an Hogarth could not have drawn figures more striking! but if we compare this performance, animated as it is, to that excellent dialogue of Lucian, cian, called the Speculator, wherein Menippus relates what had befallen him in his journey to the Shades, to consult Tiresias concerning the happiest condition of human life; or to Timon, the misanthrope, which so exquisitely displays the weakness of one man, and the baseness of men in general, we cannot, I think, hesitate to give the preference to the Greek. He has indeed represented the human species in a very bad light, but he has not endeavoured to reduce men to a level with brutes; nor do we, in his writings, meet with any of those low and disgusting images, which prove no small want of delicacy in the Dean. I would by no means, however, aim at depreciating the latter; his beauties are highly to be admired, but his defects are too glaring to be unobserved. Swift has been happily imitated; Lucian has remained, to this day, inimitable: neither Monfrur Fontenelle, nor any other copyist among the moderns, seems to have perfectly caught his manner.

Mr. de Voltaire does but justice to our countryman, when he declares, that it is too faint a praise of the Dean, to call him the English Rabelais.—Rabelais may be considered as a buffoon amongst authors; whereas Swift instructs even in his wildest flights.—As Lucian never wrote in verse, we shall not compare them with regard to this article: but it must be allowed, that there is as much humour in the poetry of Swift, as his prose. It is evident that he took Butler for his model in verse; but here he seems to be at least equal to his original: his poems being much more correct, and full as picturesque as those of that celebrated poet. This appears plainly from his Baucis and Philemon, which is by many critics considered as his Chief d'Oeuvre.

The Excursion: By Mrs. Brooke, Author of Lady Julia Mandeville and Emily Montagu.

P A R T I.

A rural Scene—Character of Col. Dormer—of Louisa and Maria Villiers—A Journey to London.

ON a mild evening in September last, as the two nieces of Col. Dormer, a gentleman of small fortune in Rutland, were leaning over the terrace-wall of their uncle's garden, admiring the radiant lustre of the setting sun, the mixed gold and azure which played on a rustic temple belonging to a neighbouring villa, praising the heart-felt pleasures of retirement and the tranquil joys of a rural life, the lovely Lady H——, whose charms had raised her to the most distinguished rank, happened to pass by, in a superb carriage, with a numerous train of attendants, in her way to the North. The sisters, for which we shall hereafter account, were differently affected: Louisa beheld this splendid equipage with languid admiration, and returned to contemplate the objects which had before engaged her attention. The eyes of Maria, on the contrary, followed the coach till it was out of sight; she continued some time after gazing at vacancy: awaking at length from her reverie, she looked at her sister in silence; she sighed; her bosom beat with an emotion unknown before; she forgot 'the radiant lustre of the setting sun, the mixed gold and azure which played on the rustic temple, the heart-felt pleasures of retirement, the tranquil joys of a rural life;' and felt, for the first time, the poison of ambition at her heart. She walked slowly, with her sister, towards the house; she stopped—after a short pause—'Don't you think, Louisa?'—she hesitated—conscious of the idea which filled her whole soul, she fixed her eyes on the ground; the rising blush of modesty expanded on her lovely cheek.—The supper-bell now made them quicken their pace; but, before they obey its summons, let me introduce to the acquaintance of my reader the two heroines of my story, with the respectable man, under whose roof they had passed the last ten years of their lives.

Louisa and Maria Villiers were the twin-daughters of a country gentleman; or, to use a phrase more suited to his character, a squire, a race happily almost extinct, who was descended from a worthy family in Nottinghamshire. To give his history in few words, before he arrived at the age of 32, he had wasted a decent estate in the elegant pleasures of racing, cock-fighting, and drinking, with beings as much below the standard of humanity as himself; and sent out of the world, with a broken heart, an amiable wife after two years marriage. He died himself, happily for his daughters, whilst they were still of an age to profit by the excellent education given them by their mother's brother, Col. Dormer; who, in every literary pursuit becoming their sex, had been himself their preceptor; and who had gone even beyond the bounds of his little fortune to procure them, as far as his remote situation and retired manner of living made possible, those external accomplishments on which most grave people are apt to set too little value; or, in the words of a late noble writer, to give them 'The graces.' This gentleman, the worthy protector of our heroines, was the younger son of a very noble family in a distant part of the kingdom:

dom: he had entered early into the army, where he had served with honour; but a weak constitution, some military disappointments, a native love of retirement, a quarrel with the head of his family, and the death of a wife he loved to adoration, had determined him to quit the service at thirty, though he had every thing to hope from continuing in it: he had bought a small house, with an estate of about five hundred pounds a year, at Belfont, a delightful village in Rutland; where, as the human mind must always have a pursuit, he acquired a passion for gardening; a passion which filled up those hours which might have lain heavy on his hands, and chased the monster Ennui, to avoid whose chilling embrace, men turn rakes, heroes, gamesters, politicians, and hunt folly thro' her ever-varying circles. But to return: the shattered remains of Mr. Villiers's estate, after paying a heavy load of debt, produced about three thousand pounds; which, with good birth, and more than a common share of beauty, composed the whole patrimony of our amiable orphans.

I have said, my heroines were handsome: they were much more; they had the soul, as well as the outward form, of beauty: they had countenance, character, expression. Louisa was fair, her features regular, her hair auburn, her eyes the celestial blue of the poets: she had a look of blended softness, languor, and indolence, which strongly painted the native features of her mind. Maria—But, as she is to stand on the foreground of the picture, she deserves a more particular description.

Maria then—Her face was oval, her complexion brown, her eyes dark and full of fire, her nose Greek, her mouth small, her teeth regular and of the most pearly whiteness, her under lip a little pouting. Her chestnut tresses would have waved (if the despotic tyrant fashion had allowed them the liberty of waving) in natural ringlets down her bosom. She was tall, and elegantly formed; her every motion exquisitely graceful; but it was a gracefulness I know not how to define; it was what courts may improve, but cannot bestow; it was native, I had almost said wild; it was unstudied, spontaneous, and varied, as the lovely play of the leaves when gently agitated by the breath of zephyr. Natural in all, she had, when conversing with those she loved, a smile of bewitching sweetness; but, when injured, a look of ineffable disdain; a look which however became her, because it evidently arose from the occasion. Warm, sincere, simple, unaffected, undisguised, every turn of temper and of sentiment was painted instantaneously on her countenance. She had one charm, which is of infinitely more importance than is generally supposed; I mean, that luxurious melody of voice in speaking, which passes irresistibly to the heart. Though beauty was the portion of each, yet nothing could have less resemblance than the persons of these sisters; though virtue formed the basis of each character, yet nothing could differ more than the features of their minds. Louisa was mild, inactive, tender, romantic; Maria quick, impatient, sprightly, playful: nor were their views and wishes less opposite; Louisa fancied happiness reposed on roses in the shade; Maria sighed to pursue the fugitive goddess through the brilliant mazes of the world. Each had the bloom of health; but it glowed more vivid on the cheek of Maria. Col. Dormer, their uncle and guardian, though he had passed his youth in the mixed society of mankind, still retained that beautiful simplicity of character which is generally the companion of every exalted understanding: he was well-bred, as much from his early intercourse with the great world (an intercourse which had been long almost intirely suspended), as from the feelings of a heart naturally desirous to please; but that good-breeding never passed the bounds of the most exact and undeviating sincerity. Generous to the extent of his income, frank, hospitable, cheerful, his table was the seat of decent plenty and convivial delight. An enthusiastic admirer of truth, nature, and genuine beauty; his house, his gardens, his fields, every thing around him, reflected his own mind. Simplicity, neatness, elegance, were the characteristics of his little domain; delicate in his choice, attentive in his culture, his flowers bloomed more fair, his fruit had a more delicious flavour, than those of his more opulent neighbours.

Indeed his most striking failing was that of valuing himself rather too much on this subordinate merit: he would I am afraid, have been better pleased with the reputation of being the most skilful gardener, than the best officer, or even the wealthiest man, in the kingdom. He was tall, had fine eyes, a dark and rather pale complexion; with the air and deportment of a man who had seen that world from which he had long withdrawn.

Mr. Dormer this evening perceived a thoughtfulness and constraint in Maria's behaviour, which, being unusual, exceedingly alarmed him: he told her so; she pleaded, what she really felt, the headache, and retired early to her apartment. She passed the night without rest; the ideas of coaches, coronets, titles, filled her mind, and effectually murdered her

She rose, determined to pass the winter in London, the only place, according to her new-born idea, beauty and merit were allowed their sterling value; but greatly perplexed in what manner to propose to her uncle a design which she was absolutely certain he would disapprove.

Col. Dormer, though he knew the human heart, had yet never thought of taking his nieces into more active scenes of life; he had fallen into the common mistake of people past the meridian of their days, who, feeling tranquility their greatest good, do not sufficiently reflect that it is insipid at that season when expectation and the wish for novelty are the springs which actuate the mind; when all opens fair on the dawning imagination, and a thousand ideal pleasures play in the cheerful rays of hope. Youth is of itself gay and vivacious; Maria possessed, in a superior degree, every charm of that enchanting age; her conversation exceedingly amused him, and it never occurred to him that his might not equally amuse her, or that she could have a wish beyond the little paradise of Belfont.

Maria wished to methodise her plan, a plan she was however resolved at all events to pursue, before she proposed the journey to her uncle. After waiting two months, a conjecture presented itself, which seemed favourable to her wishes: by the will of a relation she was, though not of age, to receive immediately a legacy of two hundred pounds, which she was to employ in whatever manner she thought proper, without accounting to her guardian. A favourite servant of her late mother, a woman of worthy character, had just before taken a house in Berners street, and had written to intreat her recommendation of some single lady to hire her best apartments, which she assured her were fitted up with the utmost elegance. And, what made this house particularly agreeable to her, it was in the next street to a lady with whom she had made an acquaintance the preceding summer; a lady whom she extremely loved, and under whose protection she hoped to be introduced, with every advantage, into the brilliant circle for which her heart now so ardently panted. This lady, Mrs. Herbert, was a young widow of fashion and unblemished character; rich, good-humoured, lively, dissipated, and a little capricious; she had spent the summer with a family in Col. Dormer's neighbourhood, and, finding no being half so pleasing in the little coterie with whom she lived when in the country, had distinguished Maria by a very flattering preference; a preference which her young heart, then unemployed, ever on the qui vive, and not absolutely satisfied with the calm though steady affection of her sister, returned by the most animated friendship. Nor was Mrs. Herbert insensible to Maria's regard; on the contrary, she had her perpetually with her, and found a thousand charms in her conversation: she had indeed taken such an amazing fancy to her, that nothing, but this amiable girl's being fifty times handsomer than herself, could have prevented her giving her an invitation to her house in town. Mrs. Herbert really loved Maria, as much as she could love any thing except admiration; but that was her primary object, and she well knew the science of light and shade was as necessary a study to a beauty as to a painter. She therefore chose for her constant companion, particularly in public, a long, lean, brown, young lady, of good family, and not ungenteel, but with a face about three scruples handsomer than that of Medusa; doated on the Opera and Ranelagh, because there were no two places where people looked so well; and abjured the Pantheon, not because it was triste, but because it was unbecoming. To this friend Maria would at first have communicated her design, had she not pleased herself with the idea of surprising her by an unexpected visit. She was a little tempted to ask Louisa to accompany her; but, when she reflected, that, by so doing, she should leave her uncle in absolute solitude, she waved the idea, and determined to undertake the journey alone. Had she asked her concurrence, she had however probably been refused. Louisa's blue eyes had not been turned on the rustic temple merely to admire the radiant lustre of the setting sun, but to contemplate the human face divine, in the person of a very handsome youth, the only son of the squire of the parish, but who, happily, had not an atom of squireism in his composition. In short, Louisa loved; Maria's hour was not yet come; a distinction which will sufficiently account for the different manner in which they had been affected by the brilliant object which had banished peace from the bosom of the latter. After settling the plan with herself, Maria determined to pursue it the moment she could assume sufficient courage to disclose to Col. Dormer her wish to pass a few months in London. She knew he would remonstrate, but she had previously resolved it should be in vain: she was clear his disapprobation would be only temporary; and painted to herself in glowing colours his rapture and surprise, when he should see her return to Belfont, after an absence of two or three months, with a ducal coronet on her coach; an event of which she had not the remotest doubt.

To recount all Maria's timid efforts to unveil her purpose to her uncle, and to observe how often her heart failed her, would be exceedingly uninteresting to the reader. Suffice it then to say, that, after several weeks of irresolution, during which the agitation of her mind exceedingly affected her temper, and in some degree her health, Maria proposed the journey with hesitation, and her uncle resisted with firmness; till, at last, wearied out, not convinced, and at once distressed and softened by seeing the gloom continue, which he hoped would have passed over like a light cloud before the summer breeze, he, after a thousand cautions against the arts of a world to which she was a perfect stranger, reluctantly gave his consent. He cautioned her, not against the giants of modern novel, who carry off young ladies by force in post-chaises and fix with the blinds up, and confine free-born English-women in their country-houses, under the guardianship of monsters in the shape of fat housekeepers, from which duration they are happily released by the compassion of Robert the butler; but against worthless acquaintance, unmerited calumny, and ruinous expence. The first dangers he knew were generally imaginary; the latter, alas! too real. After many long conversations, in which this amiable old man drew a faithful picture of the various evils to which she was going unnecessarily to expose herself; and which she heard with the attention generally given by presumptuous, believing, unsuspecting youth to the prudent lessons of wary experience; her journey was fixed for Tuesday the 10th of January; and an old grey-headed footman, who had lived twenty years with Mr. Dormer, was ordered to prepare to go with her, and attend on her whilst in town.

Behold her at length in possession of her uncle's consent, though obtained in a manner which did not quite satisfy her feelings. His arguments appeared to have some weight, though she was pre-determined not to be convinced by them. She saw something like just drawing in the dark shades of his pencil, though the lines seemed a good deal exaggerated: she reflected, she doubted; but, after settling a balance in her mind, she found her own scale preponderate; and easily obviated all the dangers he had so elaborately displayed, by determining to make no new acquaintance to whom she should not be introduced by her friend, Mrs. Herbert; and to return, if unsuccessful, to the tranquil shades of Belfont, as soon as the legacy, which she had appropriated to the execution of her plan, should be expended. As to calumny, such was her knowledge of the world, that she thought herself secure from its attacks, only by resolving not to merit them.

On Tuesday then, the 10th of January, about ten o'clock, Col. Dormer's post-chaise (for he would not trust her to any other conveyance) drove up to the door. The tears of her sister, the benevolent concern on the countenance of her uncle, with her own involuntary horror at leaving what was almost her paternal roof, and parting with friends so tenderly attached to her, a little shook her resolution: but her desire of pursuing this ardent impulse of her soul was a resistless torrent, which her own good sense, and her respect for the opinion of the man on earth whom she believed the wisest and best, in vain opposed. Louisa prest her to her bosom; neither of them were able to speak. Mr. Dormer led her to the chaise; he kissed her cheek, 'My dear child,' said he, 'as I cannot prevent your imarking on the tempestuous ocean of the world, I have only this to add; when beat by the storm, remember you have a safe port always within your reach.' The chaise, attended by John on horseback, had proceeded through half the village, when, on turning the corner of a street, the terrace of her uncle's garden struck Maria's sight: the tears gushed from her eyes, her heart reproached her with ingratitude, she felt her uncle's excess of goodness, she felt the happiness she was going to quit, and was on the point of ordering the servant to return: she had even let down the foreglass of the chaise for that purpose, when the fond deceiver, Hope, painted to her lively imagination the gaudy scene which had originally misled her. Her sister's affection, her uncle's accumulated kindness, the silent language of her own heart, every whisper of discretion and of sentiment, the pictures drawn by Truth and nature, faded away before the dazzling blaze of a coronet. She drew up the glass, and proceeded on her journey, her bosom beating with mingled regret and expectation. We will leave her on the road, and return for a moment to Belfont.

Mr. Dormer and Louisa stood some time at the window without speaking: at length the latter put an end to the silence, by venturing to ask her uncle a question, which probably the reader may have been inclined to ask already: 'Why, if he foresaw such dangers in her sister's being in London unprotected, he had not himself accompanied her?' He was struck by the question, as it had more than once obtruded itself on his own mind : he answered her as he had before answered himself : he pleaded his decline of life, his indolence of temper, his delicate health, his disgust of the world, his love of tranquillity and retirement. He did not perhaps himself perceive the governing spring of his reluctance to quit Belfont. At another season he would not have hesitated a moment ; but to leave his garden during the three most important months of the year—his early flowers, his hyacinths then ready to blow, his tulips, his anemones, his auriculas ; his lovely new polyanthus, the invaluable present of a curious friend at the Hague—all the blooming hope of the genial spring, the floral pride of the rising year—all, all, would too probably perish, if he left the tender nurselings, or (to speak in technical terms) the babes, at this critical juncture. But to resume our story. Louisa was unwilling to carry the subject too far ; she trembled lest her uncle should return her question by another—it was so natural she should have desired to accompany her sister—so natural Col. Dormer should be surprised she never made the offer.—She therefor changed her style, spoke of Mrs. Herbert's attachment to Maria, of the immense advantage of having such a friend to consult on every occasion, a friend in possession of general esteem, and able to introduce her with eclat into the best company ; of the great faithfulness of John, and the good woman in whose house Maria was to reside ; and concluded, by observing, that her sister's excursion would amuse and perhaps improve her ; and could have no further ill consequence than dissipating a part (or what if all) of the legacy which seemed to have been left her for that very purpose. They passed into the garden, and from the terrace cast a tender look at the great road, where they endeavoured to trace the wheels of Maria's carriage. Mr. Dormer was absorbed in thought ; Louisa perhaps stole, unobserved, a look at the rustic temple.

Maria's chaise flew along with a velocity almost equal to her impatience, till it stopped at the Bell at Stilton ; where, reflecting on the inconvenience her uncle must suffer by being without a carriage, she, though contrary to his express injunction, sent it back, and took a post-chaise the rest of the way. In compassion to old John, who found some difficulty in keeping up with her, she slept that night at Biggleswade, and got into London about five the next afternoon, without meeting with any adventure worthy the dignity of history to recount. Mrs. Merrick, with whom she was to lodge, a little, fair, fat, honest, loquacious, good-humoured, good sort of personage, of about forty-six, met her at the door with a thousand curtesies, a thousand smiles of undissembled affection, and conducted her to her apartment, where she had scarce entered, when she dispatched a card to inform Mrs. Herbert of her arrival, and to beg to see her immediately. Her heart danced with hope ; she counted the moments with impatience : John returned ; she met him on the stairs ; when he informed her, the day was at Paris, and the time of her being in England uncertain. It is not necessary to paint her disappointment ; she was however constrained to submit ; she drank her tea, she supped, she retired to rest ; she passed the next day, and the next, in solitude ; it was the first time in her life she had been alone ; she sat down pensive to her silent meal ; the shades of evening came, but came unattended by the cheerful voice of domestic pleasure ; the enlivening smile of friendship, the social, the convivial hour was far away. She listened, in expectation of the knew not what ; she heard a thousand coaches, but they passed her door ; she saw crowds, but to these crowds she was unknown : she seemed a solitary being, cut off from the society of human kind ; she sighed for the shades of Belfont ; the promised scene of happiness she found a dreary void.

Demand, &c. by Lieut. Col. Walcott, April 2, 1777, of Return of Prisoners.

WHEREAS General Washington did, in his letter to General Howe, bearing date the 30th day of June, 1776, declare, That he was authorized to propose, and he did in said letter accordingly propose, a general exchange of all prisoners of war, in the manner and upon the terms following, viz. "officers for officers of equal rank, soldier for soldier, and citizen for citizen : " To which proposal his Excellency General Sir William Howe did, in his answer of the first of August following, accede and agree. And whereas, in pursuance of this agreement, Gen. Sir Wm. Howe, relying upon the honour and good faith of Gen. Washington, for the due and punctual performance thereof on his part, hath, at several times, sent and delivered over to Gen. Washington, as will fully appear from the lists with them transmitted, a number of officers on their parole, and upwards of two thousand two hundred privates, of the enemy his prisoners; and who, as well officers as privates, are still to be considered as such until they shall be regularly exchanged, officers for officers of equal rank, and the privates by a like number of those now in the possession of Gen. Washington; some of whom, having been taken before, or about the time of concluding the agreement, have, in direct violation thereof, been detained as prisoners for full eight months, and others, taken in the latter end of December and in the beginning of January last, have been in the like condition of prisoners for three months; none, or very few of whom, have hitherto been sent in, in return or exchange of the number of prisoners sent by Gen. Howe to Gen. Washington. I, Lieut. Col. William Walcott, vested with full powers for this, among other purposes, do therefore, in the most positive and peremptory manner, require and demand of Gen. Washington the full and due performance of the agreement above recited; and consequently the speedy and immediate release of all prisoners of war, whether British, Hessians, Waldeckers, Provincials or Canadians, as well officers as soldiers, now in his possession, or so far as they shall or may go towards the exchange of those sent and delivered over to Gen. Washington. And whereas there are still in the possession of Gen. Sir William Howe a very considerable number of officers, and a number of privates of the enemy, prisoners unexchanged; I do farther require and demand of Gen. Washington, that so soon as he shall have completed the exchange of those already delivered over to him, agreeable to my requisition and demand for that purpose, he shall proceed to the exchange of these last mentioned officers and privates, in conformity to the agreement of the 30th of July, and the 1st of August, 1776; to the execution of which the groundless and unprecedented objections offered on the part of Gen. Washington, by Lieut. Col. Harrison, cannot with any degree of reason, or consistently with common sense, be allowed or admitted as obstacles. The one, that "the whole of the prisoners contained in the Commissary's lists, and delivered over to General Washington; should not be accounted, for, because many of them died on their return to the place of their destination, and many immediately after their arrival." Posterior therefore confessedly, from the objection itself as stated, to their being delivered over to Gen. Washington; all of whom, therefore, must be, and all of whom, this objection notwithstanding, I do again require and demand to be exchanged, according to the express terms of the agreement, "soldier for soldier," for every man delivered to the person who received them for and in the behalf of Gen. Washington: the other, "The case of Lieut. Col. Lee," whose release General Washington might with greater propriety demand, whenever, within the terms of the said agreement, "officers for officers of equal rank," he shall have in his possession an officer of rank equal to the reputed rank of the gentleman in question; but until that appear, the demand and objection upon this subject are at least premature. I do moreover expect and demand, that an immediate and categorical answer shall be given to these just and reasonable requisitions and demands. Given at the house of the Rev. Mr. Beech, in the township of Hillsborough, the 2d day of April, 1777.

W. WALCOTT, Lieut. Colonel.

To Gen. Washington, &c. &c.

(C O P Y.)

General Washington's Answer to the foregoing Letter.

S I R, Morrisstown, April 9, 1777.

I Take the liberty of transmitting you a copy of a paper addressed to me by Lieut. Colonel Walcott of your army, which came inclosed in a letter from Lieut. Gen. Lord Cornwallis. It is with peculiar regret I am constrained to observe, that this illiberal performance of Col. Walcott is obviously calculated to answer a less generous purpose than that of merely effecting an exchange, contains a gross misrepresentation of facts, and is a palpable deviation from that delicate line, which I expected would mark his conduct as a man of candour and ingenuity.

That gentleman has censured two articles insisted on by me through Lieut. Col. Harrison, at their meeting on the 10th ult. as groundless, unprecedented, and inconsistent with any degree of reason or common sense, though founded as I conceive, in the clearest principles of equity and justice.—Not contenting himself with this, which would have given me no concern, he has assumed the privilege of mutilating and mistating those articles, in such a manner, as to change their meaning, and to adapt them to the unfair conclusions he wished to establish.

Having premised these things, and being charged charged in direct and positive terms by Col. Walcott, who acted under your authority, with a violation of the agreement made between us for the exchange of prisoners, and called upon for a performance of the same, I think it necessary to explain the motives of my conduct and the grounds on which those articles or objections stand.

By respect to the first, I freely repeat, that I do not hold myself bound, either by the spirit of the agreement, or by the principles of justice, to account for those prisoners, who, from the rigour and severity of their treatment, were in so emaciated and languishing a state at the time they came out, as to render their death almost certain and inevitable, and which, in many instances, happened while they were returning to their homes, and in many others after their arrival. You must be sensible that our engagement, as well as all others of the kind, though in letter it expresses only an equality of rank and number as the rule of exchange, yet it necessarily implies a regard to the general principles of mutual compensation and advantage. This is inherent in its nature, is the voice of reason, and no stipulation, as to the condition in which prisoners would be returned, was requisite. Humanity dictated, that their treatment should be such as their health and comfort demanded; and where her laws have been duly respected, their condition has been generally good.—Nor is this the language of humanity alone—justice declares the same. The object of every cartel, or similar agreement, is the benefit of the prisoners themselves and that of the contending powers,—on this footing, it equally exacts, that they should be well treated, as that they should be exchanged: The reverse is therefore an evident infraction, and ought to subject the party, on whom it is chargeable, to all the damage and ill consequences resulting from it. Nor can it be expected, that those unfitted for future service by acts of severity, in direct violation of a compact, are proper subjects for an exchange. In such a case, to return others not in the same predicament, would be to give without receiving an equivalent, and would afford the greatest encouragement to cruelty and inhumanity. The argument drawn from the mere circumstance of the prisoners having been received, is of no validity. Tho' from their wretched situation, they could not at that time be deemed proper for an exchange, our humanity required that they should be permitted to return amongst us. It may perhaps be fairly doubted, whether an apprehension of their death, or that of a great part of them, did not contribute somewhat to their being sent out when they were. Such an event, whilst they remained with you, would have been truly interesting, because it would have destroyed every shadow of claim for the return of the prisoners in your hands; and therefore policy, concurring with humanity, dictated that the measure should be adopted. Happy had it been, if the expedient had been thought of before these ill fated men were reduced to such extremity. It is confessed however on all sides, that after their delivery they still continued your prisoners, and would be so, till regularly exchanged. I acknowledge, that I should be, and I have been, always willing, notwithstanding this confession, to account for every man who was in a proper condition, and fit to be exchanged at the time they came out, so far as the proportion of prisoners with us would extend. With what propriety, or upon what foundation of justice, can more be demanded? This has been proposed, or what is the same, was most clearly implied in the first article, or objection, made by Lieut. Col. Harrison, and illiberally rejected since, inconsistent with any degree of reason or common sense. Painful as it is, I am compelled to consider it as a fact not to be questioned, that the usage of our prisoners whilst in your possession, the privates at least, was such as could not be justified. This was proclaimed by the concurrent testimony of all who came out, their appearance sanctified the assertion,—and melancholy experience, in the speedy death of a large part of them, stamped it with infallible certainty.

In respect to the second article insisted on,—your discriminating Major Gen. Lee from other captive officers belonging to the American army, demanded my particular attention. I was authorized to conclude from your laying him under particular restraints, and from your letters of the 23d of Jan. last, that you considered him in a singular point of view, and meant to exclude him from the common right of exchange, stipulated for all officers in general terms. This distinction, the more injurious and unwarrantable as you never excepted him, though you knew him to be an officer in our army at the time, and long before the agreement was entered into, made it my duty to assert his right in an explicit manner, and to endeavour to put the matter on so unequivocal a footing as to ensure his enlargement whenever an officer of equal rank, belonging to your army, should be in our power. This was attempted by the article, and nothing more nor is any other inference to be drawn from it.—It is true, a proposition was made since since his captivity, to give a certain number of officers of inferior rank in exchange for him; but it was not claimed as a matter of right.—What name then does that proceeding merit, by which it is suggested, that the immediate release of Gen. Lee had been demanded, without having an officer of equal rank to give for him? The suggestion cannot be supported by the most tortured exposition, nor will it have credit where candour is deemed a virtue, and words preserve their form and meaning.

As to the charge of delay in not returning the prisoners in our hands—the dispersed situation of those taken at a more early period of the war, through the different states, arising from the circumstances of their captivity, and a regard to their better accommodation, made their detention for a considerable time unavoidable. When the agreement subsisting between us took place, the speediest directions were given to have them collected, that an exchange might be effected. This was done in part, and at a juncture when motives of policy opposed the measure, but were made to yield to rigid maxims of good faith. We were pursuing the exchange; and continued our exertions to accomplish it, till the miserable appearance, indicating an approaching catastrophe, of those sent out by you, made it improper. For seeing that a difficulty might arise, and that it might be expected that I should account for the whole of them, which I by no means thought equitable, it became necessary that the matter should be adjusted, and the due proportion settled, for which I ought to be responsible, before any thing farther could be done on my part. Upon this ground stands also the detention of those who have been since captured.

Added to these considerations—the discrimination set up in the instance of Gen. Lee, is to be regarded as utterly irreconcilable to the tenor of our agreement, and an unsurmountable obstacle to a compliance with your demands.

Thus, Sir, have I explained the motives of my conduct, and, I trust, vindicated myself, in the eye of impartiality, from the improper and groundless charge which you, and the gentleman acting by your authority, have been pleased to alledge against me.—If in doing this I have departed in the smallest degree from that delicacy which I always wished should form a part of my character, you will remember I have been forced into recrimination, and that it has become an act of necessary justice.

I shall now declare it to be my ardent wish, that a general exchange may take place on generous and liberal principles, as far as it can be effected, and that the agreement subsisting between us for that purpose should be inviolably observed; and I call upon you, by every obligation of good faith, to remove all impediments on your part to the accomplishment of it. If, however, you do not, I console myself with a hope that those unfortunate men, whose lot it is to be your prisoners, will bear their sufferings with becoming fortitude and magnanimity. I am, Sir, with due respect, your most obedient humble servant,

G. WASHINGTON.

His Excellency Gen. Sir WILLIAM HOWE.

Whitehall, July 12, 1777.

Extract of a Letter from General Sir William Howe to Lord George Germaine, dated New-York, June 3, 1777.

YOUR lordship's dispatches, No. 3, 4, and 5, of the 3d of March, and No 4, of the 5th following, I had the honour to receive by major Balfour, on the arrival of his majesty's ship Augusta, the 8th of May; the duplicates of which have since arrived by the Sandwich packet. The earliest opportunity was taken of signifying his majesty's most gracious approbation of the behaviour of the officers whose names are particularized by your lordship.

The arrival of the camp-equipage on the 24th of May, both for the army and provincials, has relieved me from much anxiety, being articles greatly wanted for the opening of the campaign, which will now immediately take place in Jersey, where the enemy's principal strength still remains; and I shall proceed, as occurrences may arise, according to the plan made known to your lordship in my former dispatches.

The remount horses for the 16th and 17th dragoons are arrived in good order, with the loss of ten horses on the passage. The officers of the guards and British recruits also arrived on the 24th of May, the Anspach troops, 452 German recruits, and 51 German chasseurs, on the 3d instant, conveyed by the Somerset. These troops appear to be in very good health, and have disembarked upon Staten-Island to refresh for a short time.

I have the pleasure to inform your lordship of the arrival of major-general Gray in the Somerset.

Major Dixon, of the corps of engineers, who has his majesty's leave to return to Britain, will have the honour of delivering my dispatches to your lordship by the Halifax packet; and I presume upon the acknowledged abilities of this gentleman, and his thorough knowledge of the situation situation of the country, to justify me in referring your lordship to him for the most particular as well as general information.

Letter from Vice-Admiral Lord Viscount Howe to Mr. Stephens.

New-York, June 8.

THE Nonsuch arrived here the 25th past, and the Camel and Bute the 28th, with all the transports, three excepted, of the convoy that sailed at the same time from Portsmouth. They had continued under the conduct of capt. Finch of the Camel, only, since the 6th of May, the Isis and Swift having been separated on the passage. Two of the missing transports came in a few days before, and the third a few days after capt. Finch. But the Isis and Swift did not arrive till the 7th inst.

On the 3d instant capt. Ourry arrived in the Somerset, with the transports he had in charge; but the Mercury parted company the third day after they left the British coast. The troops by both these convoys are in good health.

Capt. Mason arrived here on the 7th instant, in the Dispatch, with the Springfield and two more transports, part of the convoy that sailed from England under the charge of capt. Onslow. As the separation happened when they were not more than 150 leagues from this port, the arrival of the St. Alban's, with the rest of the transports, may be daily expected.

As there was reason to believe it might be soon requisite to embark a considerable part of the army, timely preparation has been made for the purpose; and as my attendance would be necessary with the transports, in consequence, I have recalled commodore Hotham from the Delaware, to direct the naval operations, and carry on the current service of the port.

Sir George Collier, who commands the detachment of the Squadron at Halifax, will be attentive to afford all possible protection to the fisheries at Canso and Isle Madame.

Then follows a list of captures and recaptures made by the American Squadron between the 1st of January and 22d of May, consisting of 230 captures, and 15 re-captures.

Jotham's Parable, Judges ix.

THE trees to politics inclin'd,
To form a constitution join'd,
Resolv'd to stand the test of fate
They aim at monarchy and state;
They after long debate consent
To institute a government,
And one of the fraternal race
Should deign to take the monarch's place.
An universal joy express'd,
The Olive Tree was thus address'd:
Take thou the sceptre in thy hands,
And we'll submit to thy commands;
But he disdain'd the regal pride,
And to the suppliant tribe reply'd:
Shall I who give the nations peace
And bid the thund'ring warrior cease;
Who when atoning rites are given
Ascend in curling clouds to heav'n?
Shall I my oil exchange away
In lieu of crowns and princely sway.
The Fig-Tree next to reign was press'd,
Who thus his scornful thoughts express'd:
Shall I renounce my luscious fruit,
And yield to your submissive suit?
I'll rather call my leaves my own,
And spurn the honours of a throne.
Again repuls'd; with like success
The Vine receives the third address;
Who thus replies with high disdain,
Shall I to purchase power to reign,
Cease at each season to produce
Eternal streams of purple juice?
No more with gen'rous wine restore
The lab'ring powers that flagg'd before?
No more the monarch's table grace
Nor flush with beauteous charms the face?
Still disappointed in their aim
The reverend council thus exclaim:
Perhaps the Bramble fraught with pride,
May gird the sceptre to his side;

They spoke, and cringing to the ground
Invok'd the Bramble to be crown'd:
Take the majestic seat they cry,
At whose bequest we'll live or die.
'Tis done, and with ambitious pride
The stupid Bramble thus reply'd:
If the result of your debate
I sit enthron'd in robes of state,
Vest'd with power I'll spread my sway,
My dictates you must swift obey,
Beneath my shade you trust repose,
A shelter from impending woes,
But if a trait'rous race you prove,
Nor dread my hate nor wish my love;
His at my frown nor court my praise,
Strait I'll emit a veng'ful blaze,
At once consume the lofty bough,
On Lebanon's immortal brow.

The following Elegy was occasioned by a Reconciliation between a Wife and her Husband whom her ill Conduct had forced to abandon his Family and friends.

The Reconciliation, an Elegy in Dialogue between a Friend, the Wife, and the Husband.

F R I E N D.

WHAT mean these tears, these glitt'ring drops that fall
Like silver fountains from your beauteous eyes!

Alas! far distant from your tender call,
He sheds such tears, and utters louder cries:
Perhaps heart-broken he now yields his breath,
And calls on you his dear, ungrateful wife;
Perhaps he has already found in death,
The comfort you have robb'd him of in life.

W I F E.

Burst, burst my heart; why dost thou yet remain
Unbroken, after such ingratitude?

Why

Why should the tender youth have sigh'd in vain?

Why should his cheeks have been by me bedew'd?

Fly, monster, to some solitary grove,
Where hush'd footsteps never bent the grass;
Thereby your sorrows prove how much you love,
And let your tears your former faults surpass.

F R I E N D.

Forbear these loud complaints; I know he lives,
And loves you still, though you have been unkind;

In some lone corner of the earth he grieves,
And ev'ry sigh recalls you to his mind.

How many hardships has he undergone!
How often has he call'd upon your name!

He loves you still, and lives for you alone,
And ev'ry day adds fuel to his flame.

W I F E.

Oh! bring me quickly to his sad retreat;
Shew me that face which once was all my joy:

Oh! fly, and let me cast me at his feet,
And in atonement all my life employ.

Oh! with what raptures I shall clasp my love,
And in his arms forget my former pains!

Oh! what content my tender heart shall prove,
Whilst on my breast his lovely forehead leans!

H U S B A N D.

In these sad wilds where heart-felt sorrow dwells,
What wretched mortal dares present his face?

That riv'let, which a forlorn husband swells
With tears of grief for his unhop'd disgrace,

Far from assuaging thirst will parch your tongues;

Those barren rocks, far from producing food,
With pois'nous roots will burn your raging lungs,
And drive you howling from this mournful wood.

W I F E.

Turn, turn your eyes on your unhappy wife,
Who thus repentant at your feet reclains

Your tenderness; whole days, whose nights, whose life,

Shall be a model to all future dames
Of perfect love.

H U S B A N D.

Shall I believe my eyes?

My faithful heart proclaims my ended cares;
Oh heav'n! I thank thee, thou hast heard my cries,

And kind exhausted my most fervent pray'rs.

Description of a Hauling-Home.

THEN flies as most new marry'd persons do,
To taste the joys o'th' bridal bed again,

And brings with him a hogan-mogan train
Of uncles, cousins, friends, relations, neighbours;

Some play on harps, some play on fiddles, tabours,

Some on the bag-pipes, some on hautboys play,
Some drink, some swear, some sing, some roar

away,
As if the devil had case-harden'd their lungs:

Some sit like statues, and some wag their tongues

Like prating parrots, or instructed pies,
Taught by their masters to tell truth and lies.

Hib. Mag. Aug. 1777.

The first that enters makes his scrape and kisses
The bride, then cries, "how fine a country this is!"

Tips off his bumper and devours his cake;
All buss, all sit, all two or three glasses take,
All dine, some dance, some drink, some loil,
some smoke,

Some chat, some play at cards, some crack a joke;

All go to bed, all sleep, all stretch and snore,
Some void the wine they drank the night before,

Some dream of that, some this, some not at all,
Next morn all rise and stalk into the hall;
One swears by C—d, he's glad that girl his niece is,

Then tears a cold roast turkey into pieces,
With both his paws, nor waits for knife or fork.
Diags limb from limb, and makes such greasy work

As would extort a grunt e'en from a sow,
Gives one a wing, another with a bow,
Receives a leg, a third the breast, so on,
Thus the dissected animal is gone.

With loud huzzas they place the bride behind
A silly youth unpolish'd, unrefin'd;
By turns they come to pay their compliments,
"I hope you're easy," and such arguments
As home-bred squires unsettled, uninstructed,
Had learn'd from masters, or from books deducted,

When madam Birch forc'd them to get by heart
Montelion, Reynard, or the second part Of fierce Don Belianis, or Orlando,
Which they retail, it is the most they can do.
The cavalcade arriv'd, the ladies mount
The second story, there to give account
Of what the'ad drank in brandy, wine, and tea,
Which they discharge as Shannon to the sea
Pours in its torrents, or as mountain floods Roll down o'er flowing vallies, fields, and woods;

The cataract the groaning jordan fills,
And streams along the floor in purling rills.
That labour past they all sit down to dine,
And stuff their stomachs with good beef and wine.

The noise of bag-pipes, fiddles, hautbois, chan-ters,

Sets all a trouting like old Bacchus' ranters;
At ev'ry jump you'd think the boule would fall,

They danc'd as if they had no ears at all.

To Miss I. M.

I Sought to approach my lov'd fair,
Implo'ring for leave to adore;
She told me that vain was my pray'r,
Ambition befits not the poor.

I call thee to witness thou moon,
Fair queen of the silver-rob'd train,
And ye groves where I wander at noon,
For oft' have ye heard me complain.

To have riches was ne'er my request,
My temp'rate ambition is such,
I'd rather live poor, and be blest,
Than cuss'd with care and too much.

My time in sad torment is spent,
By day and by night I complain;

C c c c

'Tis needless by day to lament,
At midnight I murmur in vain.
Ah vain is my tender complaint,
My soul sighs her pity can't move;
The nymph is on riches intent,
And alas! I have nothing but love.
I could hope, but that will not avail,
False fortune for ever beguiles;

I know her delusions too well
To trust any more to her smiles.
Adieu then, dear hard-hearted maid,
My 'plaints shall offend thee no more;
Yet think, when in cold earth I'm laid,
Thy shepherd was faithful tho' poor.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

Constantinople, June 9.

THE Porte ordered to be made public, the 27th ult. the agreeable intelligence, that 15,000 Ottoman troops had attacked, near Mendeli, in Irac Arabi, an army of 20,000 Persians, 2000 of which were killed on the field of battle, and the rest were put to flight. As a confirmation of the above, the heads of a great number of Persian officers have been brought hither, who fell in the above battle.

Cadiz, June 10. The St. Jago, of 36 guns, and the Bovadilla, a large ship, of 700 tons burthen, have arrived at this port from the south seas after a very bad voyage. They bring advice of very great disturbances having happened in several parts of the empire of Peru, particularly on the coast towards the sea, where several places have been destroyed, and numbers of the native Indians have joined themselves to the insurgents, who are chiefly mestizes and negroes, and if a stop is not very soon put to their proceedings, they will be attended with the most dangerous consequences. The people of Chili still continue to harass the Spaniards, and give them great trouble, having twice in the year 1775 set the town of Baldivia on fire, and done other considerable damage. The Bovadilla has on board a cargo estimated at four millions three hundred thousand dollars.

Petersburgh, June 17. Early yesterday morning the king of Sweden, under the title of count of Gothland, arrived in a galley at Cronstadt, attended by the counts Scheffer and Posse, general Trolle who commanded the galley, two chamberlains and a secretary; and landing at Oranienbaum, proceeded with baron Nolken to Petersburg, where he did count Panin the honour of a visit, and afterwards dined at baron Nolken's with count Panin, who set out immediately after dinner for Zarco Zelo to announce the arrival of the count of Gothland, whom baron Nolken attended thither. The empress received her illustrious visitor with every mark of friendship; and presented the great duke and duchess to him. After going to the play, and supping with her imperial majesty, the count returned to town, and lodged at baron Nolken's.

To-day the count of Gothland dines with her imperial majesty, at a palace called the Grienuillere, about seven wersts from hence. The count will lodge to-night at baron Nolken's, and will go to-morrow to Zarco Zelo, where he proposes to remain till Saturday, when the count removes to Peterhoff, at which palace apartments are prepared for him.

Lisbon, June 17. An advice-boat sailed this day for Rio de Janeiro, with orders to suspend all hostilities in America between the Spaniards and Portuguese.

Petersburgh, June 24. On Sunday afternoon the count of Gothland received the visits of the foreign ministers, and other persons of distinction: and, after walking in the public gardens of the summer palace, supped at Mr. Berkoy's. Yesterday and this morning the count visited the academies of arts and sciences, and is now set out for Peterhoff, where he will stay till Saturday next, and then return to town to dine with prince Potemkin, at the Newky Islands, and to be present at a review of light troops.

Versailles, July 9. Last Sunday the duke of Aubigny, peer of France, duke of Richmond and Lenox, peer of England, had the honour to return thanks to his majesty for his peerage, registered in parliament the 1st of this month.

Utrecht, July 11. We hear from Messina, that on the 6th of June, at about half past four in the morning, a more violent earthquake was felt there than has been remembered by the oldest man living: the shocks were equal, and not precipitate, or in all probability the town would have been destroyed: but providentially no mischief was done except some old walls thrown down.

HISTORICAL

London, June 9.

MR. Washington's army, we hear, is now collected together, and occupies the advantageous posts from or near Bound Brook, to New-Germantown, a space of about twenty-five miles; and that Mr. Washington himself daily rides from the place last mentioned, to Pluckemin, or Bedminster.

27 Dispatches from Fort St. George and Madras, brought over land, were received at the East-India-House, the latest of which are dated the 11th of January last, and afford the agreeable information that all was well at that period; so that the various reports of the taking and sacking of Madras by the nabob of Arcot, altogether fall to the ground: some of the above accounts say, that the majority once had it in contemplation to send lord Pigot home by the first ship; but that the measure was waved, and that his lordship, agreeable to the above debate, was well at the Mount.

30. The congress have ordered all their cruizers to send or bring their prisoners to America, and not give them their liberty as heretofore.

July 4. At twelve o'clock, the lord mayor, aldermen, &c. went upon the hustings, at Guildhall, when the numbers on the poll of each candidate for the office of chamberlain were declared, which were, for Mr. Hopkins 2132, for Mr. Wilkes 1228, upon which Mr. Hopkins was declared duly elected; afterwards the lord-mayor proceeded to St. Michael's church, Crooked lane, to hold a wardmote for the election of an alderman of Candlewick Ward, in the room of Sir Charles Afigill, who has resigned his gown, when Mr. Wright, in partnership with Mr. Gill, stationer, in Abchurch lane, was elected without opposition.

The merchants, owners of ships, and inferers, observing that the French, in violation of the law of nations, have permitted American privateers not only to bring in British ships and cargoes, but also to sell the same in their ports in Europe, and the West-Indies, many of which privateers, it is well known, are the property of, and manned by Frenchmen: and whereas a continuance of such practices must prove ruinous to the commercial interests of this kingdom, the owners of all such ships and cargoes as have been, or may be taken, and sold in any of the ports of France, or the West-Indies, are earnestly entreated to send the particulars thereof to lord viscount Weymouth, his majesty's secretary of state for the southern department, and also to the lords of the admiralty, in order that administration may be fully apprised of the alarming extent of this growing and destructive evil.

14. One hundred and twenty ships of the British navy are now in commission, viz. six of 90 guns, two of 80, seventeen of 74, one of 70, one of 68, sixteen of 64, two of 56, three of 50, seven of 50, three of 44, two of 36, twenty-two of 32, nineteen of 28, and nineteen of 20 guns.

In consequence of repeated information being sent to the admiralty board of the great number of American privateers cruising in the Irish channel, contracts are made by government for several ships, which are to be fitted out as armed ships, for the better protection of that trade.

15. A common hall was held at Guildhall for the election of sheriffs, for this city and county of Middlesex, in the room of Mess. Wrench and Trotter, the first being dead, and the other having paid his fine; when all the aldermen who had not served the office, and the following gentlemen who had been drank to, viz. Richard Budworth, Esq; coach-maker and coach harness-maker; Charles Vere, Esq; goldsmith; William Nash, Esq; tin-plate worker; Robert Mackreth, Esq; vintner; John Curzon, Esq; vintner; James Savage, Esq; cooper, and Philip Rowden, Esq; vintner, were put up; the shew of hands appearing for Richard Budworth, Esq; and Charles Vere, Esq; they were declared duly elected.

Whitehaven, July 15. During no time last war were the people on this coast half so frightened as they have been lately on the appearance of the American privateers. An express was sent off to our lord lieutenant, Sir James Lowther, to call out the militia for the defence of the coast; as they were apprehensive the Americans would land; to which Sir James sent word that he would immediately call out the militia, and that it might be as little detrimental to the country as possible, he would divide the time, and fix the first fortnight now, the other after harvest. Three companies are accordingly stationed here, viz. one at Workington, one at Mary-port, and one at Cockermouth.

18 His majesty in council was this day pleased to order, that the parliament, which stands prorogued to Monday the 21st of this inst. July, should be further prorogued to Thursday the 18th of September next.

23. Orders have been issued for repairing the fortifications at Kinsale, the Cove of Cork, Waterford, Carrickfergus, and other ports of Ireland, and six frigates will be stationed in St. George's Channel, to prevent the future predations of the provincial privateers.

The Fox man of war, of 28 guns, is taken by two American frigates, one of 32 guns, and the other 26, after an engagement of four hours, in which the Fox lost all her masts, and had many of her crew killed and wounded. The Fox was one of admiral Montague's squadron on the Newfoundland station.

A letter from Paris contains the following very whimsical particulars: "The ladies of this our fanciful metropolis exceed, both in fashion and folly, even those of London. The world, that is to say, that part of it which is inclosed within the walls of Paris, has been lately entertained with the most singular, and the most laughable adventure that ever was recorded in the chronicle of occurrences. Two ladies, eminently distinguished by rank, fortune, and bon gout, have been the subject of general ridicule, merely for harbouring in their curious bosoms the innocent desire of peeping into futurity. The plan concerted between our heroines was, that being decked in all the paraphernalia of diamonds, feathers, and frivolite, (to form that evening the most sparkling jewels of the opera) they were to make their coachman stop at the Temple of Prediction to consult with the priests. Having mounted the fourth stair-case with more perseverance than they would have pursued the path of honour, their dirty oracle answered their hasty, and rather violent rap at the door, with all the haste she was mistress of, and having exhausted all the compliments she had learnt since the age of fourteen, on the occasion, she was ordered to tell, by her art, whether count de L. and the marquis de C. were faithful to their cara sposa, and if they would remain so; and if the answer was agreeable, she would be well paid for resolving resolving that and some other matters of doubt. The matron, with all her profession in her countenance, told our adventurers that her skill was of so peculiar a nature, that she could give no answers to questions whilst the persons making them, have on any kind of ornament, or any wearing apparel whatsoever; and that, unless they would retire into her closet, and divesting themselves of every thing they had on, return in the original nakedness of their mother Eve, she could not give them the satisfaction they required. The scheme tickled the imagination of our laughter-loving ladies, and, without loss of time, they stripped; diamonds, feathers, trinkets, silks, linen, and the endless catalogue of women's parade were laid aside and neglected for the novelty of the thing in hand, and they presented themselves to their Cassandra in the dress of the Venus de Medicis. After some tricks of sagacity belonging to their trade, she said their skins were very favourable to spells, and that with the assistance of her Genius, she should give them much information; but, to receive his inspirations, she must be left alone for ten minutes in the next room; which being agreed to, she left them, shut the door, turned the key upon them, and put it in her pocket; and in the next room with the assistance of her Genius, she packed all their valuables in a bundle, slid gently down stairs, and removed herself to a distant part of the town. The ladies of quality having waited impatiently for more than half an hour, made a terrible noise for their conjurer, which brought the people of the house to them, who, laughing at, and commiserating their situations, lent them some old rags to cover their nakedness, in which they skulked down to their carriage, and went home with the sneers of their servants. The woman has not been heard of, and all the women of Paris still giggle at the joke.

Anecdote of the Emperor of Germany.

The emperor of Germany, on his way to Paris, arriving on the dominions of the duke of Wurtemberg, was received by the prince himself in cog. who insisted on taking care of his majesty's horses, equipage, &c. and also to take him to a house made ready for his arrival. The whole of the prince's attendants were industriously employed in the service of this illustrious traveller, who of course found this imagined hotel the best prepared of any on the road. When the emperor renewed his journey, such fine swift horses were fixed to his carriage, that he confessed they did honour to his landlord, the post-master. The postilion who drove him had not, as the rest, the usual style of habit; a bag wig, rough and undressed, old boots well blacked, and his whole dress manifestly declared the injury that time had made on him; but in mounting his horse he had such an air of activity, that the emperor immediately conceived a favourable opinion of him. When the emperor had taken his place in his carriage, the postilion set off like lightning, and arrived at the appointed stage with an astonishing speed, and such as no other horses the emperor had used could any ways equal. The dextrous postilion was not only immediately called, and well rewarded, but promised a place in the emperor's service if he would accept it. "With all my heart," said the postilion, in a jocular manner. "Very well," said the emperor, "take a draught of wine, and then we'll set off." "Two if you please," said the postilion, and then I'll whip you over six more leagues in a trice." One of the boys of the inn brought him a bottle of wine, which he took in one hand, saluted the emperor with the other, and then drank freely, like a postilion.

The emperor again got into his carriage—"Drive on, my friend," said he, "you shall have something more for your speed." "Oh! by my soul, no doubt, master," said the postilion, "I find you are a worthy gentleman." They presently arrived at the stage and refreshed, and the postilion received a handful of ducats, which he took without counting, and went out as going to the stable.—"I never had such a good relief of horses, nor so good a postilion," said the emperor to his landlord.—"I believe it firmly," said the inn-keeper, the horses belonging to his highness the prince of Wurtemberg, and the prince himself was your postilion." The emperor gave immediate orders to go and seek the prince; but it was needless, he set off for his own palace, and it was impossible to overtake him. The emperor was extremely surprised at the singularity of this piece of gallantry, and directly wrote to the prince his acknowledgments for such a condescending service.

Clewelly, Aug. 4.

LAST Thursday were committed to the county gaol, John Mullowny, Andrew Biophy, other wise Bray, Edmund Duggan, other wise Crounkeen, and John Mulloughney; the three former charged on oath with having robbed on the 14th of June last, Thomas Bolland of Garrane in this county, of twenty-one guineas; and the latter charged on oath with stealing two pigs, the property of John Coffee, of Lockwell near Cahell.—Last Friday, Bridget Dunn, charged by the information of John McDonnell, of the liberties of Waterford, with having robbed him of sundries, and of which four guineas and a half in gold, one shilling in silver, one pair of silver buckles, five silk handkerchiefs, and two gold rings, were found on the said Bridget Dunn, when apprehended.—Same Day, John Ryan and Mary Ryan his wife, both of the town of Thurles, charged on suspicion of feloniously breaking open a chest or trunk, about the 19th of June last, the property of Anne Ryan of Thurles aforesaid, and taking therefrom some linen to the amount of 10s. sterl. which was found in the possession of the aforesaid Mary Ryan; and upon being examined, the said persons confessed to have committed said fact.

Trim, Aug. 5. This day Simon Strong was tried on an indictment found against him some time ago, on the examination of his brother, Andrew Strong, for being a popish priest; and was honourably acquitted, the jury finding it an unnatural and malicious prosecution, calculated to deprive him of his paternal property.

Corke, Aug. 7. We can assure the public, that a mechanic in this city, has lately discovered a method of tanning hides in one month, and calf skins in a week without bark, and is more beautiful in colour, and durable in wear, than the old tedious method.

Carlow, Aug. 9. Last Wednesday night, a dreadful fire broke out in the dwelling-house of Mr. James Younge, in Tullow, which entirely consumed the same, whereby an industrious man, and his family have sustained the loss of upwards of one hundred and fifty pounds, together with a very promising youth of ten years old, who perished in the flames.—The above unhappy catastrophe was occasioned by the carelessness of a nurse sticking a candle against the wall in her bed-chamber; and finding the flames had got to so great a progress, she made off without acquainting the unhappy sufferers, and has not since been heard of: Providence however had just awoke them time enough to provide a better asylum, than falling a victim to the impetuosity of the flames.

DUBLIN.

July 23. John Duff, convicted of robbing the mail on Kilmainham-road, and whose execution had been respited from Saturday last, was brought to the gallows at Stephen's-green, where he declared in the most solemn manner his innocence of the crime for which he was condemned to suffer; after some time spent in praying he was turned off, and having hung the usual time was cut down, and being put into a coffin was carried away by his friends. It has been a practice lately, though hitherto without effect, for the populace to endeavour by bleeding, chafing, &c. to recover those unhappy objects to life; in this case, however, their experiments were successful, for after bleeding him a pulsation was observed, upon which he was conveyed to the fields of Portobello, where in less than a couple of hours he exhibited several convulsive motions, opened his eyes and breathed freely; and further assistance being given him, he was restored to existence; but from the neglect of those who were set to watch by him, his veins were burst open again and he died.

27. On Sunday evening three American prisoners arrived under a strong guard at the barrack in Drogheda from the goal of Dundalk. They were brought into that place by a vessel which had been taken by the Americans some time ago, and which had been retaken by the crew, who rose upon the Americans put on board. Two of these men have agreed to enter into the king's service, but the third perseveres in insisting upon being either tried as a rebel, or used as a prisoner of war. They arrived in Dublin the 29th.

Lord Liffle has received a letter from captain Lylight, which says, that the king's troops having marched up to Walthington's camp, found that general so strongly entrenched, that they concluded it impracticable to attack him in that situation; and having performed several ineffectual manœuvres to draw him out, made a regular retreat. That when the king's forces had marched about a mile and a half, their rear was furiously attacked by the Americans; and 300 British soldiers fell, among whom were several officers; many are also wounded—in particular captain Lylight, who received a musquet ball in his neck. This letter is dated July 23, and came by the way of Corke.

An eminent merchant in this city has received a letter from France, which informs him, that an American privateer having taken an English vessel, bound from France to England, she was re-taken by a French man of war, and delivered to the owners. This shews that the French are determined to preserve a free commerce to them-themselves from the depredations of every country—a wise policy, which once inspired our forefathers; for we find that the preservation and protection of merchants and traders was one of the articles of Magna Charta, the great bulwark of our liberties; and Montesquieu mentions it as a distinguishing evidence of English justice and humanity.

The following extraordinary instance of the power of vegetation, in the transmutation of one species of corn into another, may be depended on as a fact. A gentleman sowed a handful of oats on the 21st of June; and again another handful on the 26th of July following. The first, as soon as above the ground, he cropped at three several times, viz. on the 29th of July, the 8th of September, and the 18th of November. The last he cut only twice, viz. on the 13th of September and 18th of November. The succeeding winter happening to prove very severe, almost all the grain perished in the earth through the inclemency of the weather. Five of them however remained alive; shot up in spring, and produced large and full ears of good rye, which was ripe on the 7th of August, and was cut as a curiosity. An experiment something similar to the above was made in the year 1756 in Holland, and a proof of its resiliency to their high mischiefs, the states, by a very curious naturalist, Jop. Bern. Vergin, a native of that country: But it does not appear that any particular notice was taken of it.

An affidavit has been made before Mr. Barber, of Dungarvan, by the crew of a sloop from Court-machery to Dublin; purporting, that on Tuesday last the 29th of July they were fired at and brought to, about two leagues south of Ballycotton Island, by a brig of 12 carriage and several swivel guns, whose people told them that she was seven weeks from Philadelphia, and had taken seven prizes, two of which they took the 27th ult. a few leagues from Cape Clear; there were six brigs in sight, which the privateer's men said were their consorts and bound up the Irish channel.

Extract of a letter from Lisbon, July 12.

"You will scarcely believe me when I tell you that there is a ship already arrived here with fish from Newfoundland, and now selling off her cargo. She is called the Happy Return, captain Martin Murphy, and belongs to Waterford in Ireland. 'Tis strange, yet true, she has performed the whole business of catching and curing her fish, with the voyage to and from Newfoundland, in something more than four months, having sailed thither the 9th of March, and arrived here on the 7th inst. where she will meet with an excellent market, being so early and the first ship."

Two soldiers belonging to the 68th regiment of foot, received sentence of death to be executed at Gallows-hill, near Kilmarnock, on Saturday the 13th of September next, for robbing Daniel Gale, Esq; on the king's high way.

We hear from Cork that a very curious experimental farmer near that city, having last summer manured a considerable quantity of well prepared ploughed land, with a mixture of roche lime, marle, and sea-wreck, sowed it with the finest red French wheat, imported by himself from Rouen, which has exceeded his most sanguine expectations, not only in quantity and quality, but in early growth and maturity. Twenty acres are already levered and stocked in the field, and the rest is nearly got up, which is more than can be said of any County in this kingdom, not excepting that of the metropolises.

The Albion, lately at anchor in the bay, drew multitude of the citizens on board, to large a vessel having never been so near Dublin. The officers were extremely polite, and seemed to take peculiar pleasure in gratifying the curiosity of every person who went on board. A number of hands under the direction of the boatswain were employed in hawling up, by a tackle, a chair which was fixed for the purpose of bringing the ladies on board; and indeed every civility which it was possible to bestow, and every attention which could be paid, all who have gone on board this man of war while she was at anchor in the bay have experienced.

It often happens, either through inexperience or inattention, that gentlemen, as well as farmers, have their hay spoiled from cutting it down at such times as there is a moral certainty of the weather being unfavourable. And as hay is so necessary an article, out of compassion to the beasts of the field, as well as out of friendship to mankind, we recommend the following general rule for their guidance in this respect, viz — When the moon changes, or comes to the full, at any hour between six o'clock in the evening, and eight o'clock in the morning, there is a just reason to expect fair weather: and it often sets in three days before the full or change, in which case you may expect the weather to continue fair six or seven days. The same observations will hold good with respect to the harvest for corn. It is written in the infallible oracles of truth, "that the wind bloweth where it listeth," and the rain cometh sometimes unexpected, yea, contrary to the rule here laid down: but in general it is otherwise, and we write from at least twenty-seven years experience. One of our friends to whom we communicated our remarks, followed the advice, and he has always found it to answer better abundantly, than before he attended to what is here laid down.

Last Wednesday se'nnight, about half past eleven o'clock, three gentlemen coming to town from Howth, were surrounded, near the Charter-school on the north strand, by a very glaring light, which they at first imagined might be a flash of lightning; but on its continuing some seconds, they looked to see whence it proceeded, and perceived a great ball of fire (apparently about the bigness of a football) descending from the heavens. Its direction was south east, and motion much like what is vulgarly called the shooting of a star. It vanished in the same manner as a squib that makes no report. Some other people saw this unusual phenomenon, and were much terrified.

Fourteen bullocks were lately houghed on the lands of Clonburn, in the county of Roscommon, belonging to Sir Richard St. George, bart. It is imagined the diabolical perpetrators had the blade of a scythe fastened to a pole to accomplish their wicked purpose.

The brigantine Lovely Betty, Thomas Darcy, master, which sailed from Dublin bound to Antigua, the 13th of last April, was taken on the 31st of May by the Fly American armed sloop, of 14 carriage guns, and 14 men, chiefly foreigners, commanded by Thomas Palmer, about forty leagues to the east of Antigua, and carried into St. Pierre's in Martinico, the 3d of June.

The following account of a very curious trial appeared in one of the English papers:—"At Croydon assizes, George Philips was indicted for that he having been married to Eleanor Sawyer, at the parish church of Shenley in Hertfordshire, in September, 1768, had likewise married Sarah Warden, in a parish in Surry, in March last, his former wife being then alive. The first witness produced an extract of the parish register of Shenley, certifying his first marriage, which the witness swore was a true copy, and which he himself had compared with the original register. Besides this, the prosecutors strengthened their evidence by producing the living witness who saw them married, and acted as the father, by giving away Eleanor in marriage to the prisoner. The first marriage being fully established, they produced the same kind of evidence of the last marriage, to which the prisoner's council could make no colour of objection. The council for the prisoner did not attempt a denial of the facts, by pleading an alias, an alibi, or non nocui; but set up a very extraordinary defence, that although every person present, which was that he, the prisoner, previous to his marriage with either of these wives, had actually married a third wife (first in order of time) Ann Ledyard, in the year 1765; in proof whereof he likewise produced the same kind of parish register, and also the brother of the said Ann, who proved the marriage, and that the said Ann lived till the year 1775, when she died, at the house of one Mr. Pullen of Field-lane, near Holborn. This testimony was corroborated by Mr. Pullen, as to her living with him some years, and dying at his house; and he produced the undertaker's bill, which he had paid for her funeral. A bricklayer, who formerly worked as a journeyman with the prisoner at St. Alban's, Hertfordshire, swore that he remembered seeing the said Ann come to the prisoner's house, claiming to be his wife, and demanding a maintenance; and that the prisoner acknowledged her to be his wife. Being cross examined, whether he owned his marriage with Nanny, as they called her, before his wife, Eleanor? He could not say as to that: He thought she was not present, but he was positive the prisoner at that time owned Nanny for his wife. A witness proved, that in 1772, the prisoner told him that Nanny was dead at last, and talked of her as his wife. One witness swore he saw her in her coffin. The council for the prisoner having established this first marriage, and the woman living at the time of this second marriage with Eleanor, that was of course null and void, and it being a nullity in law, no verdict in a criminal case could be founded upon it. Eleanor Sawyer never was his lawful wife, consequently when he married Sarah Warden, in March last, near two years after his first wife's death, and having then no lawful wife, he could not be convicted of bigamy; he was entitled to a verdict in his favour. This doctrine was sustained by the bench, and but little disputed by the opposite council. The judge seemed to lament that such a defence could be supposed, and the jury found a verdict—not guilty.

August 14. Thursday evening, about eight o'clock, a most dreadful fire broke out in the house of Mr. Galbraith, in Christ-church-yard, which entirely consumed the same, with all his furniture and effects, and did other very considerable damage. The houses adjoining suffered greatly, particularly Mr. Murphy's, whose goods and furniture were almost all destroyed in the hurry of moving them, and what renders the misfortune still more aggravating is, that not one of the sufferers were injured, a circumstance truly pitiable; as these poor people, from a state of comfortable independence, are now reduced to the most melancholy situation. Were it not for the providential calmness of the night, and the spirited and laudable exertions of the chief magistrate and other persons, who attended, much greater mischief must have been the consequence of this unhappy accident. We since hear that Mr. Galbraith was so severely hurt, in endeavouring to save some part of his effects, that he died the Saturday following, and has left a family in the most poignant distress.

Extract of a letter from Corke, August 12.

In the evening of the 5th inst. the Sally of Lancaster, Cleland, for Jamaica, and the Rawlinson of Lancaster, Preston, for St. Vincent's, sailed from Cove; and last night, about seven o'clock, the Rawlinson put back to Cove, having on Wednesday, the 6th inst. in company with the Sally, been met and attacked by an American privateer brig, mounting 14 carriage guns, a number of swivels, and full of men; they were about 16 leagues S. of the Old Head of Kinale, when the privateer clapped along-side the Sally, which happened to be headmost, and running under her stern, fired a broad side into her, (by which captain Cleland was killed,) and immediately hauled the colours down, and struck. This was about half after six in the evening, when the privateer and captain Preston immediately engaged broadside and broadside; about half after nine captain Preston wounded the privateer's bowprit, that she could not set either jib or stay-sail, and being a fast sailing vessel, she, under favour of the night, stood away before the wind, and left the Sally behind her to captain Preston, who next morning took her in charge. Captain Preston put back to get ammunition, having expended what he carried to sea. His sails were like a sieve, and his rigging in many places wounded. When the privateer attacked these vessels, she had a brig in custody; and captain Preston had some doubts of its being the Queen of Portugal, for Lisbon, which sailed from Cove about two hours before him: but as the Queen of Portugal was a remarkably tall sailer, it is hoped she escaped.

A particular Account of the Limerick Jubilee.

The ladies and gentlemen of Limerick, incited by the laudable intention of making their amusement of service to that city, at the same time they paid a great mark of respect to the heir apparent to the throne of these realms, instituted a jubilee in honour of the prince of Wales, which drew great numbers from all parts, and set many industrious hands at work, as all the preparations for the week's diversion, and the fancy dresses were of Irish manufacture. The whole was planned and conducted by Thomas Smyth, Esq; in a manner that did the highest honour to his taste.

The jubilee began on Tuesday, August 12, being the anniversary of the birth of the prince of Wales. The fancy ball was particularly elegant, the rooms were adorned with a taste and magnificence that surpassed the most sanguine ideas which expectation had raised. The company consisted of about three hundred persons, the supper was plentiful, sumptuous, and well selected, and the whole conducted with the most satisfactory decorum.

The dresses, in general, were well imagined, and properly executed, and the characters justly sustained. The most striking were the following:

Turkish emperors, Thomas Smyth, Esq; Mr. Leslie; Achmet, Mr. Ryves; a Roman senator, colonel Smyth; an Italian prince, Mr. Arthur Douglas, Mr. Gould of Corke; two Spanish Dons, Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Young; Leander, Mr. Nash; a Dutchman, major Burton; Mercury, Mr. T. Grady; a sportsman, Mr. Fitzgerald; an Irishman, Mr. Harrison; an Italian fiddler; a fisherman, col. Brasier; a Harlequin, Mr. Fitzgerald; lieutenant of a press gang, the mayor elect; sailors, Mr. Blood, Mr. Norris, &c. a Scandinavian miner, Mr. Quin; Millers, Mr. Quin, Mr. Brady, &c. Irish hurlers, Mr. Stackpoole, Mr. Franklin, &c. and a grotesque figure of half alderman half captain, represented by Mr. Harte.

The female figures were from deities to a dairy maid. The immortals were Flora, the countess of Carrick, and Diana, Miss O'Callaghan; the nymph Aethusa, was personated by Miss Pearce; Miss Hoops was a priestess of the sun, and the Miss Grady's represented vestal virgins. The royal maids were, Cleopatra Mrs. Grady; queen Elizabeth, Miss Wilson; Lady Jane Grey, Mrs. Smith; and Miss Burke, Miss Addison, and Mrs. D'Esterre were queens of night. The dramatic characters were, Violante, Mrs. M——; Leonora, Miss D'Esterre; a Roman matron, Mrs. Evans; an Indian princess, Miss Clossy; and Columbine, Miss O'Callaghan. Besides these, Mrs. Arthur appeared like a Circassian slave, in chains; Miss Plummer, like the wife of Rubens; Mrs. Gould and Mrs. Fitzgerald, like Spanish ladies; Miss O'Callaghan, Mrs. Martin, and Miss Anketell, like novices; Mrs. Widenham, Mrs. D'Esterre, Mrs. Russell, Mrs. Hallam, and Mrs. Gabbott, like quakers; and Miss E. Burke appeared a very pretty milk maid.

The champagne, burgundy, and supper, gave general satisfaction; and it was allowed by all, that so many enchanting faces never appeared in fancy dresses. The mobility, as usual on such occasions, forced the nobility and gentry out of their chaises and sedans, and made them walk from some distance to the house, to the no small diversion of a numerous crowd. The weather was highly favourable; and the company broke up at four in the morning, well pleased with the night, and the reflection that all the dresses were stuff, serge, and other manufactures of this city.

On Wednesday, Aug. 13, the Provoked Husband was performed at the theatre to a numerous and splendid audience.

The Venetian breakfast was given in the beautiful and romantic garden of Mr. Robert Davis, which was greatly crowded on the occasion. This was the goal of the boats, and the competitors for the prizes were very numerous. Mr. Blake won the first prize, Mr. Eggers the second, and Mr. Burke the third.

There was a brilliant assembly on Thursday, and a fandango on Friday evening. On Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, Lionel and Clarissa, Jane Shore, and the Duenna were performed at the theatre to very crowded and genteel audiences. On Saturday there was a sermon in the cathedral church, and afterwards an oratorio was performed by several capital hands, who generously assisted the charitable designs of the mayor on this occasion.

The principal performers at the theatre were, Messrs. Webster, Reddih, Heaphy, and Moss; Mrs. O'Keefe, Mrs. Thompson, and Miss Potter.

On Monday, August 18, the franchises of the city were rode in the most splendid and magnificent manner. The whole city exerted itself to the utmost, in honour of the mayor; it was acknowledged by many that the citizens of Dublin never made such a gallant and regular appearance. Every one of the corporations took such pains to provide fine cattle, elegant cloaths, furniture, standards, ensigns, &c. that we know not which to applaud most. The procession set out from the King's Island at 12 o'clock in the following order: peace officers two and two; city regalia, mayor, sheriffs, aldermen, Limerick Union, consisting of above a hundred gentlemen, with an excellent band of music belonging to the 19th regiment. 1. The smiths had a Venus and a child in a phaeton drawn by four beautiful pied horses, and Vulcan on horseback at her side; 2, the carpenters; 3, the clothiers, with bishop Blaze on horseback; 4, the shoemakers; 5, the taylor's; 6, the coopers; 7, the skinner's; 8, the tanners; 9, the saddlers; 10, the bakers; 11, the barbers and surgeons; 12, the butchers; 13, the chandlers; 14, the tobaccoists, with the black king of Morocco and Grimalkin the snuff-grinder closing the procession.

In short, during the whole jubilee there was such a diversity of splendid objects, that the fancy, in a kind of controversy with itself, knew not which most to admire, and the company testified by action, every expression of applause of the delectable entertainment.

O R,

Compendium of Entertaining Knowledge,
For SEPTEMBER, 1777.

Memoirs of the Right Hon. Edmund Sexten Pery, Speaker of the House of Commons of Ireland, with an elegant Engraving.

MR. Pery is one of those few men who, in a very critical situation, hath acquired the esteem of all parties, not by a time-serving ductility of temper, but solely by prudence, and the universal opinion of his abilities and integrity.

This gentleman drew his first breath in the city of Limerick, in the year 1719, and is descended from an antient and respectable family; one of his ancestors was by Henry the Eighth, in the 34th year of his reign, (Anno. 1543,) rewarded for his eminent services, with a grant, not only of lands in the city of Limerick, but also with the abbey of St. Francis, formerly adjoining to it, on the site of which the county court-house is now built.

After receiving a suitable preparatory education, Mr. Pery attached himself to the study of the law, and was called to the bar in Hilary Term, 1745, being then in the twenty-sixth year of his age.

In this profession he soon became very conspicuous, his reading being extensive, his judgment acute, and his sense solid. His eloquence was not of that florid or frothy kind, which may be compared to trees which abound more in flowers than fruit; but firm, manly and convincing: And as he would never engage in any cause which did not appear to him to be founded on strict justice, so he seldom failed of crowning his client with success. This at the same time, it encreased both his fame and fortune as a lawyer, established his character for probity; more especially as he despised and discountenanced that chicane which is too often an attendant at the bars of our courts of justice.

But his abilities were not destined to be confined there, for in the year 1751 the electors of the town of Wicklow sent him into parliament as their representative. From that moment he devoted himself to the service of his country, and by a close study of the fundamentals of our constitution, and the laws and rules of parliament, he soon shone in the light of a Senator, shunning equally the characters of the gilded insect that shines in the sunshine of court favour; the boisterous debater of the name of patriot, who thinks it consists only in a determined opposition to every measure supported by administration; and the clamorous demagogue who joins that opposition merely with the hopes of being bought off; and having his mouth stopped with a place or a pension. On the contrary, Mr. Pery's sole object was, the good of the nation: whatever he thought tended to that end was sure of his support, on which side of the house soever it originated; and what he imagined would be detrimental to it, he constantly opposed, let who would propose it. This conduct ensured to him the truly honourable appellation of a real patriot. His integrity was unimpeached, his conduct was a pattern to others, his manly, nervous and spirited speeches were ever heard with attention, and he was justly esteemed a true friend to constitutional liberty.

The parliament being dissolved in the year 1760, on the demise of the late king, his fellow citizens of Limerick took the first opportunity of shewing their esteem for Mr. Pery, by their unanimously returning him to parliament, which they have done twice since, fully proving their sense of his parliamentary conduct. Nay, he was so dear to them, that when the news of his recovery from a dangerous sickness, in 1761, reached their ears, their rejoicings were as great as they were sincere.

Mr. Pery was ever jealous of the honour and privileges of parliament, and his conduct during the sessions of 1763 and 1764, was too exemplary to be passed over in silence.

In the address to his Majesty, moved for by Mr. Burton, member for Govran, the Commons promised to continue the necessary supplies for his Majesty's ordinary establishment. These words, Mr. Pery thought improper, as they might be taken to imply the establishments hitherto granted, and would then, he said "include the Pensions, which he never could consider as constitutionally necessary to the support of government," as therefore those words were ambiguous, he moved to substitute in their place, the word government, as more definite and certain: which, after some debate, was carried.

On the second of November, Mr. Pery's attention to the manufactures of this kingdom, and his just sense of the true mode of encouragement were manifested by his opposition to a petition from a linen Printer at Donnybrook, * for aid to carry on her trade. Petitions of this kind, praying parliamentary aid to carry on manufactures had been very frequent, and many were ready to be presented, if this succeeded. Mr. Pery wisely saw that this mode produced an effect directly opposite to the intention of the house, for in some cases it put an end to the very manufacture it was supposed to encourage; and in others it favoured a monopoly, and repressed the industry of many, by giving the few an undue superiority. These being his sentiments, he wisely opposed the referring the petition in question to a committee. He said "I am very sensible that manufactures should be encouraged by all possible means, and that no object can be more worthy either of the attention or the bounty of parliament. It is impossible that many should live, where but few can be employed: It is by labour only, that the inhabitants of a civilized country can subsist; and it is therefore impossible, that any civilized country should be populous, where there is little to do. As no country that is not populous, can be either flourishing or strong, and as it is manifestly the interest of every individual, that the country in which he lives, should be both, it follows, that the due encouragement of manufactures, by which alone multitudes can be employed, is essential to the prosperity, if not to the very subsistence of the state. Upon this principle therefore, instead of granting large sums to particular persons, to dispose of as they please, I think we should apply them in liberal premiums, for different manufactures, as they are brought to market, in proportion to their quantity and excellence. This would be an universal encouragement, and would diffuse an universal spirit of diligence and emulation, as every man would aspire to gain what was offered, not to this or the other individual, but to whomsoever should excel."

This reasoning was unanswerable, and indeed the only reply made by the gentleman who patronized the petition * was, "that like petitions had met with no objections, and he did not see why he should not have his Jobbs done, as well as another." To this Mr. Pery answered, he was so far from meaning any thing like a personal opposition to the gentleman, that if he could bring himself to submit to do a Jobb at all, he would do his Jobb as soon as any man's. The question however for referring the petition to a committee, was carried by a majority of nineteen, on which Mr. Pery with a modest submission that conveyed at the same time a keen stroke of satire, said, "As I shall always be disposed to submit my private judgment to that of this house, I conclude that I had made a wrong determination as I see the majority is against me. But, notwithstanding the division for referring this petition, I am persuaded that many gentlemen who divided for it, must be extremely sorry to see the public money lavished away in Jobbs, which might be otherwise employed to public advantage, and I hope some method will still be found to signify the disinclination which, I am sure, the house has to these applications."

In a debate which came on a few days afterwards (Nov. 8.) in a committee of accounts, Mr. Pery had a fresh opportunity of testifying his zeal for the public good. A worthy member * remarking the encroachment of pensions, moved for a resolution of the committee "That the pensions do exceed the civil list 42,627l. 19s. 2d. This motion was opposed, and a motion was made for adjourning. On this occasion Mr. Pery spoke to the following purport. "As there can be no previous question moved for in a committee, the motion for adjournment, is always considered as a previous question: I must therefore declare I am so far from thinking the resolution in question will gain weight and force, by delay, that I think it will greatly lose, with respect to both; as the fact itself is manifest at sight, we can deliberate only whether we will declare it; and surely this can throw nothing but an irresolution and lukewarmness, which can neither do us credit, nor our country service. Is not the excess of expences above our revenue, a grievance that calls for instant redress? Is not the consequence of it equally manifest and fatal? Ought we not to seize the first opportunity of making it known to Him from whom alone redress is to be expected? And can delay have any other tendency than to convince him, either that our danger is problematical, or, that we have not a proper sense of it? will it not, therefore, tend directly to counteract the very resolution we are urged to delay, when at last it shall be made? If a man was to see his friend drowning, would he deliberate about throwing out a rope to save him? would this action lose any of its weight, or force, or use, by that haste which the honest impatience of affection would naturally give it? And would not deliberation, on the contrary, be a proof, either that no danger was apprehended, or no deliverance designed? I confess that I cannot but see deliberation in this case, and in ours, exactly in the same light, and, therefore, I oppose the motion for adjournment on this occasion."

The argument of Mr. Pery was too strong and too conclusive to be fairly controverted. The only method the opposite party had to elude it was, to declare that it had been that day mentioned at the castle, that a letter came from the secretary of state to the lord lieutenant, empowering him to communicate to the house his majesty's intention not to grant any pensions on this establishment hereafter, except upon very extraordinary occasions, either for life or years. Yet Mr. Pery's opposition had such weight, that the question for the adjournment passed in the negative, and then the resolution was carried.

Character of General Washington.

THERE are some men, who seem to be singled out by Heaven, as the authors of great good, and others of much misery to their species. Among those so distinguished must be ranked George Washington, commander in chief of the forces, and protector of the united states of America. But whether he ought to be considered as the author of good or ill, we presume not to say: that point we leave to be determined by the historians of future ages.

During the late war in America, this gentleman distinguished himself eminently as a colonel of the provincial militia; and was of singular service to his country in repelling the incursions of the French and Indians, as well as in acting offensively against the enemy. After the peace, he retired to a private station, loaded with honour, and seemingly satisfied with the praise of a good citizen;—the consciousness of having done his duty, and deserved the esteem of his fellow-countrymen, without making use of his superior reputation to usurp over his equals, or of his popularity to disturb the peace of the state. But no sooner was an attempt made, to recover by a stamp duty, some part of the sums expended in protecting America, than Mr. Washington, among others, flew boldly in the face of the British legislature: the progress of the dispute is well known; and as soon as it was judged necessary to repel force by force, he was chosen by the congress to command their armies, along with Mr. Lee.

Whether Mr. Washington had then in prospect that high dignity to which he has now attained, it is impossible to say with certainty; and consequently to determine, whether his opposition to government was dictated by ambition, or inspired by principle. If we may judge from the letters published in his name, the amor patriæ seems first to have roused him to action. "Heaven that knows my heart," says he, "knows how truly I love my country; and that I embarked in this arduous enterprise on the purest motives. But we have overhot our mark: we have grasped at things beyond our reach. It is impossible that we should succeed; and I cannot, with truth, say that I am sorry for it, because I am far from being sure that we deserve to succeed." He here alludes to the scheme of independency, which it appears he opposed. He afterwards, however, adds, (probably when ambitious passions had insinuated themselves into his heart) "If it be the will of God that America should be independent of Great Britain, and that this be the season for it, even I, and these unhopeful men around me, may not be thought unworthy instruments in his hands."

But whatever may be the governing principle of Mr. Washington, in the present contest, he is a man of bold and liberal sentiments, and more of a general than was imagined either by his friends or his enemies. This is alike discoverable in his conduct and his opinion of military matters. "A good army," says he, "is by no means secured, as some seem to reckon, by securing a large number of men. We want soldiers; and between these, and raw undisciplined men there is a wide difference. The question then is, how are these raw and undisciplined men to be formed into good soldiers?—And I am free to give it as my opinion, that so far from contributing to this end, will strong holds, fortified posts, and deep intrenchments be found, that they will have a direct contrary effect. To be a soldier, is to be inured to, and familiar with danger; to dare to look your enemy in the face, unsheltered and exposed to their fire, and even when repulsed, to rally again with undiminished spirit.—It would almost be worth our while to be defeated, if it were only to train us to stand fire, and to bear a reverse of fortune with a decent magnanimity."

In a word, whatever fortune may attend General Washington's operations, or whatever use he may make of those dictatorial powers with which his countrymen have vested him, we cannot at present justly challenge either his abilities as a soldier, or his principles as a patriot. His own sentiments, in regard to the part he has to act, will not improperly conclude this character. "I am prepared for every event, one only excepted—I mean a dishonourable peace. Rather than that, let me, though it should be with the loss of every thing else I hold dear, continue this horrid trade; and by the most unlikely means, be the unworthy instrument of preserving political security and happiness to them [Englishmen] as well as ourselves.—Pity this cannot be accomplished without fixing on me the odious name of rebel! I love my king; you know I do: a soldier, a good man cannot but love him;—how peculiarly hard then is our fortune to be deemed traitors to so good a king!—But I am not yet without hopes, that even he will see cause to do me justice: posterity, I am sure, will. Mean while I comfort myself with the reflection, that this has been the fate of the best and bravest men; even of the Barons who obtained magna charta, whilst the dispute was depending.—This, [a reconciliation with his king] however anxiously I wish for it, is not mine to command. I see my duty, that of standing up for the liberties of my country; and whatever difficulties and discouragements lie in my way, I dare not shrink from it:—and I rely on that Being, who has left to us the choice of duties, that, whilst I conscientiously discharge mine, I shall not lose my reward. If I really am not "a bad man," I shall not long be so set down*."

A particular Account of the unfortunate People who were lately brought off from Sable Island by the Dauphine, a French Ship sent on Purpose from Port Louis, in the Isle of France, for their Deliverance.

ON the 15th of November, 1776, the above ship left port Louis, and on the 28th they came in sight of the island. On the 29th, the weather being fine, and almost a calm, Mr. Le Sage, an officer on board, was dispatched, with a boat and a canoe, to the west of the island, from whence he brought back seven black women and a negro child eight months old. They were the only people existing on the island. Those wretched creatures, being interrogated as to their unhappy situation, said, that they had been on that island ever since the loss of the indiaman called l'Utile, wrecked there the 31st of July, 1761; that the chief part of the crew left them, taking to their boat, and leaving about eighty black men and women, eighteen of whom, some time after, embarked in a vessel which they made with planks fished from the wreck; that, within these twelve years, their number had been reduced through fatigue and want. They moreover say, that, during the space of fifteen years which they have been there, they had only seen five ships, who, upon signals made to them, all attempted to land, but, from the great danger attending such attempts, were obliged to desist; that, some time ago, a ship, called La Sauterelle (The Grass-hopper), sent a boat on shore, and gave them some relief, but the weather being boisterous next day prevented the boat coming again to take them off; that one of the sailors belonging to the boat, taking a fancy to one of the women, staid on the island, intending to go on board his ship when the boat came back, but being, as well as the rest, disappointed, was obliged to take up his residence among them; that, about three months ago, he embarked in another boat built from the wreck, with three black men and three women, in hopes of reaching the island of Madagascar.

The manner in which these unfortunate people lived was as follows: They built a sort of cabin, on the most elevated part of the island, and covered it with the shells of turtle, which they caught in great abundance, and on which they chiefly subsisted: they likewise, by way of change of diet, caught some fish, and a few birds, with their eggs. They dug a hole in the sand, which supplied them with a brackish kind of water, being their only drink.—The feathers of the birds which they caught, curiously worked together, was their covering.

The island is nothing but a bank of coral, a quarter of a league in length, and three hundred perches in breadth; its highest part about 15 feet. The violence of the sea has thrown up, on its sides, a quantity of broken coral and sand, by which means the centre of the island is much lower than the sides. The whole island is surrounded with breakers, which extend upwards of 150 fathoms to the south, and are very near the shore on the north side.

The superintendent of Port Louis has provided for these distressed people.

MR. Trenchard obeyed the summons, and his father precipitately accosted him: the young gentleman was honest and renewed his protestations: high words followed, for Sir William was of a choleric temper; Mr. T——d was obliged to stand to what he had said, though his father could ill bear it.—Mr. T——d was very sorry the knowledge of it came to Sir William in this abrupt manner, but he could not foresee it, and was determined not to forfeit his character nor bring his sincerity into question let what would ensue. Mr. Pelham acted on this occasion a prudent part; he saw Sir William's mate, and something of his son's: he told them, "He should ever entertain sentiments of gratitude for his daughter's sake, for past favours; was truly sorry anything had arisen that would disturb the family repose; would not himself do any thing that should be a tendency to it. If he could be of any service to prevent such an evil, he should be happy in laying himself out to promote the interest of each individual; he recommended submission to the son, (though modestly) tenderness to Sir William." Both were pleased with the good man's behaviour. Sir William thanked him, and desired him to use all his influence to prevent a match between them, and they parted with great good temper. Mr. Pelham then took his leave, went to Dr. Butler's, and spent the evening, but never hinted the subject matter of his journey to W——n B——h; he went home next day and told his wife what had happened, who thought proper to tell Nancy; the poor girl was not surprized at Sir William's conduct; she foresaw it thus, and had warned his son. She now thought of nothing but rejecting Mr. T——d if he repeated his proposal, though she apprehended he would only do it to secure his reputation, knowing his father's mind—and she did not think but he would easily accept a dismissal. So little did she know of Mr. Trenchard's affection to her; so little of human nature, and the tendency of a warm opposition in favourite points. Sir William was in high wrath, did not even speak to his son for some time, and when he broke silence, it was to vent the language of impatient indignation.

In a few days, Sir William ordered Mrs. Wilson to get all Nancy's things, and send them away directly. He spoke of this to her before the servants, and said something very angrily to the steward, on his saying "Nancy had always borne a very good character in the place; every body respected her." This ill-timed resentment irritated every one of the domestics. The lower sort of people have their feelings, and often as quick perceptions of real honour and decent conduct as their lordly superiors. They resented Sir William's treatment of their young master among themselves, and thought he had no good a right to chuse his wife as the son "a sure," they said, "no Sir William nor any body else, no not king George, as great a man as he was, should hinder them." The under servants spoke of this to their acquaintance, but Billings, Mrs. Wilson and Katy were silent, as was Mr. Trenchard's waiting-man, whom his master had forbid to open his lips about it.

After this, Mr. Trenchard, willing to do his duty, talked with his father seriously on the subject. Sir William sent for Mrs. Mutham, in hopes she could influence him to break his purpose; she loved her nephew, and used all the arguments she she could to change his mind, but in vain; his were so pungent and moving, that she owned their force: this made Sir William very angry also with her. Mrs. Masham had no other near relation but Sir William and his sons; she was loth to break with either, and therefore resolved to meddle no more, but preserve an absolute neutrality; and the more, as she did not then doubt as Sir William had almost idolized his son Billy, and as he knew he must be his heir, that if Billy did not yield, his father would at last, and then she would not be blamed by either party.

The servants having all told what they heard Sir William say, the affair became public, and people talked variously of it; Mr. Trenchard was accosted by several, and in particular by Messrs. Collet, Harmel, Evelant, Jones and Digby, who were all acquainted with Nancy, and spoke handsomely of her to him; Harmel said, he did not know her superior for sense and penetration, and she was a fine poetess. At this hint, Mr. Trenchard coloured, and shewed so much sensibility as convinced them all that the rumour was well grounded, though he neither owned nor denied the thing. Young people are apt to find out the language of the eye; whose aspect, and even muteness in these cases, convinced Mr. Trenchard's friends, and they told their respective mistresses (Mr. Collet courted Miss Harmel, and Mr. Harmel, Miss Collet;) these young ladies were much pleased, but especially Miss Collet, and the next day she wrote to Nancy as follows:

LETTER XVIII.

From Miss Collet, to Miss Pelham.

'Tis well, mighty well, Miss Pelham, to keep all your affairs to yourself; after such an opening as I made when you called on me, methinks if you had that confidence in my friendship I have in yours, you would not have been so very shy of taking my hints. Is it thus you rend our ancient love asunder! yet I will not quite condemn you: you might have reasons, or 'twas let your Colinda know, you shall have still play, my dear; with your wonted openness and generosity own what can be no longer a secret (for 'tis town talk) I will love you as well as ever; but if you affect the prude or the coquette, characters that are reverse to your turn, if you but appear proud because you have the offer of the first youth among us, and so seem to look down on all the young fellows besides, and on me, Miss Rolfe, Miss Harmel, and twenty more of the girls, then will I not spare my Amanda; I will hold a true mirror to her, and though I must still love her person, yet with honest warmth will I reprove her failings: nevertheless should she in any of these things act contrary to her usual discretion, her modesty, and good sense, yet satisfied that such things are only occasional weaknesses, from which she must and will recover (unless her brain is turned, and her heart is changed) I shall be angry with any one beside who shall dare to say, Miss Nancy Pelham is altered since Mr. Trenchard made his addresses to her. I have not seen the said gentleman since the talk became public; I fancy he avoids me on purpose, and I know why. Things carried on so privately, secretly I may say, for half a year and more, and not a lip to me! 'Twas saucy, 'twas more, 'tis high treason against our sovereign friendship; but I suppose you have transferred your fealty to Mr. Trenchard, and he is sole master of your secrets, if not your heart; but this must never be; a corner, a nook, is still claimed and insisted on by your

W-n B—b. POLLY COLLET.

The next day after this letter was sent, Mr. Trenchard sent a card to Miss Collet, inviting himself to drink coffee with her, if she would be alone that afternoon; she returned a polite welcome; he waited on her accordingly; she would not take any notice to him of the public talk, but spoke of distant themes, which led him to imagine she did not approve, or that she disbelieved it. He was coming away without hinting at what lay nearest him; but on her speaking of her brother's match as near being compleated, he said, "Happy Mr. Collet! happy Mr. Harmel! I do not envy their good success, but I with they could say with equal assurance, happy Billy Trenchard!" A sigh accompanied the accent; Miss Collet was too compassionate any longer to affect a distance of speech. "I don't scruple to say we all think you as happy, and rejoice in the prospect."—He thanked her, but told her, "He would give half his worldly prospects to be secure of his desire; she wondered at that, for she thought he was certain of Nancy, though his father opposed it, and replied, "Why, Sir, I thought you was fixed on a certain lady very dear to me, but you disappoint me; for I had planned a series of pleasure in having her settled so near me." "Fixed! so I am, so I have been for a great while, nor is it in the power of any one to alter my purpose; but if your Amanda refuses me, what can I do? will you join your influence, exert all your charming eloquence in my favour? Ladies have powers (we men feel they have) that sweetly captivate the human mind." She told him she had not such an opinion of herself herself as to think she could succeed in any point where Mr. Trenchard failed. He then told her, "He should set out for E—n in two days, and wished she would favour him in being her letter carrier; a line would make him welcome to her friend than otherwise (he had reason to think) he should be." Mr. Harmel, and Mr. Stains then came in, and the conversation took another turn; he took his leave, and she followed him to the door, telling him, "She would do herself the pleasure to write by him, though she wrote by the post but yesterday."

LETTER XIX.

Miss Collet to Miss Pelham.

Again, my dear Amanda, do I break in upon your repose. The bearer has politely offered me the conveyance; he drank coffee with me yesterday; I am pleased with his manner of speech; he is honest and avows the truth of the long secret, and will not you? Shall Nancy Pelham dissemble to her Polly Collet? Nay, my dear, let the big privacy which is rolling in torrents on W—n B—h and Trenchard manor, find its way in a gentler stream to the breast of a friend. It will be ill breeding to detain your eye and your ear any longer from your admiring Strephon, than just to tell you that with a warmth as ardent, I am,

Your sincere friend,

And humble servant,

W—n B—h. POLLY COLLET.

The Life of an Author.

(Written by himself.)

I Am the second son of a gentleman of small fortune in the west of England, who, however, possessed vanity sufficient to think his children qualified to cut very respectable figures in life; and though he was not able to bestow much money on his boys, determined that they should have every requisite that could result from the advantages of a good education. We were therefore put to school at a very early period of life, and gradually advanced from one degree of learning to another, till at the age when other boys can do little more than read and write, we were the astonishment of the country for our proficiency in the learned languages: our knowledge in the French tongue was not very trifling, and we had each a smattering of the Italian.

My father's paternal estate had descended to him from the conquest; and had regularly gone from one elder son to the other; my eldest brother, therefore, was of course provided for. My next brother,

Charles, was placed with a merchant in the metropolis, and was happy enough, by a close application to commercial concerns, to acquire the esteem of his master, whose daughter he married, and succeeded to the business: nor is it many years since he paid a considerable fine to be excused serving one of the most honourable, though troublesome offices, in the city. He is now happy in a great and successful business; corresponding with half the globe, and every day adding to those thousands, which are hereafter to aggrandize his family.

It was my lot to be destined to the church. At sixteen years of age I was sent to the University, and having finished the usual course of studies, returned to the house of my father, waiting for that promotion which it was supposed my diligence, sobriety, and literary accomplishments had merited. Here I continued above a year and a half, during which time I took orders: but nothing offered better than a poor curacy, which my father thought proper to reject. While I lived at home, I saw and became enamoured of the daughter of a worthy man that rented a small farm of my father. After a short courtship I married her privately. Soon after this event my father died, and the estate fell of course to my elder brother. The funeral rights had but just been paid to the deceased, when my brother told me it was time for me to entertain thoughts of providing for myself, as I could not think of becoming a burthen to the estate, which was already too small to support the honour of the family.

Stung to the soul by this treatment, I retired to my wife, and told her what had happened. We were not long in determining what course to take. London seemed to afford the proudest asylum for learned poverty: and at the end of three day, my dear Maria and I found ourselves in the metropolis, without friends, and nearly destitute of money. It is true, I had a rich brother in the city; but there were no hopes from that quarter: for on my marriage with my amiable Maria, I had written to demand his felicitations on the occasion; but the answer was, that I must never think of writing or speaking to him again, after having degraded myself by so mean a connection. The man who loved his wife, and who knew that an alliance with her would have done honour to the proudest family, could entertain no thought of future application, after so scandalous a repulse.

It therefore now only remained to consider how we should dispose of and support ourselves. We immediately left the inn where the stage had put up, and took a cheap lodging. The next day I made application for employment to several book-fellers, at length thought myself happy when I was engaged to translate a sheet of Latin for five shillings, or a sheet of Greek for seven shillings and sixpence.

After more than a twelvemonth's drudgery at this rate, at which I could not earn so much as a bricklayer's labourer, my wife was brought to bed of a son, and my encreasing expences made it necessary that I should look out for an encrease of income. After some weeks diligent enquiry, I was fortunate enough to be engaged as the amanuensis of an author who could not spell: but he had got in (as they call it) with the bookfellers, and that was better. With this gentleman I worked all day, and for myself almost all the night. Still, however, I repined not at the severity of my fate;—for I was able to give bread to my wife and child. At the end of two years my employer died, and I thought it was now a proper time to strike a stroke for myself. I therefore waited on those who had commissioned him to compile for them; represented what a share I had taken in the business, and solicited to succeed him. It happened at this time that authors were scarce. I was immediately employed, and, I think, never felt such joy in my life, as when I presented my wife with two guineas, the profits of one week's labour! But alas! fleeting are the joys of humanity! the work in which I was engaged came to a period within six months; and I was reduced to the verge of beggary; for, in the pride of better employment, I had long since declined the drudgery of translation.

While poverty and horror surrounded me on all sides, I had no time to reflect—I wrote for magazines, reviews, and newspapers—I picked up a casual dinner by an essay, or the fragment of a supper by a paragraph—but often have I passed the day without a dinner, and gone to bed supperless, in failure of both these supplies! My last resource was to write dying speeches:—but the opportunities for these compositions occurred so seldom, and the payment for them, when finished, was so trifling, that so far from living, I barely dragged about a most miserable existence.

After struggling with these accumulated calamities above four years, an uncle of my wife died, and left us a decent independence; and we are just on the point of setting off, to take possession of what will keep us above want, and secure us, I trust, that peace of mind, which is not to be acquired by perpetual labour, attended with the perpetual dread of starving.

A Short Account of the Fortrefs of Ticonderoga.

THIS fortress, which has lately been taken by the British troops, under General Burgoyne, is one of the most important posts in that part of the world, and as strongly secured. It is situated on a tongue of land between Lake George and a narrow gut, which communicates with the Lake Champlain. On three sides it is surrounded with water; and for a good part of the fourth it has a dangerous morass in front; where that failed, the French had made a very strong line, upwards of eight feet high, defended by cannon, and secured by 4 or 5000 men. A great fall of trees, with their branches outward, was spread before the intrenchment for about a hundred yards.

In this manner the celebrated General Montcalm had fortified it, in the beginning of last war, when the English army appeared before it, under the command of General Abercrombie, the 8th of July, 1758. They amounted to near 16000 men, and having precipitately attacked it without artillery, they were obliged to retreat, leaving near 2000 men upon the field of battle, among whom were some of the best officers in the corps.

The gallant Lord Howe, elder brother to the two noble commanders now in America, was also killed in a skirmish, about the same period, among the woods near this fort, so fatal to the British arms.

The next year the brave General (now Lord) Amherst, determined to attack it. At first the French made some appearance, as if they meant to defend the place; but as they knew the strength of our forces, as they saw that the preparations for the attack were making with as much judgment as vigour, and as the enterprise which was preparing against Quebec did not leave them a force so considerable as they had in the preceding campaign, they abandoned the fort in the night of July the 7th, having damaged it as much as they could, and retired to Crown Point.

At the commencement of the present troubles in North-America, the British Garrison in Ticonderoga being reduced to a very small number, were surprised, and made prisoners by a large body of Americans, since which time they have done all in their power to make it more formidable than ever, in order to cut off all communication between Sir William Howe and General Burgoyne.

Memoirs of Mrs. Anne Louisa Durbach, a celebrated German Poetess.

THIS prodigy in the literary world was born in the year 1722, upon the borders of Lower Silesia, between Zulichaw and Crossen, at a small hamlet called Hammer; her father, being the brewer and alehouse-keeper, was the principal of seven poor inhabitants, but died whilst she was still a child, not above seven years old.—Her grandmother's brother, an old man with a good understanding, who lived in Poland, had taken her home to his house a few months before this happened, and taught her to read and write: this is the uncle to whom one of the poems in the printed collection is addressed. She continued with him about three years, and then returned to her mother. The misfortunes which constantly attended her till she was near forty began at this period.—Her first employment was the care of her brother-in-law, but she soon quitted that, in order to attend upon three cows, which was the whole stock of her parents. The first signs of her natural inclination to poetry had then just made their appearance, by an uncommon desire to sing; she knew an hundred church hymns by heart, and sung them at her work, or whilst she was watching the cattle: her inclination soon prompted her to write verses; but she does not, at present, recollect any part of the first essay of her uncultivated genius, which was accidentally assisted by a neighbouring shepherd, who, although separated by a small river, contrived to lend her a few books. Robinson Crusoe, the Asiatic Banise, a German romance, and the Arabian Night's Entertainment, composed her whole library. She read these with great pleasure, and her time passed away in a very agreeable manner:—but this happiness was soon at an end, as she was obliged to return to her former attendance upon children, with which, and other laborious employments of a servant, she reached her seventeenth year. Her next step was matrimony, and the husband her mother provided for her being a wool comber by profession, obliged her to prepare all the wool which he used, besides which she had the whole business of the house to manage, and could find no time to indulge her natural propensity to writing verses and reading, except a few hours on Sundays, but took that opportunity to write down the poems she had composed at her work. After having been married nine years, she was released from this drudgery by the death of her husband, but her mother soon engaged her to ap-other, who was much worse than the former: this was the most unfortunate part of her whole life, as she felt with this second husband all the hardships of an unhappy marriage, and great poverty; but even in these circumstances nature had a surprising influence over the genius of our poetess. She got to the sight of some poems written by a clergyman named Schoenemann, who is well known in Berlin, to have been at times affected, after a violent fever, with a sort of madness, during which he always spoke and preached in verse. Although the bulk of this extraordinary man's performances rather indicate a disordered imagination, than the inspiration of the muses, our poetess found, in those she saw, something which greatly excited her genius.

She now became more desirous than ever to follow the natural bent of her inclination, but wanted both time and opportunity; she was, however, at last, encouraged by several persons to proceed, and particularly by professor Meyer, of Halle, who was no other wise acquainted with her than by having seen one of her poems. In gratitude to her first patrons and benefactors, who were chiefly inhabitants of Frankfort in Poland, the place where she then resided, she mentions their names in the preface. Mr. Korber, of Great Lissa, was the first who transmitted any of her performances to the press. These productions of her genius were only small sparks of that half-extinguished fire which the muses had kindled in her; but the king of Prussia's victories gave her force to overcome all obstacles, and the flames, which had till then been smothered, blazed out at once. She removed to Great Glogau in the year 1755, with her husband and children, and gaining admittance to a bookseller's shop, read many poetical and other performances with much pleasure, but without any order or settled plan. The use Mrs. Durbach has made of this cursory reading, and the easiness with which she retained the most material parts, appear throughout her poems. She has read only a few books, and those with great expedition, but any person unacquainted with the real fact, would naturally imagine that she had read them with great attention.

The remarkable war which ended in the year 1764, and her sovereign's exploits, displayed at large the poetical powers of this extraordinary woman. The battle of Lowoschutz gave occasion to her first triumphal ode, and she soon afterwards perused the military songs of a Prussian grenadier, some of Raniber's Odes, and Mrs. Unzer's poems: her subsequent productions, occasioned by the king of Prussia's victories, plainly shew the effect they had upon her, and are proofs of a poetical genius already come to maturity.

Our poetess continued, however, still oppressed with poverty; but providence was pleased, at last, to release her from a very deplorable state, under which few would have been able to support themselves.

Baron Cottwitz, a Silesian nobleman, who has been long celebrated for many amiable qualities, became acquainted with her in the year 1760, as he was travelling through Glogau: actuated by his charitable disposition, he pitied her distress, relieved her from it, and carried her to Berlin: there she soon became known to several men of learning, and judges of poetry.—Her genius then appeared in its highest lustre, and she was universally admired. It is now her happiness to be caressed at the court of a prince, whose characteristic it is to be at once the judge and patron of genius. Most of the poems in the collection just published have been composed since, and fully explain her character, and the late occurrences of her life.

To the above account it may not be improper to add a few remarks concerning Madame de Durbach's genius and writings, made by the editor in the preface to the collection of her poems, from whence our narrative is taken, and likewise a specimen of the poems themselves to illustrate these remarks.

“Plato, in his discourse called Io, lays it down as the character of a true poet, that he delivers his thoughts by inspiration, himself not knowing the expressions he is to make use of. According to him, the harmony and turn of the verse produce in the poet an enthusiasm, which furnishes him with thoughts and images, which in the moments of composure he would have sought for in vain.

This observation is verified in the writings of our authoress, who, without design, without art, without instruction, is arrived at a wonderful perfection in the mechanism of poetry, and may be ranked, indeed, among poets of the first class. On this account she has been more successful in these pieces written during the glowing warmth of her imagination, than in those which she has composed with coolness and deliberation, in her leisure hours: the latter productions always discover some traces of art, and betray the absence of poetic fire.

Whenever our authoress is struck in a particular manner by any object, either in her solitary or her social moments, her spirits are immediately roused: she has no longer command over herself: every spring of her soul is in motion. She feels an irresistible impulse to write, and with an amazing rapidity commits her thoughts to paper, which the muse inspires her with; and, like a watch just wound up, as soon as her soul is put in motion by the impression the object has made on her, she expresses herself in poetry, without knowing in what manner the ideas and figures arise in her mind.

Another, and more nice observation of Plato's is, that the harmony and turn of the verse should keep up the inspiration. Of this truth likewise our authoress is a living instance. No sooner has she hit upon the tone, as she calls it, and the sort of the verse, but the words go on fluently, and she is never at a loss for thought or imagery.—The most delicate turns of the subject and expression arise in her mind (whilst she is writing) as if they were dictated to her.

Of her extempore performances we have an excellent specimen in that beautiful “Ode, sacred to the memory of her deceased uncle, the instructor of her infancy, written in the year 1760,” at a time when she happened to be engaged in company of the first rank at Berlin; it consists of eight stanzas of six lines, of which the third and sixth have nine syllables, and the others ten. It seems, whilst she was in this select company, she was touched by a sudden reflection, with a keen sense of the great difference between her present condition, and her situation in the early part of her life, and of the great obligation she was under to the good old man, who, by his tender care for her better parts, had laid the basis of her present happiness. Overcome with the sense of this felicity, and with a heart replete with gratitude, she could contain herself no longer, but, before all the company, poured forth the overflowings of her soul, (it must have been a very affecting scene) nearly in the following words—

“Arise from the dust, ye bones that rest in the land where I passed my infant years.—Venerable sage! re-animate thy body; and ye lips, that fed me with the honey of instruction, once more be eloquent.

“O thou bright shade! look down upon me from the top of Olympus;—behold I am no longer following the cattle in the fields. Observe the circle of refined mortals that surround me.—They all speak of thy niece's poems.—O listen to their conversation, thy praise.

“For ever flourish the broad lime, under whose shade I was wont to cling round thy neck, full of tenderness, like a child to

A quarter of an hour had elapsed, our heroine had recovered her presence of mind ; her apprehensions had given place to unmixed pleasure ; her ideas were still in some degree tumultuous, but it was the tumult of delight : when Lady Hardy offered her a card for one of the gold quadrille tables, she was too happy not to be inclined to comply with any thing : but, had not this been the case, though she hated play, yet she wanted resolution to refuse. She sat down without having dared to inquire into the stake, and was surprised at being asked for twenty guineas to put into the pool. As she carried her little exchequer in her pocket, she was however amply prepared, and had the good fortune to rise from the table thirty guineas richer than she sat down : a circumstance which, it may be supposed, did not diminish her happiness. She had just cut out, and was passing from one room to another, Lady Hardy leaning with an air of intimacy on her arm, when a servant announced Lord Melville. She turned hastily at the sound of a title ; a sound for which she had listened impatiently the whole evening in vain. This young nobleman, the only son of the earl of Claremont, whose rank and character intitled him to shine in more distinguished circles, happening to dine in the neighbourhood, had accidentally, in his way to Arthur's, rambled into lady Hardy's, whose parties he generally honoured with his presence about once a year. The first object that struck his sight was Maria, her countenance dressed in smiles of undissembled pleasure, talking earnestly to lady Hardy. So much beauty, under such protection, must necessarily attract the notice of every man who was at all its votary. Lord Melville's eyes met those of Maria ; she blushed ; he regarded her with an attention the most flattering possible to her charms ; but in which, if she had known the world, she would probably have observed a mixture of something like hope, not quite so flattering to her virtue. If the well-known character of her chaperon, 'whom (to borrow the admirable definition of Fielding) every body knew to be what no-body chose to call her,' might naturally encourage ideas unfavourable to Maria's honour, her own present appearance was not very well adapted to destroy them. The transport of seeing herself in the cheerful haunts of men, after a week of uncomfortable solitude ; the admiration she had excited, perhaps her success at play, which pointed out a new source of ways and means, with the revival of that brilliant imagination which had at first seduced her from Belfont, and the sight of a man she thought formed to realise her fairy dreams of greatness ; all conspired to give a glow to her complexion, a fire to her eyes, a gaiety, I had almost said levity, to her air, which it was not difficult to misinterpret. Fresh and blooming as Hebe, playful as the mother of the loves, her form, her manner, invited the spoiler, whom the purity of her heart would, if known, have repelled. If she appeared charming to lord Melville, he did not seem less to her. Amongst such men as composed lady Hardy's assembly, he seemed, what indeed he was, a being of a superior order. To a countenance full of expression, eyes that anticipated all he meant to say, and a form more perfect than that of Belvedere Apollo, lord Melville added that air of distinction, that easy dignity, compared to which, beauty alone is a mere dead letter. His address was polite, spirited, insinuating ; his conversation that happy mixture of good sense and frivolousness, which makes the most pleasing of all compounds, and is so particularly agreeable to women. He had read, he had travelled ; he knew books and mankind ; but the latter had unfortunately been shewn to him through the wrong end of the perspective. His father, lord Claremont, besides being naturally of a gloomy and suspicious turn of mind, had seen the world in the way most likely to give him unfavourable impressions of it ; he had stood high in administration ; and, on a change of men, had figured not less conspicuously on the side of opposition : the school of modern politics not being the purest school of rectitude, he had found a great part of those with whom he co-operated knaves, and therefore naturally enough, though very falsely, concluded knavery to be the characteristic of mankind. For such a world he had endeavoured to form his son, and had, in this view, spared no expense or trouble to improve and adorn his person, polish his behaviour, cultivate his understanding, and corrupt his heart ; in all which points his labours had been crowned with tolerable success. He found it however impossible to eradicate, and very difficult even to suspend, a warm susceptibility of soul, and an extreme good-nature, both which strongly opposed those cold, uncomfortable, selfish maxims, on which he endeavoured to form lord Melville's character. He read him unceasing lectures on the universal depravity of mankind, the supposed total selfishness of the human heart ; and, to confirm his precepts by the more forcible language of example, he introduced him early into the intimate society of a set of men, whose general principles were as profligate as their outward conduct was regular and decent ; and of women who practised every vice with impunity, under the mask of hypocrisy, and the sanction of bon ton. though he had instilled these destructive principles into the young bosom of Lord Melville, principles calculated not only to loosen the bonds that hold society together, but to rob it of all its sweets, he had instructed him to conceal them with the utmost care. He had taught him to 'smile without being pleased, to caress without affection;' to profess friendship for the man he regarded with aversion, and respect and esteem for the woman he beheld with contempt: to dress vice in the graceful garb of virtue, and conceal a heart filled with the deepest design, under the beauteous veil of honest unsuspecting integrity. He had succeeded in making him one of the most pleasing men in the world; he had not absolutely failed in making him one of the most artful. But though his system of conduct formed on his father's plan, his heart frequently revolted against it: his principles were narrow and selfish, his feelings generous and humane. In short, he had learned to smile and smile, but he had not yet learned to be a villain.

Such was the man who now addressed Maria, with that insinuating respect, that graceful ease, that gentleness of manner, that softened tone of voice, that mixture of every thing seducing, which good sense and good breeding equally dictate to the man who wishes to gain the heart of woman, and which was so peculiarly adapted to insnare that of our heroine. Lady Hardy pressed him to play: he pleaded an engagement, which obliged him, however unwilling, to go in a quarter of an hour. She again offered a card to Maria—the timid Maria now found courage to refuse: Lady Hardy smiled maliciously; her young friend blushed, and sat down. Lord Melville took the chair next her, he talked, she found a thousand charms in all he said; the subjects of his conversation were trifles, but those trifles from him were so interesting!—

'Then he would talk—good gods, how he would talk!'

Her heart felt sensations to which she had till this instant been a stranger—she did not doubt he was actuated by the same emotions—he had asked, with an air of the utmost anxiety, where so much beauty had been till then concealed—that countenance could not deceive—he certainly loved—all she had heard, all she had read, of sympathy, was realised—she anticipated the joy her uncle and her dear Louisa would feel on receiving her next letter—she blessed the happy impulse that, had brought her town.—These were the first moments in which she could be said to live—they danced on downy pinions. We will suppose Lord Melville's quarter of an hour, which he had however more than doubled, was expired; we will suppose he had left the assembly; we will imagine Maria, after having followed him to the door with her eyes, sitting pensively gazing on her fan, insensibly to all around her, when she was suddenly awakened from her reverie by lady Hardy's presenting her to some of her female friends, who were dispersing their cards of invitation with a liberal hand. She exchanged a profusion of civilities, and found herself invited to sixteen card parties in the course of the coming eight days. The difficulty in respect to many coteries is how to get in; may we be permitted to say, the only difficulty in respect to this true hospitable one is how to get out? Miss Villier's chair came, and was in due course announced: as the party was beginning to break up, and she felt herself untuned, as to play, for the evening, she gladly embraced the opportunity of this event presented of making her escape.

Maria returned from her visit, full of a thousand pleasing ideas. She sat down, and wrote a letter to Louisa:

'She had passed a delightful evening in the best company, at the house of a very respectable lady, the widow of a baronet; had been invited by half a dozen ladies of the most estimable character to parties where she should see only persons of the first fashion; had attracted the notice of the most amiable young nobleman in town, the heir of immense fortune.—But his rank and fortune were the least considerations—she had found the man she should have chosen, had she seen him in a cottage—the man on earth formed to make her happy—had found him in the most distinguished rank—had found him possessed of that bewitching delicacy of sentiment—that dear sensibility—that perfect honour—that noble simplicity of character—that dignity of manner—his looks express such benevolence of heart—such candour was painted on his countenance—it was virtue adorned by the graces—his eyes spoke the language of truth and tenderness—their souls were formed for each other—it was his least merit to be the most lovely of mankind.' She would have filled a folio sheet in this Pindaric style, the style of a girl bred in the shades, who loves for the first time, if the bellman had not reminded her to seal and send away her letter.

The Life of Stephen Duck.

DUCK (Stephen) a very extraordinary person, who from a thresher became a poet, was born in Wiltshire about the beginning of the present century, and was taught reading, writing, and arithmetic. Being taken from school in his fourteenth year, he was for several years engaged in the most laborious employments of a country life. However, he read sometimes, and thought oftener; for he panted after knowledge; and having almost lost his arithmetic, grew uneasy at his having forgot any thing he had learned. Though he was then twenty four years of age, was married and at service, and had neither books nor money, he, by working longer than other day labourers, found means to purchase, first a book of vulgar arithmetic, then one of decimal, and a third of measuring land; all which he made himself a tolerable master of, in the hours he could steal from sleep, after the labours of the day. At length a friend of his, who had been two or three years at service in London, returned into the country, bringing with him some books; viz. Milton's Paradise Lost, the Spectators, Seneca's Morals, Telemachus, Addison's Defence of Christianity, an English Dictionary, an Ovid, a volume of Shakespeare's Plays; and a few other books. By these assistances, Stephen soon grew something of a poet, and something of a philosopher. He had from his infancy a turn for poetry; but received a much higher relish for it by reading Milton twice or thrice over. The Spectators improved his understanding more than any thing; and the copies of verses scattered in them, prompted his natural inclination for poetry. Sometimes, while at work, he attempted to turn his thoughts into verse; and at last began to venture them on paper. This took air; and Stephen, whom the country people before thought a scholar, was now said to be able to write verses. His fame reached the ears of the neighbouring clergymen and gentlemen, who, upon examining him, found that he had a considerable share of merit, and gave him money to encourage him. At length some of his poems falling into the hands of a lady of quality, who attended on the late queen Caroline, they were read to her majesty, who took him under her protection, and settled on him an annual pension. He now studied the Latin tongue, and having taken holy orders, was preferred to the living of Byfleet in Surry, where he became a popular preacher: at length, however, falling into a state of lunacy, he, in the year 1756, threw himself into the Thames from a bridge near Reading, and was drowned.

The Life of John Dudley.

Dudley (John) baron of Malpas, viscount Lisle, earl of Warwick, and duke of Northumberland, one of the most powerful subjects that ever flourished in this kingdom, was the son of Edmund Dudley, the infamous tool of Henry VII. (beheaded in 1510) and was born in the year 1502. In 1511 the parliament reversed the attainder of his late father. In 1523 he attended Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, in his expedition to France, and distinguished himself so much by his gallant behaviour, that he obtained the honour of knighthood. He accompanied cardinal Wolsey in his embassy to France, in the year 1527; and, some time after, was appointed master of the armoury in the Tower. In 1542 he was raised to the dignity of viscount Lisle, and at the next festival of St. George was elected knight of the garter; and was soon after made lord high-admiral of England, in which office he performed some signal services. Towards the close of king Henry VIIIth's reign, he received large grants of church-lands from that monarch, who appointed him by will one of his sixteen executors.

Edward VI. having ascended the throne, and the earl of Hertford, his uncle, being declared protector of the realm, the lord viscount Lisle resigned his post of high admiral in favour of Sir Thomas Seymour, the protector's brother, and was the same day (Feb. 16, 1547) created earl of Warwick. He was lieutenant-general under the lord protector in the expedition to Scotland, and had a principal share in the victory at Muffelburgh. In 1549 a rebellion broke out in Norfolk, under the conduct of Robert Ket, a tanner, who was soon at the head of sixteen thousand men. The earl of Warwick, whose reputation was very high in military affairs, was ordered to march with an army against these rebels, and soon gained a complete victory, killing above two thousand of them. Ket, their ring-leader, escaped from the field; but, being taken the next day in a barn with his brother William, was hung in chains on Norwich castle; his brother was hanged on Wymondham-steeple, and the rest of the chiefs suffered the same fate. After the execution of Sir Thomas Seymour for high treason, the earl of Warwick was again made lord-admiral. In April 1551, he was constituted earl marshal of England; soon after, lord warren of the northern marches; and, in October the same year, was created duke of Northumberland. He was also elected chancellor of the university of Cambridge, upon the death of the duke of Somerset, whom by his intrigues he had brought to the block. In 1553 he married his fourth son, lord Guildford Dudley, to the lady Jane Grey, eldest daughter of the duke of Suffolk; and had the address to prevail with king Edward to settle the crown upon this lady, to the exclusion of the princesses Mary and Elizabeth. On the 6th of July, 1553, the king died; and on the 10th of that month, the duke of Northumberland caused the lady Jane to be proclaimed queen. The princess Mary had retired into Suffolk, where she was joined by several of the nobility, and a great number of people; upon which the duke, with an army of eight thousand men, marched against her as far as St. Edmund's-bury. When Mary's friends were informed that the duke of Northumberland had begun his march, some of them advised her to retire into another country; and perhaps she would have complied with this advice, had he exerted that vigour and activity which had hitherto distinguished his character. But finding his troops diminish; the people unwilling to stir in his favour, and that he received no supplies from the council, he retired back to Cambridge. On the 19th of July, Mary was proclaimed queen in London; of which the duke being informed, he immediately disbanded his army. He then caused that princess to be proclaimed in Cambridge, at the same time throwing up his cap and crying, "God save queen Mary." But he reaped no advantage from these exterior marks of loyalty; for he was soon after arrested in the queen's name by the earl of Arundel, and committed prisoner to the Tower. On the 18th of August, he was brought to trial in Westminster-hall; and being condemned for high treason, was beheaded on the 22d of that month.—Such was the end of this potent nobleman, of whom it may be truly said, that, tho' he was endued with many great and good qualities, yet they were overbalanced by his vices. He had a numerous issue, viz. eight sons and five daughters.

The Life of Ambrose Dudley.

Dudley (Ambrose) baron Lisle, and earl of Warwick, son of John duke of Northumberland, was born about the year 1530. He attended his father into Norfolk against the rebels; and was in high favour with king Edward VI. After that prince's decease, appearing in arms in behalf of lady Jane Grey, he was attainted, received sentence of death, and remained a close prisoner till the 18th of October, 1554; when he was discharged out of the Tower, and pardoned for life. In the year 1557, he signalized himself by his bravery in the famous battle of St. Quintin; but had the misfortune to lose there his brother Henry, who was a youth of great hopes. The same year an act was passed for restoring the whole family in blood. On the accession of queen Elizabeth, he was regarded as one of the most accomplished persons at court; and, in the fourth year of her reign, was created baron of Lisle and earl of Warwick. He was afterwards appointed the queen's lieutenant in Normandy, where he distinguished himself by his courage and conduct. In 1569, he, together with the lord admiral Clinton, suppressed the rebellion raised in the north by the earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland. In 1570 the queen granted him the office of chief butler of England, and the next year he was chosen one of the privy-council. He was a man of great sweetness of temper, and of an unexceptionable character, which gained him the appellation of "The good earl of Warwick." In the last years of his life he endured great pain in his leg from a wound he had received in defending Havre de Grace against the French, and at length submitted to an amputation, which proving unsuccessful, he died soon after at Bedford-house, Bloomsbury, on the 26th of February, 1589, and was interred in the chapel of the Blessed Virgin at Warwick, where a noble monument was erected over him. He was thrice married, but had no issue.

The Life of Robert Dudley.

Dudley (Robert) earl of Leicester, was the fifth son of John duke of Northumberland, by Jane, daughter and heiress of Sir Edward Guildford; and is supposed to have been born about the year 1532. He received the honour of knighthood from king Edward VI. and in June, 1550, espoused Amy, daughter of Sir John Robsart, at Sheen in Surry, the king honouring their nuptials with his presence. He was shortly after appointed master of the king's buck-hounds; and, in August 1551, was chosen one of the gentlemen of the king's chamber in ordinary. In 1553 he took arms in support of lady Jane Grey, for which act of rebellion he was condemned to die; but was the next year pardoned for life. In 1557 he was present at the siege of St. Quintin; and was that year restored in blood. Upon the accession of queen Elizabeth, he became one one of her principal favourites: he was made master of the horse in the first year of her reign, and in 1559 was installed knight of the garter, and sworn of the privy-council. The great affection the queen discovered for Sir Robert, and the many favours she conferred upon him, induced him to imagine, that if he could but get rid of his wife, he might soon render himself acceptable to her majesty as an husband. With this view, he is said to have dispatched his lady into the country, to the house of one of his dependents, at Cumnor in Berkshire; where, we are told, he first endeavoured to have her taken off by poison; but this design not succeeding, he caused her to be thrown down from the top of a stair case, so that she was killed by the violence of the fall, which was pretended to have been merely accidental. She was at first obscurely buried at Cumnor; but Dudley, in hopes of putting some stop to the rumours that were circulated on this occasion, ordered that her body should be taken up, and removed to St. Mary's church, Oxford, where it was interred with great pomp and solemnity.

In 1562, Sir Robert Dudley obtained from the queen the castle and manor of Kenilworth, together with Astell-Grove in Warwickshire, and the lordships of Denbigh and Chirk. The same year he was chosen high steward of the university of Cambridge; and received many other grants from the crown. In the latter end of September, 1564, he was created baron of Denbigh and earl of Leicester; and before the close of the year, was made chancellor of the university of Oxford.—On the 24th of January, 1566, he and the duke of Norfolk were invested with the order of St. Michael, which had been sent them by Charles IX. king of France. In 1575 the earl of Leicester entertained the queen and her court at Kenilworth-castle with surprising magnificence, for the space of seventeen days. In 1585 he was appointed lieutenant-general of the forces sent into the Low Countries against the Spaniards, and deputy-governor of the United Provinces. He was not only unsuccessful as a general, but ventured to lay an oppressive hand upon a people who had lately shaken off the Spanish yoke, who exulted in their new liberty, and were extremely jealous of it. He returned to England in November 1586; and in June the next year embarked for the Low Countries; but the states-general being greatly displeased with his arbitrary government, he was soon recalled. Upon his return, finding that an accusation was preparing against him for mal-administration, he privately implored the queen's protection, and besought her "not to receive him with disgrace at his return, whom she had sent out with honour; nor bring him to the grave, whom her former goodness had raised from the dust;" which expressions of humility wrought so effectually upon the queen, that she re-admitted him into her favour, and appointed him steward of the household. In the year 1588, when the nation was alarmed with the apprehensions of the Spanish Armada, the earl of Leicester was made lieutenant-general, under the queen, of the army assembled at Tilbury. He died on the 4th of September following, at Cornbury-lodge in Oxfordshire, and was magnificently interred at Warwick.

"Leicester's engaging person and address (says Mr. Granger) recommended him to the favour of queen Elizabeth.—These exterior qualifications, without the aid of any kind of virtue, or superiority of abilities, gained him such an ascendant over her, that every instance of his misconduct was overlooked; and he had the art to make his faults the means of rising higher in her favour. He is said to have been the first who introduced the art of poisoning into England. It is certain that he often practised it himself, and that he sent a divine to convince Walsingham of the lawfulness of poisoning the queen of Scots, before her trial."

The Life of Sir Robert Dudley.

Dudley (Sir Robert) who was styled abroad earl of Warwick and duke of Northumberland, appears to have been the legitimate son of Robert earl of Leicester, by the lady Douglas Sheffield, though he was declared illegitimate by his father. He was born at Sheen, in Surry, in the year 1573, and received his education at Christ-church college, Oxford. The earl of Leicester dying in 1588, left him the reversion of the greatest part of his fortune, to which he succeeded upon the death of his uncle Ambrose, earl of Warwick. Endued by nature with an enterprising genius, he had a strong ambition to distinguish himself by some naval achievement; and, 1594, undertook an expedition against the Spanish settlements in the West Indies, where he behaved with remarkable gallantry. In 1596 he attended the earl of Essex and the lord high admiral Howard in their glorious expedition against Cadiz; and for the courage which he displayed at the taking of that town, he was knighted by the first of these noble peers. In the beginning of the reign of king James I. he commenced a suit, with a view of proving the legitimacy of his birth; but being overpowered by the intrigues of the countess dowager of Leicester, he retired into foreign countries, and assumed the title of earl of Warwick. This last circumstance was greedily laid hold of by his enemies in England, who represented it to the king in the most unfavourable light, so that his majesty sent orders to him to return home; and upon his refusal to comply with that injunction, his estate was seized and vested in the crown.

Sir Robert Dudley was kindly received at the court of Florence by Cosimo II. grand duke of Tuscany, who, in process of time, appointed him great chamberlain to his consort, the arch-duchess Magdalen of Austria, sister to the emperor Ferdinand II. While he resided at this court, he contrived several methods of improving shipping, introduced new manufactures, and encouraged the merchants to extend their foreign commerce; and by which and other services he obtained so high a reputation, that, at the desire of the arch-duchess, the emperor Ferdinand, in 1620 created him a duke of the holy Roman empire. Upon this he assumed his grandfather's title of duke of Northumberland; and ten years after, was enrolled by pope Urban VIII. among the Roman nobility. He formed the great project of draining the morass between Pisa and the sea, and by that means raised Leghorn from a paltry village to a large and beautiful town. He was deeply read in philosophy, physic, chemistry, mathematics, and history; and was the inventor of a famous medicine called "The earl of Warwick's powder." He wrote an account of his voyage to the West Indies; a work entitled Del Arcano del Mare; a medical treatise called Catholicon; and a proposition for his majesty's service, to bridle the impertinency of parliaments. Sir Robert died in September 1639, at his castle of Carbello, in the neighbourhood of Florence.

The Life of Sir William Dugdale.

Dugdale (Sir William) an eminent historian and antiquary, was born at Shustoke, in Warwickshire, on the 12th of September, 1605. He was taught grammar-learning in the free-school at Coventry, where he continued till he was sixteen years of age; and then returning home to his father, who had been educated at Oxford, was instructed by him in civil law and history. Having distinguished himself early by his knowledge in antiquities, he was recommended by Sir Henry Spelman to Thomas earl of Arundel, earl marshal of England, who appointed him a pursuivant at arms extraordinary, by the name of Blanch Lyon. In 1640 he was made Rouge-Croix pursuivant in ordinary; and in April 1644, was created Chester-herald. He attended king Charles I. at the battle of Edge-hill, and afterwards at Oxford, where he remained till the surrender of that garrison to the parliament. Upon the restoration of Charles II. he was advanced to the office of Norroy king of arms; and in 1677 was appointed Garter principal king at arms. The same year his majesty conferred on him the honour of knighthood. He died on the 10th of February, 1686, and was interred at Shustoke. He wrote, 1. The Antiquities of Warwickshire: 2. Origines Juridicales; or Historical Memorials of the English Laws, &c. 3. The History of St. Paul's Cathedral: 4. A short View of the late Troubles in England: 5. The History of imbanking and draining divers Fens and Marshes, &c. 6. The Baronage of England; and other pieces. He likewise assisted Roger Dodsworth in compiling the Monasticon Anglicanum. Mr. Granger styles him, "the most laborious and judicious antiquary of his age;" and observes, that "his books in general are of special use to the readers as well as the writers of English history."

The Life of Laurence Echard.

Echard (Laurence) an English historian and divine, was the son of a clergyman, and was born at Bassam, near Beccles, in Suffolk, about the year 1671. He studied at Christ's college in Cambridge, where he took the degree of bachelor of arts in 1691, and that of master in 1695. Having taken orders, he was presented to the livings of Welton and Elkinton, in Lincolnshire. He was afterwards made a prebendary of Lincoln; and, in August 1712, was installed archdeacon of Stowe. In the reign of king George I. he was preferred to the livings of Rendlesham, Sudborn, and Alford, in Suffolk; at which places he lived about eight years in a continued ill state of health. Being advised to go to Scarborough for the waters, he advanced in his journey as far as Lincoln, but, declining very fast, was unable to proceed further; and there, going to take the air, he died in his chariot on the 16th of August, 1730. He was a member of the antiquarian society at London. He acquired a great reputation by his History of England, which, though violently attacked by Mr. Oldmixon, is still held in considerable estimation. Besides that work, Mr. Echard wrote a general Ecclesiastical History, from the nativity of our Saviour to the first establishment of Christianity by human laws, under the emperor Constantine tine the Great : this performance has passed through several editions, and is recommended by the learned Dr. Prideaux as “the best of its kind in the English tongue.” He also wrote a History of the Revolution, a Roman History, &c. and translated into English the comedies of Terence.

Life of Edward the Black Prince.

Edward the Black Prince, so called from his wearing his black armour, was the eldest son of Edward III. and queen Philippa, and was born at Woodstock the 13th of June, 1330. Before he was seven years of age, he was created by his father duke of Cornwall, being the first in England that bore the title of duke. Upon this occasion he received a grant of the flanneries or tin-mines in Cornwall, together with the coinage, and the profits arising from thence. In the fourteenth year of his age he was created prince of Wales ; the king investing him with a coronet, a gold ring, and a silver rod, and adding lands of considerable value in Wales to his former possessions, to enable him to maintain the dignity of a prince. When he was just turned sixteen, he attended his father in the wars in France ; commanded the first line or battallion in the famous battle of Cressy, and obtained the honour of that glorious victory. In the year 1356, he prosecuted the war in Guienne with astonishing success ; and on the 19th of September, 1356, with no more than twelve thousand men, engaged the French army near Poitiers, which consisted of above sixty thousand, whom he entirely defeated, and took John, the king of France, prisoner. “In this battle (says Granger) he displayed all the military talents of a consummate general ; and in his behaviour after it, all that moderation and humanity, especially towards the royal captive, which none but great minds are capable of, and which did him more honour than his victory.” In 1362 he was invested with the principality of Aquitaine ; and in 1367 restored Don Pedro the Cruel to the kingdom of Castile, who had been deposed by his natural brother Henry. This valiant prince died at Westminster on the 8th of June, 1376, in the 46th year of his age, universally regretted by the English nation ; he was interred with great magnificence in the cathedral church of Canterbury. He married Joanna, the daughter of Edmund earl of Kent, a widow of extraordinary beauty, by whom he had two sons, namely, Edward, who died in his infancy, and Richard, who succeeded his grandfather on the throne of England.

Edward the Black Prince was regarded throughout all Europe as one of the most invincible heroes of the age in which he lived. “The soldiers loved him to a degree of enthusiasm ; and always fought under his banner with an assurance of victory, which no odds could lessen, and no accidents disappoint. His affability, politeness, piety, clemency, and liberal disposition, have been celebrated by different historians.”

The Life of Thomas Egerton, Baron of Ellesmere.

Egerton (Thomas) baron of Ellesmere, adorned the office of chancellor by his knowledge, his integrity, and his writings. He was the natural son of Sir Richard Egerton, of Ridley in Cheshire, and was born in that county about the year 1540. He was educated at Brazen-nose college in Oxford, of which he was entered a commoner in 1556. He continued there three years, and having laid a good foundation of solid learning, removed to Lincoln's-Inn, where he applied with such diligence to the study of the law, that he became, in a little time, a most eminent counsellor. Queen Elizabeth, charmed with his rising merit, appointed him first her solicitor-general, then her attorney-general, and afterwards master of the rolls. In the thirty-eighth year of that princess, he was made lord-keeper of the great seal, in which office he continued during the remainder of Elizabeth's reign. On the 21st of July, 1603, he was created a peer of the realm, by the title of lord Ellesmere ; and on the 24th of that month was appointed chancellor of the university of Oxford ; and the same year was advanced to the dignity of viscount Brackley. In the beginning of the year 1617, being seized with a dangerous illness, he resigned the seals, and died on the 15th of March following, in the seventy-seventh year of his age. Wood says, “he was a most grave and prudent man, a good lawyer, just and honest ; of so quick an apprehension also and profound judgment, that none of the bench in his time went beyond him.” Some of his writings relating to his high office, and the court in which he presided, are in print. The present duke of Bridgewater is one of his descendants.

The Life of Thomas Emlyn.

Emlyn (Thomas) a learned and pious divine, memorable for his sufferings on the score of heterodoxy, was born at Stamford, in Lincolnshire, in May 1665 ; and received his education at Emanuel college, Cambridge, and an academy of the dissenters, dissenters, amongst whom he began to preach in the year 1682. He soon after became chaplain to the countess of Donnegal, whom he accompanied to Belfast in Ireland, where Sir William Franklin, who had a good estate in the west of England, offered him a considerable living, on condition of his conforming to the established church; but this he declined, the terms of ministerial conformity being such as he could not conscientiously comply with, though he had not then those scruples about the Trinity which he afterwards entertained. The confusions in Ireland at the time of the revolution induced him to return to England; and being invited by Sir Robert Rich, one of the lords of the admiralty, to his house near Beccles in Suffolk, was prevailed upon by him to officiate as minister to a dissenting congregation at Leostoff in that county. Here he contracted an intimate acquaintance with Mr. William Manning, a nonconformist minister in that neighbourhood; and being both of inquisitive tempers, they jointly searched into the principal points of religion. Dr. Sherlock's Vindication of the Doctrine of the Trinity being published about this time, they turned their thoughts to that subject; which they examined the more closely, as they imagined they saw reason first to doubt, and afterwards to differ from, the received doctrine in that article. Mr. Manning became a Socinian, and endeavoured earnestly to make Mr. Emlyn one; but the latter could never be brought to doubt either the pre-existence of our Saviour, or that God created the material world by him. In 1691 Mr. Emlyn received an invitation from Mr. Boyse, a dissenting minister of Dublin, to accept of the pastoral care of his congregation jointly with himself, and accordingly went to Dublin, where, about six years after, he had some thoughts of openly declaring his sentiments, on the Trinity, and quitting his congregation, as he could have no hopes of staying when they were known. He only wanted a proper opportunity of doing it, and this was soon offered him; for Mr. Duncan Cummins, a physician in Dublin, having some suspicion, put Mr. Boyse first upon the enquiry, and afterwards went with him to Mr. Emlyn's house, where Mr. Emlyn freely owned his being convinced that "the God and Father of Jesus Christ is alone the supreme Being, and superior in excellence and authority to his Son, who derives all from him." He further declared, that he had no design to occasion strife among them, and would therefore leave the congregation peaceably, that they might chuse another, if they pleased, in his room. Mr. Boyse, however, brought the affair before the meeting of the Dublin ministers in consequence of which Mr. Emlyn was immediately prohibited from preaching, and a few days after obliged to withdraw himself into England, the loudest Clamours being raised against him and his opinions.

On his arrival at London he published a short account of his case, and after about ten weeks absence returned to his family, which he had left in Dublin. Here perceiving the prodigious odium his opinions, and consequently himself, lay under, he resolved to shew what evidence he had for them from the Scriptures, and wrote An humble Inquiry into the Scripture Account of Jesus Christ; intending to return to England as soon as it was printed. Some zealous dissenters gaining intelligence of this, procured the lord chief justice Pine's special warrant to seize him and his books, and went with the keeper of Newgate to see it executed. The chief justice at first refused to take bail, but at last allowed two persons to be bound in a recognizance of eight hundred pounds for his appearance. He accordingly took his trial for this book, before the court of Queen's Bench, on the 14th of June, 1703; and not being permitted to speak freely, was soon found guilty. He was committed to the common jail till the 16th of June, and then appearing to have judgment given against him, the queen's council moved that he should recant; which Mr. Emlyn absolutely refusing, he was sentenced to undergo a year's imprisonment, to pay a fine of one thousand pounds to the queen, to lie in prison till it was paid, and to find security for his good behaviour during life; and, as if this was not sufficient, was led with a paper on his breast round the four courts. He was now for above a quarter of a year a close prisoner in the under-sheriff's house; after which he was hurried away to the common jail, where he lay among the criminals, in a close room filled with six beds, for five or six weeks; and then was removed upon his petition, by an habeas corpus into the Marshalsea. Thus he continued under close confinement, forsaken by all his friends, except Mr. Boyse, who made incessant attempts to procure his liberty. At last his fine was diminished to seventy pounds, which together with twenty pounds claimed by the prime as queen's almoner, being paid, he was released, after two years and above a month's imprisonment, upon giving security for his good behaviour during life.

He now returned to London, where a few few friends assembled a small congregation, to whom he preached every Sunday. This gave great offence to the high-church clergy; and the lower house of convocation, in their representation to the queen in 1711, made no scruple falsely to assert, that weekly sermons were preached in defence of the Unitarian principles. Within a few years, however, this congregation was dissolved by the death of the principal persons who supported it; and Mr. Emlyn being left a comfortable subsistence, by a gentleman who pitied his misfortunes, retired into silence and obscurity; but was honoured with the esteem and friendship of many eminent and learned men, among whom were the excellent Dr. Samuel Clarke, Mr. William Whiston, and Dr. James Foster. He died at Islington, on the 30th of July, 1741, at the age of seventy-eight. He wrote several tracts relating to the Trinitarian controversy; memoirs of the life and sentiments of Dr. Samuel Clarke; and sermons on various subjects. His works are printed in three volumes, octavo, and to the whole are prefixed, by his son Solomon Emlyn, Memoirs of the Life and Writings of the Author.

GUIANA.

BESIDES many trees and plants common to it with other countries, Guiana produces many peculiar to itself, particularly the simaroba-tree, the bark of the roots of which is esteemed a specific in dysenteries; the caruna, a small poisonous nut, which the Indians reduce to powder, and conceal under their nails at their meetings, when they intend to revenge an injury, till they can put it into the drink of their victim; the woorara, a species of the nibbees, called by the Spaniards bejucos, which are a sort of ligneous cordage, some flat, some round. The round nibbees are innocuous; the flat poisonous. The woorara is a flat nibbee, used by the Indians in a composition to poison their arrows.

There are some animals also peculiar to Guiana, particularly the laubba. This animal is amphibious, and about the size of a pig of four months old. The head is shaped like that of a pug dog, and its feet are like a dog's, but it has no tail. The species of monkeys in Guiana are innumerable. There are bats here twice as large as ours, and without a tail.—Most people in Guiana sleep in hammocks, as more secure from serpents and poisonous insects; but this does not secure them from the bats, which approach any part of the body that is uncovered, generally the feet, open a vein, and suck the blood till they are satisfied. There is also peculiar to Guiana a large venomous toad, called the pipa. Its young are bred in the back of the male, where the female deposits the eggs.

There is a great variety of beautiful birds in Guiana, but most of them are common to it with some other countries. Several persons in the Dutch colony employ themselves and their slaves in killing and preserving birds for the cabinets of Europe.

Most of the fishes of Guiana also are common to it with some other countries; among the rest is the torpedo, or numbing-fish.

Guiana abounds in serpents of various kinds. There is one sort not venomous, that measures sometimes above thirty feet in length, and three in circumference.—It has a taper tail, armed with two claws, like those of a dunghill cock. There are also some of those called amphibiaena.

The inhabitants of Guiana are either natives who are of a reddish brown, or negroes and Europeans, or a mixed progeny of these in various combinations. The natives are divided into different tribes, more or less remote from the settlements of the Europeans. They allow of polygamy, and have no division of lands. The men go to war, hunt, and fish, and the women attend to domestic concerns, spin, weave, in their fashion, and look after the planting cassava and manive, the only things which in this country are cultivated by the natives. Their arms are bows and arrows, short poisoned arrows, blown through a reed, which they use in hunting, and clubs made of a heavy wood called iron wood. They eat the dead bodies of those that are slain in war, and sell for slaves those they take prisoners; their wars being chiefly undertaken to furnish the European plantations. All the different tribes go naked. On particular occasions they wear caps of feathers; but, as cold is wholly unknown, they cover no part but that which distinguishes the sex.—They are cheerful, humane, and friendly, but timid, except when heated by liquor, and drunkenness is a very common vice among them.

Their houses consist of four stakes set up in a quadrangular form, with cross poles, bound together by slit nibbees, and covered with the large leaves called troelies. Their life is ambulatory, and their house, which is put up and taken down in a few hours, is all they have to carry with them. When they remove from place to place, which, as they inhabit the banks of rivers, they do by water in small canoes, a few vessels of clay made by the women, a flat stone, on which they bake their bread, and a rough stone, on which they grate the roots of a cassava, a hammock and a hatchet, are all their furniture and utensils; most of them, however, have a bit of looking-glass framed in paper, and a comb.

Their poisoned arrows are made of splinters of a hard heavy wood, called cacario; they are about twelve inches long, and somewhat thicker than a coarse knitting needle; one end is formed into a sharp point; round the other is wound some cotton, to make it fit the bore of the reed, through which it is to be blown.

They will blow these arrows forty yards with absolute certainty of hitting the mark, and with force enough to draw blood, which is certain and immediate death. Against this poison no antidote is known. The Indians never use these poisoned arrows in war, but in hunting only, and chiefly against monkeys; the flesh of an animal thus killed may be safely eaten, and even the poison itself swallowed with impunity.

All the tribes of Indians in Dutch Guiana believe the existence of one supreme God, the author of nature, and of inferior beings, always disposed to mischief, exactly such as our devils, and an influence over them; and have ceremonies much like what is called pawwawing in other parts of America: they seem rather to wish than believe a future state; and as they suffer no anxiety about the next hour, they suffer still less about the next life.

They bury their dead naked: when the ceremony is over, they drown their sorrows in a drunken feast; and when the body has lain so long in the earth, that the flesh is supposed to be rotten, the bones are taken out, and distributed among the relations: this ceremony is also attended with a drunken feast. The ceremony of marriage is nothing more. Though polygamy is allowed, it is not often practised; but when the wife is grown old and disagreeable, a girl about eight years old is taken into the house, who acts as a servant in domestic employments, till about eleven, and being then marriageable, becomes a wife.

The Indians here have no chief; yet, living in a state in which artificial wants have not produced a general opposition of interest, and where natural wants are easily supplied, their vices are but few. Continence before marriage is not considered as a virtue; a man cares not whether the woman he marries is a virgin or not; but no injury is so surely revenged as the infidelity of a wife.

Nothing is cultivated here by the natives but plantains, cassava, and yams; and one month's cultivation is sufficient for all these. The men are all hunters, and they can always find game or fish, if they prefer it, without danger or toil. They dress it by boiling, either in water or in the juice of cassava, and season it very high with chian, or red pepper. The only set time of eating is the evening, when they return from hunting; in general, they eat whenever they are hungry. They scarce know salt; but sometimes preserve animal food by smoke-drying it. Their drink is water, or a fermented liquor, prepared from the plantain, called pievoree; when they have plenty of this, they are continually drunk.

As the supplying the wants of nature in so fertile and delightful a country takes up but a small portion of their time, they fill up the intervals by various amusements: they bathe and swim in the rivers, in large companies, several times a day, without distinction of sex; and they swim so well, that they may almost be reckoned among amphibious animals. At other times they visit each other, and are mutually entertained by the simple occurrences of their lives, and a great variety of fables, which are merry, significant, and moral. Sometimes they recline indolently in their hammocks, where they not only sleep, but eat, converse and play, blow a kind of rustic flute, pluck out the hair of their beards, or admire themselves in looking-glasses.

The women suffer nothing in child birth, which is attended neither with danger nor pain. The mother and child, immediately after delivery, are plunged into the water, and the next day she returns to her domestic employment, as if nothing had happened. The children are fed, and during their infancy no other care is taken of them; none are sickly or deformed: the boys, as they grow up, attend the father in hunting, and the girls assist the mother. In old age, they become wrinkled; but never either bald or grey. As they have no method of computing time to any number of years, their age cannot be ascertained; but there is sufficient reason to conclude that their lives are long.

In all their traffic with each other, or with Europeans, they estimate every thing by their present want of it; they will at one time demand a hatchet, for what at another time they will exchange for a fish-hook.

This blameless and happy people live together upon terms of perfect equality, having no distinction but of age, or personal merit; neither have they any division of property; each amicably participates the ample ample blessings of a delightful and extensive country; envy, fraud, and violence are precluded, natural desires are immediately and innocently indulged, and government rendered wholly unnecessary.

This colony is the joint property of the West India company, the city of Amsterdam, and the lord of Sommersdyk; but the sovereignty of it belongs to the states general. Accordingly, of the board of directors at Amsterdam, by which this colony is governed, five are chosen by the magistrates of that city, four by the West India company, and one by the lord of Sommersdyk; but the governor must be approved by the states general, and take an oath to them, as well as to the directors.

The colony is now in the most flourishing condition; and a considerable trade is carried on in sugar, tobacco, gums, dyeing drugs and woods, coffee, cotton, flax, and skins; not only with Europe, but the West India Islands, especially the British. Besides Surinam, the capital, there are no less than seven or eight inland towns belonging to the colony, all rich, populous, and commercial, and about five hundred plantations.

Surinam, which gives name to the adjacent country for a hundred miles round, stands within the river of the same name, in 6°. 16. north latitude. The river is navigable thirty leagues up the country; and, besides other forts situated on it, has one called Zelandria, two leagues from the entrance, with a small town called Paramaribo, near it.

To the north-west of the colony of Surinam lies that of Berbice, which takes its name from a river, and is also governed by directors, chosen from among the proprietors in Holland, who, in 1732, obtained a privilege from the states general to render the navigation to this colony free, and also to levy certain duties, both on the inhabitants and ships going out or in.

Further to the north-west lies the river Essequibo, on which the Dutch have likewise settlements.

Having described the whole continent of America, together with the islands in the South Sea*, on the coasts of Patagonia, Brasil, and Guiana, we now proceed to the other islands not yet described; and the first that present themselves to the northward of Guiana are those commonly called the West Indian or Sugar Island, though not the only such, comprehending the Greater and Lesser Antilles, the Caribbee Islands, divided into Windward and Leeward, the Virgin Islands, the Sotaventos, Ballestos, and other small islands; but to avoid confusion, we shall describe them as they belong to the different European nations, beginning with the British.

THE BRITISH WEST INDIAN ISLANDS.

JAMAICA,

the largest of all the British West Indian Islands, extends from 75°. 57. to 78°. 37. west longitude, and from 17°. 48. to 18°. 50. of north latitude; being about one hundred and sixty miles in length, from Point Negril, on the west, to Point Morant, on the east; and seventy from Portland Pitch, on the south, to Gallina point, on the north, where it is broadest; but being of an oval form, it grows narrower towards each end. It lies near four thousand five hundred miles south-west of England, one hundred south of Cuba, and seventy west of Hispaniola, containing between four and five millions of acres.

With respect to the air, there is no country between the tropics where the heat is more moderate, being constantly cooled with refreshing breezes, frequent rains, and nightly dews: however, it is unwholesome, especially on the sea coast, and excessively hot in the mornings all the year round, till about eight o'clock, when the sea breeze begins, increasing gradually till about twelve, when it is commonly strongest, and lasts till two or three, when it begins to die away till about five o'clock, when it is quite spent, and returns no more till next morning. About eight in the evening begins a land breeze, which blows four leagues into the sea, and continues increasing till twelve at night, after which it decreases till four in the morning, when it ceases, and returns again at night. The sea-breeze is stronger at some times than at others, and more so near the coast than within land; whereas, it is just the reverse with the land breeze. Sometimes the sea-breeze blows day and night for a week or two. In December, January, February, the north wind blows furiously, checking the growth of the canes, and all other vegetables, on the north side of the island; but the mountains cover the south side from them. Though it often rains at other times, yet the months of May and October bring the heaviest and most lasting rains; and the east and west parts of the island, containing large tracts of inclosed ground, are more subject to storms of wind and rain, and more unwholesome than the south and north. The south winds bring the most rain; no rains are lasting on the south side of the island, that come from the land. Frost and snow are never seen here; but sometimes large hail, especially on the mountains, where the air is always cooler than in the low lands. The land-wind blowing in the nights, and the sea-breeze in the day time, no ship can come into port but in the day time, nor go out but soon after day-break.

The dews here are so great within land, that the water drops from the leaves of the trees in the morning as if it had rained; but there are seldom any fogs, at least in the plain or sandy places near the sea.

Earthquakes are very frequent in Jamaica; the inhabitants expect one every year. A remarkable one happened in 1668, which was felt all over the island. It was observed, that the ground rose like the sea in waves, as the earthquake passed along; but this was nothing to that which happened at Port Royal in 1692, by which that town was almost swallowed up.

As to the soil and face of the island there is a ridge of hills, called the Blue Mountains, that run from east to west, through it, furrowed by deep gullies on the north and south sides, made by the violent rains, which fall almost every day on those mountains, the tops of which are crowned with different kinds of trees, cedar, lignum vitæ, mahogany, and the like, which render them equally pleasant and profitable to the inhabitants. Several fine rivers also, stored with fish, and navigable by canoes, take their rise from them. A lower ridge runs parallel to the greater, and the vallies or savannahs are exceeding level, without stones, fit for pasture, and fruitful, when cleared of wood, especially on the south side of the island. After the rains, or seasons, as they are called, their savannahs are very pleasant: but, after long droughts, look quite parched and burnt up. One may ride many miles in them without meeting the least ascent. They produce such quantities of grass that the inhabitants are sometimes forced to burn it. Notwithstanding the many rivers and lakes, water in some places is very scarce, and in others so mixed with sand and sediment, that it is not fit for use, till purified for some days in earthen jars; and many cattle, in some years, perish for want of water. There are several salt springs in the island, which form a salt river, and several lakes. Near the sea, as at Port Royal, the well water is brackish, and unwholesome. Though the soil of Jamaica in general is exceeding fertile, yet it is thought not one fourth of the sugar ground upon the island is cultivated, even the grounds lying near the rivers and the sea are in many places over run with wood, insomuch that a planter who has patented three or four thousand acres, has seldom above five hundred well cultivated. One acre, in some places, has been known to yield several hogheads of sugar in a year.

The principal vegetables and produce of the island, besides sugar and rum, are cacao, of which chocolate is made, cotton, coffee, indigo, pimento, commonly called cod, or Jamaica pepper, oranges, lemons, citrons, palms, pomegranates, shaddockes, mameys, sour-tops, papao, pine apples, custard apples, star apples, prickly pears, Alicada pears, melons, plantains, and guavas, dying woods, gums, and medicinal drugs, as guaiacum. China-root, sarsaparilla, cassia fistula, tamarinds, vanillas. Jamaica also produces some tobacco, but of a coarse kind, and cultivated only for the sake of the negroes, who are fond of it; Indian and Guinea corn, with peas of various kinds, but none resembling those of Great Britain, except those which are reared with great care and tenderness in gardens, together with cabbages and a variety of roots, particularly cassava, of which they make bread, yams, and potatoes.

The woods are stored with berries; but apples, and those fruits that are more peculiar to cold countries, thrive but poorly in Jamaica. Besides the productions we have mentioned, many others may be found in the accounts of the naturalists, who have treated of the island, particularly the manchineel tree, which bears a beautiful but poisonous apple, and the wild cinnamon, which is esteemed a sovereign remedy for dispelling wind, and assisting digestion.

After all, the sugar cane is the glory and chief support of Jamaica.

History of the British Parliament.

MR. Ashly demanded of lord North, whether the tax on the sale of estates was to include leases set by auction?

Lord North replied,—Not simple leases; but he apprehended, if leases were sold under a fine, which he knew to be the case case in some places, from some lands he had in the west of England, that in such case they would be within the bill.—Being upon his legs, he partly replied to Mr. Hartley.—He agreed with him, that it was very wrong to load the public accounts with a large navy debt, and for that reason had paid off a million, but did not see that his proposition of a million and a half was at all necessary. Upon the subject of the American war, he lamented it as well as the honourable gentleman; and Mr. Hartley having called upon him to take care of his head from the effects of it, he said, that as to the situation of his head, he was not in much pain, as he trusted this was a country in which he should remain safe, provided he was innocent. That he had acted in every circumstance from the best of his judgment; and what was of much more consequence, honestly, openly, and without concealment. That as to nobody's being willing to take the post of first lord of the treasury, and the honourable gentleman's advice to him to withdraw in time, he had contradicted himself: that he could not think of retiring at any period, because that period was difficult and dangerous—it would be inconsistent with honour; but the honourable gentleman had furnished him with another reason which made it impossible for him to quit, which was the unlucky misfortune, that nobody could be found to accept his place. Let me, however, Sir, (he continued), add, that I sit on this bench no longer than the voice of the people keeps me here, I mean the voice of this house; whenever I shall have so acted as to have that voice against me, believe me, Sir, I shall retire with as much pleasure as propriety.

Relative, Sir, to the hints which dropped yesterday, as well as to-day, complaining of my not going so fully into the state of the nation as some gentlemen expected, it is proper to observe, that when the business of the year occasioned very short budgets, I had time to do it, without tiring the house; but since new taxes have been devised, it has made so long a detail necessary, that the same length has not been within my power, without a speech so long as to tire the house.

Mr. Dempster proposed to lord North a scheme by which he might have raised the same money upon better terms by three and a half per cents, only creating a capital of six millions and a half instead of five. Upon the point of the taxes he said they were multiplied so, that soon no man, that did not eat the bread of government, would have any bread to eat at all. He touched also on the propriety of raising the supplies by long annuities, rather than by perpetuities, as in the case of one of ninety-nine years, every year was a minister acting in our favour; time the best lord of the treasury, and the nation always approaching nearer and nearer to the total extinction of the debt.

Lord North said, that the matter of raising money on perpetual, or on long annuities, was an old question, and by no means one of to-day; that Sir Robert Walpole had had the experience, and had determined that it was by much the best to grant perpetual securities; that there was one very remarkable circumstance relating to long annuities which perhaps that honourable gentleman was not acquainted with; which was that the annuities for 99 years granted in the year 1708, now sold as well as they did when first granted:—That grant them when you would there was not above three and a half per cent. between a term of 50 and of 99 years, for which reason, though he was very much a friend to short annuities, to the end of which the nation had a tolerable prospect; he was very much an enemy to long ones, as decisively the worst way in which a nation could borrow.

Mr. Bayley spoke an indistinct word or two, and then

Mr. Luttrell arose, and complained of lord North having included the new manufactory of plate glass in his category of taxes.

Sir Joseph Mawbey next arose, and for the edification of the house, went upon the general line of politics, but unfortunately the house made so incessant a noise, that we were not among the number of those that were edified by his observations.

Colonel Barre arose, and silence followed him. He touched shortly upon the expectations, which every one who was present yesterday must have of some explanations from both, or one of the noble lords (lord North and lord George Germain) relative to the state of the nation, with regard to foreign powers, and to the prospect of a speedy end to the American war; farther he hoped than what could be gathered from two dry sentences, that France meant nothing hostile, and that there were hopes of a good conclusion to the troubles in America.

Lord North sarcastically congratulated col. Barre upon his change of ground, since yesterday; from the affair of the contracts, to that of the political line, from which he hoped he was to understand, that he had reaped better information.

Col. Barre said, that if the noble lord meant to be at all communicative, there was ample matter for him to expatiate upon; he called on him particularly to explain the 700,000*l.* for provisions alone; likewise the 800,000*l.* for extraordinaries, of which the noble lord had hitherto only told them that that and other 400,000*l.* were applied for a military chest; a very laconic explanation, but such an one as he hoped would not prove satisfactory to the house by any means; that in relation to the rum business, a Mr. Atkinson must be a very good friend of the treasury indeed! for he has paid 35,000*l.* for rum, without any of the requisites of a satisfactory account; for there was not even the quantity specified which he had furnished; he understood, however, that it was at five shillings and three-pence a gallon;—that he had made many enquiries of planters, merchants, and others, and had found that three shillings and six pence was a very favourable contract price; that two shillings and four-pence was a prime cost price, and desired to know if a Mr. Irvine had not offered to contract for rum at two shillings and six pence? And also if the victualling office had not contracted for it no longer ago than last Monday at two shillings and six-pence? He would not hint an idea that the noble lord touched a penny of these contracts—he who certainly was capable of refusing LACKS OF PAGODAS, can never be reproached with the meanness of being concerned in the pitiful transactions of rum contracts.

Lord North rose again to answer colonel Barre. He said, in reply to the contract business, that nothing could be clearer than the mode of the exchequer, passing the accounts of those who had contracted with government;—that there were always vouchers for every thing that was done, so that the completest satisfaction could at any time be had, as to the terms of the contract, and the due performance of those terms. That the contract with Mr. Atkinson was for rum of the very best proof, the finest that could be had in Jamaica, and in order that it might be known whether the rum was of that goodness, an instrument for ascertaining it was sent out. That Mr. Pelham, secretary to the navy board, had informed the treasury, that their contract price in Jamaica was four shillings and four-pence a gallon, but that in addition to this, there was a freight part to Boston at six-pence, and part to Canada at nine-pence, which made seven-pence halfpenny an average. Leakage was ten per cent, or five-pence. Insurance eight per cent, or four-pence. Commission was five per cent, two-pence half-penny.

—Whereas the treasury had contracted at five shillings and three-pence, which he thought so far from being a bad bargain, was evidently a very favourable one.

As to Mr. Irvine having offered to contract cheaper, he knew not the fact, but no other contracts were to be made than the first, as they were now left to the commander in chief, Sir William Howe. In answer to the colonel's enquiries about the sums called a military chest, he said, it seemed to him not an improper term, as it was at the disposition of the commander in chief, for the purchase of extraordinaries.

Colonel Barre with some vehemence of pleasantry, rose to hug the noble lord as he called it; upon the rum affair he was perfectly satisfied;—perfectly convinced of the wonderful good economy of the noble lord, to get that at five shillings and three-pence, which plainly cost the contractor six shillings. Why the poor man must be ruined!—It was cruel to treat him so unjustly;—and he now plainly saw the reason why people of all sorts were so shy of taking government contracts;—but this Mr. Atkinson must be the greatest ideot in the whole contracting world. Did he make his contracts for four grout, and porter upon the same principles? But what will the noble lord say to rum, so far from being four shillings and four-pence, being in the island no more than one shilling and nine pence;—yet that this was the fact, he knew from certain intelligence.—Those therefore who had so flagrantlly misinformed the noble lord, ought to be reprimanded. He then called again on lord George Germaine to give some satisfaction to the house, upon the business of the American war;—that noble lord spoke but seldom, but he spoke with weight.

Governor Johnstone treated the idea of rum being four shillings and four-pence with great harshness;—he said it was possible, that the noble lord must have made a mistake not very uncommon, that of currency for sterling: but there was forty per cent. difference in the exchange. He said, that the whole occasion of these contracts were wrong; for they were only bribing bribing the foldiers to their bufinefs;—that Sir Jeffery Amherft conquered that country without any rum coming into the national expence.

Sir James Colbourn rofe to explain the circumftances of his contract, for 100,000 gallons of rum from Grenada, where the current price was two fhillings and a penny fterling a gallon, that there were expences in casks, &c. which gentlemen had forgot; that to carry rum from the Weft Indies to Bofton or Canada now was an immense expence, as they were to be freighted thither on purpofe, and to come back again empty to the iflands. But he produced one fact, which was very ftrong for the treasury, he freighted five fhips with his contract, and one not being loaded, he filled her up with more of the fame rum, to be fold at Quebec on his own account, and that fold for a higher price than what his contract gave him:—he fpoke entirely from facts, and offered to produce proofs of what he faid at the bar. That if the treasury would give him another fuch contract, he would not take it; that his contract, and it might be the fame with others, was made under the expectation of the price falling, inftead of which it rofe.

Lord North faid, that Mr. Pelham's account was four fhillings and four-pence, without diftinguifhing whether it was currency or not; but he apprehended, that currency was meant from the certain expences he had recapitulated, running fo much above five fhillings and three-pence;—but that he would inform himfelf more particularly about it, and give the houfe every fpecies of information they wifhed to have about it;—as there was no contract which would not bear their clofeft examination.

Mr. Fox called on the houfe fimplly to remark, that forty per cent was no fort of difference in the accounts of the noble lord.

Mr. Bayley offered to deliver to the ufe of government, the very beft rum, at two fhillings and two pence fterling in Jamaica, which was juft half the price the noble lord had mentioned.

Lord North replied, if the honourable gentleman had any good offers to make in the contrary way—the navy and victualling boards were the proper places to apply to, which were not in his department;—that the prices he had mentioned were from papers, not memory.

Mr. Dempfter remarked, that if contracts were publicly advertifed to whoever would fupply them cheapeft, as they ought to be; the noble lord would not be under any difficulty in having recourfe to either papers or memory.

Mr. Dunning faid, that there was no clearnefs in this matter of the contracts, but there was one thing clear as day, which was the noble lord's perfect ignorance of the whole tranfaction.

Lord George Germaine rofe to give fatisfaction to the houfe, why he had in the debate of the day before faid that there was a profpect of a fuccefsful end to the war in North America:—That as to his fpeaking feldom, it was not his cuftom to fpeak when he had nothing to fay; but whenever he was called upon to give information to the houfe, he fhould always fpeak then with pleafure; as to the campaign, he thought he had the greateft reafon to expect fuccefs from the army of general Howe being in good order, and more numerous from recruits than in the laft campaign, while that of the rebels was in much worfe order, and lefs numerous than it was before: That the fleet was alfo reinforced with fome fhips of the line, which were wanting laft year: That he thought himfelf farther founded in his expectation from the minds of the people turning from their experiencing the mifery of anarchy, confufion and defpotifm, inftead of the happinefs and fecurity they enjoyed under the legal government of this country,—that thefe emotions had operated fo ftrongly in their minds, that very many deferters had left the rebel army, and come in to general Howe with their arms—many hundreds—and were coming in every day: That he had farther formed his opinion from the circumftance of the congress having given up the government, confeffing themfelves unequal to it, and creating Mr. Wafington dictator of America: thefe circumftances, he thought, promifed divifions among them: That another circumftance which every day proved of yet greater importance, was their being difappointed in their expectation of affiftance and fupport from France; they had been buoyed up with that hope, and made to believe, that a fuperior French fleet would be feen riding on their coaft:—in all which they now felt themfelves deceived, and repented it accordingly: That they had met with the fame difappointments from Spain—not that he afserted they had not received underhand affiftance from both in officers, &c. but what they were promifed was open, avowed affiftance. Yet, Sir, added his lordfhip, for the protection of France, they would pay largely—they have offered largely,—they have, by their pretended ambaffadors, actually offered to the French court all our Weft India Iflands!—There is liberality, Sir!—There is love of freedom, dom, to consign so readily under French dominion and despotism the whole West Indies!—Let me farther remark, Sir, that there are great expectations from the army in Canada, which last year could do no more than prepare to act; but having destroyed the enemy's fleet, they will be able to advance early in the spring, and unite with general Howe's army, adding 12,000 men to it besides Canadians. His lordship farther brought another circumstance, which was the infinite difficulty Washington found in raising men: he had been under the necessity of forcing them into arms for three years, yet gave them a bounty of thirty pounds sterling a man; but nothing could make it effectual, for as fast as they were forced on one side, they deserted to the other; of which there were 6000 armed New Yorkers in Howe's army; that his army was collected chiefly from the south; for from New England none had been raised, and they would early be cut off from the south. These, he said, were the reasons which induced him to have the warmest hope that the next campaign would prove very favourable.

Colonel Barre in answer to lord George Germain, said, I congratulate the house upon the noble lord for once, at last, giving any hope that there would be an end of the American war; this was what he never could be brought to do before—not one word of the kind could ever be drawn from him—the noble lord has told us that all deficiencies have been made good in our army by recruits from Europe. I do not clearly understand him: does he mean their present or their former establishment, and does he include in the army the American auxiliaries?

Lord George Germaine—What I mean, Sir, is this, that on the 20th of March, the date of the last general return, the army was more numerous, including the troops going on the sea from Europe, than it was when it took New York—more rank and file, without including the 7000 Americans.

Colonel Barre—The noble lord seems to pride himself upon that circumstance, which he has no room for, for I will tell him the reason, the last division of the Hessians were not arrived when New York was taken—

Lord George Germaine and Lord Barrington—No—no—no—we do mean that—

Mr. P I T T.

MR. Pitt owed his rise to the most considerable posts and power in this kingdom singly to his own abilities. In him they supplied the want of birth and fortune, which latter, in others, too often supply the want of the former. He was a younger brother of a very new family, and his fortune was only an annuity of one hundred pounds a year.

The army was his original destination, and a cornetcy of horse his first and only commission in it. Thus unassisted by favour or fortune he had no powerful protector to introduce him into business, and (if I may use that expression) to do the honours of his parts—but their own strength was fully sufficient.

His constitution refused him the usual pleasures, and his genius forbade him the idle dissipations of youth, for so early as at the age of sixteen he was the martyr of an hereditary gout. He therefore employed the leisure which that tedious and painful distemper either procured or allowed him in acquiring a great fund of premature and useful knowledge. Thus by the unaccountable relation of causes and effects, what seemed the greatest misfortune of his life was perhaps the principal cause of its splendour.

His private life was stained by no vice, nor sullied by any meanness. All his sentiments were liberal and elevated. His ruling passion was an unbounded ambition, which when supported by great abilities, and crowned with great success, make what the world calls a great man.

He was haughty, imperious, impatient of contradiction, and overbearing—qualities which too often accompany, but always clog, great ones.

He had manners and address, but one might discern through them too great a consciousness of his own superior talents.

He was a most agreeable and lively companion in social life, and had such a versatility of wit, that he would adapt it to all sorts of conversation. He had also a most happy turn to poetry; but he seldom avowed it.

He came young into parliament, and upon that great theatre he soon equalled the oldest and the ablest actors. His eloquence was of every kind, and he excelled in the argumentative, as well as in the declamatory way. But his invectives were terrible, and uttered with such energy of diction, and such dignity of action and countenance, that he intimidated those who were the most willing and the best best able to encounter him *. Their arms fell out of their hands, and they shrunk under the ascendant which his genius gained over their's.

In that assembly, where public good is so much talked of, and private interest singly pursued, he set out with acting the patriot, and performed that part so ably, that he was adopted by the public as their chief, or rather their only unsuspected, champion.

The weight of his popularity and his universally acknowledged abilities obtruded him upon king George the second, to whom he was personally obnoxious. He was made secretary of state. In this difficult and delicate situation, which one would have thought must have reduced either the patriot, or the minister, to a decisive option, he managed with such ability, that while he served the king more effectually in his most unwarrantable electoral views than any former minister, however willing, had dared to do, he still preserved all his credit and popularity with the public, whom he assured and convinced that the protection and defence of Hanover with an army of seventy-five thousand men in British pay, was the only possible method of securing our possessions or acquisitions in North America—So much easier is it to deceive than to undeceive mankind.

His own disinterestedness, and even contempt of money, smoothed his way to power, and prevented or silenced a great share of that envy which commonly attends it. Most men think that they have an equal natural right to riches, and equal abilities to make a proper use of them, but not very many of them have the impudence to think themselves qualified for power.

Upon the whole, he will make a great and shining figure in the annals of this country; notwithstanding the blot which his acceptance of three thousand pounds per annum pension for three lives, upon his voluntary resignation of the seals, in the first year of the present king, must make in his character, especially as to the disinterested part of it.—However it must be acknowledged, that he had those qualities which none but a great man can have, with a mixture of some of those failings, which are the common lot of wretched and imperfect human nature.

Review of the Character of Mr. Pitt.

THERE is a grandeur in some subjects, which few have abilities to comprehend fully, or describe happily.

N O T E.

* Hume Campbell and lord Mansfield.

When the importance of the objects calls for uncommon vigour of mind and elevation of style, it is no wonder if a writer should sink under the burden which he has rashly imposed upon himself.—He who attempts to draw the character of a Pitt, must not expect to meet with applause—it will be well for him if he escape with pardon for his presumption.

Chesterfield pretends, that this great man owed his vast acquisition of knowledge to an acute and hereditary distemper.—I would not flatly contradict the noble writer; but it is well known, that Pitt, when a boy at Eton, was the pride and boast of the school: Dean Bland, the master, valued himself upon having so bright a scholar: the old man shewed him to his friends, and to every body, as a prodigy.

Walpole scarce heard the sound of his voice in the House of Commons, but he was alarmed and thunderstruck; he told his friends, that he would be glad, at any rate, to muzzle that terrible cornet of horse. The minister would have promoted his rise in the army, provided he would have given up his seat in parliament.

Demosthenes was his great model in speaking; and we are told, that he translated some of his orations, by way of exercise, several times over. But though he was delighted with the manner of this orator, who united a wonderful power of expression to the most forcible method of reasoning, yet he was equally master of the pleasing, diffuse, and passionate style of the Roman orator.

He enjoyed every requisite to command attention in popular assemblies; a striking figure, a sonorous voice, a dignified action—add to this, a keen and ardent look, which occasionally terrified and disarmed his opposers.

Though he was a master of the great artillery in eloquence, the descriptive, the sublime, and the pathetic; he did not disdain to use the small arms of rhetoric; his satire was pointed—his ridicule diverting—his wit brilliant—and his irony provoking.

One great proof of his superiority to all other speakers was, his being heard at the latest parliamentary hours with astonishment, nay with pleasure, by his very enemies.

His great abilities forced him upon a prince who hated him, as the man who had constantly opposed his darling principles of government—one who had reprobated German and Continental measures in the plainest and most forcible terms. In the great struggle between the king and the subject, the latter was obliged to submit; mit; he could not serve his country, without gratifying the prince's humour. He adopted those modes of political conduct which he had so openly condemned; but in this he did the kingdom most effectual service: he revived the drooping courage, and retrieved the sinking honour, of the nation.

The quadrennium, or four years of Pitt's administration, is not to be matched in all our history. The enemy, who had learned to despise the futile schemes and timid councils of a weak, corrupt, and disunited ministry, were astonished at the rapid progress of our arms, and the success of all our enterprizes: in every part of the globe, they were attacked, surprized, and defeated—France bled at every vein.

All Europe was surprized at our triumph. They sincerely envied our happiness; but the name of Pitt awed them into acquiescence and silence.

With all this uncommon success, we are not to be surprized if Pitt was as much hated as he was admired. His superior qualities excited the envy of a proud and degenerate nobility: eclipsed by the splendor of his virtues, they felt the disgrace of inferiority when near him.

His temper was not indeed of the conciliatory kind: he could neither cajole like Fox, nor caress like Walpole: he trusted to the vigour of his mind, and the uprightness of his intentions. The great things he did for the nation gained him such a popularity as no minister, no king of England, had enjoyed before.

Whether he retired from business upon the sudden opposition he met with in the cabinet, or from any deliberate design of his own, may be doubted; he certainly had foreseen into what channel all political affairs would run; nor had he very decisive proofs that he was grateful to his royal master.

It must be owned, that the sudden step of resigning his post appeared, to moderate people, rash and violent. They thought, that his having obtained early intelligence of the family-compact between the courts of Versailles and Madrid was not a sufficient pretext for seizing the Spanish flota.

When Mr. Pitt resigned the seals, the king justified his council, for rejecting the proposed attack upon Spain, with great dignity; nay he declared he should have been at a loss to support a measure which the equity of his mind condemned. But, notwithstanding he could not approve the sanguine advice of the minister, he owned himself to be truly sensible of his great services; and made him an unlimited offer of any rewards which were in the power of the crown to bestow.

This unexpected gentleness of behaviour in the prince softened the haughty spirit of the minister, and he burst into tears:—the interview became extremely affecting.

The great person is acknowledged to be master of a most winning manner of address, and to be the most powerful persuader in the world. Nor can it be wondered at, that the man who had ever manifested the most sovereign contempt for money should, in his circumstances, accept of a moderate pension.

In spite of this unexpected conduct of Pitt, a conduct so seemingly inconsistent with patriotism; and though, by accepting a peerage, he has rendered himself almost totally incapable of serving his country; the people pursue him still with the most ardent and unremitted love and veneration. They still look up to him, as their friend, patron, and protector; as the only man whose abilities can save them from distress, and whose virtues can secure them from that tide of corruption which is now overflowing the nation.

To the Editor of the Hibernian Magazine.

Description of the City of Amsterdam.

AMSTERDAM the capital of Holland, and the second emporium in Europe, takes its name from the river Amstel, and the Dyke (in Dutch called a Dam) that prevents its overflowing the country. This river is broad and beautiful, running thro' the city, and having a communication with the canals which run through most of the principal streets. This city contains perhaps three fourths of the number of houses in Dublin, and the inhabitants are estimated at 250,000. The extent of ground on which this city is built, seems not to be much less than that on which Dublin stands, as the streets are in general wide; some of the streets of this city are perhaps as magnificent as any in Europe; the houses being in general well built with brick or stone, and the canals in the middle of the street are planted with trees at each side.

The Stadt-house (or town-house) is about three hundred feet long, two hundred and forty broad, and one hundred and twenty in height. It stands on upwards of thirteen thousand six hundred piles of wood driven into the ground; as does the whole city stand on piles, the ground being so marshy, that building could not stand without them. Over the center of the Stadt-house is a fine round tower with a cupola, which rises fifty feet above above the roof: in the tower is a ring of the most musical harmonious bells in the city. Several of the churches have very fine chimes of bells, and in this it could be wished your city (Dublin) would imitate the Dutch. A particular description of this magnificent building (the Stadthouse) would fill a volume, therefore does not suit the bounds of such a work as this.

There are in this city 13 or 14 churches of the established religion (which is calvinistical) with two for French, one for high Dutch, and one for English Presbyterians. These only are allowed steeples and bells, and their preachers are maintained by the government. Of this persuasion are reckoned one-third of the inhabitants.—The papists form likewise one-third, who have, or are said to have, 80 chapels.—The Lutherans, Armenians, Jews, Anabaptists and Quakers, form the other third.

The Exchange is 250 feet long, and 180 broad, yet at high change there is scarce room for the vast swarms of merchants of all nations who resort thither. The walks are very beautiful. The trade of Amsterdam is very great, far exceeding that of any city in the world of the same extent; the prodigious forests of masts to be seen in the harbour, and the vast number of canal boats in every street, bringing all kind of provisions, &c. to town from the country, are surprising to a stranger. To an inhabitant of Dublin, the vast business and hurry on the quays and wharfs appear as great, as the business done on the quays of Dublin would appear to a person from a country seaport, where 20 or 30 vessels are seldom seen together. In the spring each year, it is said 1600 vessels sail from this port to the Baltic only. The numerous hospitals in this city, are (many of them like those in Ireland), built like palaces; some say 20,000 people are maintained in them, but the number appears to me to be greatly exaggerated. There is scarce a house in the city, which has not a poor box, and the deacons go once a quarter round the city to gather the money from those boxes. The profits arising from the playhouse, and other places of public amusement, are applied likewise to charitable uses. Every person who passes thro' the gates after candle light, pay likewise a penny. Thus are they enabled to support their numerous charitable institutions.

The manner in which the poor in the country are maintained seems more eligible than in hospitals, and would be much more comfortable to the object relieved. If a person is disabled by age or otherwise from earning his bread, he is boarded and lodged with some farmer, who treats him as one of the family. In many places likewise are houses, where poor travellers get their suppers, one night's lodging, and four pence when they depart, which must be next morning. A regulation among the poor in Ireland seems much wanting; many in the most fruitful parts thereof (which is the most fertile in the world) barely exist, and many are in a state of wretchedness. Some-time hence thro' the channel of your Magazine, I shall offer to the public a scheme for their better maintenance. I am, Sir, your humble servant,

Proceedings of the late Session of Parliament.

MR. Dunning said, he would not take up the time of the house in debating the bill upon legal grounds; for where there was no reason or justice, there could be no law. Law supposes a rule, which, while it prescribes a mode of conduct, respecting either the public or individuals, defines the offence, annexes the punishment, and, besides, specially provides and directs all the intermediate steps between the charge and conviction, but more particularly the measure and quantity of the punishment. What does this bill say? No crime is imputable, no examination of innocence or criminality is to follow. The punishment is inflicted, in the first instance, on the ground of mere suspicion. A man may be suspected; but his guilt or innocence are entirely out of the question; no enquiry whatever is to be made into either, as long as the present bill continues in force.

He confessed there were times, in which it had been found extremely necessary to suspend the habeas corpus act; such, in particular, were the two late most unnatural and unprovoked rebellions in Scotland: but then there was a necessity stated. That necessity was not denied; it was, indeed, notorious: but would any man say, that was the case at present? Is there a rebellion within the kingdom: Is there a Pretender claiming the crown as his legal and constitutional inheritance; and that at the expence of both our civil and religious rights—the very essence, as well as the form of our constitution? No such thing: the idea is ridiculous. Are we, on the other hand, afraid that the people of America will pass the Atlantic on a bridge, and come over and conquer us? and that their partizans lie in ambush about Brentford or Colnbrook? That, it may be presumed, will be hardly contended, even in the present rage for assertion without proof, and conclusion without argument. No; this bill, I plainly perceive, has been manufactured for other purposes. It can be stretched, and twined, and twisted, by the ingenuity of my worthy and learned friend over the way, [Mr. Attorney General] or by some of his brethren, equally ingenious, to affect and reach men who never saw America, or, peradventure, the high seas, as strongly, at least as efficaciously, for the mere temporary purposes of persecution and revenge, as if they had been caught in arms—in open rebellion. If even ministers had contented themselves with this first ebullition of their fiery, irresistible zeal for persecution, the public might look on, with a mixture of contempt and astonishment, at the insolence and folly of the attempt; but when they go a step farther, and venture to couple it with a power untried hitherto in the annals of this country, a power, including in it the most bloody species of proscription, I confess, I begin to feel sentiments of a very different nature. What does the clause say? After empowering the apprehension, on the mere grounds of suspicion, and directing the commitment to any common gaol, within his majesty's dominions, are not we next told, or to any other place of confinement, especially appointed for that purpose, by warrant under his majesty's sign manual, by any magistrate, having competent authority in that behalf, (who is hereby authorised to commit such persons to the place so to be appointed.) Is not this evidently a power, not only to punish the innocent, but to inflict such pains upon them as an honest mind must revolt at, and contemplate with horror? The magistrate may take up and commit, on suspicion, to the common gaol, and by the sign manual, to any other place especially appointed; and is further authorized to commit according to such special appointment. What is this but to authorize the mode, measure, and place of confinement, at the pleasure of the minister, which, besides, manifestly includes in it the power of temporary banishment, as well as confinement, to any part, or to the most remote, unhealthy, and pestiferous climate, within the wide circuit of his majesty's dominions, in the four quarters of the globe? If this be the intention of my honourable and learned friend over the way, and his no less honourable employers, in God's name, let him speak out; let us know, let the public know, what they are to expect. Let him and his friends no longer amuse us with a formal circumstantial story of America and the high seas, or of the crime of piracy; such tales may be amusing to some people, and they may answer certain purposes out of doors, and in some particular places; but to talk of them seriously within these walls, will not, I believe, be attempted. The power endeavoured to be vested in the crown by this bill, is most evidently a dictatorial power, or similar to that exercised by the Roman dictators. We all know the motives for granting such a power. It will hardly be contended, that any such motives exist at present. We all know the frequent abuse of it, and the horrid purposes toward the latter period of the commonwealth, to which it was employed; and I presume there is not a school-boy of three years standing, who is ignorant that that mighty republic was overthrown by a dictator. Such will always be the case, when powers are granted through ignorance, wantonness, and design. If the present bill was to have no other evil effect than establishing a precedent for future ministers to come to parliament on the same errand, I should be against it: but when I behold it in the light I do, I must deem it a most formidable, dangerous, and, I fear, fatal attack, upon the liberty of this country. It seems directed at its very vitals, and, in my opinion, threatens its total destruction, if not a dissolution of the constitution. Before I conclude, I must observe, if any thing were wanting to shew the true complexion of this bill, the words high seas and piracy will fully explain it; these words apply to the seas contiguous to Great Britain and Ireland. It is, indeed, plainly perceivable, whatever the title of the bill may be, it is not an American, so much as it is a British suspension of the habeas corpus act. It may overtake any man, any where. It authorises a discretionary punishment, without a colour of legal proof, or even a probable ground of suspicion. It makes no distinction between the dreams of a sick man, the ravings of a demoniac, and the malice of a secret or declared enemy. No man is exempt from punishment, because innocence is no longer a protection. It will generate spies, informers, and false accusers beyond number; and furnish the means of gratification, emolument, and satiety, to the most profligate of the species; while it will let loose with impunity, the blackest, and most horrid vices, which disgrace the human mind. In fine, it will realise what has hitherto been looked upon to be the creature of poetic fiction; it will scatter over the land more ills and curses than were ever supposed to flow from Pandora's box. Justice will be bound, as well as blind; and it will be in the power of every revengeful minister, or mercenary villain, to satiate his revenge, or fill his pockets, at the expence of the best, and most virtuous men in the commonwealth.

The Attorney General [Mr. Thurlow] said, nothing more was meant by the bill, than than to apprehend, commit, and confine persons actually charged, or suspected of committing, the crime of high treason in America, or on the high seas, or for piracy. It was absurd and preposterous to the last degree, he said, to suppose it was framed intentionally to reach or overtake persons presumed to be disaffected to this government, within this realm. He was certain the kingdom contained no such description of men. Treason and rebellion was properly and peculiarly the native growth of America. If government feared any such disposition in the people of this country, their application would have been fair, open, and direct: they would have come to parliament, and desired an immediate suspension of the habeas corpus act, in so many words; they would have accompanied such a request with their motives, and have stated the grounds of necessity. But the present bill was framed totally on another plan: it was meant to prevent mischief, not with a view to rigorous punishments, much less to persecutions. No innocent man had any thing to fear, the guilty man had every thing; and whatever harsh epithets gentlemen, who disapproved of the bill, might think proper to bestow on it, he should, for his part, always think, that that was the mildest, wisest, and most lenient government, which directed its attention, and devised modes of prevention, instead of endeavouring to deter by rigorous and sanguinary punishments.

He observed, that his honourable and learned friend over the way, [Mr. Dunning] founded his prime objection on a supposition that the bill might be construed to extend to persons who had committed crimes within the realm. This was an objection, he solemnly believed, of the first impression. Be that as it might, this was not the proper stage of the bill to debate that question; supposing that the bill were to operate precisely as his learned friend had stated it, he could not see even a colourable pretext for finding fault with it. Imagining the king's death, his justices, his treasurer, &c. was high treason; so was levying war within the realm, or appearing in arms against the sovereign, or adhering to, or corresponding with, his enemies; now, if it should appear, or be discovered, that any person in this country had assisted the rebels with arms, or warlike stores of any kind, or that they had been assisted by his subjects, in any part of his dominions, with money, or implements of war, &c. he could not pretend to say, how far such an assistance, or adherence, might be construed to come within the description of high treason, as laid down by the 25th of Edward the Third. He again repeated, that the committee was the proper place to come to the explanations, so earnestly pressed by his learned friend; he should, therefore, be for the second reading of the bill, and trust for the perfect formation of the bill to that stage.

Mr. Fox said, that the present bill served as a kind of key, or index, to the design that ministers had been some years manifestly forming, the objects of which they rendered visible from time to time, as opportunity served, as circumstances proved favourable, or as protection increased, and power strengthened. It resembled, he said, the first scene in the fifth act, when some important transaction, or circumstance, affecting the chief personages in the drama, comes to be revealed, and points directly to the denouement. This plan had been long visible, and however covertly hid, or artfully held back out of sight, was uniformly adopted, and steadily pursued: it was nothing less than robbing America of her franchises, as a previous step to the introduction of the same system of government into this country; and, in fine, of spreading arbitrary dominion over all the territories belonging to the British crown. He contended, that nothing but the most inevitable necessity could justify the present measure; such a concurrence of circumstances, as happened at the revolution, when the people of England were compelled to embrace the alternative of submitting passively to the will of a base, perjured tyrant, or of trusting to the dangerous experiment of appointing a dictator to preside over them, in the person of the prince of Orange, till a new constitutional establishment could be formed, and legally recognized.

This perilous state of things was but of short duration; it was running, to be sure, a great risque; but then, it was to preserve the liberty of this country from eternal destruction.—He dwelt a considerable time on the invaluable advantages derived from the habeas corpus act, which he called the great Palladium of the liberties of the subject; expressing at the same time, his astonishment, in the boldest and most animated terms, at the insolence and temerity of ministers, who could thus dare to snatch it from the people, by a mandate manufactured by themselves, though sanctioned by the sign manual: and not only attempt to deprive the object of their envy, resentment, or fears, of his liberty, but send him out of Great Britain, to the most distant and remote part of the British dominions.—Says he, who knows but the ministers, in the fullness of their malice, may take into their heads, that I have served on Long Island, under General Washington? What would it it avail me, in such an event, to plead an alibi; to assure my old friends, that I was, during the whole of the autumn American campaign, in England; that I was never in America; nor on any other sea but between Dover and Calais; and that all my acts of piracy were committed on the mute creation? All this may be very true, says a minister, or a ministers understrapper, you are for the present suspected, that is sufficient. I know you are fond of Scotland; this is not the time for proofs; you may and very probably are innocent, what of that? this bill cares not a fig whether you are guilty or innocent. I will send you, under this sign manual, to study the Erse language in the Isle of Bute; and as soon as the operation of the bill is spent, you will be at liberty to return whither you please; and then you may, if you like, call on your accusers, to prove their charges of treason in America, on the high seas, and for piracy; but they will laugh in your face, and tell you they never charged you, they only suspected you; and the act of parliament will serve as a complete plea in bar; it will answer a double end; it will be at once your redress and our justification.—O, but says the learned gentleman, it is not possible to tell how far constructive treason may extend; or whether it may not reach such as have aided and abetted the American rebels, by sending them arms and ammunition, by corresponding with them, &c. It is, it seems, lucky for me, that I have no connection in America; if I had, though they could not so decently suspect me of being on Long Island in August last, when they knew the contrary, they might say, that I held a treasonable or a piratical correspondence with them. Suppose for instance, an old schoolfellow, or intimate companion, I would most probably have kept up a correspondence; and when writing to him, would have told him, “that Whiggism, and those that were friends to the revolution, were looked upon now as factious persons, for these are the times that large strides are taken, not only to destroy the liberties of America, but of this country likewise.” Would not such a paragraph as this furnish a good ground for suspicion? But weakness, cruelty, suspicion, and credulity, are almost always inseparable, at least they are often found in the same company. Ministers are credulous in the extreme because they are fearful; from a consciousness of their crimes. Suspicions, however ill-founded upon tales, however improbable, are received by them as facts not to be controverted; witness the information of Richardson against Sayre, some time since; and the recent affair of John the Painter, relative to the improbable story of his setting fire to the rope-house at Portsmouth.

I am not surprised at any thing. The tone of the minister is become firm, loud, and decisive. He has already assured us, in this house, that he has nearly subdued America; and by what we are liable to collect from this bill, we may presume, he means to extend his conquests nearer home.

Lord North. I am extremely sorry to have the misfortune to be misquoted, or grossly misunderstood, by the honourable gentleman over the way. I never said that I had nearly subdued America, or that America was nearly subdued. What I said, and what I again repeat, was, that under God his majesty's arms had met with many signal successes, and that I thought we were in a fair way of subduing America, not that we had nearly subdued it. The honourable gentleman who spoke last, and the learned gentleman who spoke early in the debate, seem to lay great stress on the improper power vested in the magistrate respecting the commitment under the sign manual. For my part, I see no new power vested in the magistrate; the warrant under the sign manual will be his authority; that warrant will be legalized by the present bill: so that I think the magistrate will stand precisely as he did before. He could before commit to the common gaol; now he is obliged to commit, ministerially, to the place specially appointed for the reception of such offenders: so that, if any alteration be made in the power of commitment, as residing in the magistrate, it is abridging, not in extending it. Before the passing the act, he could commit to any prison; now he is bound specifically to obey the terms of the warrant. Before he could admit persons, charged on suspicion of treason, to bail; now, neither judge, nor any inferior magistrate, can, without order from his majesty's most honourable privy council, admit any person to bail so charged or suspected.

The honourable gentleman charges his majesty's servants with blind, ill-founded, credulity, relative to the affair of Richardson and Sayre. For my part, I beg leave to think very differently on the subject. I should deem the secretary of state, who committed Sayre, extremely neglectful, if not criminal in his conduct, had he not attended to Richardson's information, and proceeded in the affair as he did. Gentlemen will, when they find a convenience in it, argue and decide on facts from events, and the doctrine of probabilities; but I will venture to contend, that many plots, which have come to maturity, and have been productive of the greatest and most fatal mischiefs, have been laid open in their infancy, and such early discoveries treated as matters unworthy of credit or attention.

It is likewise certain, that conspiracies, equally important and consequential in their nature, have been defeated in their early stages, upon a discovery of circumstances and details much more trifling than those respecting the information of Richardson, or the suspicious conduct of John the Painter; for though the latter was apprehended for a burglary, I am still inclined to believe, that whatever his motives may have been, his conduct has fully justified the steps that have been taken towards a thorough discovery of this very mysterious affair. The opposers of this bill seem extremely desirous to learn its intended duration. I mean to fill up the blank by the words the thirty-first day of December next, or to the first day of the next session of parliament, which will answer precisely the same end; for in all probability the parliament will meet before Christmas; and if it should not be found necessary to continue it, the law will consequently cease.

Colonel Barre called upon administration to defend the principle of the bill in that stage, and not send it to a committee by the mere power of numbers, unsupported by reason, justice, or policy. He said this bill would fully and completely accomplish what the other hasty, ill-advised, intemperate measures had begun, and in part effected. He was certain, violent, unrelenting, and implacable as they were, the present measure was the worst of all, and would be productive of massacre and retaliation, if not of more alarming consequences nearer home. America, he contended, must be reclaimed, not conquered or subdued. Conciliation or concession are the only sure means of either gaining or retaining America. The conquest of that country is doubtful: though it were subdued, the holding of it without the affection and good will of the natives, would be impossible. To make America valuable, and to insure its possession, was therefore, in the colonel's opinion, only to be effected by the most lenient and tender measures.

Governor Johnstone said, he would repeat what he told administration a thousand times before; that America was not to be reclaimed, by the harsh decrees which originated within those walls; nor yet by the mere power of Great Britain. He said, the admiral and general sent to America were likely to effect more by their personal characters, and amiable manners, than a thousand bloody edicts issued by that house. The Americans, he said, had the spirit of Britons. They might be led, but he was satisfied they would never submit to be drove. The governor then commented on the polite and gentleman-like behaviour of general Howe, adverted to his messages and letters to general Washington, and to many other circumstances, which reflected the highest honour, he said, on Mr. Howe's conduct, both as a soldier and a gentleman. He then turned to the bill, and foretold, that it would be productive of one or both of these consequences; it would raise a discontent, jealousy, and dislike of government at home, though none of the powers delegated by the bill were ever meant to be exercised, or carried into execution; or it would widen the breach so much between Great Britain and her colonies, that it would be utterly impossible ever again to close it. The bill was unnecessary, if it was not framed for latent purposes, which, while it was depending, it would not be prudent to avow, lest it should prove fatal to it; for if the bill meant, what ostensibly it imported, an apprehension, commitment, and confinement, for offences committed, or suspected to have been committed, in America, it was to all intents and purposes nugatory and absurd; because the statute of treasons, as explained by the learned member over the way, [Mr. Attorney-General] would answer every thing promised or proposed by the present bill. If so, why then pass a bill, which impowers the minister, or administration, to lay every person in the kingdom by the heels, when they may think proper?

The question was put: 195 for the bill, and 43 against it. Ordered to be committed on the 13th.

13. The house in a committee on the bill to suspend the habeas corpus act.

Sir Grey Cooper moved an amendment, to remove, as he said, any ambiguity in the first enacting clause; though he observed, there was no occasion for such explanation, as it was obvious that the locality of the offence was sufficiently described by the words "America, high-seas, and piracy;" that the words, "said crimes, or either of them," could have no reference but to the several species of offence immediately preceding; and that the general power of committing, invested in the crown, and contained in the description, "his majesty's dominions," was evidently referable to the offences stated in the preamble and clause itself, as well as in the title of the bill; but however, to remove all doubt respecting the true legal import and construction of the clause, the present amendment was intended to specify and confine the offence therein described to America, and the high seas, and the species of crime to treason and piracy.

Mr. Fielde said, he saw no manner of service in the clause now offered: it left the matter just as it found it: it was not the place where the fact was committed that roused the jealousy of the nation; i was the power of committing within the realm, at pleasure, on suspicion; and the other power of committing to any place, specially appointed, within the wide circuit of his majesty's dominions. A possible abuse, or rather misconstruction of the clause, as it originally stood, might be made; but the powers of committing on suspicion, within the kingdom, and to whatever place the minister might think proper, were of such a nature in themselves, that if they were meant to be exercised, which he supposed they were, or if they should be exercised, they would inevitably be productive of the greatest hardships, cruelty and injustice. If, therefore, ministers were determined not to relent, but to carry the measure through, with all its imperfections, they would, after defining the offence, as respecting America, confine the operation of the bill to that country, and introduce a distinct clause, which should suspend the habeas corpus act in Great Britain and Ireland, for a limited time, which would fully answer every ostensible purpose of the bill, as well as in its present form. He objected to other parts of the bill, and recommended strongly to administration to make a difference between persons taken in arms, and such as only submitted to the respective governments where they resided, and to the civil power and controul established by the means of an usurped authority.

Lord North strongly urged the necessity there was for strengthening government at this critical period. He said it would be impossible to carry on public business without delegating powers to the crown, on extraordinary occasions, which would not be proper, because they would not be wanting on ordinary occasions. Parliament were the best judges when and to whom to entrust such extraordinary powers. If the present was a time that called for such a confidence on the part of parliament; and that parliament were satisfied that the king's servants would not call for an improper power, or abuse any power, the possession of which might be deemed necessary for the public safety and security, then every argument on a possible abuse of the present proposed law, must fall to the ground. On the other hand, if parliament should entertain any jealousy that the law would be wrested from its real intention, to purposes not avowed, or purposely concealed, then most certainly parliament would do well to withhold the powers desired by this bill. For his part, he did not wish to press for any new power; the house must judge, and which ever way the house determined, he could cheerfully acquiesce in its judgment. The only material objection he heard offered against the bill, was that now obviated by the amendment proposed by his honourable friend (Sir Grey Cooper.) Whatever the learned gentleman who spoke last might think, the amendment, in his opinion, cleared up the ambiguity of the expression, so much complained of on the second reading. If the opposers of the bill meant that it should retain any efficacy at all, they must now rest satisfied and content: for to talk of apprehending persons only upon legal proofs previously stated; or after apprehension only detaining them till they could be released by a writ of habeas corpus, was in fact not debating the clauses of the bill, but controverting its very principle, the necessity, at this critical season, of strengthening the hands of government.

An Eastern Tale.

IN a pleasant valley of Mesopotamia, on the banks of the Irwin, lived Solyman, the son of Ardavan, the sage. He was early instructed in all the oriental languages; but, as his understanding opened, like the flower in the morning, when aurora dawns in the east, he thirsted only for the knowledge of mankind. He prevailed on his father, with much importunity, to permit him to travel. The morning was spread upon the mountains, and Solyman prepared to depart; but first prostrating himself towards the sun, he addressed that glorious luminary in devotion, and then passed over the Tigris, into the kingdom of Persia.

There is some secret attraction in the place, where we have passed the cheerful innocence of childhood. No sooner had Solyman ascended an eminence, which gave him a retrospective view of the valley of Irwan, than he turned his eyes on his native fields, and gazed on them with a kind of pensive complacency, till the declining day called him to proceed.

When he had reached the foot of Mount Taurus, he sought to repose himself in the valley of Abdat; but, he was stopped by an exclamation of sorrow which proceeded from an adjacent wood. As he was in hopes of relieving some distress, he drew near, and discovered two lovers, who had stolen a secret interview before their final separation. Being made acquainted with the cause of their sorrow, and finding it proceeded from the avariciousness of the lady's father, who had sold his daughter to Khan of Buckharia, he offered them his assistance, which being accepted, he conducted them back to the banks of the Tigris; and, recommending them to his father, continued his travels, till he arrived at Ispahan.

The beauty and magnificence of that city engaged his attention for many days; but his greater pleasure derived from the conversation of an English merchant, from whom he learnt many things relating to the manners and pursuits of men in different countries, particularly in Great Britain. With this merchant, he afterwards set out for the court of Bassora; but, being driven by the heat of the sun to seek for shelter on the declivity of a neighbouring mountain, they were led by accident to the cave of a hermit. The good old father at first retreated from them, fearful of the effects of human ferocity; but being soon convinced they were only inoffensive travellers, he afterwards acquainted them with the history of his life.

The hermit told them, that he was born of competent fortune; but, being left an orphan, was deprived of it, partly by the chicanery of a court of equity, and of the rest through the treachery of a friend. This obliged him to enter as a common soldier in the army of the Sophy, where he fell in love with the daughter of the commanding officer, which plunged him again into new misfortunes, and at last ended in his betaking himself to those solitary mountains for a retreat.

After having finished his tale, the travellers took their leave, and, about the close of the day, arrived at the village of Arden. At their entrance, they were met by a person in a plain dress, who invited them to partake of his house and table that night. The hospitality they received from him, gave Solymán very different ideas of the dispositions of mankind, from what his own partial observation, aided by the adventures of the two lovers, and the tale of the hermit, had enabled him to form. When the dawn of the morning broke, Solymán and the merchant left the village of Arden, and, after a few days travel, arrived on the plain, on which stood the once glorious Persépolis. The contemplation of its ruins filled their minds with proper reflections on the instability of human grandeur, and from thence they proceeded to the court of Bassora.

The merchant here finding the vessel he expected, told Solymán he could accommodate him, if he pleased, with a passage to Europe, which the desire the latter had of seeing foreign countries induced him to accept; but, as the ship was to remain some time in the gulph, he took that opportunity to make the tour of India, and, in his way, visited the isle of Ormus. There he met with an exile from Isfahan, who had been doomed to spend his life in that dreary spot, for no other crime, than that he had said at court, he thought the Sultana Moratte extremely beautiful. The unmerited severity of his sentence moved the tender heart of Solymán. He promised him his liberty, at his return from the excursion he was making, and continued his route for India.

Being come to Delhi, the capital of the Mogul's empire, his heart, which had hitherto been a stranger to love, fell a victim to the charms of the accomplished Alméná. He thought no more of performing his voyage to Europe; but the unhappy fate of the exile at Ormus recurring to his mind, he determined to fulfil the promises he had made him, and, quitting Alméná, returned to Bassora. Having settled every thing relative to the departure of the exile, he took the opportunity of the ship's delay in setting out, to visit his father, from whom he learned the sequel of the adventures of the two lovers, who had been recommended by him to his care. Alméná, however, still continuing uppermost in his mind, and the time for the departure of the vessel drawing near, he again left Arden, and, having seen the exile safely embarked at Bassora, proceeded to Delhi.

Solymán and Alméná being now a second time together, mutual professions of love and friendship ensued, in consequence of which they agreed to quit Delhi, and to retire for the remainder of their days to the valley of Irwan. But a war at that time raging in India, and the lovers unhappily taking their passage in a vessel belonging to one of the contending parties, they had scarcely got five leagues out to sea, before they were pursued by the foe, and after an obstinate engagement, made prisoners. The enemy stripped the vessel of every thing valuable, then dismissed it; but they carried off Alméná.

What pen can describe the grief of Solymán! his fair one carried he knew not whither, and the ship, unable to proceed on her intended voyage, obliged to return to the coast of India. Here he was told, that the vessel, which had taken them, belonged to the King of Sundah; and, having informed himself of the situation of that country, he went in quest of Alméná. For a long time he continued his miserable search in vain; but at length discovered by accident, that she was confined in the castle of Sevasor. This discovery only served to increase his misery. The governor, who was in love with Alméná, finding him to be the person whom she had long languished after, and considering him, of course, as the principal obstacle to his wishes, ordered him to be confined. He found means to break from this confinement just in time to rescue Alméná from the brutality of the tyrant, whom whom he killed; but the guards coming upon him in that instant, they were both made prisoners, and shut up in the castle, till it was taken by a party of the King of the Kanarians.

This incident, from which the two lovers might have hoped deliverance, only added to their woes. They were again separated, and Almena selected for the pleasures of the King of Kanaria. Solyman, however, having found means to introduce himself into the King's service, repaired to the palace, and acquainted him with the whole story of their passion. A violent struggle at first arose in the King's breast between love and virtue; but the latter triumphed, and Almena was restored to Solyman.

The two lovers being thus, once more, miraculously brought together, and unwilling to risque their happiness again upon the seas, determined to travel by land for the valley of Irwan. After many days tedious journey, they arrived at Delhi, from whence they continued their route to Ispahan, where Solyman found his old friend the merchant. The customary congratulations over, and the merchant being informed of the particulars of their adventures, Solyman then gave him an invitation to accompany them to the valley of Irwan, which was accordingly accepted. In their way, they visited the two lovers mentioned in the preceding part of the story, whom they found completely happy. Having been witnesses of their felicity, they proceeded to the valley of Irwan, where Ardavan received them with the greatest tenderness; and Solyman and Almena, happy in themselves, and in each other, closed the returning day with prayer and praise to that Providence, which had preserved them in all their dangers."

LETTER IV.

AFTER much fatigue for some days past in the parliament house, I think it time to salute thee thus even at a distance, my most excellent friend, and to tell thee I have heard several patriots speak, and notwithstanding I am but a novice among the men and the manners of their country, I fancy I have found out the true meaning of the word patriot, although in a book for explaining words it is described as the title of a man, who would sooner die, than bear a thought injurious to his country; but the author undesignedly led me wrong, for by experience I found a patriot, in my comprehension, more anxious for the destruction of his native soil, than solicitous for her welfare, but I have since heard the writer of this book described the patriots who flourished formerly.

A modern patriot then is a man who procures a seat in parliament for money, as an hireling to some great man, or by imposing on the ignorance and credulity of some people, cursed with too much freedom to elect, and too great a lack of sense to chuse a proper representative; he worms himself in, by one or other of those means, and from the instant he takes his seat, he studies to overthrow every intention of the kings or his ministers, however necessary to the well-being of the state, he rates at the means and treats their schemes with contempt. Raillery is too delicate for the dull apprehensions of the people outside the house, and within, the members understand their business too well, to mind any thing that is said on one side or the other; the patriot then runs into the grossest and most illiberal abuse, provided he scolds loud and long, he may use the same expressions over again and again, the people shout for him, and all the weak declare him a sensible learned man; he at length becomes troublesome, and the minister offers him a place, or pension: If he has been long neglected and unnoticed, he forms higher notions of his worth, and rates his fancied consequence at too great a value; he meets with a just rebuff, and thus disappointed, and sensible of the lessening treatment he has received, he commences a two-fold more noisy, scurrilous brawler than before, and the ignorant add to his other perfections his virtue in resisting a bribe. But should he possessed of sense enough, worldly sense, find he is offered as much as his weight in the house entitles him to expect, he prudently accept it, and does what honour should have prompted him to—his duty. Now he strives as ardently to undeceive the people, as he had before abused their weakness and credulity, but in vain, he has a place from court or a pension; he is deemed as sold, as an abettor of slavery, he has undoubtedly but little claim to confidence or merit; he is truly infamous. But government or her proceedings ought not to receive any odium for his being a tool to work withal: But a patriot divests himself of every tie, and breaks through the most solemn oaths; he is more vile than the courtier, for he not only perjures himself, but he destroys public good, to forward his private self-interest. There are many of these people here, and altho' some of them are of the vilest characters, others of them have been the most abject slaves slaves to ministerial mandates, notwithstanding, O Jonadab, the people believe their fables, and by an unaccountable weakness suffer themselves to be deluded, by this tribe of miscreants, whenever pique or the loss of places, stir them up to opposition. Allow me to explain the true import of the name, those people have arrogated to themselves. A patriot, such as older times produced, possessed every social virtue, and was equally unblameable in private and public life; his religion was conspicuous without ostentation, most people felt his worth, all good men heard of it and revered him. Devoid of passion, and resentment, he bore every indignity that could be put on man, associated with his most inveterate private enemy, to benefit the public weal; his wealth and property he esteemed but a trifling part of his country's riches, and judged therefore only comparatively of their value: in one point he was nice, and sometimes grieved his countrymen by it: he refused all private emoluments, as returns of their gratitude, for fear he should rouse envy, or give slander room to suspect he acted from a hope of meeting with a reward.—You, my friend, may judge how this character (which I have learned since my arrival here, from the history of antient Rome) of an heathen patriot, corresponds with the Christian assertor of English freedom; and yet there are patriots here, real patriots, but they do not please the people, for the men of this land love to be fooled, and he who has effrontery enough to carry on the system of abuse, and bellow for slavery and oppression, need not fear to reap a more plentiful harvest, than real merit has generally received.

A man destitute of the virtues befitting social life, some years ago, caused a great deal of trouble and confusion in this country by his profuseness; he squandered away in profligacy all his patrimony. He was in parliament, and adverse to every proposal from government. In the house he published the grossest ribaldry, and most licentious abuse against the ministry, the king, nay against the king of kings. For these crimes he was at length noticed, but as I hear some illegal steps being taken in bringing him to condign punishment, he escaped the penalty due to his crimes; and the people immediately fancied they saw in him their deliverer from arbitrary power, and all the terrors of tyranny; in their eyes, he became virtuous, pious, honest and sincere; he led the citizens of London as he pleased: those who dared be sensible were branded with the most odious epithets; while numbers hurried away by their folly, with their fortunes repaired his shattered circumstances, and administered to his unbounded luxury; they stopped not, but placed him at their head, and blazoned forth their folly and ignorance to all Europe, by chusing him their Mayor, the first officer in this city. Here the ministry have acted with virtue and honour, they have not attempted to win the wretch over to their party, and of late have adopted the truly wise plan of not taking any notice of his conduct, which has most effectually sunk him into obscurity and contempt, even among his late most extravagant admirers; he is now forgot, and scarcely ever named. A discarded minister has struck a deeper, more dangerous and a most fearful bloody stroke, by pursuing the same track of opposition, whether through inadvertency, or to regain the exalted seat he fell from, an unbounded rule in all affairs. The people of the new world our worthy father left an account of, are the descendants of men who under certain laws and regulations, granted by the then reigning king, with the consent and together by the powers of parliament settled in those distant lands of America. England cherished them, by every friendly and political manner to improve their trade, encourage industry, supply their wants, and defend their possessions. It came to pass however some years ago, that England took from France a part of America, settled by colonies from that nation, as the English had on the country they claimed a right to, (for the nations of Europe, such as Spain and Portugal, have also large territories there); this French colony had always been to the English settlers a great inconvenience; the fear of them was upon the English: they therefore paid obedience to every law and dictate from England, which verily were the wholesome commands of a tender mother free from cruelty, ill-nature and oppression. Soon after this conquest, peace was restored between England and France, and this conquered country belonged to the British crown, the expences of the war run high, and an honest minister who was then employed, judged it proper, that the colonies should help to defray part of the expence the mother country had incurred by this war, which I ought to have told you was waged moreover on their accounts: he therefore had a tax, a very light one, laid on them, which they seemed to dislike; however the king and his ministers intended to compel them to their duty, but the person who I told thee before had lost his place, declared the law for the taxation improper, and that the people who granted the privileges to these settlers in America, first, to inhabit it, and afterwards, by their laws and arms protected their properties; had now no right to expect any thing from the colonies, but what they thought proper of their bounty freely to give: the law was repealed, and from that period, every day produced a more certain and firm indication of the settlers' intentions, to throw off all subjection to the mother country: at home they were freed from their antient fears of the French settlers; they relied on the depravity of the people here, who, Esau like, would sell their heritage. Their own turbulence arising from ease, and affluence, has hurried them lately into a war, where much treasure will certainly be expended, and I fear many lives lost; after all, what will probably be the result? If conquered and brought back to their duty, the settlers will find, they are thrown back some years, in wealth and numbers. If they on the other hand are successful, I fear, alas! it is but the beginning of the most unheard of barbarity and confusion, which ever destroyed a people: for who can reconcile the different wishes and interests, of the various provinces, which comprize the British territories in America? especially as each actuated by pride and ambition, will seek to lead, and strive to rule, where all hate subjection? A deviation from religion overturns entire countries. Thus many powerful nations are now overwhelmed by the Mahometans of Turkey; fallen from religion, the fall from morality was almost the necessary consequence; vice and luxury intruded; their old men became foolish at the council table, their young men dastards, and enervate in the field: Hardy barbarians bore them down with ease, the bloody Mahometans, like a torrent, left no trace of them. Nations slowly emerge from barbarity; through poverty, frugality and temperance, they arrive at power, commerce and wealth; simplicity and honesty is forgot, and by an almost regular but swifter retrogradation, they fall into their former savageness and insignificance.

There is however a people in the North of Europe who not long ago deserved the title of barbarians; but by the wisdom granted one of their princes he almost at once wonderfully civilized, introducing and carrying on arts and manufactures, with whose names his subjects, the Russians, were scarce known before his time, but the transition was too sudden, from the lowest state of barbarism, to so conspicuous an appearance of improvement, to be permanent. Nations, like particulars, must be led by degrees; the improvement of the former, like the knowledge of the latter, else proves superficial, and perhaps the first weak governor Russia has, will cause that splendid shew of power and politeness to tumble again into inactive barbarity: moreover the histories which I have met with here of other nations, point out a slow progressive improvement, as I just now remarked, the work of time, of intercourse, and as it were, the private remarks and experience of each particular subject, during a course of ages: However the Russians still maintain their ground, and have now on their throne, a woman whose wisdom and firmness equal that of the most consummate heroes. I propose to journey towards her dominions, and from thence to China, so return God, willing, to thy bosom, my friend, to enjoy under the Oak of Mamre thy sweet assistance, in teaching our many pupils. Behold what a long letter I have written thee, yet permit me to add, I am sincerely grieved to see this country thus abused, by the most worthless of her subjects; and the lives and properties of so many thrown, sported away to support the schemes of designing men in America and here. Fare thee well.

SOUTH of St. Werburgh's parish is the parish of St. Bridget, vulgarly called Bride's parish; the parish is of a moderate size, the church a plain building without a steeple.

St. Peter's parish adjoins St. Bridget's, St. Anne's, and St. Andrew's, being south of the three; 'tis next to St. Catherine's, the largest parish in Dublin, and contains a great number of great gentlemen's houses, and almost three sides of Stephen's Green; the parish church is of a moderate size, it has a clock but no steeple. There is another church or chapel in this parish called St. Kevan's, both churches are filled of a Sunday, and a third church seems wanting in this parish to the eastward of St. Stephen's green.

St. Anne's parish is east of St. Peter's; it is large and mostly inhabited by gentry; the palace of his grace the duke of Leinster is in this parish, as also the Mayoralty-house, which is a large building of brick, but not elegant on the outside: in the gardens behind the Mayoralty-house, is an equestrian statue of king George I. which formerly stood on Essex-bridge. The parish church had once an elegant front and steeple, but the latter was taken down several years ago. 'Tis a matter of surprize that so many of the most opulent parishes, parishes should want steeples to their churches, and few of the inferior parishes are without them.

Besides the cathedrals and parish churches, there are in this city eleven chapels of the established religion; seven Presbyterian; two Methodists; two Quakers; two Moravian Meeting-houses; three French and one Dutch church; a Jews Synagogue, and about twenty Romish chapels: so that there are not seventy places of worship in this city, which is a number too small for three hundred thousand inhabitants.

There are several public buildings, exclusive of those I have mentioned, as the King's Custom-house, Corn market house, Corporation-halls, &c.

There are about twelve flesh markets in Dublin, which are constantly well stocked with provisions of all sorts, which are cheaper than in any other capital in Europe.

In Dublin there are about four thousand public houses, four hundred hackney coaches, an equal number of one horse chairs which constantly ply in the streets, and within seven miles of the city; and a vast number of sedan chairs, to be had in all parts. For the convenience of travelling, twenty stage coaches run from Dublin to the principal towns in Ireland. Post-coaches and chaises are to be had at a moderate price: on the road to Belfast and Donaghadee post-chaises are to be had in every town, after the English plan; regular stages have not yet been established on any other road.

A penny-post is established here for the convenience of conveying packets, under four ounces weight through the city, and within four miles thereof. Post-offices are established in most part of the city, and in the principal villages round about.

In 1774, an act passed for new paving the streets and flagging the foot path at each side, after the manner of the streets in London, already the city has a much more agreeable aspect than formerly, in consequence of this regulation.

An English author, speaking of Dublin, says, this city, from one of its towers, has the most agreeable appearance of any other in Europe, from the neatness of the blue slating, with which the houses are universally covered.

About half a dozen new churches seem much wanting in this city, as I have mentioned before in their places. Several of the principal passages in the city are by much too narrow, particularly Dame-street, and Skinner-row; and likewise, a wide passage from the Tholsel to the river side would be of great service. The Corn-market, in Thomas-street, is too confined; it would be much better to remove it out of the main passage through the city; but hints of this nature will be sufficient. The greater number of the parish churches are with steeples as before noticed, and those that have steeples are all in the inferior parishes; 'tis matter of surprise that such rich parishes as St. Mary's, St. Thomas's, St. Anne's and St. Peter's should not have those ornaments to their churches, which scarce any country town is without. The steeple of Christ church is a fine strong building, 'tis strange it should be without a spire.

It is strange that with all this spirit of improvement, manifest throughout this city, there are few good inns to be met with here; there are not a dozen that deserve the name; private lodgings are indeed more customary than lodging at inns in this city.

Besides several prisons for debtors, there are two goals for malefactors. That for the county, in Kilmainham at the western extremity of Dublin, was rebuilt a few years ago, in a handsome manner, the front being entirely of hewn free stone; for the better security of this goal, a serjeant's guard of fourteen men are each day appointed to attend the goal.

The city goal, called Newgate, though once one of the gates to the city, is now near the centre thereof, occasioned by the great increase of buildings; for which reason it is found very inconvenient, as is one of the most populous parts of the city, passengers must go under the goal; but a large new goal, upon an excellent plan, is now building in another part of the city; when finished, the old goal of Newgate is to be taken down, which will be of great utility to the public.

The great number of houses, or rather palaces, of the nobility and gentry in this city is surprizing to a stranger. The Irish nobility and others of great fortune now vie with those of England in the magnificent structure of their houses; but it would be unjust to particularize any; but I may say works of ornament and public utility in Dublin, keep pace with those erecting, great as they are, in the British capital; the circumstances of each place considered.

But of all undertakings this age can boast of, the greatest and most useful, is the walls by which the harbour of Dublin is confined; at each side of the harbour, several hundred acres of land is taken in by the North and South Walls, which are each upwards of a mile in length, and the breadth of a moderate street; and from the point of Ringsend, (a village about one mile from Dublin) a new wall is lately built through the bay about three miles, and upwards, of fifty feet wide, which is intended to be brought to the light house at the entrance of the bay.

The government is by a lord mayor, who is stiled right honourable, a recorder, twenty-four aldermen and ninety-six common-councilmen, who are chosen by the freemen of the twenty-five trading companies, which are about three thousand in number. The dress of the lord mayor is a scarlet robe trimmed with ermin, a collar of double chain of gold which cost 1000*l*. and in his hand an ivory wand: the recorder wears a scarlet robe, but no collar or wand: the aldermen who have been lord mayors, wear scarlet robes, the others purple: the sheriffs and commons wear black gowns, the sheriffs each wear a chain of gold. When the lord mayor walks abroad he is attended by the sword and mace bearer, and running footmen.

The trade of Dublin consists more in imports than exports, and supplies the whole nation in foreign luxuries. The import of English coals is very great; it is generally supposed that what coals are consumed in the city only, costs annually upwards of 80,000*l*. which is a dead loss to the nation, and as most other great towns are likewise supplied in this necessary fuel from England at a vast expence, 'tis matter of surprize, that gentlemen of fortune, whose estate lye near those great towns, do not search their estates for coals, which would (if found) greatly raise the value of the estates on which they are found, and be a vast saving to the nation.

There is likewise a very considerable export from this city of provisions, of hides, linen cloth, &c. The number of vessels in the harbour of Dublin, vastly exceed in number those to be seen in any other in Ireland; by reason of the barr, great vessels cannot come into the bay, but vessels of 300*tun*, come up to Essex-bridge, near the centre of the City. The number of vessels in the harbour and river, above 100*tun* burden, are seldom fewer than 5 or 600.

There are few manufactures but what are carried on here, but in the manufactures of fine poplins this City is not to be equalled: in England the Irish popl^{du} are preferred before silks.

In this place I chuse to mention the Linen-hall, in which three times a year a great market is held, of the manufacture from which the province of Ulster draws its wealth, and to which she owes her present flourishing state. The numbers of North country drapers who attend these markets, and the great quantity of linen, cannot but surprize the spectator. The rules by which this trade is regulated are admirably calculated for universal benefit: the superior cannot impose on their inferior: the draper on the weaver, or the English, nor the Dublin merchant, on the linen-draper.

The building of the Linen-hall, consists of two large quadrangles, the stories high, built intirely of brick, and contains some hundreds of chambers; the principal front is ornamented by a clock and cupola.

There are several good houses of entertainment in the neighbourhood of the Linen-hall, and instead of coffee-houses, common in other trading parts of the city, the wise and frugal Northerns have established houses where the more substantial refreshment of broth and soup is to be had for less money, than what the city merchants throw away foolishly on the trash which the Exchange coffee-house affords.

There are four theatres in this city, two of which are usually open together; that in Crow-street, called the Theatre Royal, is the largest and most elegant in this city; Smock-alley theatre is the next in size, but Fishamble-street for elegance; that in Caple-street is by much the smallest of the four.

The other places for public amusement besides the theatres, and gardens of the Lying-in-hospital, already mentioned, are Ranelagh gardens, near a mile from town, where fire-works are performed in the summer evenings, subscription balls, and several places where concerts are held occasionally. For the amusement of the nobility and principal gentry, balls are held at the castle every Tuesday night in winter; but assemblies for the amusement of inferior gentry and genteel traders families, such as are frequent in the most insignificant country towns, seem wanting in this city; 'tis somewhat strange such assemblies are not held here, one in each parish, and the profits applied to some charitable use, might be both agreeable and serviceable.

The City Bason, by which the whole town is supplied with water is a noble reservoir situated near James's-street, at the western extremity of the city; 'tis about half a mile round, surrounded by a grass walk planted with elms at each side, which is much resorted to by the lower class of genteel-citizens. From this bason in 1765, a canal was begun to be cut, and intended to be carried across the province to the river Shannon about sixty miles, but is not yet finished: for several miles it is planted with elms at each side. Between the bason son and first bridge (which is one handsome arch with a stone ballustrade like Essex-bridge) the bank at each side is gravelled, and make two fine walks, and are much frequented.

The better sort of the inhabitants of this city are polite, generous and hospitable to strangers, and much more agreeable than those of the same rank in London. The common people for the most part, given to idleness and excess; however this remark is not general; on the whole the inhabitants are an agreeable medium between the English and French, being neither so boorish and uncivil as the one, nor so insincere as the other. Although the common people have that disagreeable tone of voice, called the Irish brogue, there is no where that English is spoken so much in its purity as here, and that by all ranks of people.

As a traveller, sojourning in this city, might be desirous of visiting every thing curious in it, for his information I shall insert the names of the possessors of the most curious paintings and drawings in this city, which, when he has visited the public buildings and curiosities already mentioned, he may spend a few days in viewing, as by the favour of the noble possessors, strangers are permitted at all times to the sight of those collections.

It would be needless to give a catalogue of each particular picture; I shall therefore only just mention in general the most eminent collections.

The earl of Charlemont is in possession of several fine paintings; among which is one of the finest pieces Rembrandt ever painted; it represents Judas repenting and casting the silver pieces on the ground; despair and terror are so visible in his countenance as to terrify the spectator. His lordship's library is one of the most elegant apartments in Dublin.

The earl of Moira's collection, is numerous and elegant.

Alexander Stewart, Esq; possesses a great number of fine paintings, perhaps some hundreds; among which is a Nativity of Rubens, so large that the oxen in the manger are of the natural size.

Joseph Henry, Esq; has a pretty good collection.

Lady St. George has a fine collection of pictures at her house in town; and, the earl of Ely at the castle of Rathfarnham, about two miles from town: if the traveller thinks it not worth his while to go so far to see the latter collection, the many beautiful improvements in and about this lovely village, will amply reward him for his little excursion.

To the Editor of the Hibernian Magazine.
S I R,

ALTHO' I not long ago, in an account of a tour through the county of Down, &c. gave a short description of the town of Newtown Ards, from what observations I made in my passing thro' it; as I have since spent a day or two in that town, I find the description very imperfect. I therefore send you a more full account to insert in your Magazine, when convenient.

This town is situated at the northern extremity of the lake of Strangford, 7 miles E. of Belfast, and 87 N. of Dublin. It consists of several streets, the houses of stone, and the greater number slated, and the date of the year in which built, engraved in free stone, over the doors: The house of Alexander Stewart, Esq; landlord of the town, is a large, but not elegant building in the principal street; opposite his house is the market cross, an octangular building of hewn free-stone, with a lion rampant of stone at the top.— On each side of this building are the coats of arms of the king, and the several owners of the town, and an inscription now scarce legible. The church of this town is a large gothic building, the roof supported by several ancient pillars: The congregation being very small, and the church large, it was suffered to go to decay, and a small chapel built at the eastern end.

Passing under the steeple, we come into the old church in which are monuments belonging to the Colville family, formerly possessors of this town. Passing thro' the old church, which is now mostly inhabited by owls and bats, we enter the chapel, which, including the channel, is about 50 feet long and 20 broad: The circling is finely stucco'd, and at the entrance are two seats with canopies. There is in the steeple of this church a good clock and two small bells.

In 1769 a new market square was planned, and several new streets, some of which are already built, particularly a handsome street opposite the center arch of the market house. Another is to be built opposite the center arch at the other side. The market square is capable of holding 10,000 people without crowding, or incommoding each other. The new market-house forms one side of this square: It contains in each front 9 arches, the center arch 22 feet high, and 11 wide, the other 8, 14 by 7. The work is very neat, and entirely of a white free-stone, over the center arch is a most beautiful room 32 feet long and 22 wide, which serves for a drawing-room to the larger or assembly-room.

THIS

This room is most elegantly stucco'd, the walls painted a light green, and bordered with gold; a large branch for 20 candles, hangs from the cieling; the marble chimney piece is hardly to be equalled. Over this room is a handsome clock, belfry and cupola. Over one wing of the market house, is the assembly-room, 50 feet by 24. The walls of this room are painted a light blue, and bordered with gold; the cieling is beautifully stucco'd, from it hang 3 brass branches, which hold 20 candles each; the stair-case is elegant: The steps are of white-free-stone; the ballustrade of iron gilt, and the hand rail mahogany.—Over the opposite wing of the market-house, are store rooms, &c.

The number of houses in this town are about 500. The inhabitants are mostly Presbyterians, as is the landlord; they have three very large meeting-houses in the town. The trade of the town is very inconsiderable, and the weekly market very small.

Newtown, is a borough sending two members to parliament, who are chosen by the provost and 12 burgessees, none of whom dwell in the town.

The language spoken here is broad Scotch, hardly to be understood by strangers. A few Scotch words are to be heard from the best bred people all over the province, but in this neighbourhood, which is entirely inhabited by Scots, no other language is to be heard.

The Philosophical Cöbler.

CURIOSITY engaged me not long since to see a pompous procession. Struggling for some time, in order to be first to see the cavalcade as it passed, some one of the croud unluckily happened to tread upon my shoe, and tore it in such a manner as utterly unqualified me to march forward with the main body. Thus rendered incapable of being a spectator of the shew myself, I was at least willing to observe the spectators. In this plight, as I was considering the eagerness that appeared on every face, how some bustled to get foremost, and others contented themselves with a transient peep when they could; how some praised the black servants that were stuck behind some of the carriages, and some the ribbands that decorated the horses to another; my attention was called off to an object more extraordinary than any I had yet seen. A poor cöbler sat in his stall by the way-side, and continued to work, while the croud passed by, without the appearance of the smallest share of curiosity. I own his want of attention excited me; and as I stood in need of his assistance, I thought it best to employ a philosophical cöbler on this occasion. Perceiving my business therefore, he desired me to enter and sit down, took my shoe in his lap, and began to mend it. "How, my friend," said I to him, "can you continue to work while all those fine things are passing by your door?" "Very fine they are, master," said the cöbler, "for those that like them, to be sure; but what are all those fine things to me? You don't know what it is to be a cöbler, and so much the better for yourself: your bread is baked; you may go and see fights the whole day, and eat a warm supper when you come home at night: but for me, if I should run a hunting after all those fine folks, what should I get by my journey but an appetite? And, Heaven help me, I have enough of that already, without leaving my work to get it. Your people, who may eat four meals a day, and a supper at night, when they have an appetite, are but a bad example to such a one as I. No, master, as God has called me into this world to mend old shoes, I have no business with fine folks, and they no business with me."—I here only interrupted him with a smile. "See this last and hammer," continued he; "they are the two best friends I have in this world: no-body else will be my friend, because I want a friend. The great folks you saw pass by just now, have five hundred friends, because they have no occasion for them. Now while I stick to my good friends here, I am very contented; but whenever I run after fights and fine things, I begin to hate my work; I grow sad, and have no heart to mend shoes any longer."

This discourse only served to raise my curiosity to know more of a man whom nature had thus formed into a philosopher. I therefore insensibly led him into a history of his adventures. "I have lived (said he) a wandering life now fifty-five years, here to-day, and gone to-morrow; for it was my misfortune, when I was young, to be fond of changing." "You have been a traveller then, I presume," said I. "I can't boast of travelling," continued he; "for I have never left the parish in which I was born but three times in my life, that I can remember; but then there is not a street in the whole neighbourhood that I have not lived in at some time or another. When I began to settle, and to take to my business in one street, some unforeseen misfortune, or a desire of trying my luck elsewhere, has removed me, perhaps a whole mile, away from my former customers; while some more lucky cöbler would come into my place, and make a handsome fortune among friends of my making:

making : there was one who actually died in a stall that I had left, worth seven pounds seven shillings, all in hard gold, which he had quilted into the waistband of his breeches."

I could not but smile at these migrations, and continued to ask if he had ever been married? "Aye, that I have, master," replied he, "for sixteen long years; and a weary life I had of it, Heaven knows. My wife took it into her head, that the only way to thrive in this world, was to save money; so, though our comings-in was but about three shillings a week, all that ever she could lay her hands upon she used to hide away from me, though we were obliged to starve the whole week after it. The first three years we used to quarrel about this every day, and I always got the better; but she had a hard spirit, and still continued to hide as usual: so that at last I was tired of quarrelling and getting the better; and she scraped and scraped at pleasure, 'till I was almost starved to death. Her conduct drove me at last, in despair, to the ale-house: here I used to sit with persons who hated home, like myself, drank while I had money left, and ran in score when any body would trust me; 'till at last, my landlady coming one day with a long bill when I was from home, and putting it into my wife's hands, the length of it effectually broke her heart. I searched the whole stall, after she was dead, for money; but she had hidden it so secretly, that with all my pains I could never find a farthing."

By this time my shoe was mended; and satisfying the poor artist for his work, and rewarding him besides for his information, from which reflections not only unnecessary may arise, I took my leave, and returned home to lengthen out the amusement his conversation afforded, by communicating it to a friend.

An humorous Account, by Dick Tattle, of the Misfortunes arising from a Musical Ear.

IN my younger days I was put apprentice to a pewterer, but having unfortunately a most delicate ear for music, could by no means relish the perpetual din and clatter of my occupation. When the hours of work were over, I always flung away my hammer with disdain, and flew with rapture to my fiddle. To say truth, I never went to work without a tune in my head, and performed always more or less than my daily task, according to the quick or slow notes I hummed over. When my humour led me into an Adagio or Piano, (as the fiddlers call it) the pauses were so long between the strokes I made, and my hammer fell so gently that I worked to little purpose. But the next day I was, perhaps, the most expeditious labourer in the shop, and did great execution in a jig or hornpipe.

I was no sooner out of my time, than I determined to renounce my trade for ever, and devote myself wholly to music; but finding it attended with little profit, not having interest enough to obtain a seat in the orchestra at the theatres, nor chusing to submit to the indignity of fiddling only at occasional country dances in the neighbourhood, I was obliged to go to service. I had not been long in my first place before my mistress's monkey escaped through the garret window, to take the air on the top of the house. A ladder was sent for, and I was ordered to catch him. Not being an adept in the art of climbing, I considered it as a hazardous enterprize. It affected my spirits, and I ascended the ladder, to the tune of the dead march in Saul. I gained the roof to this slow time, without making a slip, secured the monkey, and had descended with good success to the second story, when, thinking myself out of danger, and recovering my spirits on a sudden, I passed at once into a concerto of Corelli's. My feet corresponding with the rapidity of the measure, I made a false step in my hurry, fell into the area, and broke my leg. From this time I looked on a house ladder as properly the bricklayer's gamut, and determined never to perform on that scale for the future.

In three months I was discharged from the hospital, and taken into another service. My master was fond of music, and at his country seat was usually entertained with French-horns at dinner. My attention to their playing was the occasion of my committing many blunders. When he called for claret, I carried him finall beer; I either set down the plates with a flourish, or snatched them away with a jerk; and one unfortunate day, as I was introducing a dish of soup in a minuet, I inclined it a little below the level, and, with a kind of semi-circular sweep, poured it fairly over him. I was dismissed upon the spot; and when I pleaded the true reason in my excuse, I was told that such rascals as myself had no business with an ear to music.

In short, Sir, my case is particularly unhappy: though I am a better performer than most footmen, I shall never be able to maintain myself by my fiddle; and am too much attached to it to get a comfortable maintenance by any thing else. I shall be pleased if, by your means, before I am quite quite starved, I may be of some use in society, as a warning to others. My fraternity, in general, are too much addicted to music; and in every kitchen, at the polite end of the town, you are sure to hear either a French-horn or a fiddle. Every black servant thinks himself qualified by his complexion to be an excellent performer on the horn; and every white one, whose ear can distinguish between Bumper-Squire Jones and the rooth palm, has no doubt of excelling on the latter. But you may assure them, that whatever their talents may be, they have but a poor chance to make them turn to any valuable account; and if they will be musicians, the salt box, or the platter and spoons, are the properest instruments for a servant.

Dr. Armstrong's Method of treating the Hooping-cough.

IF the fever is high, when I am first called, and the child of a sanguine habit, I advise bleeding; and if the patient is coëtic, I direct a cooling glyster to be administered, and the body to be kept open with some gentle purgative, viz. a small dose of manna, magnesia, rhubarb, or calomel, given occasionally. Till the fever abates, or remits, or intermits, I give the extrastum cicutæ, according to Dr. Butler's directions, and as soon as I find a plain remission, or intermission of the fever, I have recourse to the tincture, or decoction of the bark, the elixir paregoricum, in a double quantity to that of the sudorific elixir, ordered by Dr. Lettsom, and the tincture of cantharides; and this I continue till the end of the disease. Taking care all the while, to keep the body moderately open, and if the phlegm is troublesome or the patient feverish in the night, I give the antimonial solution in the evening, as before mentioned. If the child is turned of six or seven months, and troubled with worms, or has a great foulness of the intestines, I prefer calomel, by way of laxative, to any other medicine, giving it over night in a sufficient quantity to procure two or three stools next day.

During the whole cure, I pay the strictest regard to the diet, forbidding the use of any kind of meat, or fish, nay even of broth, while the child is feverish at nights. I chiefly allow sago and panada to children at the breast, or while they are very young. To such as are little grown up, about two years old and upwards, besides the above-mentioned, bread pudding, apple-pudding, or dumpling, during the season, stale French-roll with honey, currant-jelly, or raspberry jam, apples, boiled, roasted, or baked; but no pyc-crust of any sort, nor any jelly of meat or hartshorn. Turnips, if they are good, well boiled, and mashed with milk instead of butter, and likewise potatoes, dressed in the same manner. But the mealy sort is the best, and they ought to be carefully picked and tasted before they are mashed; because it is no unusual thing here to meet with potatoes that look very well, but, when you come to taste them, they have a most disagreeable flavour, and are very unwholesome. These, I imagine, are raised in the garden grounds about town, and contract that rankness from the too great quantity of dung with which the soil is corrupted, and rendered incapable of producing either potatoes or turnips in perfection. Both these roots grow best in a light, sandy soil, and new ground, with little or no dung, and every body knows, that the turnips brought to market here, are not fit for the table till the field ones come in. In the same manner the potatoes that are sent to market from different parts of the country where the soil is less manured, must be the most sweet and wholesome. Bread and milk I have no objection to, when there is not much fever, if the child is fond of it, and if used to agree with him when in health. But to make it digest the more easily, a little Spanish soap should be dissolved in it, viz. the bigness of a filbert to half a pint of milk, adding to it a sufficient quantity of sugar, to take off the disagreeable taste of the soap. For drink, infusion of malt, or of apples in the season, barley-water, baum tea, hyssop-tea, or that of horehound, if you can persuade them to take it. But it is not sufficient to give proper attention to the quality of the food, the quantity likewise should be carefully regarded; that is to say, the child must never be allowed to feed too heartily at a time. There is nothing more hurtful in a cough of any kind, than filling the stomach too much at once, but especially in the hooping-cough. A fatal instance of this happened a few years ago, to a child near two years old, which I attended in that disease. The cough had been better for some days, and was apparently going off, when the parents one Sunday fed it too heartily with bread-pudding, which they had boiled for their own dinner, and which from its lightness they thought could not do the child any harm, but unfortunately it was thereby immediately thrown into convulsions, of which it died the next morning. A gentle puke was given, which operated very well, but it was so weakened by the violence of the fits, that nothing administered gave any sensible relief. I must however observe, that she was naturally a very tender, delicate child, but never had been subject to convulsions before.

PREMIUMS

Offered by the DUBLIN SOCIETY,

For the Encouragement of Agriculture, Planting, and other Articles in Husbandry.

Wheat on Clover Lay.

TO such persons as shall before the first day of November, in the year 1777, sow wheat upon fresh clover lay of one year's growth only, that has been mowed and never grazed, a premium of 20 shillings for each acre so sown.

No person is to be entitled to the foregoing premium who shall not prove to the satisfaction of the society, that he has punctually observed the following particulars, viz.

That he has sown the clover lay as he plowed it.

Then harrowed in the seed, or trenched it with shovels.

Carefully picked out the roots of docks, and other weeds.

Cleared up all the furrows, and thoroughly water-cut the whole ground, if subject to wet; all before the fifteenth day of November in the said year.

N. B. The claimant may either sow all the seed with the plough, or with the harrow; or half with one, and half with the other, as he chuses.

For this premium the sum of 800l. will be given after the rate of 200l. in each province. 800l.

The claims must be sent in before the first day of February 1778, and will be adjudged on Thursday the 19th of November following; at which time the claimant is to make a return of the produce of his crop, by calculation, or otherwise.

The foregoing Premium for sowing wheat upon clover lay, will be continued by the society for the years 1778, and 1779 inclusive.

Turnips after Wheat.

To such persons as shall pull up by the roots the stubble for manure, and sow with turnips, wheat-stubble, before the first day of October after the reaping of the wheat: a premium of ten shillings for each acre so sown.

For this premium the sum of 400l. will be given for the year 1777; after the rate of 100l. to each province. 400l. or. od.

The claims are to be sent in before the first day of March 1778, and will be adjudged on Thursday the 3d of December following.

The foregoing premium for sowing turnips after wheat, will be continued by the society for the years 1778, and 1779 inclusive.

In case more persons shall be entitled to any premium, than the money appointed thereto will answer to pay; a preference will be given in the manner following, viz.

In the premium for wheat after clover.

To such claimants as shall have used bullocks instead of horses, in the entire tillage thereof, and shall have earliest sown and finished the ground.

In the premium for turnips after wheat.

To such as shall have used bullocks in like manner from the said time; shall have sown the turnip-seed after the wheat, for which the first Hib. Mag. Sept. 1777.

of the foregoing premiums was given or adjudged to have been deserved; and as shall have most effectually manured the ground before sowing.

N. B. Where any of two or more things are to give a preference, the use of bullocks will be chiefly attended to.

All claims must set forth the performance of the several matters required; and also, how far such articles as are to give a preference have been observed; and also whether the claimant is seized of a real estate of the yearly value of 300l. or possessed of a personal or real estate together of the value of 3000l. And no claim by any person who is not so seized or possessed will be received, unless two members of the Dublin Society, or any of the corresponding county societies shall certify under their hands at foot thereof, that they have viewed the works, operation, lands, &c. for which such claim is made, and that they verily believe, as far as they can judge, every matter set forth in the said claim to be true, and that the claimant is justly entitled to the premium he demands.—Provided however, that no certificate from any member who owes more than a year's subscription at the time that the claim is sent in, shall be deemed sufficient.

Rape or Turnips on Boggy Ground.

A premium of twenty shillings an acre will be given for rape or turnips sown upon bog, or boggy mountain, plowed and burnt, or limed with not less than 140 barrels of lime to an acre for that purpose, and sown before the 20th day of July in the year 1777. Fifty pounds will be disposed of for the said premium in each of the provinces; and in case there should be claimants for more than 50 acres in each province, then the sum of 50l. to be rateably divided among the claimants: the claims to be considered, and premiums for them adjudged on Thursday the 5th of February 1778. 200l.

The foregoing Premium for sowing rape or turnips on boggy ground, will be continued by the society for the years 1778, and 1779 inclusive.

H O O P S.

To the person who shall have between the first day of February, and the first day of April, in the year 1777, planted any quantity, not less than four acres, with timber, fallow, chestnut fall w, Norfolk willow, Gogmagog fallow, (by some called Gogmagog or Huntingshire willow,) Lombardy or pine poplar, sweet chestnut, hazel, or ash, after the rate of 9000 plants at least to the acre, for hoops, in each province; a premium after the rate of 40 shillings for each acre to be planted will be given, but not in any province to exceed in the whole the sum of thirty pounds. 120l. or. od.

In case more claims shall be made than the said sum will be sufficient to pay, a preference will be given in proportion to the amount and goodness of the security each claimant shall give, that the plants shall be kept well fenced, and none of them cut for any purpose but hoops, or hop poles, for five years from the adjudication of the premium, and until they shall have out-grown the size fit for these purposes.

The claims must be sent in before the first day K k k k of November 1777, and the premiums will be adjudged on the last Thursday in January following; but before the same shall be paid, sufficient security in triple the amount of the premium must be given for the purpose aforesaid.

To be adjudged the 29th day of January 1778.

The society recommend, that the ground intended for this plantation be first thoroughly drained, and then well trenched three spades deep before the first of Janua y preceding the planting; that it be then marked into lines 18 inches asunder, and the plants set 18 inches distant in those lines, leaving however every fourth line unplanted; and that whenever the plants shall be cut down, the ground so left between every three lines shall be thrown up over those three lines for the nourishment of the roots growing in them.

The common method practised of planting fallows in raised beds like potatoes is very injurious; not only rendering the soil too dry, but also in not leaving good mould for covering the plants when cut; which is the time that covering will be of most benefit by encreasing the number of stems from each, and nourishing afresh the roots.

Every claimant must, before adjudication, shew that his ground for which he claims, is well fenced from cattle.

The foregoing premium for the encouragement of plantations for making hoops, will be continued by the society for the years 1778, and 1779, inclusive.

SPIRITUOUS LIQUORS.

GENEVA.

TO the person who shall, in the year 1777, make the greatest quantity of Geneva, and of the best quality, in imitation of Geneva imported from Holland, for not less than 1000 gallons, a premium of 50l.

To the person who shall, in the said year, make the next greatest quantity, and of the best quality, for not less than 600 gallons, a premium of 30l. 80l. os. od

BRANDY.

To the person who shall, in the said year, make the greatest quantity of brandy and of the best quality, in imitation of French brandy imported from France, for not less than 1000 gallons, a premium of 50l.

To the person who shall, in the said year, make the next greatest quantity, and of the best quality, for not less than 600 gallons, a premium of 30l. 80l. os. od.

Exporting home-made Spirits.

To the person who shall, in the said year, export the greatest quantity of home-made spirits, and of the best quality, for not less than 3000 gallons, a premium of 50l.

To the person who shall, in the said year, export the second greatest quantity and of the best quality, for not less than 1500 gallons, a premium of 25l.

To the person who shall, in the said year, export the third greatest quantity and of the best quality, for not less than 750 gallons, a premium of 12l. 10s. 87l. 10s. od.

None of the aforesaid premiums for making and exporting spirits will be given, but for such spirits only as have been distilled from malt made of bere or barley of the growth of Ireland.

The surveyor, or gauger of the ⁶alk, where any spirits shall be made, for which a premium is intended to be claimed, is required to seal up a bottle of such spirits taken by him from the still; which sample must be produced on the day of adjudication, and sufficient evidence must be given that the quantity declared to be made by such distiller was equal in quality and goodness to the sample produced.

All the said premiums for spirits to be adjudged on Thursday the 19th of February 1778.

These premiums for the encouragement of making and exporting spirits will be continued for the years 1778, and 1779.

N. B. The savings arising from any of the aforesaid premiums will be applied to induce landlords to encourage their tenants to reclaim boggs, or boggy, heathy, mountain land; such inducements to be premiums equal to such sums as the said landlords shall pay or allow to their tenants for that purpose, so far as the said savings shall amount to.

No member of the society, or person seized of any real estate of the yearly value of 300l. or who in personal estate, or real and personal estate together, is worth the sum of 3000l. shall receive any of the foregoing pecuniary rewards in agriculture or planting, nor by his claim prevent the same from being given to persons who are not possessed of such property, their whole amount being intended to be distributed among such persons only; but as a testimony of his merit, and for more usefully dispersing proper instruments of husbandry throughout the kingdom, the society will give him such implements of husbandry, with their arms stamped or painted thereon as he shall choose, to the value of 5l. in lieu of every premium of 10l. and under 20l. and to the value of 8l. in lieu of every premium of 20l. or more, to which he would have been intitled, if he had not been a member of the society, or seized or possessed of the value aforesaid.

And every other person, to whom any premium of 30l. or more shall be adjudged, shall receive five sixths thereof in money, and the remaining sixth part in such instruments of husbandry as he shall choose, to the amount and value of such sixth part.

The society, in order to procure instruments, and implements of husbandry of the best materials, manufacture, and construction, declare they are ready to contract upon proper terms, for a regular, annual supply, with such workmen as shall produce of their own manufacture the best patterns of all the common implements, viz. ploughs, carts, carrs, harrows, rollers, harness, &c. &c. for the reception of which, they intend to fit up a store in some convenient place, where all models, &c. may be deposited; and to which every person shall at all times have free access, and liberty to examine and take patterns.

As it would be very beneficial, and tend to the promoting of agricultures and manufactures the society intend likewise to purchase all valuable books of trade, agriculture, arts, manufactures, &c. which are not already in their possession. Also regularly to procure the proceedings and publications of the several societies instituted throughout Europe; particularly those in countries of equally or colder climates than our own.

For these purposes of purchasing implements of husbandry and books, the society will give a sum not exceeding 232l. 10s. annually, for the years 1777, 1778, and 1779. 232l. 10s. od.

MANUFACTURES.

SILKEN MANUFACTURE.

Silks sold in the Warehouse.

THE sum of 500l. will be given in premiums of 5l. per cent. on the value of Irish silken goods, which shall be sold in the Irish silk ware-house, by retail, according to the present rules of the said house, from the 1st of June 1777, to the 1st of June 1778. 50l. 0s. od.

To be adjudged as the goods are sold.

A sum not exceeding 600l. will be given to defray all expences whatever of the said ware-house, from the 1st of June 1777, to the 1st of June 1778. 600l. 0s. od.

Premiums of 3l. per cent. will be given to the wholesale buyers of silks, of the value of four shillings per yard, and upwards, for the purpose of selling again, on the value of such goods, provided the same shall not exceed 21,666l. 13s. 4d. and if it should, then the sum of 650l. will be given in proportion to the value of silken goods so bought respectively by each claimant, from the 1st of June 1776, to the 1st of June 1777. 650l. 0s. od.

N.B. No person to be considered as a wholesale buyer, who shall not have purchased goods within the year to the value of 100l.

Black alamode, though not of the value of four shillings, equally entitled to the premium.

To be adjudged the 6th of November 1777.

Premiums to the same amount, and on the same conditions, will be given to the wholesale buyers of silks, from the 1st of June 1777, to the 1st of June 1778.

Clouding of Silks.

To the person or persons who, between the 1st of June 1776, and the 1st of June 1777, inclusive, shall have followed the business of clouding of silks, for the manufacturers at large, to be certified by the corporation of weavers, 15l. per cent. will be given on the value of said labour, provided the same shall not exceed 200l. the work done to be certified by the oath of the clouder, and the certificate of the manufacturer. 30l. 0s. od.

To be adjudged the 4th of December 1777.

The above premiums for clouding silks will be continued by the society, from the 1st of June 1777, to the 1st of June 1778.

Steel Reeds.

To the person who, between the 1st of June 1776, and the 1st of June 1777, inclusive, shall have made cast steel reeds for weavers, of bright wire 10l. per cent. will be given on the value of said reeds, provided the same shall not exceed the sum of 158l. 6s. 8d. 158l. 6s. 8d.

To be adjudged the 4th day of December 1777.

The foregoing premium for steel reeds, will be continued by the society, from the 1st of June 1777, to the 1st of June 1778.

WOOLLEN MANUFACTURE.

A SUM not exceeding 500l. per annum will be given yearly, to defray all expences whatever of the Irish woollen ware-house for the years 1777, and 1778.

Broad Cloths manufactured and finished, no nearer than 20 Miles to Dublin.

The sum of 200l. will be paid in premiums of 6l. per cent. on the value of broad cloths and broad rugs, sold or exposed to sale in any city, town corporate, or market town of this kingdom, to be entirely manufactured, and completely finished at a distance of not less than 20 miles from the city of Dublin, and not within the city or liberties of the city of Cork, from the 24th of June 1776, inclusive, to the 24th of June 1777, by persons who have twice already obtained premiums for such goods manufactured at or above the distance aforesaid from the city of Cork.

And if it should appear that such goods to more than the value of 3333l. 6s. 8d. shall have been so manufactured by such persons within the said time, then the sum of 200l. shall be divided in proportion to the value of the goods respectively manufactured by each claimant. 200l. 0s. od.

To be adjudged the 20th of November 1777.

The sum of 200l. will be paid in premiums not exceeding eight and one-fourth per cent. on the value of broad cloths and broad rugs sold or exposed to sale in any city, town corporate, or market town of this kingdom, to be entirely manufactured, and completely finished at a distance of not less than 20 miles from the city of Dublin, and not within the city or the liberties of the city of Cork, from the 24th of June 1776, inclusive, to the 24th of June 1777, by persons who have already once obtained premiums for such goods, manufactured at or above the distance aforesaid, from the city of Dublin, and the city of Cork.

And if it should appear that such goods to more than the value of 2400l. shall have been so manufactured by such persons within the said time, then the sum of 200l. shall be divided in proportion to the value of the goods respectively manufactured by each claimant. 200l. 0s. od.

To be adjudged the 20th of November, 1777.

The sum of 200l. will be paid in premiums not exceeding 10l. per cent. on the value of broad cloths, and broad rugs sold, or exposed to sale, in any city, town corporate or market town of this kingdom, to be entirely manufactured and completely finished at a distance of not less than 20 miles from the city of Dublin, and not within the city or liberties of the city of Cork, from the 24th of June 1776, inclusive to the 24th of June 1777, by persons who have never obtained premiums for such goods, manufactured at or above the distance above-mentioned from the city of Dublin, and the city of Cork.

And if it should appear that such goods to more than the value of 200*l.* shall have been so manufactured by such persons within the said time, then the sum of 200*l.* shall be divided in proportion to the value of goods respectively manufactured by each claimant. 200*l.* os. cd.

To be adjudged the 20th of November, 1777.

Provided that to ascertain the value and quantity of such goods, they shall be deposited in a hall or room in any city, town corporate, or market town of this kingdom, which shall be provided for that purpose; that every piece be there viewed and examined by an inspector, to be approved of by the society, who is to certify upon oath before the chief magistrate of such city or town corporate, that the said broad cloths and broad rugs have been well and sufficiently manufactured, and completely finished, and that the prices at which they shall be rated by the manufacturers are reasonable.

The said inspectors shall be allowed for their trouble in so doing three pence per piece, to be paid proportionably by such claimants as may obtain premiums.

Every claimant must prove to the society's satisfaction, that the place where his said goods had been manufactured, had been also his place of residence.

Superfine Warp or Woof Yarn.

To the undertaker scribblers who shall have caused to be scribbled and spun for warp or woof, superfine yarn fit for superfine broad cloths, from the 1st of June 1776, to the 1st of June 1777, the sum of 240*l.* cs. cd.

Provided the said undertaker scribblers shall have paid weekly to the spinners of the said yard one farthing per skain more than they have formerly done, according to the quantity so spun, and shall prove that they have so done, to the satisfaction of the society.

To be adjudged the 11th of December, 1777.

Country Yarn.

For warp yarn fit for broad cloths, scribbled and spun, at the distance of at least 10 miles from the city of Dublin, from the 1st of June 1776, inclusive, to the 1st of June, 1777, a premium will be given of one penny per skain, provided the number of skains of such yarn shall not exceed 25000, and if it should, then the sum 104*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* shall be divided among the claimants proportionably to the quantity which each shall have scribbled and spun. 104*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.*

To be adjudged the 11th of December, 1777.

The foregoing premiums for the encouragement of the woollen manufacture of this kingdom, will be continued in like manner from the 24th of June 1777, to the 24th of June 1778.

Callamancoes, Russells, and Broad Stuffs.

For making and selling, from the 24th of June 1776, to the 24th of June 1777, at the distance of at least 30 miles from the city of Dublin, and 20 miles from the city of Cork, callamancoes of single worsted, and full fifteen inches wide, Russells and broad stuffs, all of single worsted, and equal in quality to such as are imported. A premium of 5*l.* per cent. will be given on the value of such goods, or of any one of the said sorts, provided the value of what shall have been so made and sold by all the claimants together, shall not exceed the sum of 200*l.* and if it should, then the sum of 100*l.* will be divided among the claimants proportionably to the value of such goods by them respectively manufactured. 100*l.* cs. cd.

To be adjudged the 18th of December, 1777.

For making and selling, from the 24th of June, 1777, to the 24th of June, 1778, at said distances from Dublin and Cork, callamancoes of full fifteen inches wide, and russells of full twenty-four inches wide, both of single worsted, and equal in quality to such as are imported: the same premium of 100*l.* will be allotted in the same manner; but no premium will be given on any piece which shall not be wove by boys under 17 years of age. 100*l.* os. cd.

To be adjudged in December, 1778.

MANUFACTURE of MIXED GOODS.

C R A P E S.

FOR the manufacturing of crapes, commonly called Norwich crapes, of 1*s.* 4*d.* and upwards, per yard, from the 10th of March, 1777, inclusive, to the 10th of March, 1778, 5*l.* per cent. shall be given on the value of such crapes, provided the same shall not exceed 800*l.* and if it should, then the sum of 40*l.* shall be divided proportionably to the value of crapes manufactured by each claimant. 40*l.* cs. cd.

To be adjudged the 12th of March, 1778.

B O M B A Z I N E S.

For the manufacturing of bombazines of 2*s.* and upwards, per yard, from the 10th of March, 1777, inclusive, to the 10th of March 1778, of the same kinds and qualities, and of the same breadth with those usually imported, 10*l.* per cent. will be given on the value of such bombazines, provided the same shall not exceed 250*l.* and if it should, then the sum of 25*l.* shall be divided proportionably to the value of bombazines manufactured by each claimant. 25*l.* os. cd.

To be adjudged the 12th of March, 1778.

L U T H E R I N E S.

For the manufacturing of lutherines, from the 1st of August, 1776, inclusive, to the 1st of August, 1777, 10*l.* per cent. will be given on the value of such lutherines, provided the same shall not exceed 150*l.* and if it should, then the sum of 15*l.* will be divided proportionably to the value of lutherines manufactured by each claimant. 15*l.* os. cd.

To be adjudged the 16th of November 1777.

And for ascertaining the quantity and value of each of these articles of mixed goods, the inspector for the time being of the goods sent into the Irish silk ware-house, shall examine the same, and certify to the society the quantity and goodness of each article, with the name of the manufacturer; for which he shall be allowed two-pence per piece, out of the premiums, for the goods he shall so examine.

Cotton carded.

A premium of 3*l*. will be given on every hundred weight of cotton carded by an instrument similar to that invented by James Barlow, master of the royal charter school on the Strand, or by the said instrument, provided the same does not exceed the sum of 45*l*. and if not more than 150 weight should be claimed for, then the said sum of 45*l*. to be rateably divided among the claimants. 45*l*. os. od.

To be adjudged the 27th of November, 1777.

The foregoing premiums offered for the encouragement of manufacturing mixed goods, will be continued by the society from the 1st of June, 1777, to the 1st of June 1778.

MUSLINS.

A premium of 20*l*. per cent. will be given upon all muslins manufactured in this kingdom, which shall be sold between the 1st day of July, 1777, and the 1st day of May 1778, provided the said premium shall not exceed 8*l*. in which case the said sum of 80*l*. shall be divided rateably among the claimants. The said premiums to be paid to the manufacturers of the said muslin, on their proving to the satisfaction of the society, the number of yards so manufactured, and the different breadths thereof, with the prices at which they were sold. 80*l*. os. od.

To be adjudged the 7th day of May, 1778.

Tanning of Hides.

TO the person, or persons who shall first tan one hundred hides, from 50 to 80 pounds weight, according to the method invented by Dr. Mc. Bride, and shall give a satisfactory information to the society, from experiments made by him or them for that purpose, whether the leather tanned in that manner is equal in every respect to leather tanned according to the old method, a premium will be given of 60*l*. And in order that Dr. Mc. Bride may have an opportunity of attending the progress of the said new method of tanning, no person will be considered as a claimant for the said premium, who shall not give notice in writing to the assistant secretary, before the first day of August next, of his intention to become a claimant for the same; and if more than one person shall so give notice, the preference will be given to that person whose notice shall be first received by the assistant secretary. 60*l*.

Fullers Earth.

TO the person or persons who shall find out in any part of this kingdom, a pit or pits of fullers earth, equal in goodness to any imported, a premium of 10*l*. per cent. will be given on the value of such quantity thereof, not exceeding 350*l*. as shall be raised and sold by such person or persons; and if there should be claims for a greater quantity, then the sum of 35*l*. shall be rateably divided among the claimants. 35*l*.

To be adjudged on the 4th day of December, 1777.

FISHERIES.

A premium of 20*l*. per cent. will be given upon all money which shall be hereafter laid out in building houses of lime and stone, or brick, for curing fish, or smoke-houses for smoking of fish, upon the north west coast of this kingdom;

provided the same shall not exceed the sum of 300*l*. and if claims to a greater amount should be approved of by the society, the said sum of 300*l*. to be rateably divided among the claimants: who must lay before the society plans of the said buildings, with a particular account of the materials of which they shall be constructed: the said premium to be paid only for new buildings which shall be begun subsequent to the last day of the month of June, 1777, and completely finished before the first day of June, 1778.

To be adjudged the 11th of June, 1778.

A premium of 20*l*. per cent. will be given upon any sum or sums of money which shall be hereafter expended in erecting proper work-houses, and ware-houses of lime and stone, or brick for coopers, on that part of the coast of Donegal, called the Rosses, or at Killybegs, or at any place between the same; upon security given, that the said buildings, or any part thereof shall not be turned to any other use for seven years after receiving the said premium; and provided the same shall not exceed the sum of 200*l*. to be rateably divided among the claimants, who must lay before the society plans of the said buildings, with a particular account of the materials of which they shall be constructed: the said premium to be paid only for new buildings which shall be begun subsequent to the last day of the month of June, 1777, and completely finished before the first day of June, 1778.

To be adjudged the 11th of June, 1778.

A premium of ten shillings a ton will be given upon all home-made or imported salt which shall be consumed in curing of fish upon the north west coast, from the 30th of June, 1777, to the 1st of June, 1778; provided the several sums to be adjudged, shall not exceed the sum of 200*l*. otherwise to be rateably divided among the claimants.

To be adjudged the 11th of June 1778.

A premium of one shilling a barrel will be given upon every barrel containing thirty two gallons of well cured fish, taken upon the north west coast of this kingdom; which shall be exported to, and actually sold in foreign parts, from the 30th of June, 1777, to the 30th of June, 1778; provided the claims which shall be allowed, exceed not the sum of 400*l*. if they should, the said sum of 400*l*. to be rateably divided among the claimants.

To be adjudged the 11th of June, 1778.

* * All matters for which the society offer premiums, must be begun after the publication of such premiums, unless there be a particular exception in the publication.

The society reserve to themselves a power of giving in all cases such part only of any premium as the performance shall be judged to deserve; or in case of want of merit, no part.

A candidate for a premium, or a person applying for a bounty, being detected in any dissingenuous method to impose upon the society, shall forfeit all such premium or bounty, and be incapable of obtaining any for the future; and if any person shall be detected in offering any forged instrument in evidence to the society, or in committing wilful perjury in proof of any claim, a prosecution will be carried on against such offender with the utmost rigour of the law.

The society being desirous of avoiding as much as possible the multiplication of oaths in the disposal of their premiums request that the nobility, magistrates, gentry, and clergy in their several districts, will give their attention when applied to for certificates of the merits of any candidate for a premium, to examine the pretensions of such person, that the society may not be under the necessity of tendering an affidavit to him; which they apprehend has sometimes occasioned the misapplication of their fund, and the guilty of perjury.

No person will be admitted a candidate for any premium offered by the society, who has obtained a patent for the exclusive right of making or performing any thing for which such premium is offered, or for which premium there might not have been a fair competition.

Any manufacturers detected in entering into any illegal combination of raising the price of their goods or labour, are for ever excluded from receiving any premium or bounty from the society.

All claimants of premiums are to send in their claims at least fourteen days before such premiums are to be adjudged, directed to the Rev. Mr. Thomas Lyfter, at the society's house in Grafton-street.

All premiums offered by the Dublin Society are designed for Ireland only, unless in any article mention be made to the contrary.

* * The Dublin Society being desirous of promoting such enquiries as may tend to the information and service of the public; and also diffusing as generally as possible, the knowledge of such useful discoveries as may be communicated, as well as those which are locally known and practised, request the assistance and communication of the ingenious and experienced.

By order of the Society,
THOMAS LYSTER, Assist. Secretary.

A Night Piece.

NOW blushing Phœbus, sinking in the west, Withdraws his rays and bids the world
good night;

While silent darkness haſt'ning from afar,
Expands her mantle o'er the lucid air,
And clads fair nature in a veil obſcure.
What wonders now attract my eager ſight,
Delight my view and fill me with amaze!
What glories throng the ſpacious firmament,
Displaying light ineffable around!
Thou ſplendid Moon, thou lucid orb, 'tis thee,
True image of thy Maker's lovelineſs,
That lumines the ſable night and all thy train,
Thoſe monuments of ſweet celeftial love.
Eternal! wond'rous! inexpressible!
O darling theme! O ſubject of my choice!
On thee, with heav'nly contemplation rure,
I could for ever dwell. — But how can man
Preſume to ſing thy praiſe in ſimple verſe;
Or where find words or language to reveal
Thy worth immortal! matchleſs! infinite!
When angels ſaw thee, they admiring ſtood,
Wrapt in amazement! wonder! and delight!
Proclaiming loud throughout eternity,
With ſacred lays, with hallelujah's ſweet,
The praiſe that's ever, ever due to thee:
Of thee they ſing with never-ceaſing joy;
Their joy was love, and love was all their ſong.
Hail, holy love, auſpicious child of heav'n!
Man's ſole redemption, everlaſting hope!
Man's conſolation, everlaſting bliſs!
Hail glorious pow'r! hail bright divinity!
Immortal ſource of ſanctity and truth!
Of righteouſneſs, of ſound felicity!
And bleeding mercy! mercy without end!
Each thought of thee exalts my riſing mind,
And opens wide eternity to view.
Oft do I think when meditating thee,
I climb Olympus, tow'ring eminence,
In company with ſaints and ſpirits pure,
Join harps celeftial, endleſs praiſes join,
And hymn the God of nature! God of all!
O love divine! 'tis thee that thouſand ſpirits
And gives my ſoul her fancy'd flight to heav'n!
Yet human thought falls very ſhort of thee:
And ſhall the muſe with feeble pinions ſoar

Above the clouds, above immenſity!
Shall ſhe attempt, in mortal ſtrain, to ſing
Of ſuch a ſubject, nothing leſs than GOD.
For God, the ſource of godlineſs, is love!
Is love ſtupendous! love ineffable!
From him proceeds the good mankind receive!
Which daily he, in great abundance ſhow's
Down on his creatures, univerſally;
Nor does he want, like mortal man from man,
The ſame propoſition he ſo kindly gives:
'Tis nought but love, what gratitude demands,
The Maker, Lord, and Deity requires;
For well he knows the feebleſneſs of fleſh,
Its nature, ſubſtance, and infirmities;
And tho' we daily violate his will,
He yet with mercy pardons our offence,
And, like a ſhepherd, tender of his flock,
Invites us, wand'ring ſinners, to his home.
O! cannot ſuch ſtupendous goodneſs cheer
The ſmalleſt ſpark of gratitude within
The callous breaſt of man; ungrateful wretch,
Whoſe very thoughts are not exempt from ſin.
In ſin was death and human woe conceiv'd,
And human woe, without her mother ſin,
Could ne'er exiſt, for both in nature's one.
Why then do we, poor fooliſh mortals, plant
Thoſe roots of vice, which ever will produce
The products, ſorrow, miſery, and death.
Much rather let us ſow in virtue's ſoil,
The ſeed of truth, of piety, and faith;
Whoſe fruits are peace! and righteouſneſs and lie!

And ſanctity and everlaſting joy!

Description of an Iriſh Country Wedding.

THE prieſt arriv'd, the holy words are ſaid,
The kiſs is given and the table ſpread.
The ſupper ended, all ariſe to dance,
All take their partners, thump the floor and prance;
The midnight hour proclaims it time to ſtrip,
The bride retires, the ladies aſter ſkip.
Some envy Chloe her approaching bliſs,
Whiſt others grieve to've ſaid the fatal Yes.
One takes a ſhoe, the next a ſtocking throw;
A third expects the garter will diſcloſe

The

The shape and temper of her future mate
In pleasing dreams; a fourth must calculate
How many husbands she'll be blest withal,
By pins, long, short, straight, crooked, great, and small.

The following Lines were written by the late unfortunate Dr. Dodd, the Day before his Execution, and therefore will certainly be acceptable to the Public.

To my Friends, especially of the CHARITABLE SOCIETIES.

AH, my lov'd friends!—why all this toil for one

To life so lost, so totally undone!
Whose meat and drink are only bitter tears;
Nights past in sorrow, mornings waked to cares!
Where deep offence sits heavy on his soul,
And thought self torturing, in deep tumult roll!

Could you by all your labours so humane,
From this dread prison his deliverance gain
Could you by kind exertions of your love,
To generous pardon, royal mercy prove;
Where should he fly—where hide his wretched
head,

With shame so cover'd—so to honour dead?

Spare then the task; and as he longs to die,
Set free the captive—let his spirit fly,

Enlarged and happy to its native sky;
Not doubting mercy from His grace to find,
Who bled upon the Cross for all mankind.

But if it must not be, if Heaven's high will,
Ordains him yet a duty to fulfil:

O may each breath—while God that breath shall spare,

Be yours in gratitude! be heaven's in prayer;
Deep as his sin, and low as his offence;
High be his rise, thro' humblest penitence.

While life or death, mankind at least shall learn
From his sad story, and your kind concern;

That works of mercy and a zeal to prove,
By sympathetic aid, the heart of love,

On earth itself a sure reward obtain,
Nor e'er fall pity's kindly drops in vain!

I live a proof! and dying round my urn,
Afflictions family will crowd and mourn:

"Here was our friend," if weeping o'er my grave

They cry—'tis all the Epitaph I crave.

Receipt to make a Modern Fcp,

RECIPE. Two tons of pride and impudence,
One scruple next of modesty and sense,
Two grains of truth; of falsehood and deceit,
And insincerity, an hundred weight.

Infuse into the skull of flashy wit
And empty nonsense quantum sufficit.

To make the composition quite complete,
Throw in th' appearance of a grand estate,

A lofty cane, a sword with silver hilt,
A ring, two watches, and a snuff-box gilt,

A gay effeminate embroider'd vest,
With suitable attire. Probatum est.

SONG on MONIMIA.

MONIMIA is esteem'd by all
Who matchless merit prize;
In whom 'tis own'd blooms ev'ry grace,
Essential to our joys.

She's wife, she's virtuous, and she's fair;
From affectation free;
She's humble, placid, and sincere;
She's truth and chastity.

Her actions speak a soul refin'd,
A stranger to caprice;
Her gen'rous, tender, artless mind,
A spotless mirror is.

Happy, thrice happy, sure the swain,
To whom kind Heav'n shall give,
A bliss which all must wish to gain,
That is, with her to live.

*Advice to a Brother.

IN winter's cold and melancholy gloom,
When sultry Sol withdraws his cheering rays.
No peaceful muse with friendly aid will come,
To grace thy brother's unharmonious lays.

But O! my William, from the feeling heart,
Where parent nature's ample feast is fix'd:
Accept the gen'rous wishes I impart,
With fond affection, and good nature mix'd.

In this obscure and dreary vale of woe,
Be Heav'n-born virtue thy auspicious choice;
From her celestial consolation flow,
Which can the soul of piety rejoice.

Let truth, let wisdom, o'er thy ways preside,
Their precepts just, and dictates wise attend;
Make sacred reason thy unerring guide:
On that your faith and future hopes depend.

Humanity gave deeply on thy heart,
And early plant religion in your breast;
As well the pious christian's honest part,
And leave, O! leave to gracious Heav'n the rest.

Thee deeds alone will cheer the sullen day,
Of sickness, trouble, care, and penury,
And guide us Pilgrims on our lonely way,
To life of bliss and immortality!

Come then, my William, while exulting youth,
Within thy ardent, tender bosom glows;
Come listen to the Heav'nly voice of truth,
'Twill charm thy years and give old age repose.

And when thy bloom and manly vigour fail,
And chills of death the pulse of life benumb;
Then will thy works of piety avail,
And joyful wait thee to the silent tomb.

Nor will they thee in dull oblivion's night,
Regardless lye, but with thy ashes rise,
Start from the tomb, triumphant take their flight,

And Phoenix like, with thee attempt the skies.

There to receive, to share without annoy,
The promis'd bliss, the father's clemency!
And there, O! there, eternally enjoy,
The full fruition of the Deity!

NOTE.

* This Poem was the composition of a winter's leisure hour.

To the Editor of the Hibernian Magazine.

SIR,

The following are some extracts from the poems of a friend, lately gone abroad; to which I request you will give a place, at convenient times, in your Magazine. The public, to whom whom these papers may one day be given, will be able, by this sketch, to judge of the genius of an author who has hitherto carefully concealed himself from the eyes of the world.

The following is taken from a Poem on Marriage.

Merchant's Soliloquy.

FIVE thousand pounds will load me six good sail,
Each of three hundred tons; which cannot fail
To bring me in three hundred pounds per cent;
No, that's too little: I shall be content
With four; no less. The jointure she demands

She can't exact, as I have got no lands;
My Wealth consisting in dry cash and goods,
Not in old mills, old castles, towns, nor woods.
Let her pursue John Roe and Richard Doe,
I care not which, for neither do I know;
But this I know, the widow I must bite,
And touch her money, be it wrong, be it right.

In Answer to his Wife, who threatens to go to Law with him.

I've got opinion on my side. Opinion,
In these our days, bears uncontrol'd dominion.
A character of ten years standing bears
The palm away, 'gainst e'en the widow's tears.
Besides, a bribe well plac'd will gain a cause
'Gainst justice, truth, and our most sacred laws.
I fear you not. Dash at it when you will:
Heap suit on suit; and pile up bill on bill.
The lawyers will receive thy fees and mine,
And plead my cause with greater force than thine.

OF all the nymphs so fresh and fair,
That grace the banks of Bann;
None can for beauty's charms compare
With lovely Marianne.
Her cheeks the roses here displays;
Her neck that of the Swan;
Smiles deck'd as bright as summer-rays,
The looks of Marianne.
Sweet sense in her pure bosom guides
The intellectual plan;
And mild good-nature still resides
With charming Marianne.
A nymph like her, then should I wed,
Lads, blame me if ye can;
And make the partner of my bed,
The accomplish'd Marianne.

M Y R T I L L U S.

To Miss M——B——, at C——n.

WHILE hope dispos'd one cheering ray,
And said—"Maria may be thine!"
Th' extatic thought drove care away,
Nor let my anxious heart repine.
Brooy'd by its friendly, flatt'ring aid,
My passion (long with care conceal'd)
To the far-distant, beauteous maid
My trembling hand at length reveal'd.
She, ever dutious, wished to find,
If my fond suit her friends approve;
But they, ungen'rous and unkind!
Fobade with scorn my offer'd love.
'Tis true! to gild my humble name,
No pompous, long-resounding line
Of ancestry, once known to fame,
Nor pageant wealth, nor pow'r was mine.

Tho' these, to happiness how vain!

Yet these alone are highly priz'd,
While honour, free from blot or stain,
And faithful love, and truth's despis'd.
Since then by fate deny'd the sight
Of her, for whom alone I live,
One moment's heart-felt, true delight,
Not all on earth beside can give.
If courting solitude, I stray
To the deep covert of the grove,
Its warbling tenants seem to say,
"What's life, without the mate we love?"
If 'mid the gardens vernal bloom,
(A scene 'ere while my pride and care)
No more it breathes a sweet perfume,
No more its fairest flow'rs are fair.
When at the festive board I sit,
Where friendship, wine, and wit's combin'd,
Alas! in friendship, wine, or wit;
Nor peace, nor pleasure can I find.
No! peace, that once this bosom blest'd,
Must never more inhabit there;
—Come then!—usurp its place!—(thou guest And child of hopeless love) Despair.

To Eliza on her Birth Day.

ANOTHER year is roll'd away;
Again returns thy natal day;
Thy beauties now matur'd by time,
And all thy charms are in their prime.
So in the month of June, the rose,
Brightest of all the garden flows;
The flow'rs around in vain compare,
It blooms like thee, supremely fair.
And long may all thy beauties last,
Preserv'd from every nipping blast!
And long may gracious heaven shed,
Its choicest blessings on thy head!
Eliza! may'st thou never know
Corroding care, nor weeping woe!
But may each smiling hour present,
Calm happiness, and rich content.
A length of years from youth to age
Exempt from sickle fortune's rage,
In health and pleasure may'st thou pass,
'Till time presents the finished glass.

Lisburn, 1777.

Inscribed to Miss M——y D——n, Jervaisstreet.

WHILE we with pity see each thoughtless fair,
Strive to be fools, with most assiduous care;
Heaping, where nature needs not, shameless dress,
And from excess still running to excess;
Still emulous each other to outvie,
In affectation, folly, vanity!
How blest and different is Maria's choice;
Guided by virtue's, and by reason's voice;
Not lost in those false pleasures of the sex,
Pauces that satiate, vanities that vex;
But ev'ry female excellence her share;
Her mind improv'd, her form divinely fair.
Blest maid, in whom we see what God design'd,
When last and best her form'd womankind;
Could I raise numbers equal to thy worth,
I'd sing thy virtues, and thy native truth;
Thy matchless charms enraptur'd on we gaze,
And all that dignity that's lost in ease;
But ah! to that I never can aspire;
All I can do, is silently admire!

Madrid, July 9.

OUR last accounts from the coast of Barbary mention, that the Moors have again laid siege to Melille, to which place reinforcements are daily obliged to be sent; but we do not fear the surrender of that fortress, although the Moors are battering it with heavy artillery, which is very well directed.

Belgrade, July 12. Letters from Constantinople mention, that the Captain Pacha being returned on the 10th inst. from Belchik-Tachi, where his Squadron is at anchor, went incognito to the house of the English ambassador; and the next day he sent a very fine horse as a present to his excellency Mr. Anslie, with whom the admiral had previously had several private conferences. It is supposed, that they relate to the means of terminating the differences between the Porte and the court of Petersburg, because nothing is apparently more contrary to the interest of Great Britain at present, than a rupture between those two powers.

Petersburg, July 18. The king of Sweden left Peterhoff on Wednesday last in the evening, and embarked at Oranienbaum about eight o'clock on his return to Stockholm. Her Imperial majesty being apprized of his departure, her Swedish majesty did not take a formal leave of the empress, wrote a letter of compliment, and sent it after the king of Sweden, together with a pelisse of black fox-skin, of the value of 30,000 roubles, by Mr. Solitz, one of her Imperial majesty's adjutants, whom his Swedish majesty invested on the spot with the order of the sword.

The king of Sweden has conferred the order of the Polar Star (of the class of commandeurs) on baron de Nolken, his Swedish majesty's minister at this court.

A deputation from the new Cham of Crim Tartary to the empress arrived here a few days ago.

Augsburgh, July 13. A reinforcement of 35,000 men for Great Britain are raising here, who are to serve next year; which is a proof that the differences with the colonies are not expected to be decided yet. We are assured that the duke of Wintemberg has brought the estates of that duchy to cele 7000 men, but we do not hear what other princes are to furnish the rest of the 35,000 men, among which number we do not include the 6000 Hanoverians, who are ordered to be in readiness to march on the shortest notice.

Paris, July 17. The day before yesterday lord Stormont, his Britannic majesty's ambassador, declared in full audience at the count de Vergenne's house, that the king his master was much displeased at the protection which France seemed to afford to the insurgents, and that he was charged to request of the king of France what his intentions are, and whether he is determined to continue favouring the incursions of the American privateers.—The ambassador desired to be introduced to an audience of the king, who answered, that he owed to his people and to his states to support his flag, and to defend his possessions, and that he would never suffer them to be attacked.—The ambassador having also requested that a stop might be put to his armaments, he made no immediate reply; three days were demanded to return an answer; and yesterday a council was held on this subject. We know not whether any thing is determined on, but it is certain orders were immediately sent to all the ports for some new constructions to be made.

Amsterdam, Aug. 6. We have authentic advices from Gibraltar, that peace was concluded upon between the States General and the emperor of Morocco on the 29th of July at Salee; in consequence of which, his Moorish majesty had sent Don Manuel da Pontes, a Portuguese, in the service of the emperor, to Gibraltar, to carry this agreeable news to the Rear Admiral Pichot; and to let him know at the same time, that all the subjects of their high mightiness who were in slavery, should be sent to Gibraltar. The emperor of Morocco has sent accounts of this conclusion of peace to Tunis, Azile, Tangiers, and Tetuan, with orders to treat any vessels under Dutch colours, which may come into any of these ports, as friends.

HISTORICAL

LONDON.

July 25.

A Vessel upon a particular construction is now building in a private dock-yard near Limehouse, on governments account, to serve as a packet between England and America; she is to mount 24 guns.

Orders are also given from the War-office for a general survey of the ordnance and military stores, in the several fortresses throughout Great Britain and Ireland, and for a report to be made of the same.

26. Orders are given for three men of war to sail with all convenient dispatch, as a reinforcement to admiral Mann's squadron on the Mediterranean station.

28. Orders are given that no person be admitted into the warren at Woolwich, without permission from the board of ordnance.

CHRONICLE.

30. Four agents to the army, set off on Saturday last, two for Holland, one for Hanover, and the other to Hesse Cassel, to agree with the proper farmers-general, and forage masters, at those places for transports and forage, that will bear exporting from those countries, as also houses for the use of our forces in America.

Aug. 1. The Milford frigate, of 28 guns, Sir William Burnaby commander, has taken, retaken, sunk, and destroyed, from the 25th of March, 1776, to the twenty-third of March 1777, forty-two sail of American ships and vessels, among which were three privateers, which government purchased, and fitted out as sloops of war. The Milford sailed on her former station, June 8, for two months, off Boston harbour.

11. The court of Copenhagen has published a proclamation, forbidding the American privateers from entering their ports, except in case of distress, and then to depart in twenty-four hours after.

Extra

Extract of a letter from Jamaica, brought by one of the fleet that sailed by the Isle of Wight on Tuesday.

"Capt. Bateman, of the Winchelsea frigate, met with a large merchantman off Hispaniola, under French colours; he immediately gave chase, and soon came up with her, and sent one of his officers on board to examine where she was bound to, but could not get a satisfactory answer, till after a little time he espied one of the sailors, whom he knew to be a deserter from his majesty's service at Portsmouth; the officer immediately seized the fellow, told him he was his prisoner, and unless he acquainted him from whence the ship came, and where she was bound, he would certainly have him hanged for detraction, which so intimidated the fellow, that he could scarcely utter a syllable more than to beg a few minutes to recollect himself, which, when he had done, he told the officer, that if he would procure his pardon he would answer his questions; the officer told him, if he would tell the truth, he would endeavour to get him pardoned; the fellow, then, without hesitation, desired the officer to search an arm-chest on the quarter-deck, to which he would find a false bottom, and there would meet with papers and many letters, which would give him great satisfaction, which was accordingly done, and papers and many letters were found from Mr. Deane, and the merchants, to the Congress in America, containing an account of the bad success Deane had met with from the court of France, who had declined all the proposals he had made for embracing the American cause, but that he had been more fortunate with the principal merchants, who declared they would support them to the utmost of their power, and that they had then sent them a very valuable cargo, and, in the course of a few months, would send three or four more. The vessel was immediately seized, and carried into Jamaica a few days before the fleet sailed.—It appeared she was fitted out from Old France, and bound to Cape Francois, where she had landed her cargo, and re embarked it again, and took out a sixth certificate to Philadelphia, in America. The abovementioned letters and papers were sent home by the fleet, and contain many curious observations of Deane, Franklin and others."

Bristol, Aug. 13. On Sunday and Monday last arrived in King's Road, 17 sail of our Jamaica fleet. As soon as they came in, the tender in the Road dispatched her boats to press the men, when several of the sailors belonging to the fleet got into their boats, and were making off for shore, who were accordingly pursued by the press-gang, and wantonly fired upon, by which the boatwain of the Friendship was killed on the spot, and several others wounded. The tender sailed the next day; but as the fellow is known who shot the boatwain, it is hoped he will be brought to condign punishment, for so gross a violation of the laws of the land. We hear that officers are dispatched to Plymouth to meet the tender on her arrival, and apprehend the delinquents.

15. The Pallas frigate is sailed from Brest for Philadelphia, commanded by Mons. de Duviell, who has a proclamation from the French king, which is to be published in America, requiring all French officers in the service of the Congress, on pain of death, to immediately to return to France.

20. Late last night a riot happened in Newgate. For several days past a plan had been formed amongst the prisoners to make a general insurrection on the keepers.—It was suggested, it seems, by a woman, and the chief conduct in the execution was given to Patrick Madan, principally assisted by an infamous gang, who have been sentenced to a very long imprisonment in that gaol, for the riot in Moorfields, and who, from the nature of the crime of which they were convicted, cannot legally be held in irons. For several days past they had been collecting together a quantity of bricks, which they took an opportunity of picking out of the walls in different parts of the prison. They had got above a cart-load in all.—About half after nine o'clock, when the keepers were locking up, they were assaulted by a shower of bricks. It seems it was the intention of the prisoners to make their escape by that part of the gaol which is next to the debtors side. Mr. Akerman and his people immediately attacked them.—The whole prison joined in the riot.—The watchmen of the neighbourhood were called to aid the keepers, and the butchers from Fleetmarket shewed great alacrity in assisting Mr. Akerman, who, at the hazard of his life, went in amongst them, and seized on Madan; after which the rest soon retreated to their wards. In the scuffle, it seems, Madan received a slight wound, but there was, upon the whole, very little mischief done.—Immediately on the rioters being secured, Mr. Akerman gave them every assistance in his power, and sent for Messrs. Glover and Yates, two surgeons in the neighbourhood, by whom those who were wounded are now attended, and it is said, are all in a fair way of recovery.

23. On Wednesday evening, a quarter before nine o'clock, a most daring robbery was committed by a single highwayman, near the corner of Blackland's-lane, Chelsea, on the persons of the earl of Peterborough and Miss Dawson, who were going to town in his lordship's chariot.

25. They write from Gibraltar, that orders have been received there from England, for building several additional forts and out-works for the better defence of that place, especially towards the side of Old Spain, and to repair and strengthen all the fortifications in general; and likewise to pay a strict regard and attention to the discipline of the soldiers in garrison.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

Galway, September 3.

LAST night, as Richard Burke, some time since one of the bailiffs of this town, charged with levying distresses in Inconnagh, without legal authority, and there taken prisoner, was conducting hither under the care of a constable and a guard of soldiers from the barrack of Oughterard, he attempted to make his escape in the west suburbs of this town, when by order of the constable, four of the soldiers fired at him, and each ball took place, whereby the unfortunate man is so desperately wounded, that his recovery is much despaired of.

Galway, Sept. 11. In the county court, James Somers, for the murder of Michael Joyce at Dunmore fair in May last, was tried and found guilty, but being recommended as a proper object of mercy, his execution is deferred to the 18th of October next. Also, Patrick Rowley, otherwise Ryan, for the murder of Francis Barry, late corporal of the 4th horse, was tried and found guilty, and to be hanged and quartered, on Saturday the 20th inst.

Corke, Sept. 11. This day the right worshipful the mayor, attended by the Sheriffs and city officers, marched in regalia, from the mayoralty-house, to Tuckey's-street, where he laid the foundation stone of a guard-house, intended to be built. He was received and saluted by the military, who, after the foundation stone had been laid, fired three volleys.

Loughrea, Sept. 5. The 3d inst. ended the assizes of Loughrea, in the county of Mayo; one man convicted for theft, was sentenced to be burnt in the hand, and suffer a month's imprisonment, or enlist in his majesty's service.

A trial came on before Mr. Serjeant Coppinger, relative to flax-seed, for which a decree had been obtained last summer assizes, and affirmed this spring assizes; it appeared to the court that this seed was of a bad quality, and did not grow to the satisfaction of the purchasers, therefore the former decree was reversed, and the sole loss to revert from hand to hand on the importers. It is to be observed, that this seed was the growth of France.

Several actions were taken against the venders of flaxseed imported into Newport from New-York, in May 1776, on a complaint of a failure in the growth, but on a thorough enquiry the court were of opinion the complaint was groundless and dismissed the parties, for though the quantity it produced was not equal to expectation, yet what there was, was of a good quality.

A boy not above 16 years old, remarkably small for his age, was tried for robbery, and acquitted for want of prosecution: It is believed there never came before a court so remarkable a villain of his age, being guilty of many robberies, and having practised in Dublin and other places in company with a gang. He had a method of house robbery by cutting the putty from the glass, taking out the same, and so getting in; at other times down the chimney, &c. &c.

Monaghan, Sept. 8. Last Saturday ended our assizes, at which the following persons were found guilty:—Michael Quorkan, who was transmitted here with his two sons from London (apprehended there by Sir John Fielding) for the most inhuman murder of Arthur Woods, of Ballymackny, near Carrickmacross, in this county, to be hanged, quartered, and beheaded, on Tuesday the 16th inst. Hugh Quorkan to be executed on Saturday the 15th of November next, for being an assistant in the above murder. John Watson to be executed on Saturday the 15th of November next, for horsestealing.—Bryan Connelly to be publicly whipped on Tuesday the 16th inst. for felony, and to be imprisoned one month. Elinor Smyth to be privately whipped on the same day, for felony.

DUBLIN.

The following unanimous resolution of the general assembly of a very considerable town in this kingdom, is a most honourable testimony of the constituents approbation of the conduct of their late representative in parliament.

At a court of oyer hundred held for the town of Youghall the 22d day of August, 1777.

A letter from James Dennis, Esq; late his majesty's prime serjeant and one of the representatives in parliament for this town, to John Swayne, Swayne, Esq; mayor [desiring him to inform the members of this corporation of his being appointed to fill the place of chief baron of the court of exchequer, whereby his seat in the house of commons was vacated] being read,

Resolved, that the thanks of this court be returned to the lord chief baron; and we assure him that we retain the highest sense of our obligations to him, for his zeal and attention to the interests of this corporation; and altho' nothing could more strongly manifest our high opinion of his abilities and integrity, than our unanimously re-electing him our representative in the present parliament, yet when we reflect on the great national benefit of having upright and learned judges to preside in the courts of judicature, we trust applaud that wisdom which dictated to his majesty the promoting to the dignity of chief baron a person so eminently qualified to fill that station; and if it shall be found that the office of recorder be not incompatible with his present station, we hope for his aid and assistance in that office for many years. In testimony of this, we require that it may be signed and transmitted as the act of this court to the lord chief baron, and a copy entered in the town book.

JOHN SWAYNE, Mayor.

An old beggar woman near Castlenock, who has many years subsisted on the charity of the people in that neighbourhood, but who was by the lower class suspected to have money, went a few days since to Lady Well, a place of devotion near Mulhuddard, and on her return home was stopped by two men who used her in a most cruel manner until she confessed to twenty-four guineas which were sewed up in the binding of her petticoat, and which when she delivered they threw her into a ditch, and made off with their booty.

There is now living at a place called Plasfagh in the co. of Kerry, one Patrick O'Kelly, a labouring man, who has entered the 124th year of his age, is perfectly in his senses, can see without spectacles, and is able to walk ten miles every day. This may at first sight appear incredible, but the person who lends this article of intelligence assures us that the man's age, &c. is known to thousands in and about where he lives, and can be attested by many witnesses.

August 29.] Friday night, the house of Mr. Dudley, of Raheny, was broken open and entered by eleven armed men, who took from him to the amount of near one hundred pounds in cash and bank notes, as also his plate, and the wearing apparel of him and his wife, to a great value. They stayed in the house near an hour, notwithstanding carriages were passing and repassing through the town the whole night, and notwithstanding the Clontarf association against robbers dined within a mile of them; and what is also very remarkable a large fierce mastiff dog was in the yard and never made the least noise. It is said they forced open an upper window, by the help of a ladder which was imprudently left in the yard. The same gang it is thought attacked the house of Mr. Adams near Lord Charlemount's some time before.

Sept. 5.] Saturday morning about three o'clock, the servant boy belonging to Mr. Boileau, of Queen-street, who is at present in England, was alarmed with a noise in the parlour, and on opening the door perceived a fellow, who had forced open the shutters, which were secured with an iron bar, with his hands on the sill, just entering at the window, the boy on his coming up stairs had provided himself with a broad sword, with which he struck the man across the hand, who receiving the blow jumped over the palisadoes and ran off. It is thought he received a severe wound, as there was a great quantity of blood on the rails. And it is hoped that any gentleman to whom he may apply for cure will have him properly secured. What is very remarkable no watchman could be found, though repeatedly called on, by means of which the fellow was suffered to escape.

The Royal Dauphin, capt. Delamotte, from St. Domingo and Cape Nicholas, for Brest, took up at sea, in lat. 59, an oak coffin, which contained the body of an old man in a Turkish dress, with a beard, turban, drawers, and other habiliments of that nation; on examining the body and stomach, which were sewed up, it appeared that the corpse had been embalmed in a curious manner. Capt. Delamotte has shewn this extraordinary object at the town house of Brest, for the inspection of the magistrates and clergy, who have ordered it to be put into a large cabinet, fronted with glass and placed in an upright posture, among the rarities belonging to the surgical academy in that city. From the several valuable ornaments found on the body, particularly a large signet topaz ring, engraved with Arabic characters over the figure of a lion crowned with a plumed turban, which probably was the arms of the deceased, it is conjectured that he was some person of quality who died in Barbary, and was bringing to some place for interment, on board a vessel which was lost.

The several persons who have been convicted before the commissioners of the revenue, of having sold wines or spirits without licenses, have constantly their names published in the news papers, whilst those bakers who have had their bread seized for being deficient in weight are kept concealed from the public obloquy their base practices surely merit.—What can be the reason of their partiality? Surely selling liquors without a license cannot be so great a crime as cheating the poor and indolent of their due weight of bread. Or is it thought that an offence against the revenue merits a more public shame than one against humanity? If the lord mayor, and those juries who seize light provisions, would constantly publish the names of those public defrauders, it would prevent repetitions of that crime more effectually than forty seizures, and point out to the public the honest traders they ought to deal with, and the knaves they should shun.

A very eminent lawyer has given his opinion, that should a land tax be established by the legislature of this kingdom, it will fall upon the original landlords, and not upon the tenants; and that such clauses as have been put into leases to bind lessees in futuro to the payment of casual taxes, are void; this will be a great disappointment to most of the landed gentlemen, who, for some years past, have attempted to bind their tenants, not only to the payment of such taxes as are in being, but which at any time hereafter may be laid on by parliament, and that without any any clause of abatement or allowance to the tenant, though the land is left at the highest rent. This point however will scarcely be determined by arbitration or private opinion, but will, in all probability, be an ample field for the gentlemen of the bar in both kingdoms to glean a harvest out of.

A correspondent informs us, that on Friday se'nnight, at a place called Coolaine, in the co. of Wexford, there happened the following melancholy catastrophe:—A lad, not 15 years of age, (and he supposed an only child) being chastised by his father for some mischief or other, so ungovernably strong was this youth grown in his passion, that he swore he would be immediately revenged on his parents, and accordingly slipped out and went to a turf hole, some little distance from the house, and there very deliberately undressed himself, leaving his clothes carefully aside, which when done, he instantly plunged himself into eternity. —The body in some little time was taken up, but all the means to restore life proved ineffectual. The parents of this unhappy youth are now in a state of insanity; have thrown up their habitation, and are running wild about the country. In this truly melancholy picture, a lesson of instruction may be received by all indulgent parents, who are through tenderness, blind to the foibles of their children, to an extreme degree, until the passions and wild bent of inclination in the child take so strong a root, that it becomes unsheddable in time; and, as in the present instance, dangerous to be resisted.

A poor woman in the village of Crowa Baune, in the co. Wicklow, wife to a sawyer, was lately brought to bed of three children, all boys, after a barrenness of above thirty years. What renders this extraordinary instance, of fertility the more remarkable is, that the husband is 68, and the woman 56 years old. A neighbouring lady of distinction has made a handsome present to the old couple, with a promise of renewing it every year, to enable them to support so unexpected an increase of family.

Thursday last an extraordinary species of fish was taken in our bay, along with some herrings it had pursued for prey; we can't learn that any of our fishermen ever saw one of the kind before, it measures five feet in length, and about eighteen inches in breadth, just under the jaw, where it had two large fins, and two more where it begins to grow small; its head is somewhat circular and flat, its tail pointed; after being taken it discharged a great quantity of herrings. It lay some time on Aston's quay. We hear the skin will be preserved and stuffed, which will be a rare curiosity.

Early Thursday morning Sept. 11, a duel was fought in the fields at the back of Merriion-square, between two young gentlemen; when the parties met, the seconds strove to reconcile and settle the unhappy dispute, but so inflexible was one of the young gentlemen that all their arguments proved ineffectual, they therefore took their ground, and the last mentioned person fired without receiving a return, on which he called frequently on his antagonist to do the same, which he very spiritedly refused, saying that as he had given him every satisfaction that a gentleman ought to do, he hoped he was then satisfied; but the other still insisting on the gentleman's firing his reserved shot, he fired it in the air, and then said he hoped the other was content; when being again answered in the negative, they both took their ground again with the reserved pistols, when after the gentleman received his antagonist's fire in the same manner as before, he then asked him if he was satisfied, to which the other replied he was not, whereupon the gentleman fired, when the ball grazed along the other's forehead without doing any other damage than taking away part of the hat and cutting the skin. The seconds again interfered, and put an amicable end to the dispute. The quarrel originated at the Rotunda on Wednesday evening, where one of the parties behaved with some indelicacy to a lady.

The two grenadiers who were to have been executed on Saturday morning, at Gallows-hill, for robbing Mr. Geale, were rescued in the following manner. A small party of soldiers, conducting two men handcuffed together came to the door of Kilmainham gaol, and demanded entrance for two prisoners. The door was no sooner opened but another party of about fifty rushed forward, secured the entrance and brought out the two condemned grenadiers, who they set at liberty. One of them went four miles from Dublin, but unfortunately for him, returned to visit a girl with whom he cohabited, when she immediately betrayed him to some who were in search of him, who conducted him to gaol, and he was executed on Saturday afternoon pursuant to his sentence. The other is not yet taken.

Proclamation,

By John Burgoyne, Esq; &c. &c. &c.

Camp at Putnam-Creek, June 29, 1777.

THE forces entrusted to my command are designed to act in concert, and upon a common principle with the numerous armies and fleets which already display, in every quarter of America, the power, the justice, and when properly sought, the mercy of the King.

The cause in which the British arms are thus exerted, applies to the most affecting interests of the human heart; and the military servants of the Crown, at first called forth for the sole purpose of restoring the rights of the Constitution, now combine with love of their country, and duty to their Sovereign, the other extensive incitements which spring from a due sense of the general privileges of mankind.

To the eyes and ears of the temperate part of the public, and to the breasts of suffering thousands in the Provinces, be the melancholy appeal, whether the present unnatural rebellion has not been made a foundation for the completest system of tyranny, that ever God in his displeasure suffered for a time to be exercised over a froward and stubborn generation? Arbitrary imprisonment, confiscation of property, persecution, and torture, unprecedented in the inquisitions of the Romish church, are among the palpable enormities which verify the affirmative. These are inflicted by assemblies and committees, who dare to profess themselves friends to liberty upon the most quiet subjects, without distinction of age or sex, for the sole crime, often for the sole suspicion, of having adhered in principle to the government under which they were born, and to which,

by every tie, divine and human, they owe allegiance. To consummate these shocking proceedings, the profanation of Religion is added to the most profligate prostitution of common reason; the consciences of men are set at naught, and multitudes are compelled not only to bear arms, but also to swear subjection to an usurpation they abhor.

Animated by these considerations, at the head of troops in the full powers of health, discipline, and valour, determined to strike where necessary and anxious to spare where possible, I, by these presents, invite and exhort all persons, in all places where the progress of this army may point, and, by the blessing of God, I will extend it far, to maintain such a conduct as may justify me in protecting their lands, habitations, and families; the intention of this Address is to hold forth security, not depredation, to the country.

To those whom spirit and principle may induce to partake the glorious task of redeeming their countrymen from dungeon, and re-establishing the blessing of legal government, I offer encouragement and employment; and, upon the first intelligence of their associations, I will find means to assist their undertakings.

The domestic, the industrious, the infirm, and even the timid inhabitants, I am desirous to protect, provided they remain quietly at their houses; that they do not suffer their cattle to be removed, nor their corn or forage to be secreted or destroyed; that they do not break up their bridges or roads, nor by any other acts, directly or indirectly, endeavour to obstruct the operations of the King's troops, or supply or assist those of the enemy.

Every species of provision brought to my camp will be paid for at an equitable rate, and in solid coin. In consciousness of Christianity, my royal Master's clemency, and the honour of soldiery, I have dwelt upon this invitation, and wished for more persuasive terms to give it impression; and let not people be led to disregard it, by considering their distance from the immediate situation of my camp. I have but to give stretch to the Indian forces under my direction, and they amount to thousands, to overtake the hardened enemies of Great-Britain and America.—I consider them the same, wherever they may lurk.

If, notwithstanding these endeavours, and sincere inclination to effect them, the phrenzy of hostility should remain, I trust I shall stand acquitted in the eyes of God and man, in denouncing and executing the vengeance of the State against the wilful outcasts.

The messengers of justice and of wrath wait them in the field; and desolation, famine, and every concomitant horror that a reluctant, but indispensable prosecution of military duty must occasion, will bar the way to their return.

Description of fashionable dresses.

The fashionable dress for the present season; for ladies travelling or riding on horseback; consists of a jacket and coat, commonly called a habit: the make and shape is more delicate than ever we can describe, for fashions alter almost every month, or week. The most prevailing at present, is the Artois colour, nearly the same as the gentlemen's riding coats, with only this difference, the lady's is buttoned at the breast with a silver tassel and loop; the cape falls, and all the shoulders turned over with the same colour as the waistcoat or the lining of the dress; 1, 2, 3, the tassel, or buttons in front; the sleeve is the Artois, as the last we have seen from Paris; the buttons chiefly steel, with a star, or cut diamond in the middle.

An adjournment of the quarter sessions was held at the Tholfel, when Charles Nalty, charged with feloniously taking several articles of value, from Mr. Caleb Paine, was tried and acquitted, the evidence not attending to prosecute. Several other persons were tried for different felonies, some of whom were found guilty and burnt in the hand; the rest were acquitted: after which the court adjourned to Saturday.

A captain O'Hara, an officer in the French service, being one day in a coffee-house in Paris, heard a French gentleman, a brother soldier, swear most vehemently, and curse his bad luck at play. Captain O'Hara, who, by the bye, was as great a swearer as any military hero in the world, walked up to him, and asked how he could dare to swear in his presence; the other, who had as much fire as O'Hara, and did not like to be catechized, desired to be informed by what authority he dared to question him: O'Hara replied, Sir, I am God's friend; and by the immortal God, and his eternal Son Jesus Christ, no man shall ever profane his sacred name with impunity before me, while I have a sword to avenge his cause. The French officer, resenting this behaviour, drew, but unfortunately received a mortal wound in the conflict, from God's Irish Champion, who was ever after better known in the regiment by the name of God's friend, than that of O'Hara.

Thursday night two soldiers, belonging to the 66th regiment of foot were lodged in Kilmainham goal, on the information of one of their comrades, charged with being concerned in breaking into said jail on Friday night the 12th instant, and setting at liberty Brown and Cameron, then under sentence of death for highway robbery. One of the above prisoners is first cousin to Cameron, who is not yet retaken.

There have been upwards of twenty men committed to different prisons in this city on the above evidence.

Friday evening a female sharper decoyed a child into a lonesome entry in Cook-street, and stripped it of all its apparel, with which she got clear off before the fact was discovered; it is probable she is the same that robbed some children of their ear-rings, as mentioned in the papers last week: We hope her inhuman career will be at length stopped by exposing her naked, and soundly flogging her, as an atonement to the injured innocents.

The steeple of our University, from its want of elevation, being found inadequate to the height and grandeur of the new front, is shortly to be taken down, and built either over the entrance of the College, (a sufficient octagon base having with a view to this design been formed at the erection of the new front) or raised on the ground where the chapel now stands, which edifice is also to be removed removed from that side, and with a most magnificent theatre now building, will form the East side of the first court; between these two piles a space will be left to give a prospective of the proposed steeple, or of some other capital piece of architecture. This court which forms an oblong square of 220 feet, by 130, will then exhibit one of the most finished areas in Europe.

It seems not a little surprizing, notwithstanding a late example of justice, in the punishment of Crignion, for opening letters, put into the Post-office, and the trial of a young gentleman for the same offence, whose inexperience and family connections recommended him to mercy, that any person could now be found capable of renewing to dangerous a practice. Yet, shocking to relate! two packets belonging to different houses in this city, directed for Corke, with cash, notes, and lottery tickets, to a considerable amount, were stolen out of the post-office a few days ago, together with their contents. The consequences attending frauds of this kind, committed in the very bosom of national security, must strike every honest person with horror, and be the ruin of that peace, order and punctuality, so necessary to a trading people, for whose ease and protection the duties arising from the carriage of letters were originally granted.

Last Monday lord Harcourt amusing himself in the demesne of his seat at Nuneham, England, with a favourite dog, the animal by some accident fell into a deep well, and his lordship endeavouring to save him, had the misfortune to lose his equilibrium and fell into the same pit on his head, in such a manner, that it is thought he was instantly suffocated. His body was not discovered for six hours, when all hopes of recovering him were intirely lost. His death has caused real affliction to all his acquaintance, and to none more than his domestics and dependants who are inconsolable for the loss of so good a master and so worthy a patron.

By what has happened more than once lately in Dublin, one would be led to imagine that an heretical sect named Adamites, who appeared in the kingdom of Bohemia, and in several other parts of Germany about two centuries ago, going about naked, and under the pretence of restoring things to their pristine state of nature, committing every sort of excess, was revived here. Last Saturday morning about two o'clock a disorderly group of persons, supposed to be about twenty in number, a great part of which were stark naked, patrolled the liberty of St. Sepulchre's and St. Peter's parish, and having driven from their stands such watchmen as they met as impediments to their career, were proceeding in a most riotous manner through the streets, when the watch of St. Peter's reinforced by a party of St. Bridget's, attacked them in Bishop-street, front and rear, but the rioters being armed with sticks and incessantly throwing stones, defended themselves and dispersed their assailants, wounding many of them, particularly a watchman of St. Peter's, named John Spring, whose right arm was broke in a very terrible manner. The poor man, who has a family, was next morning sent to the Inns-quay infirmary.

Extract of a Letter from Troppau (Silesia) August 15.

* A few days ago the inhabitants of a neighbouring village were dreadfully alarmed by thunder: They saw the lightning at first slide down the steeple, then divide itself into several parts, which joining again, ran down to the foundation by some wire that had been fixed to a bell. At the same time a dreadful clap of thunder was heard, the atmosphere grew dark, and the people seeing every thing passage a terrible storm withdrew to their houses, so that none of them saw what was passing while their fear kept them within, but they heard a most horrid noise.—When the violence of the thunder had abated, the most daring amongst them went out, and found that there was not a house that had not been stripped of its roof; the wooden spire of the steeple was torn from its place, and left lying on the church, which had not been otherwise damaged. Some statues of wood that adorned a kind of a Mount Calvary, were not to be found; and a chimney, with part of the roof next to it, was turned about from the south to the west. A labouring man was sleeping in a hay loft with his coat on his feet, when the lightning unroofed the loft, carried away the coat, which was not found for three days, and never awakened the man. Luckily not a life was lost. Naturalists say that the thunder could produce all these effects without the help of an earthquake."

Some Account of Lieutenant General Burgoyne. With an elegant Engraving.

LIEUTENANT General Burgoyne, son of the late, and brother to the present Sir Roger Burgoyne, was born in the year 1727, and is descended from a very ancient family, to which John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, uncle to king Richard the Second, in the year 1387 granted the two extensive manors of Sutton and Potton, by this very extraordinary deed,

I, John of Gaunt,
Dogive and do grant,
Unto Roger Burgoyne,
And the heirs of his loin,
All Sutton and Potton
Until the world's rotten.

Lieutenant General Burgoyne very early embraced a military life, and rose gradually to the high rank he now possesses. On the 8th of October, in the year 1762, he had his first commission as colonel, and on the 18th of March, 1763, had given to him the 16th, or Queen's Regiment of light dragoons now in America. On the 25th of May, 1772, he was made a major general, and was raised to be lieutenant general Sept. 1777, and is governor of Fort William, in North-Britain.—He is also a member of parliament for the borough of Preston in Lancashire.

Hib. Mag. Oct. 1777.

Lieutenant General Burgoyne is married to lady Charlotte Stanley, sister to the earl of Derby. He is also as celebrated for his taste in polite literature as for his martial deeds. The Maid of the Oaks, performed with great success, was written by him, and he planned the celebrated Fete Champetre, given by lord Stanley at the Oaks, in Surry, (the feat of the general) on his marriage with lady Betty Hamilton, daughter of the duchess of Argyll.

An account of the festival was given in our Magazine for the year 1774, page 405; and of the Maid of the Oaks in the same Magazine, page 737, and 746. A prologue written by this gentleman, and spoken at Boston, before the tragedy of Zara, performed by officers of the army for a public charity, with the epilogue, by the same author, were inserted in page 279, 280, of our Magazine, for the year 1776.

The general's opinions relative to the American dispute may be gathered from his conduct in parliament and in America, for which we refer our readers to our Magazine for 1776, and the present year, under the heads of History of the British Parliament, and Proceedings in America.

On Operas.

I Confess I am not displeased with the magnificence of operas. The machinery has something that is surprizing, the music in some parts is charming, the whole together seems wonderful; but it must be granted me also, that this wonderful is very tedious, for, where the mind has so little to do, there the senses must of necessity languish: after the first pleasure that the surprize gave them is over, the eyes are taken up, and at length grow weary of being fixed upon the same object. In the beginning of the concerts, we observe the justness of their concords, and, amidst all the varieties that unite to make the sweetness of the harmony, nothing escapes us; but it is not long before the instruments stun us, and the music is nothing else to our ears but a confounded sound, that suffers nothing to be distinguished. How now is it possible to avoid being tired with such an entertainment? Where there is nothing in the music to charm, nor in the words to please, the soul, fatigued by a long attention, wherein nothing is found to affect it, seeks some relief within itself; the mind, which in vain expected to be entertained with the shew, either gives way to idle musing, or is dissatisfied that it has nothing to employ it. In a word, the fatigue is so universal, that every one wishes himself out of the house, and the only comfort left to the poor spectators, is the hope of seeing the shew soon after.

Another reason why commonly I soon grow weary at operas is, that I never yet saw any which appeared not to me despicable, both as to the contrivance of the subject and the poetry. Now it is in vain to charm the ears, or flatter the eyes, if the mind be not satisfied; for my soul, being in better intelligence with my mind than with my senses, struggles against the impressions which it may receive, or at least does not give an agreeable consent to them, without which even the most delightful objects can never afford me any great pleasure. A representation set off with music, dances, machines and decorations, is a pompous piece of folly, but it is still a folly; though the embroidery is rich, yet the ground it is wrought upon is such wretched stuff that it offends the sight. There is also another thing in operas so contrary to nature, that I cannot be reconciled to it, and that is the singing the whole piece from beginning to end, as if the persons represented had ridiculously agreed to treat in music both the most common and most important affairs of life; is it to be imagined that a master calls his servant, or sends him on an errand, singing? that one friend imparts a secret to another singing? that men deliberate in council singing? and orders in time of battle are given singing, and that men are melodiously killed with sword, pike, and musket? This is the downright way to lose the life of representation, which, without doubt, is preferable to that of harmony; for harmony ought to be no more than a bare attendant, and the great masters of the stage have introduced it as pleasing, not as necessary, after they have performed all that relates to the subject and discourse; in the mean time, our thoughts run more on the musician than the hero in the opera; the mind not being able to conceive a hero that sings, thinks only of the composer that set the song.

I pretend not, however, to banish all manner of singing from the stage; there are some things which ought to be sung, and others that may be sung without trespassing against reason or decency; vows, prayers, praises, sacrifices, and generally all that relates to the service of the gods, have been in all nations and at all times. Tender and mournful passions express themselves naturally in a sort of querulous tone; the expression of love in its birth; the irresolution of a soul agitated by different motions, are proper matters for stanzas, as stanzas are for music. Every one knows that the chorus was introduced upon the Grecian theatre; and it is not to be denied, but that with equal reason it might be brought upon ours. This ought to be the distinction: in my opinion, all that belongs to conversation, all that relates to intrigues and affairs, all that belongs to council and action, is proper for actors to repeat, but ridiculous in the mouth of musicians to sing. The Grecians made admirable tragedies, where they had some singing: the Italians and French make vile ones, where they sing all.—Would you know what an opera is? I tell you: It is an odd medley of poetry and music, wherein the poet and musician, equally confined one by the other, take a world of pains to compose a wretched performance; not but that you may find agreeable words and very fine airs in operas; but you will more certainly find at length a dislike of the verses, where the genius of the poet is so cramped, the spectators cloyed with the singing, and the musicians spent by too long a service. Did I think myself capable of giving counsel to persons of quality, who delight in the theatre, I would advise them to take up their old relish for good comedies, where dancing and music might be introduced, that would not in the least wound the representation. Thus enough might be found to satisfy both the senses and the mind, wanting neither the charms of singing in a bare representation, nor the beauty of acting in a long-continued course of music.

The Italian singing is either feigned, or at least forced, for want of knowing exactly the nature or degree of the passions. They burst out into laughter, rather than sing, when they would express any joy. If they sigh, you shall hear violent sighs formed in the throat, and not sighs, which unawares escape from the passion of an amorous heart. Instead of a doleful tone, they fall into the strongest exclamations; the tears of absence are like the mournings at a funeral; sadness becomes sorrowful in their mouths; that they roar rather than complain, and sometimes express a languishing passion as a natural fainting.

As to machines, they may satisfy the curiosity of ingenious men, that love mechanical inventions, but they will never please persons of good judgment in the theatre; the more they surprize, the more they divert the mind from attending to the discourse; and the more admirable they are, the less room they leave us to be touched and charmed with the music. The ancients made no use of machines, but where there was a necessity of bringing in some god. Nay, the poets themselves were generally laughed at for suffering themselves to be reduced to that necessity. If men love to be at expences, let them lay out their money upon fine decorations, of which the use is more natural and more agreeable than that of machines. Antiquity, which made the Gods no strangers to the poets, and exposed them even to their chimney corners; antiquity, I say, as vain and credulous at it was, exposed them nevertheless, but very rarely, upon the stage. Now the belief of them is gone, the Italians in their operas have brought the Pagan gods again into the world, and have not scrupled to amuse men with these ridiculous vanities, together with a confused assembly of shepherds, heroes, enchanters, apparitions, furies, and devils, only to make their pieces look great, by the introduction of that dazzling and surprizing wonderful. In fine, the constitution of the opera must appear very extravagant to those who are true judges of the probable and wonderful; nevertheless, one runs a risk of having his judgment called in question, if he dares to shew it; but should not we resolve to strike in with good sense, tho' so much forsaken, and to follow reason, though in disgrace, with as much zeal, as if it were still in vogue, and if for no other motive than that operas tend directly to ruin the finest theatrical exhibition, I mean the drama, than which nothing is more proper to elevate the soul, or more capable to form the mind.

Dodd's Thoughts in Prison.

EVERY thing relative to the late unhappy Dr. Dodd, has, for some months past attracted the public attention: his Thoughts in Prison cannot therefore be deemed unworthy of our notice, even though they should not hold the first rank among literary compositions.—These Thoughts are delivered in blank verse, and divided into five parts; viz. The imprisonment, the retrospect, public punishment, the trial, futurity:—and afford several strokes of nature and poetry of a class superior to any found in his former productions, and which could little have been expected from the circumstances under which they were composed.

The following lines, for example, with which the first part opens are not unworthy of Dr. Young, whom the author seems, through the whole, to have in his eye.

- “ My friends are gone! Harsh on its sullen hinge “ Grates the dread door: the massy bolts respond
“ Tremendous to the surly keepers touch.
“ The dire keys clang: with movement dull and slow, “ While their behest the ponderous locks perform: [care
“ And, fasten'd firm, the object of their
“ Is left to solitude—to sorrow left!
“ But wherefore fasten'd?—Oh still stronger bonds
“ Than bolts, or locks, or doors of molten brass,
“ To solitude and sorrow would consign
“ His anguish'd soul, and prison him, tho' free!
“ For whither should he fly, or where produce
“ In open day, and to the golden sun,
“ His hapless head? Whence every laurel torn,
“ On his bald brow sits grinning infamy;
“ And, all in sportive triumph, twines around [grace!
“ The keen, the stinging adders of dis-“ Yet what's disgrace with man? or all the stings
“ Of pointed scorn? What the tumultuous voice [shafts
“ Of erring multitudes? or what the
“ Of keenest malice, level'd from the bow
“ Of human inquisition?—if the God “ Who knows the heart looks with com-placence down

" Upon the struggling victim; and behold
 " Repentance bursting from the earth-bent eye,
 " And faith's red cross held closely to the breast!"

The description of Newgate, and the pernicious effects of promiscuous imprisonment, in the third part of this performance, are also strongly painted.

" Ah, mournful dwelling! destin'd ne'er to see
 " The human face divine in placid smiles
 " And innocent gladness cloath'd: des-tin'd to hear
 " No sounds of genial, heart-reviving joy!
 " The sons of sorrow only are the guests,
 " And these the only music of their sighs,
 " Thick sobbing from the tempest of their breasts!
 " Ah, mournful dwelling! never hast thou seen,
 " Amidst the numerous wretched ones imprison'd
 " Within thy stone-girt compass, wretch
 " So lost, so ruin'd, as the man who falls
 " Thus in deep anguish on thy ruthless floor, [tears,
 " And bathes it with the torrent of his

" Oh for a moment's pause—a moment's rest,
 " To calm my hurried spirits! to recall
 " Reflection's staggering pilot to the helm,
 " And still the madd'ning whirlwind in my soul!
 " It cannot be!—The din increases round:
 " Rough voices rage discordant; dreadful shrieks!
 " Hoarse imprecations dare the Thun-derer's ire,
 " And call down swift damnation! thousand chains [bursts
 " In dismal notes clink mirthful! roaring
 " Of loud obstreperous laughter, and strange choirs
 " Of gutturals, dissonant and rueful, vex " E'en the dull ear of midnight! Neither rest, [mind
 " Nor peaceful calm, nor silence, of the " Refreshment sweet! nor interval or pause [is found
 " From morn to eve, from eve to morn
 " Amidst the surges of this troubled sea!
 " Oh my rack'd brain;—oh my distracted heart! [grows
 " The tumult thickens: wild disorder
 " More painfully confus'd!—And can it be?
 " Is this the mansion—this the house ordain'd
 " For recollection's solemn purpose? This
 " The place from whence full many a sitting soul

" (The work of deep repentance—
 mighty work,
 " Still, still be perform'd) must mount
 to God,
 " And give its dread account!—Is this the place
 " Ordain'd by justice to confine a while
 " The foe to civil order, and return
 " Reform'd and moraliz'd to social life!
 " This den of drear confusion, wild uproar,
 " Of mingled riot, and unblushing vice!
 " This school of infamy! from whence improv'd
 " In every hardy villainy, returns
 " More harden'd, more a foe to God and man, (lap;
 " The miscreant, nurs'd in its infectious
 " All cover'd with its pestilential spots,
 " And breathing death and poison where-fo'er (den
 " He stalks contagious! from the lion's
 " A lion more ferocious, as confin'd!

The author afterwards pursues the same subject thus, in language yet more animated and striking:

— Hither then,
 " Ye sons of sympathy, of wisdom;
 friends
 " To order, and compassion to the state
 " And to your fellow-beings; hither come
 " To this wild realm of uproar; hither haste,
 " And see the reformation, see the good
 " Wrought by confinement in a den like this!
 " View with unblushing front, undaunt-ed heart,
 " The callous harlot in the open day
 " Administer her poisons, midst a rout
 " Scarcely less bold or poisoned than herself!
 " View, and with eyes that will not hold the tear,
 " In gentle pity gushing for such griefs—
 " View the young wretch, as yet un-fledg'd in vice,
 " Just shackled here, and by the veteran throng,
 " In every infamy and every crime
 " Grey and insulting, quickly taught to dare,
 " Harden'd like them in guilt's opprobrious school!
 " Each bashful sentiment incipient grace,
 " Each yet remorseful thought of right and wrong [heart!
 " Murder'd and buried in his darken'd " Hear how those veterans clank—even jovial clank—
 " Such is obduracy in vice their chains!
 " Hear, how with curses hoarse and vauntings bold,
 " Each

“ Each spirits up, encourages, and dares
 “ His desperate fellow to more desperate proofs

“ Of future hardy enterprise; to plans
 “ Of death and ruin!

In a word, this performance, which abounds with many salutary reflections, both of a public and private nature, exhibits a very amiable picture of Dr. Dodd's mind and heart.

To the Editors of the Hibernian Magazine.

Gentlemen,

I Am one of those despised beings, termed Old Maids, and having no family to take up my attention, employ the most of my time in reading: and among other works, am a constant reader of your very useful Magazine. I have often wondered none of your correspondents have yet employed their pens in our behalf, to inform the world what grievance we old maids labour under. The only mention made of us is by an ingenious (a disappointed old batchelor I suppose) gentleman, who in April Magazine, proposes instead of alleviating our misfortunes, a tax to be levied on us, and will not even allow us the common privilege of our continuing young girls till we own ourselves thirty years of age, but fixes the commencement of our old maidship at twenty-seven. Now, Sir, I doubt not but when you consider the deplorable situation of many of our sisterhood, you must confess, a tax on old batchelors to be applied to our use much more equitable, than our being obliged to support a war, which many of us cannot in conscience approve.

The laws of our country for the relief of the distressed are many; but in Monarchies the most absolute, I do not find a tax levied on the unfortunate, for no other reason than that they are such; but certainly, gentlemen, you will allow a tax for the relief of the unfortunate, to be paid by those who caused their misfortunes, to be just and equitable.

I appeal to the ladies of our sisterhood throughout the nation, of every sect, denomination, quality or rank in life, whether they do not look on themselves as unhappy on account of their passing such a length of time in vain, and whether they do not imagine they are possessed of the qualifications requisite for good wives, mothers, &c. and even to the gentlemen. Do you not own there are many of our class thus qualified? Why then are we thus not only neglected, but despised, for being slighted? That we are neglected, proceeds chiefly for want of large fortunes, without which with a wife, the gentleman imagines he cannot cut such a figure as his neighbour Mr. Such-a-one, who, but a few years ago, purchased that fine estate near his, by the profits of a successful trade; and thus his honour is in danger of becoming inferior in consequence to a base-born plebeian.—The trader is yet much harder to deal with than the gentleman: (I write from experience, and from a place where successful trade, and its concomitant train of mean grovelling Dutch ideas, reigns) the frugal youth is brought up in such ideas of thrift, and taught so many proverbs of industry, that the greatest dread of his life is lest he should be taken in; that want of fortune is want of every requisite to render the married state happy, according to his low idea of happiness.

Thus are we neglected, because we want a few guineas of what the judicious traders, and marriage brokers call a good match; but those thrifty sagacious gentlemen never consider that there are many without a fortune with whom they would sooner grow rich than with others, tho' possessed of thousands. She who possesses a great fortune, must have her suitable settlement, pin money, &c.—These we do not pretend to.—Thus we immediately balance our want of fortune, and entirely depending on our husbands, to please him is our interest as well as duty.—Besides settlements, the lady of great fortune, in balls, assemblies, plays, masquerades, and in cities, puts her husband to much greater expence than the interest of her fortune will indemnify, and our ladies here in the country tread on their heels, or as Shakespear better expresses it

“ The age is grown so picked that the toe of the peasant comes so near the heel of the courtier, he galls his kibe.”

I own there are some of us indigent ladies, even in this town that are so very polite, and brought up so much in high life, as to fright their equals from paying their addresses, till their fortunes be more ponderous than at present. Such as these no doubt will be placed among the sisterhood deservedly, but to draw general characters from particular cases is ungenerous and unjust.

Seeing our want of fortunes have been the occasion of the greatest number of us, thus lying on hands, how can your sagacious anti-old-maiden correspondent, imagine so great a number of ladies of great fortune in the nation, belong to our class, I doubt the gentleman is wrong in his calculation. But that there are many old batchelors of fortune in Ireland, none will deny, and I hope none will deny the justice of their being obliged to contribute to

our continuing in the station of life we were born in, and in which we lived in the days of our worthy parents; as it is very mortifying to a person in her decline to be obliged to appear in a lower sphere, particularly as in this country (Ireland in general) trade is much more degrading in a woman than a man. The proposed tax to be as follows:

Every batchelor above thirty-five years of age possessed of upwards of 60l. per annum, to pay at least 6 per cent of his annuity to the purpose intended by the act. A trader to be taxed in like manner in proportion to his yearly profits,—except such batchelor has actually made honourable proposals to three different ladies before that time, but if it can be proved that said batchelor paid his addresses to a lady of great fortune more for her fortune than person, said batchelor to lose the benefit of said address.

Supposing the product of this tax to amount to 100,000l. yearly, that 10,000l. be given to the city and county of Dublin, 3000l. to the city, and 7000l. to the county of Corke, and the residue to be divided among the other counties in proportion to the number of inhabitants in each county.

That in each city, great town, assize town, &c. a large and elegant house be built with gardens, and a library, and at least one thousand pounds yearly settled on said house. That in each of those houses (call them nunneries, colleges, convents, or what you please) a matron be appointed to have the oversight thereof, and that said matron be allowed 60l. per annum, for the board of forty old maids, and young ladies that are orphans, and have not three hundred pounds fortune, but who have been brought up genteely, and have received a good education, the surplus of the thousand pounds yearly, and the interest of the several small fortunes each lady possesses, to be divided equally between the whole number, making no difference between the matron (who should be chosen by the rest) and the others. That the ladies of the convent should have free ingress, egress, and regress, to all balls, assemblies, and polite companies in the town, &c. where said convent is established. If any lady of small fortune would chuse to be of the sisterhood, that she be received in the convent at the rate of 16l. a year for her board, which is quite sufficient among so great a number, though much less than what is usually paid for boarding in a genteel family.

Every lady shall have permission to quit the convent when she pleases.

Thus, gentlemen, those old batchelors, those mere blanks in the creation, would be obliged to rid themselves of a little useless dross (useless to them indeed) to support an institution, the utility of which must appear conspicuous to all who reads my scheme, as for us old maids, to us it would only be benevolence many would think, supposing us incapable of service to the community in general, but besides each convent being a good nursery for wives for old widowers, &c. we will endeavour to educate our young ladies (all school education is supposed to be over with them ere they come to us) in every duty belonging to wives of inferior gentlemen and traders, as to balance their want of fortune, and any sensible young man, who wants a useful and industrious partner, will not be at a loss where to apply.

Those few hints, gentlemen, I submit to your consideration, and conclude your very humble servant,

An indigent old maid of quality.
Lisburn.

To the Editor of the Hibernian Magazine.

Gentlemen,

OF the many grievances under which this poor oppressed nation labours, I look upon the present mode of maintaining the parochial clergy as one of the heaviest, especially to the lower class of yeomanry and peasantry. 'Tis said our clergy are supported by the tythe of the produce of the land after the manner of the priests of the Israelites in the first ages of the world. I shall not attempt to prove (as the Quakers pretend to do) that in this gospel age, all tythes are unlawful, and that we should have a free gospel ministry; as we do not allow our clergy to follow any trade or mechanic occupation, a suitable maintenance must be allowed them out of the labour of their disciples, nothing is more reasonable; but I cannot imagine that in a parish consisting of 200 families (many in Ireland contain 1000) it is requisite that the minister should have the produce of the labour of 20, or why what supports half a dozen industrious farmers, each with a large family, may not be adequate to the necessities of their learned teacher, who only labouring for the good of the souls of his parishioners, cannot be suspected to have any temporal designs in view, but having food and raiment in sufficiency and decency, shall be therewith content: However, were they only to have the tythe or tenth part, I should not hesitate to pay it with cheerfulness, but when I and many of my neighbours pay at least one fourth of our worldly goods for hearing a sermon preached once or twice a month: I own

I think

I think it unreasonable, and cannot but wish some more suitable mode of taxation for this purpose were followed. When I lay my case before you, ye will not think I have been mistaken in saying I pay the fifth part of my substance to the minister. I have a farm of one hundred acres Irish, in the county Antrim, for which I pay a tenant of the earl of Antrim, 100l. per annum, the greatest part of this farm I have cultivated, which produces on an average 4l. per acre, of which the minister has 8s. per acre, for the 50 acres under corn and hay, which amounts to 20l. and about 2s. per acre in lambs, and a small tax we pay for cows on the other 50 acres, which amounts to 5l. in the whole 25l. for labour and manure I pay about 35s. an acre, which reduces my profits to 100l. per annum, which if I paid no tythes would be 125l. Perhaps, gentlemen, you will think my case very hard, but how much more severe is that of many of my neighbours, who hold at will from five to ten acres, at the rent of 25s. and some 30s. per acre?

In the dispensation of the Jewish law, the poor were allowed a maintenance out of the tythe, besides its supporting a whole tribe or twelfth part of the people. But now in this gospel-day, the poor themselves, are obliged to pay one fourth of the fruit of their labour to a priest, who cares only for the fleece of his flock, many of whom are not to be seen at church above once or twice in the year, from the great distance at which it is built. In the parish in which I dwell there is no church, but it is united, for the emolument of the minister, to the next parish, the church of which is built at the extremity of the parish for the convenience of a great man's house and the parsonage house in the neighbourhood. The two parishes contain 875 families, of which 206 are of the established religion, the rest dissenters; of those 206, one hundred and eleven families live in this parish, which has no church, and many of them nine miles from the next church; judge then, gentlemen, how those people can bring their families to church in the winter season, and if they go not to church, they may remain untaught, many not having bibles in their houses, and as for the minister we never see him, except when he comes to enquire into the conduct of his tythe proctors, not but, that he makes a charitable allowance for those gentlemen oppressing the poor parishioners, lest they should deprive him of his due.

Some time ago, two or three farmers in my neighbourhood, proposed to the minister, to sit up an out house, in which the curate might read prayers to us every Sunday in winter, as there were several families of the established religion in our neighbourhood, who could not conveniently go six miles of a wet morning to church, but would very willingly go one or two; but the great man was pleased to reject our proposals, as it would oblige him to preach in the parish church, which is only open every Sunday morning; now I would query of you, gentlemen, is it reasonable I should pay 25l. per annum for the instruction I do not receive? or why we who have no church among us, should pay as much as if we had? For my part, I think it would be much better if in these parishes, we had two curates instead of one rector, we then might go to church every Sunday for 80l. per annum; instead of paying between 6 and 700l. for nothing.

In this neighbourhood are two dissenters meeting-houses, to one of which I always bring my family, tho' I had much rather go to church; I hear that in many parts of the nation where there are no dissenters, several are farther from church than I am, and if religiously inclined, they may be easily persuaded to go to mass, what will be the consequence in a few years. For my part, I had rather become a disciple of Calvin, Mr. Westly, or Mr. G. Fox, than of that great man the Pope. But if our clergy were put upon shorter allowance, and obliged to perform their duty more faithfully, many would be preserved from joining either, especially the latter, and already we know the ill effects of their encreasing in number. If you think these lines from the pen of an illiterate farmer worth a place in your Magazine, you will much oblige him by inserting them as soon as convenient, and you may be assured that however deficient in point of style, they are the sentiments of many thousands of

The Fashionable Head-Dresses.

THE dresses of our ladies have inclined very much to the Persian and Turkish, since the taste for masquerades as a fashionable amusement has prevailed. Even the Italian robes and the ladies court dresses partake of and are derived from the Turkish.

No alteration having happened in the dress of our ladies or gentlemen in the course of this month, except that the latter have gone from one extreme to another, and now wear enormous large hats.

A Description of Roscrea.

ROSCREA, a market town in the co. of Tipperary, and province of Munster, in Ireland, is built on a rising ground, and almost surrounded by a river, has one market weekly, on Thursday, and two fairs annually, one on the 21st of June, and another on the 29th of October; the country to the S. W. of it is mountainous, but to the north east and north west, is pretty level, situated 59 miles S. W. of Dublin. It contains about 300 houses, which are very full of inhabitants, who are estimated at about 1500 souls; it has three streets besides lanes: the two principal of which are pretty well built and inhabited, most by shopkeepers, the rest are pretty regular, but the houses for most part indifferently built.

There has been a barrack in it a few years ago for one company of foot, nothing of which remains at present but part of the walls.

In one of the streets is a large old castle, flanked with two round towers, supposed to be built in the reign of king John. Within its walls is a very fine house, built by John Deamor, Esq: deceased, which at present, together with the town, belongs to his son John Deamor, Esq: of Kame, in Dorsetshire, (England). About 200 yards to the west of this building is the ruins of a Franciscan Convent, built by Mulrony O'Carrol, formerly one of the kings of Munster, in Ireland, in the year of our Lord 1490. Nothing at present of the ancient grandeur of this building remains entire but the steeple, which with the fragments of some pieces of carving, exhibits the elegant taste and masterly design of the architect, that few buildings of its size can vie with it either in elegance of workmanship or beauty, but like most others of the kind, we may say with the poet, —It falls a ruin to the wreck of time.

The round tower in which the church bell is hung, is an elegant stone building about 60 feet high, well built, stands east of the town, about 15 yards from the parish church.

The parish church is an oblong building, has nothing very grand or elegant worth mentioning, but is a good country church, stands east of the town, and is counted the most ancient building in it.

This town is remarkable in history, on account of a battle fought near to it, by its inhabitants and the Danes, in which the latter were entirely routed, and thousands of their troops left dead on the field, together with their general. For the better understanding of which I'll insert the words of Keating, vid. Keat, General History of Ireland, page 499, he says, the Danes came with a numerous and well disciplined army from Limerick and Connaught, under the command of a bold enterprising General, whose name was Alfin, who designed by this expedition, to surprize the natives, who were at that time assembled from all parts of the country, at the celebrated fair of Roscrea, which was annually kept upon the festival of St. Peter and St Paul, but the Irish were so well acquainted with the Danish treachery, that they thought proper to bring their arms with them, and when they had intelligence that the foreigners were marching against them, they immediately left their trade, their shops, and their merchandize, which they esteemed of small importance, to the concern of their country, and made head against the Danes; and notwithstanding the disadvantage they lay under from the surprize, which gave them no time to draw up in regular order, they supplied this defect by their unanimity and courage, and so shocked the foreign troops at the first charge, that they felt the impression through all their ranks, and terrible slaughter, and an universal rout followed, and fortune and victory declared for the Irish. Four thousand of the enemy were left dead in this engagement, and Alfin, a Danish earl, general of the army, was slain.

An extraordinary Instance of Self-Denial.

AFTER the reduction of the fortress of Sole, in Hainault, by the great Marechal de Turenne, a lady of the most enchanting form and exquisite beauty fell into the hands of the soldiers, who thinking her the most valuable part of the plunder, carried her to their general. The Marechal was then only twenty-six years of age, and far from being insensible to the charms of his beautiful prisoner; he, however, pretended not to understand their motive for bringing her to him, commended their moderation and discretion; and giving them reason to believe that he imagined they only meant to place her out of the reach of their fellow soldiers brutality, by putting her under his protection, he dismissed them. He afterwards caused the lady's husband to be sought for, and delivering her into his hands, said to him: "Sir, I feel the greatest pleasure in being able to restore your wife to you inviolate; and that you may learn what sort of an enemy you war with, know that it is to the discretion of my soldiers, that you are indebted for the preservation of your lady's honour," denying himself even the harmless pleasure that results from being known to be the author of a virtuous action.

BRITISH and IRISH BIOGRAPHY,

Etherege (Sir George) a celebrated wit, who flourished in the reigns of Charles II. and James II. was descended from an ancient family in Oxfordshire, and was born about the year 1636. It is supposed that he had some education at the University of Cambridge, though it appears that he made no long residence there, an inclination for seeing the world having led him to travel into France when he was very young. On his return, he for some time studied the law in one of the inns of court; but finding that kind of study too heavy for his volatile and airy disposition, and consequently making but little progress in it, he soon quitted it for the pursuit of more agreeable accomplishments. In 1664 he brought on the stage his first dramatic performance, entitled The Comical Revenge, or Love in a Tub, which met with good success, and introduced him to the acquaintance of the greatest wits of the age, such as the earl of Dorset, the duke of Buckingham, the earl of Rochester, Sir Charles Sedley, &c. In 1668 he produced another comedy, called She would if she could, which gained him no less applause than the former. Mr. Phillips says of these two comedies, that “for pleasant wit and no bad economy they are judged not unworthy the approbation they have met with.” In 1676 he published his third and last dramatic piece, viz. the Man of Mode, or Sir Fopling Flutter. This is an admirable comedy; the characters in it are strongly marked, the plot agreeably conducted, and the dialogue truly polite and elegant.

Our author was much addicted to gaming, wine, and women, which impaired both his health and his fortune. In order to retrieve the latter, he paid his addresses to a rich widow, whose ambition was such, that she had determined not to marry any man who could not bestow a title on her; on which account he was obliged to purchase the honour of knighthood. He was in his person a fair, slender, genteel man, and in his deportment very affable and courteous, of a sprightly and generous temper; which, with his lively and natural vein of writing, acquired him the appellation of Gentle George, and Easy Etherege. His courtly address and other accomplishments procured him the favour of the duchess of York, to whom he dedicated his last play; and when, on the accession of James the II. she became queen, he was by her recommendation sent ambassador to Ratibon, where he continued till after his majesty quitted this kingdom. None of the biographical writers have exactly fixed the period of Sir George's death, though all seem to place it not long after the revolution. Gildon says, that on that great event he followed his master king James into France, and died there, or very soon after his arrival in England from thence. But the authors of the Biographia Britannica mention a report that he came to an untimely death by an unlucky accident at Ratibon: having treated some company at his house there with a liberal entertainment, in which he had taken his glass too freely, and being, through his great complaisance, too forward in waiting upon his guests at their departure, flushed as he was, he fell down the stairs, and breaking his neck, died on the spot; thus falling a martyr to jollity and civility. Of this however, we have no certain proof.

Sir George, besides his comedies, wrote some airy sonnets, panegyrics, and other poetical trifles. He also wrote a piece entitled, “An account of the rejoicing at the Diet at Ratibon, performed by Sir George Etherege, Knight, residing there, from his Majesty of Great Britain, upon occasion of the birth of the Prince of Wales. In a letter from himself.” His comedies, though highly applauded for wit, have been justly censured for the immorality with which they abound.

The Life of John Evelyn, Esq.

Evelyn (John) Esq. one of the greatest natural philosophers that England has produced, was born at Wotton in Surry, the 31st of October, 1620. He was instructed in grammar learning at Lewes in Sussex; from whence, in the year 1637, he removed to Baliol college, Oxford, where he prosecuted his academical studies with great diligence. He afterwards studied in the Middle Temple, London; and upon the breaking out of the civil war, obtained permission from king Charles I. to travel for his improvement. Accordingly, in the spring of 1644, he left England, in order to make the tour of Europe; which he performed with great advantage to himself. His early affection to, and skill in, the fine arts, appeared during his travels; for we find, that he delineated on the spot the prospects of several remarkable places that lie between Rome and Naples. Returning to England in 1657, he took up his residence at Sayes Court near Deptford, which he possessed in right of his wife, the only daughter of Sir Richard

N n n n

Browne,

Browne, bart. In 1658 he published a book entitled "The French Gardener; instructing how to cultivate all sorts of fruit trees and herbs for the garden."—The next year he drew his pen in defence of the royal cause, and wrote "An apology for the Royal Party, in a letter to a person of the late council of state; with a touch at the pretended plea of the army." This pamphlet had a good effect, and was so well received, that it passed through three editions in that year. Soon after came out a piece entitled "News from Brussels, in a letter from a near attendant on his Majesty's person, to a person of honour here, dated March the 10th 1659." The design of this pretended letter was to represent the character of king Charles II. in as unfavourable a light as possible, and to destroy the impressions which had been propagated to his advantage. All the king's friends were exceedingly alarmed at this attempt, and Mr. Evelyn as much as any of them: he therefore, as an antidote to this poison, sent abroad in a week's time a complete answer, which bore the following title; "The late New or Message from Brussels unmasked."

Immediately after the king's return, Mr. Evelyn was introduced to him, and favoured with a gracious reception. In 1661 he published the four following pieces, viz. 1. A Panegyric on King Charles the Second's Coronation: 2. Instructions concerning the Erecting of a Library, translated from the French of Gabriel Naude: 3. Fumigium; or the Inconveniencies of the Air and Smoke of London dissipated: and, 4. Tyrannus, or the Mode, in a Discourse of Sumptuary Laws. In the year 1663, when the Royal Society was established, Mr. Evelyn was chosen one of its members; and at the breaking out of the Dutch war in 1664, he was one of the commissioners appointed to take care of the sick and wounded seamen. The same year came out his "Sylva; or a Discourse of Forest-Trees, and the Propagation of Timber in his Majesty's Dominions:" this valuable work was written at the request of the Royal Society, and published by their order. Our author's merit had, by this time, introduced him into the friendship of some of the best and greatest men of the age; and it was chiefly by his persuasion, that the lord Howard was prevailed on to present to the university of Oxford the noble collection of Arundelian marbles. In 1669 Mr. Evelyn made a journey to Oxford, where he was honoured with the degree of Dr. of the civil law. Upon the first erection of the board of trade and plantations, he was appointed a member of that council; and he shewed, by his History of Navigation and Commerce, how well he was qualified to fill such place. The Royal Society having ordered, that each of their members should in his turn pronounce at their several meetings a discourse on some subject of experimental philosophy, Mr. Evelyn presented them with a treatise called, "Terra; a Philosophical Discourse of Earth, relating to the Culture and Improvement of it for Vegetation and the Propagation of Plants;" which was printed in 1675. In December 1685, he was named one of the commissioners for executing the high office of lord privy-seal; and, soon after the revolution, was made treasurer of Greenwich Hospital.

Full of years and reputation, this amiable and worthy man died on the 27th of February, 1706, in the eighty-sixth year of his age; and was interred at Wotton, the place of his nativity. Besides the above-mentioned works, he also wrote, 1. A Character of England: 2. The State of France: 3. Sculpture, or the History and Art of Chalcography and Engraving in Copper: 4. Kalendarium Hortense, or the Gardener's Almanac: 5. Mundus Muliebris, or the Lady's Dressing-Room unlocked, and her Toilet spread: 6. Numismata, or a Discourse of Medals ancient and modern; and other treatises. Bishop Burnet styles Mr. Evelyn "a most ingenious and virtuous gentleman, who is not satisfied to have advanced the knowledge of his age, by his own most useful and successful labours about planting and divers other ways, but is ready to contribute every thing in his power to perfect other men's endeavours."* The learned and judicious Mr. Wotton, in his Reflections upon ancient and modern Learning, speaks of our author in very high terms, and observes, "that it may be esteemed a small character of Mr. Evelyn's Sylva, or Discourse of Forest-Trees, to say, that it out-does all that Theophrastus and Pliny have left us on that subject: for it not only does that and a great deal more, but contains more useful precepts, hints, and discoveries, upon that now so necessary part of our Res rustica, than the world had till then known from all the observations of former ages.

and received his education at Trinity college, Oxford. Being no less distinguished for his political abilities than his literary accomplishments, he was appointed one of the commissioners of the revenue in Ireland, and would probably have been advanced to higher employments, had he not been cut off in the prime of life, dying on the 24th of March, 1698, in the 45th year of his age. He wrote an elegant Greek poem, and several English ones, which have been much admired. He also translated a poem on gardens, from the Latin of Renatus Rapinus; Life of Alexander the Great, from the Greek of Plutarch; and, from the French, "The history of the Grand Vifiers Mahomet and Achmet Coprogli; of the three last Grand Seigniors, their Sultanas, and chief favourites; with the most secret intrigues of the Seraglio."

The Life of Lord Thomas Fairfax.

Fairfax (Thomas Lord) general of the parliament's forces in the great rebellion, was the son of Ferdinand lord Fairfax, and was born at Denton in the parish of Otley, in Yorkshire, in January 1611. He studied in St. John's college, Cambridge, and afterwards, being of a martial disposition, went into Holland, and served as a volunteer under the command of Horatio, lord Vere. Having thus acquired some knowledge in the art of war, he returned to England, and retiring to his father's house, married Anne, the fourth daughter of the lord Vere. Upon the breaking out of the civil war in 1642, his father was made general of the parliament's forces in the North, and the son obtained a commission to be general of the horse under him, when he soon signalized himself by his intrepidity on several occasions, particularly in taking some important towns and garrisons in Yorkshire and Cheshire. He commanded the right wing of horse at the famous battle of Marston Moor, in which the Royalists were defeated, and the king's affairs entirely ruined in the North.

On the parliament's new modelling the army, they unanimously voted sir Thomas Fairfax general in the room of the earl of Essex, and to him Oliver Cromwell was joined with the title of lieutenant-general, who was afterwards the spring of all his succeeding motions. In February 1645, he received his commission; after which, he, on the 14th of June, obtained a complete victory in the decisive battle of Naseby. On the 18th he took Leicester; on the 10th of July he defeated the lord Goring; on the 22d took Bridgewater by storm; on the 30th of the same month became master of Bath: on the 15th of August, took Sherborne-castle by storm; and having besieged Bristol from the 22d of August to the 10th of September, it was surrendered to him by prince Rupert. After this he became master of Tiverton; took Dartmouth by storm; besieged and took the city of Exeter, made himself master of several forts and garrisons; defeated the lord Hopton, and following him into Cornwall, entirely dispersed the king's army in the west.

He then obliged the king to retire in disguise from Oxford. His majesty departed from thence on the 27th of April, 1646, and put himself into the hands of the Scots; when sir Thomas having taken that city, and several other places, the unhappy king Charles I. had before Michaelmas neither an army nor fortress left in England. He then took a journey to London, where he arrived on the 12th of November, being met some miles off by great crowds of people, and the city militia; and two days after he received the thanks and congratulations of both houses of parliament. On the 18th of December he set out to convoy the two hundred thousand pounds that had been granted to the Scottish army, as the price of their delivering up their sovereign. The parliament now attempting to disband the army, he, in the beginning of June, 1647, advanced towards London, and in August entered the city, with the sixty members who had fled to the army, and restored them in a kind of triumph; for which he received the thanks of both houses, and was appointed constable of the tower. His father dying on the 13th of March, 1647-8, he became possessed of his title and estate, and was appointed keeper of Pontefract-castle, custos rotulorum of Yorkshire, &c. in his room; after which he quelled an insurrection of the London apprentices; and another in Kent, headed by George Goring, earl of Norwich. He returned to London to awe that city and the parliament; and to forward the proceedings against the king, quartered himself at Whitehall. He was foremost in the list of the king's judges, but refused to act as he afterwards did to subscribe the test appointed by parliament for approving all that was done in relation to the king. In short, being unwilling to march against the Scots, who had declared for king Charles II. he resigned his commission, on which the parliament settled an annual revenue of five thousand pounds a year upon him; after which he lived privately, till he was invited by gen. Monk to assist him against Lambert's army, when he cheerfully embraced the occasion, and and on the 3d of December, 1659, appeared at the head of a body of gentlemen of Yorkshire, when, upon the reputation of his name, a body of one thousand two hundred horse forsook Lambert and joined him. He was at the head of the committee appointed by the house of commons on the 3d of May, 1660, to wait upon king Charles II. at the Hague, to desire him speedily to return to England; and having readily assisted in his restoration, retired again to his seat in the country, where he lived in a private manner till his death, which happened on the 12th of November, 1671, in the sixtieth year of his age.

Lord Fairfax wrote memorials of himself, printed in 1669, and was not only an historian, but a poet. He versified the psalms of David, and other parts of scripture, and wrote a poem on solitude, &c.

The Life of George Farquhar.

Farquhar (George) an ingenious comic writer and poet, was the son of a clergyman in Ireland, and was born in Londonderry in 1678. When he was very young, he gave specimens of his poetry, in which he discovered a force of thinking, and turn of expression, much beyond his years. In 1694 he was sent to Trinity-college, Dublin, where, by the progress he made in his studies, he acquired a considerable reputation: but his gay and volatile disposition could not long relish the gravity and retirement of an academic life; and therefore, soon quitting it, he betook himself to the diversions of the stage, and procured his admittance into the company of the Dublin theatre. He had the advantage of a good person, and, though his voice was somewhat weak, met with a tolerable reception as an actor, for which reason he resolved to continue on the stage, till something better should offer. But his resolution was soon broken by an accident, whereby he was near turning a feigned tragedy into a real one; for being to play the part of Guyomar, who kills Vasquez, in Mr. Dryden's Indian Emperor, and forgetting to exchange his sword for a foil, in the engagement he wounded his brother tragedian, who represented Vasquez, very dangerously; and though the wound did not prove mortal, yet Mr. Farquhar was so shocked at it, that he determined never to appear on the stage any more.

Soon after this, Mr. Farquhar, who had now no inducement to remain at Dublin, went to London. After his arrival there, which was in the year 1696, the celebrated actor Mr. Wilks ceased not to solicit him, till he had prevailed with him to write a play. Wilks, knowing his humour and abilities, assured him that he was considered by all in a much higher light than he had yet shewn himself in, and that he was much more adapted to furnish compositions for the stage, than to echo those of other poets upon it: but he was more substantially invited by a genteel accommodation, which allowed him an opportunity of exerting his genius at his leisure; for the earl of Orrery, who was a patron as well as master of letters, gave him a lieutenant's commission in his own regiment in Ireland, which Mr. Farquhar held several years, behaving without reproach as an officer. In 1698, his first comedy, called Love and a Bottle, appeared on the stage; and, for its sprightly dialogue and busy scenes, was well received by the public. At the beginning of the year 1700, was acted his Constant Couple, or Trip to the Jubilee; it being then a jubilee year at Rome, when popish zealots of all countries made their trip thither, to purchase pardons and trinkets for the convenience of their souls and bodies. In the character of Sir Harry Wildair, our author drew so gay and airy a figure, so well suited to Wilks's talent, and so animated by his gesture and vivacity of spirit, that the player gained almost as much reputation as the poet. Mr. Farquhar, encouraged by the prodigious success of this play, made a continuation of it in 1701, in his comedy of Sir Harry Wildair. The next year he published his Miscellanies, or Collection of Poems, Letters and Essays, which contain a variety of humorous and pleasant sallies of fancy. In 1703 came out another diverting comedy of his, called The Inconstant, or, the Way to win Him: but now plain English productions, with nothing but good sense, natural humour, and wit, to recommend them, began to give way to Italian and French operas; the airy entertainments of dancing and singing, which conveyed no instruction, awakened no generous passion, nor filled the breast with any thing great and manly: and therefore this comedy was received more coldly than the former, though by no means inferior to them in point of merit. Mr. Farquhar was married this year, and, according to general report, to a lady of great fortune; but in this particular was miserably disappointed. The lady had fallen in love with him, and so violent was her passion, that she resolved to have him at any rate; and as she knew he was too much dissipated in life to think of matrimony, unless advantage was annexed to with divine powers, hears, considers, and grants our prayers; our Saviour's precaution, in replying to those who told him his mother and brethren sought him, makes no impression on this people; although he emphatically declares; "Who is my mother, my sister, or my brother, even those who walk religiously, and do the will of my Father who is in Heaven." Moreover, it surprises me they do not notice this, and other plain scriptures, such as his answer to the woman's exclamation, "Blessed is the womb that bore thee, and the paps which thou hast sucked;" yea, answers our best of friends, our blessed Saviour, "yea, rather blessed are those who live according to my commands." For in other parts of scripture the Papists run into a violent extreme, by mistaking the words more literally than can well be imagined any persons, in their right reason, could mistake; for they do not receive the sacrament as bread and wine; but the repeating certain Latin words over a wafer, for in this language all their services are performed; wonderful to relate, changes it into the identical body and blood of our Saviour. This belief they ground on the words, "This is my body," not considering he must have held his body in his own hands, and given it to his cruel disciples to eat, yet still sit whole and unimpaired, a spectator of this feast of cannibals, and that he adds, broken for you, whereas he was not then crucified, no not betrayed; but to a temperate brain, the subjoined words, "Do this in remembrance of me," this gross credulity becomes inexcusable. I think by a safe and easy replacing and explanation, the words will appear thus, "And he brake the bread and said, thus do hereafter in remembrance of me, for this bread represents my body crucified, yea broken for your transgressions, and the wine of this cup, my blood shed for the sins of mankind." I was puzzled for a long time to assign a cause, why any people blest with reason, could form such a belief, or retain it now, when the truths of nature, nay of religion, are called in question by some infernally daring spirits. Listen now to the result of my enquiries. I perceived the building of their whole religion most terribly confined to externals, therefore, without bringing scripture to combat it, the mention of a few particulars will point out the object satisfactorily; and first, the language they pray in shews their hope is intirely confined to externals, for without inspiration, or pretence to it, they speak they know not what; not one in five hundred of them understanding the language; therefore they repose some trust, believe some virtuous quality in the form and sound of the words they thus express, totally unconnected with the wishes of the soul, or devotion of the heart; veneration for God, bartered for superstition; fervour of prayers, for a scrupulous repetition of such a number of words, and so often in the hour or day they repeat the same prayers over and over again, but much oftener to the virgin mother than to God Almighty; salt and water having certain words muttered over them, and mixed by a priest, preserves from dangers, and renders sacred who or whatever is touched therewith: rotten bones, said to be the skull of St. Anthony, or the arm of St. Ursula, are proper objects of veneration and worship; and a man's walking to the place where they are preserved, washes out his sins; if he is rich he may hire another to walk there for him, and I believe you will allow, it seems equally salutary. Our Saviour said, how hardly shall a rich man enter into the kingdom of God! Popery with a diabolical effrontery contradicts it, for if rich you can commute for any sin; you may die without making your bargain, and a priest, if well paid, shall rescue at any time; so that if you can depend upon your heirs good-nature you may sin to the last convulsion of death: you can have a man suffer penance for you as well as to go on a pilgrimage; you can buy good works and prayers at Rome, which are there treasured up by numbers of devout papists, under the denomination of supererogation. People who have been too good make this offering of their superfluity, still in absolute contradiction to the divine founder of our religion, who says, after you have done all that is amiable, generous, and pious, acknowledge you are unprofitable servants: now this tenor of their whole religion, regarding alone certain outward ceremonies, would it not seem extraordinary for them to pass by our Saviour's institution of the supper, without modelling it according to their own fancies, and their other devices which they have suffered to creep in and corrupt the church; wherefore as all must be external, they would pamper their bodies with holiness, and suffer their souls to die with leanness; for if we eat the flesh and blood it would descend into our stomachs, digest, and partly mix with our blood, but never reach the soul. Shameful belief; what we eat can neither make holy or defile by any corporal influence; thus the heart and inward man remain unregenerate, confiding in the external modes of worship, the dictates of a corrupted church. But let me conclude this subject. From this mortifying prospect of man's brutality and vileness let us turn away our eyes, and behold a more pleasing view, a more promising period; thou shalt know the cause.—In the papal church, men and women devote themselves to confinement, idleness, celibacy, and superstition; the men are stiled friars, the women nuns; these are of different orders, whose customs, discipline and names vary. About the time when our forefathers quitted this country, a new set of these men sprung up, differing from all the others in their discipline and manners, they were on a more worldly, enlarged, and artful plan; by their policy they seemed likely to absorb the credit, wealth, nay the other orders in time, all power and learning, and to extend to the remotest parts of the world, and the most distant times to come, for they were in every country; and in every country the grandeur, emolument, and wealth of the society in general, was their only wish, the only object they laboured with unremitting zeal to establish: polite, learned, and unconfined in their principles, they took every shape, traversed every land to promote the society's advantage, each individual ready to spend his life with pleasure for it: notwithstanding all this shew of human wisdom, this order has already fallen, nay the very Pope, for whom they artfully pretended the most blind affection and obedience, has thrust them down, released them from their oaths (a popish power) and dissolved their societies. About their rise this fall was predicted by George Brown, in the cathedral church of Dublin, in Ireland: I have read it in the history of that country, which was printed many years ago; the history was written by sir James Ware, now the prophecy doth not affect the people here, few, I believe, know there is any such thing, but I will send thee the very words. After preaching a good deal upon understanding the law, he breaks out thus: "Oh! why should we be so wicked as to defile the law which the almighty God hath made so pure, without blemish! Jesus came to fulfil the law, and not to abolish the law—but there are a new fraternity of late sprung up, who call themselves Jesuits, which will deceive many, who, are after the Scribes and Pharisees manner among the Jews, they shall strive to abolish the truth, and shall come very near to do it, for these sects will turn themselves into several forms, with the heathen an heathenist, an atheist an atheist, with the Jews a Jew, and with the reformers a reformade, purposely to know your intentions, your minds, your hearts, and your inclinations, and thereby bring you at least to be like the fool that said in his heart, there was no God: these shall spread over the whole world; shall be admitted to the council of princes, and they never the wiser, charming of them, yea making your princes reveal their hearts, and the secrets of the mind unto them; and yet they not perceive it, which will happen from falling from the law of God, by neglect of fulfilling of the law of God, and by winking at their sins, yet in the end, God, to testify his law, shall suddenly cut off this society, even by the hands of those who have most succoured them, and made use of them, so that at the end they shall become odious to all nations, they shall be worse than Jews, having no resting place upon earth; and then shall a Jew have more favour than a Jesuit—this has been fulfilled, and now we have—

English Theatre. Saturday, August 9.

THIS day was represented, for the first time, a new comedy, called, The Advertisement; or A Bold Stroke for a Husband, written by Mrs. Gardner.

Characters of the Piece.

Sir William Wydham, Mr. Fearon.—Young Wydham, Mr. R. Palmer. Dr. Obstetric, Mr. Parsons. Carefull, Mr. Blisset. Captain O'Cannon, Mr. Egan. Mac Locust, Mr. Walker. Snap, Mr. Edwin. Jack Steerage, Mr. Jackson.—Widow Holdfast, Mrs. Gardner. Lydia Fanlove, Miss Platt. Landlady, Mrs. Love. La Bronze, Miss Hale. Mrs. Epigram, Mrs. Collis.

The play was well received. The fable of it is substantially this:

The widow Holdfast, rich, young & lively, desires to form a new connubial connection, and whimsically hits upon a public advertisement for a husband, as the mode most likely to procure her an agreeable mate. She surmounts every objection on the double score of indelicacy and danger, and boldly ventures to put her enterprize in practice; for this purpose a French milliner is dispatched to find out a literary mechanic to manufacture the advertisement. She returns with an account that few men have now any brains, but that she has met with a woman in a garret, who has a great deal of wit and very little money. The widow resolves to employ this daughter of Apollo, and prepares for the visit. The distressed siter of the quill is discovered writing in her garret, and is waited on by a bookseller, who treats her with all the rudeness and insolence which form the essential characteristic of too many of those midwives of the Muses. As soon as her tyrant has quitted her apartment the widow enters, opens her business, and leaves the female scribe to execute her commission and draw up her advertisement. An honest sailor then appears, professes his regard for the distressed authoress, discharges her rent, and retires, declaring he'll free her her from her embarrassments. A father and son are next presented in dispute about the person who shall become wife of the latter. The father insists upon one lady, the son professes his pre-engagement for another whom he knows not where to find. During the altercation, a man-midwife enters, relates the scandal of the day, and among other particulars, mentions, that the lady fixed on for the son's wife had but the day before been delivered by him of a bastard. This relieves the son from the danger of an unwelcome marriage; and as the doctor pulls out a daily paper, and reads the advertisement for a husband, as a very curious article, the father instantly resolves that his son shall attempt an union with the lady, provided she appears to be really what the advertisement describes.—The doctor takes his leave, and the steward of an old friend of the father comes in to announce the death of his master, who had made his nephew his heir. The steward laments that no person knows where to find the young man, who he fears stands in much need of the bequest; they separate, the father to put his project in practice, the steward in search of the heir.—The doctor, whose avidity for news, and great curiosity particularly marks his character, resolves to find out the advertiser, discover her name, and make himself master of the consequences of the advertisement; for this purpose he bribes the French milliner (at whose house the widow has advertised she is to be seen) to let him conceal himself in a closet where he may overhear what passes between the widow and her gallants. The first who solicits the advertiser's hand is a brisk, bold, young Irishman, a disinherited younger brother, who professes his regard for his country, and his love for the widow, declaring he is ready to fight for the first, and marry the latter. The widow is struck at first sight with the Hibernian, and after appointing a future interview, against which time she proposes to enquire into his character and circumstances, he takes his leave; a Scotchman then appears, and brags of the dignity and antiquity of his family, declaring that they always pay close attention where—their interest is concerned. The widow soon dismisses this lover with a positive negative, and is then waited on by the father of the young man before-mentioned, who recognizes her face, but assures her of his secrecy; he begs her permission to let his son visit her, and obtaining consent, retires to send in the young man, who is much embarrassed at the interview, on account of his real passion for another. After in vain endeavouring to act the part of a lover to the widow, he bursts out into an invocation upon his absent and beloved mistress; the widow, struck with the name, rejoices that she has it in her power to relieve his anxiety. The father here enters, and presently afterwards the Irishman, when the former recognizes the latter to be the heir of his lately deceased friend, and congratulates him on his good fortune. The Hibernian declares his increase of wealth only serves to increase his passion for the widow, who acknowledges her predilection in his favour, and produces the lost mistress of the young man, who had resided with her for some time. The piece ends with a double union, and all persons profess themselves rendered happy in consequence of an advertisement in the news-papers.

Virtue and Constancy rewarded.

ABOUT a century ago, a gentleman of the name of Jones, lived in the North of Ireland, possessed of an estate of an hundred and fifty pounds per annum; and contiguous to him dwelt a Mr. Thompson, whose yearly income in land amounted to one hundred pounds.

Mr. Jones was generous, hospitable, and humane; nor did the object in distress ever depart from his door, without obtaining every relief that it was in his power to bestow: The blessings which Providence had bountifully conferred upon him, he liberally distributed, to alleviate the sufferings of his fellow creatures; to feed the hungry, cloath the naked, and administer to the wants of the necessitous: His tenants flourished under his paternal care, and his neighbours partook largely of his philanthropy; nor could either party which had constituted him umpire of their disputes, esteem themselves aggrieved in the judgment he passed on them, all his decisions being so conspicuously marked with equity and candor.

Mrs. Jones had been bred in Dublin, and was of a lively cast; but her disposition was naturally amiable, and the example of her worthy husband, which she was ambitious to copy after, rendered her highly respectable. Mr. Jones became enamoured of her whilst he was a member of Trinity College; and when he had honourably finished his studies in that excellent University, he paid his addresses to her in form, which being well received, they were united shortly afterwards.

Mr. Jones lost his mother when four years old, and he had been only twelve months married, when he got an account that his father had died after a few days indisposition

disposition: This intelligence hurried him from town, as he learned that by the extravagance of an elder brother, his father's affairs were in an embarrassed situation; to settle which he immediately repaired to his hereditary residence, whither his wife accompanied him; and on his arrival there he found that his brother had suddenly withdrawn himself from that country, nor, after the most minute search, could he procure the smallest intimation of his retreat.

Miss Moore, who lodged with her brother, after the decease of her father and mother, was very young when she changed her name to that of Jones; but a quick genius that she was possessed of, aided by the sensible conversation of her husband, and an alacrity shewn by her to imbibe useful instructions, made ample amends for the disadvantages which a city education exposed her to, on her removal to the country; and a close application to domestic matters, brought her, in a short time, to a perfect knowledge of them.

Mr. Jones was, by his father, intended for holy orders; but the great opinion he had conceived of that profession, and a dread of not executing the duties of it, prevented him from embracing a function for which he was remarkably well calculated, by his unaffected piety, and the goodness of his heart.

Mr. Thompson, on his first public entrance into the world, had manifested a wildness in his conduct; but fortunately he came to a sense of his follies in a couple of years, and, by an alliance which he formed with a reputable family, was easily led to abandon his former dissipated course of life; and so effectually had a reformation been wrought in him, that he now amassed riches with equal alacrity as he had squandered them before. Though obstinate in his determinations, and peculiarly attached to the heaping up of money, he was, nevertheless, proverbially just in his dealings, and a good landlord.

Though his wife came powerfully recommended to him by a considerable dowry; yet the qualifications of her mind were infinitely superior to any considerations of that nature: She had never been thirty miles from the place of her birth; but an improved understanding that she was mistress of, and a majestic affability that appeared in all her actions, made her a most valuable woman.

When Mr. Jones had been fixed a few months in the country, by a news paper his brother's death was announced to happen in London; which left him in the uninterrupted enjoyment of all that his father died possessed of.

An intimate intercourse was established between the families of Mr. Jones and Mr. Thompson, and some years rolled on without producing any thing extraordinary to either. Mr. Jones had two children, a son and a daughter, and Mr. Thompson had the same, between whom it was hoped that a connection would, in due time, take place, nor was even Mr. Thompson averse to it; for though he was well acquainted with the posture of Mr. Jones's affairs, yet he apprehended that his prudent management would extricate his estate from the incumbrances it lay under.

Young Jones was not twenty one years of age, young Thompson somewhat older, and each of their sisters had just entered the seventeenth year of her age.

Miss Jones was rather above the middle size, of a gentle temper, and uncommonly intelligent for one of her tender years: Her face was perfect symmetry itself, without spot or blemish; and a pair of languishing eyes, inexpressibly charming, attracted the admiration of the adoring beholders.

Miss Thompson was tall, and elegantly made; and to the charms of a beautiful countenance, added a remarkably fine person: In some measure she was the contrast of her fair friend, for vivacity shone eminently in her, but tempered with such sweetness, as rendered her society eagerly courted by all ranks of people, inspiring them with an inviting though awful veneration of innocent sprightliness.

A mutual affection grew up between the young persons, warmly countenanced by their parents; and they delighted themselves with the flattering prospect of a speedy consummation of their happiness, unconscious of the dreadful misery that awaited them, ready to blast all their sanguine hopes of felicity.

By the expences attending on Mr. Jones's education, and the excels of his brother, his little patrimony had contracted a debt of one thousand pounds; and his brother-in-law, who was a merchant in Dublin, had prevailed upon him to advance an equal sum to him, upon a promise of restoring it to him with a large addition, as soon as he had acquired a very advantageous benefit that presented itself in the way of trade. The former difficulty he had long struggled with, and would probably have removed; but upon being informed that a vessel had been taken at sea, and another had foundered, which contained almost the whole of Mr. Moore's property, his creditors became violently clamorous; yet still, so great was the regard professed for him, he might have weathered the storm of adversity somewhat longer, had not an accidental fire, by consuming his houses, overwhelmed him in ruin.

His neighbours in general were deeply concerned for his misfortunes, and all those who had experienced his bounty were willing, but alas! unable to afford him relief; and Mr. Thompson also expressed his pity for him, at the very time that he peremptorily commanded his son never to visit Miss Jones again: In vain did young Thompson expostulate with his father, and shew that the calamities in which Mr. Jones had been involved, were unavoidable; in vain did he attempt to demonstrate how mean, how unpardonably sinful, it would appear in him to desert a lady, whom he had approved of until unforeseen evils had reduced her thus low; and how meritorious it would be in him to raise her from indigence to a state of plenty: Such refined notions had no weight with the old man, who was inexorable; and vowed that if he disgraced his family, by marrying a beggar, he would disown him for ever.

Young Thompson, who thought that his father had forfeited all pretensions to filial obedience by his base behaviour, and was swayed more by generous principles, than the suggestions of worldly prudence, instantly flew to Miss Jones, and offered her his hand, which she accepted of, and with the concurrence of her parents they were united: The consequence of this rash step was, that Mr. Thompson disinherited his son, and, deaf to all entreaties of reason and honour, he confined his daughter to her chamber, forbidding her, upon pain of his everlasting displeasure, ever to think of young Jones any more.

As an interview between the unhappy lovers was utterly impracticable, Jones found an opportunity of conveying a letter to Miss Thompson, wherein he declared his unabating passion for her, and assured her that "he was determined to leave the kingdom with all possible expedition, and not to return until he had acquired a fortune sufficient to entitle him to her father's favour, since he perceived that he was actuated by pecuniary motives alone; and that she was at liberty to communicate his design to her father." In answer to this Miss Thompson signified her "assent to the resolution he had formed, though it deprived her of the unspeakable bliss of seeing him; sincerely wished him a prosperous voyage; and solemnly protested that he alone should ever remain the object of her choice."

Young Jones put his project into execution; whereupon Miss Thompson obtained her freedom, but though many suitors laid claim to her affection, yet she rejected them all; nor did her father want her to act otherwise.

Mr. Jones, who bore all his troubles with unshaken resignation, finding his affairs in a pitiable condition, was constrained to dispose of his estate, and with the shattered remains of his fortune, which amounted to three hundred pounds after discharging all his debts, he retired to a small farm that he purchased about twenty miles distant from his former dwelling, loaded with the benedictions of those who had nothing else to give.

About two years after this period the memorable war between king William the Third and king James the Second was vigorously prosecuted in Ireland, and a small party of Irish, after ransacking Mr. Thompson's house, and locking himself up bound in one of the chambers, carried off his daughter in triumph: Their route led them through the farm in which Mr. Jones lived, and Mr. Thompson, who was engaged in his employment of husbandry, being alarmed by the cries of a female in distress, collected a few trusty friends, and pursued the robbers: At the edge of an extensive bog they overtook the enemy, who had dismounted in order the better to defend themselves; but his chosen troop beginning the attack with resolute fury, in a few minutes they gained a complete victory over their antagonists, all of whom, except two who were made prisoners, they left dead on the spot, without losing one of their own party. But how great was the astonishment and joy of young Thompson, on discovering that the lady whom he had thus rescued was his own sister? or how can I describe the transports of Mr. Jones's family and her at meeting? After resting a couple of days at Mr. Jones's from the fright and fatigue she had sustained, she was restored to her father, together with the retaken booty, who received them with sullen thankfulness, but still continued inflexibly bent not to forgive his son.

Three years after this event, universal tranquility being established throughout the kingdom, as Mr. Jones and his family were sitting one evening before the door of his house, recounting the several imminent dangers which the merciful hand of Providence had delivered them from, and with the profoundest reverence acknowledging how gracious his dispensations towards them were, which enabled them to live comfortably by the produce of their farm, a man clothed in rags approached and accosted them; and notwithstanding the changes which time had wrought in his face, Mr. Jones instantly recognized the well known features of his son. With raptures he was welcomed and embraced by them all, tho' in this miserable plight; and being told that his dear Miss Thompson was perfectly well, though grieved at not hearing from him for the four preceding years, he was pressed to relate his adventures since his departure from them, which he did in the following manner :

"After tearing myself away from every thing that was dear to me in the world, I proceeded to Donaghadee, from whence I took my passage to Scotland, and travelled by land to London, without any material incident occurring on the road : I embarked on board the first ship bound for Holland, arrived safe at Amsterdam ; and having gained some knowledge of naval affairs, I was admitted, in the capacity of a sailor, to take a voyage in a vessel which was to sail from thence for the West Indies. We had got an hundred leagues on our way, when a terrible storm assailed us, which tossed us about for two days incessantly ; and scarcely had we mastered a tempestuous sea until we were attacked by a Barbary Corsair, and though we made a stout resistance, yet we were at length forced to strike to her, and were carried into Algiers. Here we were sold as slaves ; and luckily ten of my companions and I were purchased by the same master, who sent us to a country villa of his on the sea coast, about fifty miles from Algiers. Here we served twelve months hard labour, frequently deliberating together about our escape from bondage, which we at last accomplished by means of a small pleasure boat which we seized on ; and trusting ourselves to the clemency of the waves, we providentially made the harbour of Gibraltar, where we met with a friendly asylum, and shortly afterwards reached Amsterdam again in an homeward bound Dutch ship. Upon my second arrival at this place, I undertook the occupation of a porter, until something more eligible should offer itself : One day after I had carried a load for a Jew merchant, he questioned me about my name, and the place of my nativity ; and when I had informed him of these particulars, he asked me if I had ever been taught to write ; and being answered in the affirmative, he told me he could give me a more lucrative employment than my present was, if he found me capable of managing it. "The people from your country, said he, are not accounted strictly honest here ; but there may be exceptions to the general rule, and as you seem to have dealt candidly with me, I mean to appoint you to the office of my under-clerk who is lately dead." I gratefully accepted of this post, and gave such satisfaction to my master that, by degrees I was promoted to the place of his first clerk, with a salary of one hundred pounds per annum annexed to it. In this station I looked upon myself as quite happy ; when my benefactor fell dangerously sick, which excited my utmost grief, lest I should not only lose a master whom I tenderly loved, but be debased to my former state of obscurity : His physician having despaired of his recovery, sent for me, and ordering every one else to leave the room, he thus addressed me : " In me behold your long lost uncle ! shortly after your father's marriage I happened to have a drunken quarrel with a friend, whom I unfortunately killed. I then fled to England, where I circulated a report of my having died, thereby to prevent any farther enquiry being made concerning me. After encountering a variety of adventures, I came to this city, where I changed my name and appearance, assuming the character which you have seen me in. Your fidelity in transacting my business has not been unnoticed by me ; and the property which, my dear nephew, I have realized by trade, I leave entirely to you. I have already sent two thousand pounds to the widow of him who fell a victim to my intoxicated rage ; and I trust an unfeigned uninterrupted repentance for the term of twenty-five years, will wash away the guilty pollutions of my youth, and whisper peace to my soul at the last." He survived this only two days, leaving me in the deepest sorrow for him ; and after I had paid all due honours to his lifeless remains, I found that the money he bequeathed me, together with the effects which I disposed of, amounted to ten thousand pounds, which I have now in cash and bills ; and my present garb was put on only with a design of surprising you."

After dropping a mournful tear to the memory of their departed friend, it was thought adviseable to acquaint Miss Thompson that her lover would wait on her in a few days ; and Mr. Thompson finding that young Jones was in such affluent circumstances, forgot all his prejudices against him, and was reconciled to his son. Young Jones re-purchased his father's estate, on which he built a commodious house for the reception of the old man, whom he reinstated in that abundance which he so well knew how to apply to the best purpose. Young Thompson and his wife lived with old Mr. Thompson ; and young Jones and Miss Thompson, who became his lovely spouse, resided on an adjoining estate which he had bought, and amidst the blessings of thousands, saw the rising generation flourish around them. Thus virtue and constancy were at last rewarded.

History of the British Parliament.

May 14.

THIS being the usual day for the minister to lay before the house of commons the state of the nation, in respect of its its finances, alliances, and foreign and domestic transactions, but better known under the appellation of the budget day, a few minutes before half after three o'clock, lord North rose in his place and spoke substantially as follows.

That the expences of the American war were great, but they were necessary, and would of course call for a suitable provision; however the propriety of them being acknowledged, by a very great majority of persons, within and without doors, it now became obligatory on government, to provide in such a manner for those necessary extra-expences, as to throw the additional weight, as much as possible, upon such as could best bear it; or in other words, to tax property, instead of labour. In a commercial and manufacturing country, he observed, that customs, excises, or duties which either fall finally on the lower orders of the people, or materially affect the objects of commerce and native growth and manufacture, ought most studiously to be avoided. This evil, however, in great and pressing operations of finance, could not be prevented; because the magnitude of such loans took them out of the general rule, on the ground of necessity; of course they were made to affect the body of the people at large, who were the great consumers. But as in the present instance the sum designed to be funded requiring no extraordinary exertion, the rule was meant to be adhered to; and the taxes to be proposed to the consideration of the committee (the house was in a committee of supply) were to fall entirely on property, or what were generally deemed the luxuries of life.

His lordship next proceeded to state the several sums voted in the committee of supply, in the course of the session. We shall not follow him through the long detail; but content ourselves with recapitulating the gross sums, under the several heads of expenditure. He made the expences of the navy to amount in the whole, including the one million navy debt paid off, to 4,210,000*l*. The army, including the ordnance for land service, to 4,360,000*l*. Miscellaneous services, to 144,000*l*. Exchequer bills issued in 1776, to be paid off, 1,500,000*l*. Vote of credit do. 1,000,000*l*. Deficiencies of grants and duties 558,000*l*. Civil list arrears 618,000*l*. Lottery prizes to be paid at exchequer, 500,000*l*. Total of supplies, including 56,990*l*. excess of ways and means, 12,952,000*l*. He then proceeded to state the amount of the ways and means. Land 2,000,000*l*. Malt 750,000*l*. Surplus of sinking fund, 5th of January last, 295,000*l*. Ditto April 5, 760,000*l*. Charged on ditto, as the computed produce of the three growing quarters ditto, 1,939,000*l*. Produce of small duties, 8,000*l*. From lord Holland's excheutors 200,000*l*. New exchequer bills 1,500,000*l*. Lottery 500,000*l*. Total of ways and means, including a sum of five millions to be funded, 12,952,000*l*.

His lordship, after connecting his ideas of taxing property and the luxuries of life, with the mode of raising a fund, sufficient to pay the interest of the sum to be borrowed, observed, that the first tax he should propose to the committee, was one upon male servants, properly so called, of a guinea each, as distinguished from persons employed in trade, commerce, and manufactures. This in his opinion was a fair object of taxation, considered on the principle he set out with, and bore a double relation to it. For the burden would almost totally fall upon persons who from their affluence, or possessions, would not feel it, or upon such as living above their means, brought the retaining more persons in their service than they could afford, clearly within the substantial description of luxury. There could but one plausible objection lie against the tax, and that seemed to him but of partial consideration; which was, that it would press heavily upon great numbers of persons, who kept but one servant, persons of scanty incomes; and who retained a male-servant, merely from motives of convenience, and in many instances, of economy. Even where such an exception really existed, he doubted whether a female servant would not answer the purpose; but though it were otherwise, and that in a few instances it might be severely felt, he contended, that it was impossible for the mind of man, so to contrive a tax, as to prevent it from falling heavy upon some one class or other of individuals. Computing the number of servants in Great Britain at one hundred thousand, and the tax at a guinea, that would produce exactly 105,000*l*. The next tax he submitted to the committee, was an additional stamp duty, on all deeds and paper writings sealed. This he shewed, would be a tax upon property, would be easily collected, and little felt. He took it, in his calculation, at 5000*l*. The next duty was, an excise upon the materials for making of glass. To balance this duty, he proposed to give the home manufacturer a monopoly, by raising the duties upon the importation of foreign glass so high, as to render it nearly equal to a prohibition. He took the expected produce of this tax, at 45,000*l*. The last tax he meant to propose, was a tax upon auctioneers; upon sales of property in house and lands; and all kinds of personal chattles, sold by auction; which he computed would, taken at the lowest produce,

duce, bring in 37,000*l.* per annum. His lordship then recapitulated. He said the several sums now mentioned, amount in the whole to 242,000*l.* and that the interest of the five millions, at 4 per cent. was exactly 200,000*l.* which, at that computation, would leave an excess of 42,000*l.* But this must be further explained. Four per cents. were not worth, at market, more than 95; it would be therefore requisite to do two things, to invite the subscriber to lend his money. First to shew him, that he would be no loser; secondly, to hold out to him some prospect of profit. To effect the first, he proposed to give to every subscriber of 100*l.* a premium annuity of one and a half per cent determinable at the end of ten years; this would be worth about 4*l.* 1*s.* which added to the 95, the true market value of 4 per cent. would still leave a deficiency of 19*s.* To make up this deficiency then, and invite the monied man to subscribe, he proposed a lottery to consist of 50,000 tickets, the prizes to be paid in money, at 10*l.* each. These tickets he presumed would, on an average, sell for about 13*l.* each, or 3*l.* profit, which allowing a ticket to every subscriber of 100*l.* would in fact be a premium of 7*l.* 1*s.* This added to the 95*l.* the intrinsic value of 4 per cents at market, would be a clear profit of 2*l.* 1*s.* to the subscriber. He hoped, he said, that no person would think the premium too high. It was a fair encouragement to persons to part with their money; and when all circumstances were properly considered, he doubted not but it would prove equally satisfactory to subscribers, and the public at large. On these grounds, his lordship observed that the premium of one half per cent, for ten years, would amount to 25,000*l.* to which when the duty laid on by the 19th of the late king, upon the materials used in the making of glass, was repealed, computed to produce about 4,000*l.* were added, the whole would make 29,000*l.* which deducted from 242,000*l.* the presumed product of the enumerated taxes, would leave a residue or excess of 13,000*l.* to go to the sinking fund. He was confident, that the produce of the new taxes were considerably under-rated; but as possibly we might want to borrow next year, he took the produce thus low, either as a fund for a future loan; or as giving the fullest security to the new creditors, and a further source of increase to the sinking fund.

As to the war in America; or the disposition of the house of Bourbon, he was rather loose, general, and dissatisfactory, than confident, pointed, or explicit. He said, we continued to receive very friendly assurances from the court of France; and that no preparations were going on in Spain, sufficient to alarm us, either on our own account, or that of our allies. He remarked in particular, that France had begun to disarm, and as a still stronger proof that the most christian king meant nothing hostile against us, the Newfoundland fleet had sailed without a convoy, or even that sort of precaution, security and protection that is usually given to it, in times of the most profound tranquility. He added a farther recent proof, which he had received that very morning, of the pacific friendly disposition of the court of Versailles, from their conduct respecting the capture of the prince of Orange packet boat, taken by some pirates under American colours, and carried into Dunkirk. He informed the committee, that the fellow who made the capture, was confined at that port; and that an order came down from court, for the immediate restitution of the vessel. Whether from his lordship's personal indisposition, or the embarrassed situation of public affairs, it was universally acknowledged, that he was far from being so clear, plausible, and well informed, as he generally used to be.

Situation of Affairs at Madras.

To the Rajah of Tanjore from Mr. Stratton, dated the 26th December, 1776.

"I Have wrote to you several letters on the subject of the Nabob's claims on the Tanjore country, and at the same time acquainted you with the resolution of this government, respecting them, but to these letters I have not had any satisfactory answer from you, which greatly surprises me, for this government having come to the above resolution, it should have been proper on your part, to have shewn a readiness by a compliance therewith. I know it is difficult to state an exact account of what is justly due to him, and it being out of the Nabob's power to do this without having Dubbier Pundat, who had the whole management of his affairs in the Tanjore country; I am to request you will order him down immediately, and should he want an escort of seapoys, I have wrote to Col. Harper to grant him one, that no person whatever may molest him on his way hither. When the Dubbier arrives a clear and good account of what is due to the Nabob and his creditors from the Tanjore country, can with ease be drawn out; but as this will be a work of time, it is a justice which the company owe to the Nabob, that you fall on the means of making some immediate diate † payment on this account, from the produce of the Tanjore country for this year, which is now under management, either in grain or money, for the Nabob is at this time so greatly in arrears to his troops (whom he had raised for the protection of the Tanjore country) and had promised that they should be paid these arrears from the produce of last year, that without these arrears are paid, the company's affairs, as well as the Nabob's, will suffer inconveniences. Having thus stated to you my sentiments on this subject, I shall hope that you will pay an attention by making the Nabob a remittance by bill of four or five lacks of pagodas, for by the Nabob's account of the demands, this is not a quarter part of what the Tanjore country is indebted to him."

Copy of a Letter from Lord Pigot, to the Rajah of Tanjore. St. Thomas's Mount, 30th Decemb. 1776.

"SIR,

"I Have learnt with surprise the proceedings of the gentlemen in the fort, with respect to you and your affairs, and have directed a copy of the company's orders, relating to the Tanjore country to be sent you, that you may see what the intentions of the company really are, and be able to judge whether those gentlemen have not gone beyond them in their requisitions to you, in their letter of the 26th of this month. My advice is to make the orders of the company the rule of your conduct, nothing more can with justice be expected from you, and so long as you conform to them, you may be assured you will meet with the support of the company at home, as your faithful and best friends, and you will have nothing to fear from your enemies, either openly or privately.

I am, Sir, your most Obedient Servant,
Signed, PIGOT."

Translation of a Letter from the Rajah of Tanjore to his Vakeel, received about 4th January, 1777.

"THE governor has wrote me an English letter, which he sent, with a translation, by the Tappy, and which was forwarded to me by Colonel Harper; I send a copy of it to you for your information.

"There is an attempt made by the Nabob, under false pretences to get my people into his hands, that he may oblige them to write down whatever he is pleased to direct. The governor and council have given ear to him, and in consequence have wrote me in this manner: when the company act justly, I will cheerfully obey their commands; but, if they listen to every man that is prejudiced against me, and endeavour to force away my people from hence, they may depend upon my not delivering them up, while I live, let the consequences be what they will; I am ready to venture every thing; my life was formerly at the disposal of the Nabob, he missed the honour of taking it, if the company now claim that honour to themselves, what can I do? should they determine to destroy immediately, what they themselves have performed, let them do it; and God's will be done. I send this letter, together with the copy of the letter from the governor, that you may be acquainted with them, and that you may lay them before his lordship, and make me acquainted with his answer; let me know every thing the governor says; I will soon write an answer to his letter, translated from the original letter to the Vakeel."

"N. B. It may be observed in this, and the other letter, wrote by the Rajah, that sometimes when he mentions the company, he means Mr. Stratton, and the gentlemen in the fort."

Translation of a Letter from the Rajah of Tanjore to the Honourable Court of Directors of the East India Company, dated Oct. 21, 1776.

WHAT words shall I make use of to express my gratitude to you for sending the great, illustrious lord Pigot into this country, to restore to me my fort and my kingdom, and for the many other favours you have shewn me?

Thousands of tongues would not be sufficient to express your goodness or my feelings; it is instances like this, both of justice and of honour, that has spread the fame of the English company all over Hindostan, and which now serve to enlighten them like the rays of the sun. I pray to God that your power and influence may daily encrease, and that your colours may be always spread in this country, for the preservation of those, who, like myself, look up to you for redress or protection.

Permit me to lay before you some of those instances of friendship which my ancestors and myself have shewn to the nabob, and the very bad return he has made for them. When Chunda Chawn, assisted by the French and Hidaid Moden Chawn, had possessed themselves of the Carnatic, had killed the Nabob's father, and besieged himself in the fort of Trichinopoly, my father, Rajah Perdarp Sing, at the request of the English, assisted him with money and troops, and gave him the head of his enemy Chunda Chawn.

Some time after, during the war with Myfore, when lord Pigot formerly governed Madras, the farther assistance of a like nature, which was given, to enable him to vanquish his enemies, is well known to you.

When the French under M. Lally, besieged the garrison of Fort St. George, the Nabob, his wife and children, were obliged to take refuge in it. The gentlemen of Madras having sent him on board a ship to Negapatam, we offered him every assistance and relief; invited him to Tanjore, treated him there with the utmost respect and attention, and sent him with an escort to Trichinopoly.

Before his lordship departed for Europe the French were all overcome, and the peaceable possession of the Carnatick was delivered over to the Nabob. His lordship knowing the assistance this country had afforded, and being willing that we should remain on a good footing with the Nabob, he concluded a treaty in the year 1762, which was guaranteed by the English, and which I have strictly abided by. Some time after, when the Nabob marched over the Ghaut to invade Hyder Ally, both he and the English desired that I would assist him with money and troops, which I accordingly did. It was agreed, that whatever forces I sent to the assistance of the Subedar of Arcot, should be paid by me; and that the extraordinary expences and batta incurred, should be deducted off the annual pis cash: when I endeavoured to settle with the Nabob in this manner, he would not look at my accounts, but declared to the gentlemen then in the government, that I refused to pay the pis cash, and laid many other false accusations to my charge. I made every circumstance of my case known to my Vakeel, at Madras, and desired that he would communicate it to the gentlemen in charge of the company's affairs, but the Nabob would not allow him to go near them. In the year 1771, he sent an army under his eldest son, against my country, which destroyed a great part of it, and did me great mischief: he at last, forced my consent to give him fifty lacks of rupees, twelve and a half of which was paid down in ready money, the remainder was to be paid in two years: some countries were given as a mortgage for this amount, and the Nabob sent his own people to take charge of them, who injured the country very much. Besides the stipulated fifty lacks, during the years 1771 and two, the pis cash paid, amounted to eight lacks more.

I gave one half lack as a present to the Nabob's eldest son. For the expences of the people at Madras, I paid rupees 52,382, 12 ans. so that, notwithstanding the collections made in the country during two years, and the 12½ lacks paid down in ready money, there remained a balance due of rupees 11, 63, 110, 6½ ans. The Nabob having declared that if I paid this sum he would not distress my country, I mortgaged to Mr. Benfield those districts which were formerly in the possession of the Nabob: and when this gentleman's dubash came to Tanjore, I got him to write a tip for the amount of this balance, payable by one of the people about the Nabob, and which was sent to Madras and delivered to him: upon receiving it, he declared that his accounts with me were settled, and that he had no further demands upon me. Things were thus situated when the Nabob, having forgot all the good offices that were done for him, and being determined, through the most deceitful and unjustifiable means, to get possession of my kingdom, he used his influence with Mr. Benfield and his dubash, sent for the latter down to Madras, made him declare that he never wrote the above-mentioned tip, and prevailed upon him to raise many other aspersions to my prejudice. The Nabob had equal influence with those in charge of your affairs at Madras, and in the year 1773 he sent an army against me, under the command of his second son, who took my fort, put myself and my family in close confinement, stripped me of my cloaths, my jewels, my elephants, my horses, and every thing about me that was valuable; he likewise plundered my fort, my treasury, my armoury, and practised an unheard-of cruelty, in even robbing my women of the ornaments they wore. According to the accounts taken, he carried away to the amount 105,10,000 pagodas [about 4,200,000.] he enjoyed the revenues of my country for two years and a half, in which he collected 50 lacks of pagodas [about 2,000,000] more, and reduced it to a state of the utmost poverty and distress.

The Nabob having heard by a ship from Europe that lord Pigot was coming to take charge of the government, he gave Mr. Benfield and others tankas upon the Tanjore country, to what amount he thought proper. After his lordship's arrival at Madras, before he came to Tanjore, or sent an English garrison to take possession of it, I remained a close prisoner, under constant apprehension of being cut off. From this dreadful situation his lordship released me, and put me full possession of my fort and of my kingdom. Before lord Pigot's arrival the Nabob carried away the guns and every thing else that was valuable in the fort, and left only the bare walls destitute of every thing. This was soon by his lordship, who, after having enquired into the state of my finances, and every thing else relating to me, he departed from Madras. An account of the whole will be seen by you in his lordship's letters, and in that which I have addressed to him, dated Tanjore, the 13th of April, 1776.

When I received possession of the kingdom, there was a quantity of grain remaining in it, some part of which was delivered to the company, as you will see by what his lordship has wrote you.

The Nabob has not yet quitted all thoughts of governing this country, and he is using every means to distress me, that his invention can point out to him. He still with-holds from me the counties of Arnie and Hunumuntagoody, together with some other forts, which were declared to be mine by the treaty, concluded in the year 1762. This year the Cavery flowed to an extraordinary height, and broke down the bank near Kiliour, which separates it from the Coleroon: if it is not repaired the country can produce no crop, as the water of that river which fertilizes the soil would then run into the Coleroon, and by that channel fall useless into the sea; when any part of the bank was demolished, we always dug earth in the Trichinopoly country for the repair of it, but the Nabob will not allow of this at present, though it has been customary to do so for upwards of one hundred years.

When he heard that the kingdom was to be restored to me, he gave all his creditors tankas upon the country for double the amount of their debts, and after my restoration, he conferred upon me a fresh instance of his regard, by throwing this burthen from off himself, so by endeavouring to make me pay the balance due to the Tankadars. It does not appear just that I should discharge his debts, after he has stript me of every thing I possessed, and has enjoyed the revenues of my country for two years and a half. However, the company are all wise, so I shall willingly abide by their decision.

The sum of one lack of Pagodas, over and above what the country can produce, is now wanted as an advance to the farmers, and for the repair of the bank, as my finances are so circumscribed: and as the Nabob watches every opportunity of injuring me, I dread the evils which his treacherous temper may involve me in: my whole dependance is upon the company. I know that they will never swerve from the path of justice: what they have done for me will be as lasting as the moon, so I place the most thorough confidence in their friendship.

I am informed that colonel Stuart is coming to take the command at Tanjour; if he does, I fear he will interfere in the affairs of government, and foment differences betwixt me and the governor and council.

Had you not been pleased to send lord Pigot to relieve me from prison, I should before now have been deprived of my life and of my honour. I am at a loss to express my gratitude to his lordship, for having by your direction relieved me from prison; for restoring to me my kingdom, and for the great respect and attention he was pleased to shew me; judge then of my distress at hearing of his confinement, and of his being deprived of the government. The fault imputed to him is unknown to me, and I am a stranger to the laws of England. If sending for the Dobeer and Muttsuddys out of the Nabob's country, is laid to his charge as a crime, I must beg leave to inform you, that these people have for ages belonged to this kingdom. When the Nabob usurped the government, he forced them to serve him: before his lordship arrived at Tanjour, he removed the Dobeer and others, with all the records of the country, into his own dominions; without them there would be no possibility of governing: all the accounts, letters, and papers were known to them only: it was absolutely necessary that they should be brought; and they alone were sent for, who had long been subjects of this country, and who were servants of the government.

I am a dependent upon the company. I therefore expect your protection against the treachery of the Nabob. I hope that you will oblige him to restore the riches he plundered from this country, and the territories of Arni and Munumuntagoody, together with some other forts which he retains possession of, and that you will prevent all disputes relating to the bank, by putting it upon the footing it has stood upon, for such a length of time. It rests with you to determine every thing with regard to my situation. I shall gladly obey your commands, and yours only.

Whatever manufacture this country can produce, for promoting your commerce, I am ready to exert myself to the utmost for the provision of it: look upon this kingdom as your own, and if there is any town or district you wish to have, oblige me by accepting of it: send your own servants to take the charge of it; form any other regulation then that may prove advantageous to you, and I will gladly give every assistance in my power.

THE same spirit was displayed in a very important debate which came on the next day (Tuesday, Nov. 8, 1763), a worthy member * after a long and circumstantial account of the state of the nation, moved for an address to the crown "to lay before his majesty the debts of this kingdom, that the increase of that debt was owing to pensions being paid out of the revenues, without distinction; to beseech his majesty to order that no pensions should be paid out of the revenues till it should be determined in a court of justice, whether the crown may grant pensions out of the said revenues, and that the commons would provide a revenue, such as the condition and circumstances of this kingdom would admit of, to enable the crown to reward merit, and on proper occasions to confer those bounties that may be suitable to the honour and dignity of the crown, in case it should be determined that the present revenues, given for public use, ought not to be applied to pensions."

This motion was strenuously opposed by six several members. † By the first as tending to deprive the crown of the power of rewarding merit. The second made several nice distinctions between statute and common law. The third thought the crown might order pensions out of the aggregate fund of the several revenues; and considered pensions as expences necessary for carrying on government, being to be considered as included in the words public charges in the acts which the gentleman who made the motion said appropriated the revenues.—He also thought if a suit was instituted, it might be a long time before it might be decided, and from its very commencement, the payment of pensions being stopped, many deserving persons who subsisted only on the pensions granted to them would perish for want.—The fourth gentleman added, that instituting a suit would instil into the minds of the public that the proceedings of government were unwarrantable. The fifth was of the same opinion with the third, as was also the sixth, who strongly urged a reliance in the humanity of the lord lieutenant, and the impropriety of the motion, from its being brought at a time of great rioting and injunctions, not only in the country, but even in the capital.

The arguments of these opposers of the motion were in some measure confuted by two other members, * but the debate was closed by Mr. Pery, to the following purpose:

"Mr. Speaker,

"I am sorry to say that I have been more mortified and astonished at what I have heard during this debate, than I ever was in my life, particularly from the honourable gentleman who spoke last †. We have, in the same breath, been admonished against rash and violent measures, and urged to cut off the whole supply granted to the crown, because we think part of it misapplied; we have heard a pompous encomium on our dignity, and, at the same time, have been represented as feeble and needy, as relying on the humanity of a lord lieutenant, and being under the greatest obligations to his pity, for obtaining of his majesty, by the power of his intercession, what we could not, by all our efforts obtain for ourselves. Whether this would be proper language if we were soliciting a favour may well be questioned, but it is such as I cannot hear without indignation, when we are pleading our right. If we have not effected that for ourselves, which we are now told we are likely to obtain by the compassion of our intercessor, and the partiality of our sovereign, who has listened to him, tho' he disregarded us, to what is it owing? Surely to that conduct which we are now urged to continue; to a tame acquiescence in ministerial promises, and an implicit concurrence with ministerial mea-

tures;

tures: we have undoubtedly the power of doing ourselves right, and, our only just reproach is, that we have not exerted it to effect; if we have not, it is certainly time we should.

“Gentlemen who have recommended gentleness, patience, and repose in good prospects; a placid expectation of fruit from blossoms that have already appeared, have been very lavish in their encomiums on his majesty; and no man, Sir, can think more highly of his majesty than I do,—but surely they might be highly suspected of concealing the bitterest satire, under the appearance of panegyric, when they tell us, that the voice of an injured people has been heard in vain; that all our resolutions, as representative of the commons of this kingdom, made in the most solemn manner, have not been able to attract that regard which has at once been paid to an instrument of his own power, in the person of our lord lieutenant. Far be it from me, to think thus of his majesty; if our resolutions have not been effectual, it is because they have not come properly before him; there is, therefore, greater necessity for an address, and his attention to the representation of our worthy lord lieutenant gives us the most reasonable ground to hope that it will succeed. What reason can there be not to act in person, on an occasion so urgent and important? And, what ground is there to fear that the gracious sovereign, who has heard another on our behalf, will not hear us for ourselves? But the objections, that have been urged against the subject of our address, are not more extraordinary than those against the address itself. Is it not a most extraordinary maxim, “that every thing is better than a law-suit!” Could the greatest enemy of our country give it a worse character, than that every thing is better than a regular appeal for the decision of her laws! That it is better to suffer every evil that can be suffered, than seek redress from the remedy that our legislators have provided! Where is the difference of being totally without law, and having laws to which we cannot appeal, without incurring a greater evil than we can suffer by the breach of them! It is indeed, too true, that in law-suits, there is chicanery, delay, and expence; and with these evils, the gentleman must necessarily be well acquainted; but God forbid, that these or any other evils, arising from the abuse of the law, should ever be so enormous as to render law of no effect.

“But chicanery, and delay, and expence, are not the only mischiefs we are

N O T E.

* Mr. Prime Serjeant Hutchinson.

alarmed with; we have been told, that a judicial process is not only fruitless, but criminal. We have been told that it is a rash and violent measure to determine a doubtful question by law; nay, stranger still, we have been told that it is rash and violent, not to commence judges in our own cause; that it is rash and violent not to cut off all supplies, because we believe some to have been misapplied! Surely, Sir, these assertions and insinuations are astonishing in the highest degree, especially if we consider from whom they come. These seem intended to fright us from our duty, to spread a general panic by discovering a glimpse of some dreadful evils, and then hiding them in tremendous obscurity. Chaos is represented as coming again, and we are alarmed with a confusion not less than that among the elements of nature before creation. All interests, classes, and characters are to be jumbled together. King, parliament, pensioners, judges and lawyers, with families upon families are to be involved in doubt, darkness, and distress. This indeed, is very dreadful; but let us see if with a very little light, and a very little reason, we cannot palliate the distress, and dissipate both the darkness and the doubt.

“To drop all metaphor and figure, Sir, the law-suit proposed will not be complicated in proportion to the number of pensioners, or the diversity of their circumstances and situations, as has been insinuated; for the question to be determined does not respect the claims of these pensioners, but the right of the crown to dispose in a particular manner of the public money. The suit, sir, would have a single object, if the pensioners were ever so much more numerous and diversified than they are; and may be commenced by any individual, with the same advantage to the whole as if all were parties. But still other bug-bears have been held up before us; we have been told of faction and riot, of contumacy and of murder; and to be sure such monsters there are among us; but how are they to be destroyed? The honourable gentleman seems to suppose that an infringement of the law above, will contribute to the keeping sacred below; he supposes that if those who are intrusted with the rights of the people sit silent and quiet, and see them taken away, that the people will be less likely to attempt the righting of themselves, than if they saw the struggle made in their behalf by that power which is most likely to succeed: he supposes, that the readiest way to quiet the populace, is to strip and starve them, for the sake of pampering an idle and voluptuous set of miscreants on the other side of the water, with French cookery and French cloaths. The only way, sir, to quell the spirit of discontent that is risen among us, is to see the laws kept inviolate, and to enforce them upon those of the highest rank, and the most ample power; to shew to our country and the world, that the money raised for public purposes is used for the public benefit; and that every penny that is paid in taxes, is laid out to procure such national advantages, of which all participate as are more than equivalent to any advantage that would accrue to any individual, by withholding his contribution. Subordination, sir, is always best preserved by the apparent attention of the superior to the interest of those below him. Contumacy and rebellious opposition to those in power are produced only by oppression, or the appearance of it; and, when all real oppression is at an end, the appearance will soon vanish.

“Upon the whole, sir, as the pensions at present are an evil not less oppressive than odious, I am an advocate for the motion, upon the very principles on which that honourable gentleman has opposed it; at least, till some other measure is suggested, that appears more likely to produce the same effect, or to produce it in a more eligible way.”

This was the substance of Mr. Pery's speech on the above occasion,—but, alas! the question for the address passed in the negative, tho' but by a small majority.

JAMAICA.

THE Jamaica sugar is said to be the best of all our plantations, and made with the greatest ease. There were about sixty sugar mills in Jamaica as long ago as 1670, which made about two million of pounds weight of sugar; and it is said, they now make ten times as much as they did then. The Jamaica rum is esteemed the best in the world, and is in the greatest request in England. We are told about four thousand puncheons of it are exported yearly.

Horses, asses, and mules, are very cheap; and there would have been numbers of horned cattle, had not the inhabitants, who mind planting much more than grazing, lessened their stock by their inattention; so that they were, till lately, supplied with beef from the British colonies on the continent, whence they had also salted pork and fish, flour, pease, &c. Their sheep are large and fat, and their flesh very good; but the wool, which is long and full of hairs, is worth nothing.

Beef cannot be kept many days, though it be salt, and fresh beef is ready to corrupt in four or five hours.—Butchers, therefore, always kill in the morning, just before day, and by seven o'clock the markets are over.

Master, are obliged to furnish their servants, both whites and blacks, with three pounds of salt beef, pork, or fish, every week, besides cassavi bread, yams, and potatoes. Here are abundance of goats, rabbits, and hogs, but no hares or deer. Of wild fowl there is a great variety, as ducks, teal, widgeons, geese, turkeys, pigeons, Guinea-hens, plover, flamingoes, snipes, parrots, paroquets, and humming birds.

The bays, roads, and rivers of Jamaica abound with excellent fish, of almost all the European and American kinds; but the tortoise is the most valuable, both for its shell and fish, the latter being accounted the most delicious, and, at the same time, the most wholesome in all the Indies. The manatee, or sea-cow, which is often taken in calm bays, by the Indians, is reckoned extraordinary good eating.

Besides these ordinary provisions, the racoon, a small quadruped, is eaten; rats are also sold by the dozen, and when they have been bred among the sugar canes, are thought, by some people, very delicious food. Snakes and serpents, and coffi, a sort of worms, are eaten by the Indians and negroes.

The most common drink is water, or rum diluted with water, and punch.—Great quantities also of Madeira wine are drank, that wine having this peculiar quality, that it keeps better in a hot place, or exposed to the sun, than in a cool cellar: cyder, beer, and ale are also brought hither from the northern colonies. It is observed that passengers, when they come first to Jamaica, sweat continually in great drops, for three quarters of a year, yet they are not more dry than in England, nor even faintish.

This and all the other governments in the British American islands, are royal governments. The king appoints the governor and council, and the representatives are chosen by the freemen of every parish, and those assemblies make laws, but they must be confirmed by the court of England.

The inhabitants are either English, or of English extraction, born on the island: Indians, negroes, mulattos, or mestizze, or the descendants of them. The Indians are but few, most of the natives having been destroyed by the Spaniards.

Besides

Besides the militia, there is generally a regiment of foot from Great Britain here ; and a squadron of British men of war is usually stationed at Port Royal, even in time of peace. The principal part of the revenues accruing to the crown of Great Britain from Jamaica, is the duty arising from sugar, rum, and molasses, exported from hence, which is very considerable.

The religion of the church of England is the established religion in all the British islands ; but there are yet no bishops ; the bishop of London's commissary is the principal ecclesiastic in these islands.

Jamaica is divided into nineteen parishes or precincts, the chief towns in which are St. Jago de la Vega, or Spanish Town, Kingston, Port-Passage, and Port-Royal.

St Jago de la Vega, or Spanish Town, stands on the river Cobre, in a pleasant valley. The houses, tho' but one story high, consist of several commodious apartments, all of them well furnished and finished with mahogany. Here the governor and most of the principal people of the island reside, and the assemblies and courts of justice are held ; in consequence of which there are many coaches and chariots belonging to it, with plays, balls, concerts, and such like polite diversions ; but there is only one church and a chapel. Spanish Town sends three representatives to the assembly. Before the governor's house is an exchange, to which the merchants and others repair to do business. The chief inhabitants often take an airing in a savannah that lies close by the town. The night-watch, or patrol, consists of four horse and seven foot soldiers.

Kingston, the largest town on the island, stands on the bay or harbour of Port-Royal, ten or twelve miles south-east of St. Jago, and five by water, but fifteen by land from Port Royal. It stands commodiously for fresh water, and all other conveniencies of life, being about a mile long, and half a mile broad, with handsome regular streets. The harbour is one of the most commodious in America. It is about three leagues broad in most places, and so deep that a ship of seven hundred tons may lie close to the shore, and it can safely contain a thousand sail. Its entrance is defended by Fort Charles, one of the strongest belonging to the English islands, a battery of sixty pieces of cannon, and a garrison of regulars, maintained by the crown.—The river Cobre, on which Spanish Town stands, falls into this bay.

Port-Royal, notwithstanding the calamities that have befallen it, its hot and dry situation, and the want of fresh water, stones, and grass, hath been, in some measure, rebuilt, and its commodiousness hath tempted many to settle on the seemingly devoted spot, and run all risks.

Port Passage, or Passage-Fort, is a seaport town, seven miles south-east of St. Jago, at the mouth of the river Cobre, so called, because it is the greatest thoroughfare in the island. The fort here mounts ten or twelve guns.

There are several other small places and good harbours in the island, as Port Morant, Port Antonio, Port Pedro, Blue-field Bay, and the harbour of Cape Negroil.

Jamaica was discovered by Columbus, in 1493 ; and taken from the Spaniards by general Venables, and a squadron of men of war, under the command of admiral Penn, in 1654.

BARBADOES,

The most considerable of all the British sugar islands next to Jamaica, one of the chief, and most windwardly, except Tobago, of the Caribbees, is said to lie ninety miles south east of Martinico, and seventy east of St. Vincent ; between 59° . 50° . and 60° . 2. west of London ; and between 12° . 56 . and 13° . 16 . north latitude ; extending twenty-five miles from north to south, and sixteen from east to west. The superficial content is about one hundred and seven thousand acres.

The climate is hot, especially for eight months in the year, but not unwholesome ; for though there are no land breezes, there are others arising from the sea, which increase as the sun advances to, and abate as he declines from the meridian. A temperate regimen renders it as safe to live in as any climate in Europe, south of Britain. The days are very nearly equal, the sun rising about six and setting about six all the year round. The rains fall here as in other parts of the torrid zone, chiefly when the sun is vertical. The damps or dews are so great in the night, that every bit of iron will be soon eaten up with rust, if it be not in constant use. The twilights are so short here, that it is dark three quarters of an hour after sun-set. They have sometimes hurricanes in autumn, by which the plantations suffer greatly ; but they are not so frequent as in the neighbouring islands.

Barbadoes is generally a plain level country, with some small hills ; and the woods have all been cut down to make room for the plantations of sugar-canes, which now take up almost the whole island, and render it the most valuable plantation to Great Britain, for its size, that it ever possessed. Notwithstanding the smallness of the island, its soil is different, being in some places sandy and light, in others rich, and in others spongy; but all of them cultivated, according to their several natures: so that the island presents to the eye the most beautiful appearance of spring, summer, and autumn, producing sugar, rum, molasses, cotton, indigo, ginger, pine-apples, guavas, plantains, oranges, lemons, citrons, limes, or dwarf-lemons, aloes, tamarinds, mangroves, calabashes, cedars, cacao and cocoa-nuts. prickled-apples, pome-granates, papays, custard-apples, with fig-trees, cabbage, cassia fistula, mastic, and bulley-trees. The citrons of Barbadoes afford the finest drams and sweetmeats; and the juice of the limes is the most agreeable acid we know of.

As for animals, here are abundance of hogs, which are much finer eating than those of England, oxen, cows, horses, asses, goats, monkeys, and racoons, with a few sheep and rabbits; but the mutton is inferior to that of England.

Of wild fowl here are teals, curlews, plovers, snipes, wild pigeons, wild ducks, and a kind of bird called a man of war. The tame pigeons, pullets, ducks, and poultry of all kinds that are bred in Barbadoes, have a fine flavour, and are accounted more delicious than those of Europe.

Insects are very numerous, but not venomous in Barbadoes, nor do either their snakes or scorpions ever sting.

The surrounding sea abounds with fish, some of which are almost peculiar to itself, as parrot-fish, snappers, and grey-cavellos, tarbuns, and coney-fish. Their mullets, lobsters, and crabs are excellent; and the green turtle, the greatest delicacy that ancient or modern luxury can boast of: besides the variety of eating in it, it is at once so light and nutritive, that no bad consequences are known to attend it from indigestion or surfeit, be the quantity devoured ever so great.

This island has two streams that are called rivers, on each side, with wells of good water all over it; and large ponds, or reservoirs for rain-water: and in its center it is said to have a bituminous spring, which sends forth a liquor like tar; and serves for the same use as pitch or lamp-oil.

With regard to indigo, great quantities of which were formerly exported from hence, now little or none is made; but of scraped or scalded ginger, lignum vitae, citron water, molasses, rum, lime-juice and fruits, they export vast quantities.

As to imports they bring lumber, that is timber of all kinds, bread, flour, Indian corn, rice, tobacco, some salt beef and pork, fish, pulse, and other provisions, from the northern colonies; slaves from the coast of Africa; wine from Madeira, Tercera, and Fial, and likewise some brandy; beef and pork from Ireland; salt from Curassao; Osnaburghs, linen of all sorts, broad cloth and kerseys, silks and stuffs, red caps, stockings and shoes of all sorts, gloves and hats, millinery ware and perriwigs, laces, peas, beans, and oats, biscuit, wine, strong beer, pale ale, pickles, candles, butter, and cheese, iron-ware for their sugar-works, leaden ware, powder and shot, brass and copper wares, &c. from Old England.

The inhabitants of Barbadoes are reducible to three classes, viz. the masters, the white servants, and the black servants; the former are either English, Scotch, or Irish, with some Dutch, French, Portuguese, and Jews. The white servants, whether by covenant or purchase, lead more easy lives than the common day-labourers in England; and when they come to be overseers, their wages and other allowances are considerable. As to the black servants, it is the interest of every planter to be more careful of them than even of the white; the former, unless they should happen to be made free, with all their posterity, being his perpetual property. Most of the negroes are employed in the field; but some of them work in the sugar-mills and storehouses; while those of both sexes, who are most likely and handy, are employed as house-maids and menial servants. The original price of a negro, when he comes from Guinea, is from twenty to forty pounds sterling, according to their likelihood; but when they improve in any mechanic, or other trade, the price rises greatly: so that four hundred pounds have been refused for a good sugar boiler. The men are indulged in a plurality of wives.

Plantains are the chief support of the negroes, who have various ways of dressing them, but they have every week, at stated times, an allowance of Indian corn, bread, salt-fish, or salt-pork. Every negroe family has a cabin; and adjoining to it, a small piece of ground, by way of garden, in which the industrious sort plant potatoes, yams, and other roots, and rear live stock, which they are at liberty to eat or convert into money for their own use; and it is incredible what savings of this kind some of them make. They are fond of rum and tobacco ; and they generally lay out their earnings in fine cloaths, and ornaments for themselves and their wives.

The governor of Barbadoes has a salary of two thousand pounds sterling, payable out of the four and half per cent. besides a third of all seizures. The council consists of twelve members, and the assembly of twenty-two, chosen yearly, out of the several parishes, viz. two for each, by a majority of votes. Most of the civil officers are appointed by the governor, who also collates rectors to the parishes of the island. The perquisites of them are very considerable ; and their stated salary about one hundred and fifty, or two hundred pounds a year ; but the rectory of St. Michael's, in Bridgetown is supposed to be worth seven or eight hundred pounds a year. The church affairs at Barbadoes are governed by a surrogate of the bishop's appointment. There are upon the island some Jews and Quakers, but very few other dissenters.

The military establishment consists of several forts, with a good train of artillery, and a militia of six regiments of foot, two of horse, and a troop, called the troop of horse guard.

The island is divided into several precincts, and these again into parishes, in which the only place of any note is Bridgetown, situated on Carlisle bay, in the south west part of the island, and having the best, or rather the only harbour therein. It is reckoned the finest and largest town in the Caribbee Islands, if not in all the English West India colonies, taking its name from a bridge in the east part of it, erected over the waters that come from the neighbouring marshes, after rains. It is the seat of the governor, council, and assembly ; and also of the court of chancery. The governor's house is about a mile out of the town, but unhealthy, on account of the neighbouring marshes.—There are several forts and batteries about the town and bay, the latter of which is large enough to contain five hundred sail, and has twenty fathom anchorage, in water so clear, that the bottom may be seen, but so rocky, that cables are always buoyed up with casks.

Here is a college, with a revenue for professors in the several sciences, to which colonel Codrington was the principal benefactor.

The island was first resorted to by the English in the reign of king James I. but James, earl of Carlisle, obtained the first grant of it in 1625, the first year of king Charles I. who parcelled it out to the several adventurers that transported themselves hither.

St. CHRISTOPHER's,

Called by our seamen St. Kitt's, lies between 17°. 10. and 17°. 46. north latitude, about 62°. 30. west of London, four miles north of Nevis, and about sixty from Antigua. Its length, from east to west, is twenty-five miles and a half ; its greatest breadth, from north to south seven, and its circumference about seventy-five.

It was discovered by Christopher Columbus in his first voyage to America, who is said to have called it St. Christopher, not from his own name, but from the figure of a very high mountain in the upper part of it, which bearing a lesser one on its summit, put him in mind of the picture of St. Christopher, who is represented as a giant, with our infant Saviour on his back.

The air is sultry, but pleasant and healthful. A ridge of mountains runs through the island, the tops of which are overgrown with palmettoes, cotton trees, lignum vitæ, but the sides and the skirts of them are very fertile. This island produces not only sugar, but tobacco, indigo, ginger, pine-apples, papaws, tamarinds, prickly-pears, two different kinds of pepper, with cotton, maize, gourds, water-melons, lettuce, parsley, peas, purslane, and many other vegetables.—The sugar in quality is thought superior to that of Barbadoes. This island is well supplied with springs and hot baths, the mountains being of a sulphureous composition. In a mountain about three miles north of Fort Charles, there is said to be a silver mine : but it is not worked. The whole land on the island fit for sugar plantations is computed not to exceed 24000 acres, and those of light sandy soil. At the south-east end are salt ponds, which yield a salt more strong and pungent than the French. They are said to make three hogsheds of sugar here to one of rum.

There are several forts in the island, well provided with arms, artillery, and military stores.

Basseterre, the capital, is a handsome town, situated on a cape, that has a bay on each side, fit for shipping, and is secured by Londonderry fort towards the east, and by six batteries, raised at different landing places, and mounting forty-three cannon.

ANTIGUA,

Is of a circular form, about twenty miles each way, and near sixty in circumference.

It has more good harbours than all the English islands in these seas; yet so encompassed with rocks, that it is of dangerous access in many parts, especially to those that are not well acquainted with the coast. Of these harbours, the chief are, Nonesuch, St. John's, English, and Fal-mouth harbours, Willoughby and Carlisle bays.

The climate is hotter than Barbadoes, and very subject to hurricanes. The soil is sandy, and there are but few springs, and not so much as a single brook in the island; so that its chief dependence for fresh water is on what falls from the skies; yet for all this it is a thriving plantation. Its product is much the same with that of the other Caribbee Islands. As good Muscovado sugar is made here as in any of the sugar islands, and they also have learned the art of claying it.

This island contains above seventy thousand acres, and produces, besides sugar, ginger, cotton, pine-apples, plantains, wild cinnamon, and other tropical fruits, with some tobacco.

There is more venison here than in any other of our Caribbee Islands, with great plenty of fowl and black cattle.

St. John's, which was once almost destroyed by a dreadful fire, is the capital of the island.

Maria's Embarrassment—Figures in the gay World—Her Indiscretion—A Supper—Tete-a-Tete—A Surprise.

JOY had, after her evening's adventure at Lady Hardy's, banished sleep from the bright eyes of Maria. She arose at nine, and prepared for the business of the day. She made her morning visit to lady Hardy, who called on her at seven in the evening. She accompanied her again to the assembly, more radiant than the star of morning. She looked round the rooms with a glance of inquiry; alas, the most charming of mankind was far away! she attempted to play, but in vain; she arose from the table, made an apology to lady Hardy, and retired home, where she shed tears of regret and vexation. The next night she saw lord Melville at the opera. He artfully told her he intended the next morning to set out for his seat in Yorkshire, where he should continue some time. She had not the remotest doubt of his intention to marry her. Poor Maria!

This journey was a stroke she did not expect. How could she pass the tedious hours of lord Melville's absence from London?

Lady Hardy accosted her in the following manner: you have youth, beauty, and understanding, my dear Miss Villiers. If you wish to carry your point with Melville, you must have a house, servants, carriage, and a thousand other necessary et ceteras, without which, you will ever be regarded as one whom no-body knows, and be admitted into good company by a kind of courtesy, which is exceedingly humiliating. Let me send you my coach-maker. I will find you a ready furnished house, and a footman, with the true intelligence of a domestic of condition. Pursue this plan, and, in less than six weeks, I shall see lady Melville's carriage at my door. Maria forgot the state of her almost exhausted finances, and consented to all lady Hardy proposed. She was determined to make this new arrangement before lord Melville returned from the country.

Maria's chariot, which was now purchased, glittered, not unobserved, amongst the brilliant carriages at lady Hardy's door. She descended, and her heart fluttered with pleasure, at appearing in a style so becoming the future lady Melville.

She was sitting absorbed in contemplation when the door opened, and she saw entered the room—no other than the god of her idolatry, the all-accomplished lord Melville, whom she imagined far distant at his father's seat in Yorkshire. Lord Melville seated himself by her; his softened tone of voice, Mrs. Villiers's appeared confusion, the glance of tenderness she could not conceal, all tended to confirm ideas unfavourable to the honour of our heroine. Lord Melville, after talking for some time, in a half whisper to Miss Villiers, rose rather abruptly, and desired his chair to be called. Our Maria rose at the same time, and the hall resounded with Miss Villiers's carriage and servants. A thousand inquiring glances followed them, a thousand mouths, eager to speak, opened at once, a thousand faded countenances bloomed anew with a momentary glow of malevolent delight. Lady Blast hurried home, and dispatched cards to a dozen of her female friends (a venerable band who had figured forty years before as her sister demi-reps) to drink chocolate with her the next morning.

If Miss Villiers was elated with the sudden return of her noble lover, a return which she, with great appearance of probability, bability, attributed to the excess of his affection, and his inability to live longer absent from her; she was still more so on receiving from him the next morning a letter, in which, after some general professions of the most ardent passion, he intreated permission to attend her in Berners-street any evening she would appoint, without witnesses, on a subject of the utmost consequence to the future happiness of his life, and he flattered himself of hers. She read the letter a thousand times. She wrote him a short card, inviting him to tea, and, if he had no other engagement to supper, on Thursday evening.

The most perfect ignorance of the world, and the most unsuspecting temper existing, will, in candid minds, but in no other, apologise for Miss Villiers's extreme imprudence in inviting lord Melville to a tete-a-tete supper; and that, in consequence of a declaration, which was far from being explicit, as to its tendency. The exuberance of her joy had once more hurried her beyond the bounds of that indispensable, that cardinal virtue, discretion; a virtue without which all others lose their exterior lustre, and which is the only adequate guardian of female honour. Maria's invitation left lord Melville not a doubt of success in his design; a design he had been forming with great coolness and deliberation ever since he left his father's seat in Yorkshire. He therefore sat down, to consider how he should regulate the future household, and state the necessary expences, of our heroine, whom from this moment he regarded as a part of his equipage. His marriage, the preliminaries of which were settled, though he had not yet seen his intended bride, and which was to be concluded soon after his father's return to town, made it impossible for him to think of taking her to Grosvenor-street. It was therefore necessary she should have a house, and an establishment of her own. Naturally liberal in every part of his expence, he was profuse, and with a strong mixture of ostentation, in his pleasures. As vanity was the predominant passion of his soul, he could not resist the triumph his imagination promised him, in producing (as soon as decency after his marriage would permit) so much beauty, as his property, to the world.

The fortune of the destined lady Melville, and the consequent settlements to be made by his father on himself, would render his situation affluent, and justify a little extraordinary expence in so important an article as a mistress. Miss Villiers's person, her air, her conversation, her deportment, her tout ensemble, conveyed so strikingly the idea of a woman of condition; she was so formed to become an elegant style of life; her present appearance (if we set aside her being in a lodging) was so correspondent to that idea, that he could not think of offering her common terms. Convinced, as he was determined to be, that she was an adventurer, and that her views corresponded with his own; yet he felt a kind of respect, when with her, for which he could not account.

A moment, gentle reader, let us step to lady Blaft's. Ten dowagers obeyed her summons; the merits of the cause were fully stated; and, after debates which might have done honour to the senatorial abilities of A — and B — themselves; debates whence ministers and patriots might equally have culled the fairest flowers of elocution; Miss Villiers was found guilty of having, by her indiscretion, forfeited her title to be one of the world, and was, in consequence, adjudged to be degraded from the place she at present occupied in the immaculate coterie into which lady Hardy had so kindly introduced her. The dreadful sentence of banishment from what these venerable matrons called good company was denounced in form by lady Blaft: who, after signifying the decree in writing to Miss Villiers's protectress, lady Hardy, proceeded to dissolve the assembly. The benevolent sisterhood, having hurried down their chocolate, dispersed different ways to publish the award of the court, and, to do their possible, that, from this instant, no-body should let Miss Villiers in.

Absorbed in her fairy-dream, and insensible to every object but lord Melville and her coronet, Maria walked in air. The crisis so ardently wished was at hand; she was arrived at the smiling summit of hope. A thousand gay fountains of happiness, the delusive offspring of credulity and expectation, chased each other, in her imagination, like the ever-varying clouds of the dawn.

The door opened, and lord Melville, unexpectedly, entered the room. His lordship, who had been riding in Hyde Park, had there met the lovely lady B —, who had insisted so earnestly, before twenty of the most fashionable people in town, on his meeting her at Almack's on Thursday evening, that he must have lost all reputation as a gallant man had he refused. Not that he had the least inclination for lady B —, or she for him: on the contrary, she was strongly suspected of giving the preference to her lord; but she was amazingly the ton, and therefore to be distinguished by her was of the utmost consequence. What was to be done in this perplexing situation? To have postponed an assignation would have been as great a solecism in gallantry as to have refused lady B—'s challenge: to anticipate it would have a much better air.

He settled it with himself, to call on Miss Villiers before he went home; to dissimble a little impatience, and to prevail on her, if possible, to change the time she had fixed for their tete-a-tete, and permit him to sup with her the approaching evening, after the opera.

He addressed her with that persuasive easy grace so natural to him on all occasions, and so extremely useful on most, and found very little difficulty in carrying his point. Her present situation, setting her love aside, made procrastination extremely inconvenient to her: she had failed in one of her great pursuits; it was therefore indispensably requisite she should be clearly informed what she had to expect as to the other; and an eclaircissement, though her modesty would have deferred it, could not arrive too soon. Lord Melville returned home to dress; and Maria sent for Mrs. Merrick up stairs, to order her supper. She explained herself no farther than by saying, she should have a friend to sup with her, and desiring to have the table set out with elegance. Mrs. Merrick supposed the expected guest to be lady Hardy, who had more than once supped with our heroine before; but had too much respect for her young lady (so she always called Miss Villiers) to asked the question. She withdrew, to make the necessary arrangements for the evening; and Miss Villiers retired to her dressing-room, to prepare for the most important hour of her life; an hour, on the events of which depended the good or ill of her whole future days; an hour, which was to decide whether she was destined to be the most wretched, or the most happy, of womankind. Ten o'clock came; he had promised not to stay the whole opera—the watchman went the half hour—he had never known half an hour so long—eleven—she looked peevishly at her watch—at a quarter past eleven, lord Melville made his appearance—

A thousand apologies—the crowd—his carriage could not get up—he had met with ladies in distress in the passage, and could not refuse his assistance—Nothing was so unlucky—She might judge what must have been his impatience—He presented her with a bouquet of roses from his father's villa in Kent, praised her dress, and told her all the little anecdotes of the opera. She talked too, as soon as that mixture of anxiety and diffidence, which had taken possession of her on lord Melville's entrance, would give her leave. She talked, good gods! how she talked! could he be otherwise than charmed!—she talked of him. She praised his dress; every thing he wore was so exquisitely fancied. He was in all so superior to other men! she flattered, without herself perceiving it, his taste, his understanding, his politeness, his knowledge of the world, his refined connoisseurship in the elegant arts. He was enchanted—with the subject at least. He listened to her with the most gentle complacency, found she had infinite wit, tho' she had not yet said one word which merited such an appellation; and applauded himself for having once made a choice for which he should not have occasion to blush. He repaid her in kind the incense she so liberally bestowed; the conversation was consequently pretty dull, and, as it could entertain only themselves, may be omitted without any loss to the reader.

This mild, inoffensive chit-chat filled up the interval, a very short one, between his lordship's arrival and the appearance of supper. They sat down; lord Melville ate amazingly, found every thing excellent, asked her if her cook was French, and was with difficulty convinced of the contrary. Mrs. Merrick had really this evening surpassed herself; and she was by no means unlettered in the fashionable science of good eating. Miss Villiers, inebriated with the pleasing hope of finding lord Melville the man of honour she had always believed him, and happy at seeing him appear pleased with her entertainment, forgot the important crisis of her fate was arrived. She forgot that her future life must probably take its colour from the hour that was on the wing; and found her anxiety, before the supper was ended, give way to modest confidence and convivial delight.

She recovered that chearful ease, that something above serenity, which is so absolutely necessary to render our social moments pleasing; and gave way, by degrees, to all the natural vivacity of her temper. The bewitching melody of her voice; the softness of her manner; that lovely femininity; her sprightly sallies; chastised by delicacy and good-breeding, commanded lord Melville's admiration through all his sang froid, and threw a new lustre round the attractive graces of her person.

They had supped, the conversation was beginning to grow interesting. Lord Melville, after a thousand protestations of the most sincere attachment, had gone so far as to declare that the happiness of his future life depended intirely on passing it with her. He had proceeded, in expressions which were rather equivocal, to offer her carte blanche in respect to settlements. As her idea of the word settlement differed very essentially from his lordship's, she looked on their marriage as concluded, and could with difficulty restrain the transports of her heart. She blushed, looked abashed, dropped a tear of mixed tenderness and gratitude, and was for some time unable to speak. She at last assumed sufficient courage to tell him, though with hesitation, that she had the most lively sense of his lordship's generosity and nobleness of sentiment; but that she loved him for himself alone, and was indifferent to every other consideration. As he looked on these as words of course, which meant nothing, he pressed her to be more explicit. She was going to answer, when the door opened, and a very genteel man, about twenty-five, in regimentals, entered the room, with an air of the most perfect ease and unconcern, humming a part of one of the favourite songs in Montezuma. He stopped short, appeared confused, looked round with astonishment, and, addressing Maria with the most respectful air, attempted to apologise for an intrusion which he had not intended. 'Can you forgive me, Madam? I found the street-door open, and mistook it for my own apartment, which is in the next house. I am ashamed of my indiscretion, but you have nothing to fear from it.' He hurried down, after he had said this, without waiting for an answer. Neither Miss Villiers nor lord Melville could speak; they were both petrified with surprise. His lordship's was, however, a surprise mixed with uncertainty and chagrin. He knew not how to give credit to the stranger's story of mistaking the house; it was very improbable, to say no more. He might be a lover, and a favoured one; or, at least, one who had been favoured, and was still in the list of her friends. His familiar manner of entering the room, his embarrassed address to Maria, his retiring without waiting an answer, gave lord Melville, who had been taught to think ill of the human heart, suspicions still more injurious to both. He even fancied, and how creative is fancy! that he had seen mutual glances of intelligence. He thought it more than possible he was in danger of becoming a dupe to the most infamous artifice; and that Maria, in her seeming attachment to him, had been only acting an assumed character, in order to deceive. His vanity combated, but could not conquer, this very mortifying idea. Unable to recover his good-humour, or to resolve in what manner to take this extraordinary adventure, he found it impossible, and indeed he thought it impolitic, to resume the conversation. Miss Villiers, who was still more disconcerted, without having merited to be at all so, had an air of perplexity and self-condemnation, which added strength to lord Melville's suspicions. She was much more at a loss than his lordship, how to behave in so uncommon a conjuncture. The confusion she felt, on the stranger's entering the room, gave her the first idea of her own imprudence in allowing lord Melville's midnight visit. The stranger's apology for his intrusion; though apparently respectful, shewed too plainly the light in which he regarded the party. She was alarmed, she was determined to be more guarded for the future; she intreated lord Melville to retire. She was not without apprehension as to the continuance of his esteem. She dreaded losing his good opinion, by that very indiscretion of which her too great anxiety to oblige him had been the sole cause. The delicacy, inseparable from real affection, taught her to be the more careful of her own honour, because it was soon to be his. In short, without knowing well how to develop her ideas, she found them crowd upon her too fast for expression; nor indeed were they such as she would have chosen indiscriminately to communicate. The continuity of the scene being broken by this unexpected event, and both feeling an embarrassment which made it very difficult to recover the thread of their discourse; each found a thousand plausible reasons for separating, and deferring the subject, on which they were just entering, to another opportunity.

End of Part III.

Female Virtue and Greatness displayed in Principle and Conduct.

WHEN Miss Pelham received and read her Colinda's first letter, she was perplexed how to answer it; she could not be so unpolite to the young lady her most intimate friend, as to remain silent. Yet what could she say? her situation was rendered extremely delicate, and Nancy had as delicate a sense of it. If she owned it, and he did not proceed, how would she appear? deny it she could not; to equivocate would fix the charge of coquetry on her, a part she despised, nor could she act it; she could be silent, she was used to that; but artfulness and hypocrisy was foreign to her. But when Mr. Trenchard arrived and brought the second epistle, and the reading of it was followed by as zealous and affectionate an address as could be made to any woman, a rei-

a reiterated profession of his long determined purpose, her way was clearer to answer her friend, which she did in these terms.

LETTER XX.

From Miss Pelham, to Miss Collet.

You do me honour, and real kindness, my dear Colinda, when you ask, in your usual stile, my constant confidence: you have it, my friend. If I had a secret while I lived at the manor, and acquainted her not with it, it was wholly owing to the perplexed nature of it, that I knew not how with any degree of prudence to let it escape me to any person living that did not first discover it themselves. If I could, Miss Collet would have been the Person, and the time I waited on her the season. But honestly, my dear, I had no secret until the evening after that. But are you not a little inconsistent, to call that a secret, a big secret, a secret that rolls in torrents, is town-talk, a talk that is become public, and ask me in the same page to commit it to your breast? How is this? Is Miss Collet's brain turned? Ah! Mr. Harmel, it was not before you had engaged little Cupid on your side! but I will not rally you. I love, and thank, and prize my Colinda for her friendly cautions, and kind warnings; I'll store them for use, and bind them to me as a crown. Continue them, and add your just rebukes as you see them wanted; they shall be as an excellent oil, that, instead of wounding, shall cure my maladies. If I am distinguished by the worthy heart, as an object of desire, I must be far gone in the fever of vanity, to assume airs of consequence; my brain must be turn'd indeed, for who in their senses would go about to divest themselves of qualities, the reputation of which has gained them the esteem that has raised that desire? If this is a specimen of prudery or coquetry in your estimation, pray be honest and tell me. My circumstances are too intricate, too much involved in perplexity to be more explicit than I am. I cannot say any thing more explanatory at present than that my love to you admits no rivalry, nor I believe, will while I can sign the name, and that I believe will be a long time, of

NANCY PELHAM.

My letters to you must now be seen by none, not even Mr. Harmel, who is not only master of your secrets, but your heart too, and to whom I hope you will very soon vow fealty, before many witnesses.

Mr. Trenchard, tho' very earnest in his suit, had little success at E—n. Mr. Pelham gave no countenance to his addressing his daughter, though he treated him like a gentleman. Mr. Pelham talked modestly and wisely; he was entertained hospitably, nor could they do otherwise by a son of lady Trenchard. For his own sake he was entitled to polite usage, and for their daughter's to civility; politeness, hospitality, and civility was all he had to boast of. Nancy could not encourage his proposal, nor would he desist: she told him honestly she could not be ungrateful to his father, nor risk her own happiness and his; it was by no means a fit match. He pressed hard to find whether she had any personal objections; he put it to her closely, whether if he was in circumstances nearly equal to hers: if every thing of him was in another, of inferior rank and wealth, she would refuse him. She owned she should not. He put it to her father; he tacitly owned the same. Hard, said he, very hard, to be heir to a title and an estate, only to single me out for a title to crosses and losses the most painful to bear: if these are entailed to the heirship of a barony, I will relinquish my right to the phantom of honour, to the wealth of the manor! and if there be one fool enough to accept it on these terms, he shall be the inglorious possessor. He was moved, he moved her father that he could say no more; Nancy was moved, but she was actuated by more durable principles than a fleeting feeling. She steadily resisted the plea, yet with a mild complaisance she treated the refusal; he went away more confirmed of her worth, less encouraged, yet more resolute to continue it than ever: he went home very dull. See letter, No. 30,—continued pensive, finding he could not with prudence advise with, or open his mind to any in the family, nor did he expect relief from his relations. He saw Mrs. Masham had put on the politician, and he expected the rest of his great connections would adopt like maxims: he bethought himself of Mrs. Butler, whose character was, as he had often heard, established for prudence, and constancy in friendship: he went to pay her a visit, and was highly pleased with his reception, as he had been also with that lord W—y gave him, see No. 35.—After this he tarried at home three weeks, and then set out (in a more open manner, with a servant to attend him) for E—n. Arriving there by noon, he put up at the best inn, dined and went to Mr. Pelham's. Miss Nancy was then absent at a relation's house at Bath, about seven miles from E—n; thither he immediately rode, but did not meet with her until the next day in the evening: he waited on her to her lodgings, and on invitation from her cousin spent the evening in her company and some other ladies and gentlemen: next morning he again waited on her, and earnestly solicited her return home (she generously nerously complied, and at her mother's sending, (he went the next day) he went that day back to E—n, and prevailed on Mrs. Pelham to send for her daughter; in the mean time, as he had no acquaintance in the town, he thought it a piece of decent respect to make his compliments to Sir James Parker, the chief gentleman of the place; he did, and was politely entertained by him and his lady, they insisted on his taking a bed, &c. at their seat whenever he came to E—n; there he spent the day and evening, and in course of conversation it so happened that they spoke of Mr. Pelham's family; lady Parker praised Miss Nancy much, said "she was one of the finest young creatures she knew:" he supposing they knew of his suit, asked their opinion, (the first of their hearing of it was from him.) They gave him their sentiments; he went next morning to see Miss Nancy, found her very thoughtful, and the situation of her mind the same. "She owed so much to the Trenchard family, that it was the point of her ambition to behave suitable to her obligations, and as she respectfully, but freely told him, she could not bear the thoughts, instead of making grateful returns, for such an exuberance of favour, that she of all persons should be the one who should occasion variance and strife: how would it wound her own peace! how base must he appear to his father, to every dear connection! under what disagreeable circumstances should she bring him! how disgraceful to her ever revered lady! who had bestowed her love and her care upon her, from her youthful days: she could not think of entering the closest and most indissoluble of all connections under such apprehensions. If she did, and was so happy as to retain his affections, how distressing to her to see him banished his parents presence! avoided by his relations, and neglected by his acquaintance; the right owner in reversion of such an ample inheritance, reduced to low fortune, reduced on her account! undergoing many painful mortifications, painful if not in themselves, yet to one born and educated, and caressed, and esteemed, as he was! If he had greatness of mind to bear these more than probable consequences, yet the very knowledge that she had occasioned them, would embitter her hours! She begged, she intreated him to withdraw his purpose!" The cautious girl stood as one on the brink of a precipice, shuddering at the horrid sight of the gulph below. The gulph, she thought within herself, is fludded here and there with crystalline rocks, but I may sink in the waters, and what avail the sparkling gems on its surface? All Mr. Trenchard's arguments failed of success. Lady Parker founded her apart. She had the like answer, nor could some flattering hopes assuage her fears, nor abate the steadiness of a mind (not obstinately but) rationally firm. See No. 32, for this journey.

After his return he visited Mrs. Masham, who told him Sir William was as determinately set against the match as ever. No. 33, Sir John Holt, brother to the late lady Trenchard, hearing of this affair, sent for his nephew to London. There had been a long variance between Sir William and he; so that they had no love for one another, but rather an apparent enmity; a severe trial to lady Trenchard, for she loved her brother, and loved her husband, and beside she had no other near relation, and the gentlemen could never mention each other, but a bitter epithet prefaced or ended the speech. How cutting to one of her delicate gentle temper! Nancy knew more of this trial than any one else, and it had its weight with her on her own affair, lest thus it should prove with Mr. Trenchard, and his brother Jack on her account. Mr. Trenchard went to visit his uncle, who, with his lady and children, treated him affectionately, and talked of his designed match with tenderness. See No. 34. We will now leave Mr. Trenchard, and his feelings and conduct for a while; referring to his private journal, for a sketch of his proceedings, &c. and pursue Nancy through the windings and perplexities of her own mind. Observing by the way, that she had no help from her parents, her father was silent and her mother was cautious and diffident. Lady Parker was peremptory in urging her to accept Mr. Trenchard, but she could suggest nothing of that side, but what Nancy knew as well, therefore she received no light from her; Miss Collet finding by a private way, that matters hung thus, in statu quo, wrote warmly on Mr. Trenchard's side as follows.

LETTER XXII.

Miss Collet to Miss Pelham.

I should think, my dear Amanda, if some ladies were so long demurring, that they were guilty of affectation, or had a spice of what in vulgar speech is called quiddling; but I know too well to think thus in this case. But what ails you? tell me plainly, have you an aversion to Mr. T—? But this cannot be, he has sense enough, he is reputed to be a good scholar, to have a polite taste, he is well bred, he certainly is an accomplished man. But if you have, tell him so, and petemptorily refuse his offers, and there's an end of the

the matter. If not, what in the name of wonder makes you hesitate? O Nancy, Nancy!

In spite of all the virtue we can boast, let your memory finish the aphorism: think you not, my lovely friend, Mr. T——d will not avail himself of this remark? love has its Argus eyes; his have acquired more penetration since last January than ever before, or I have no judgment; he will persevere, for he certainly loves you, unless you can do more than I think you can, scorn, and condemn him, and treat him accordingly; have you perplexities? tell me, my dear, let your Colinda reach out a helping hand, to extricate you out of the maze; no one beside me shall know aught you say. Trust me, 'tis not idle curiosity, vain prying, but real love that makes me enquire; 'tis because I feel interested in all your concerns; can I be unconcerned while you are distressed? be free, be explicit, command my best efforts and you have them; be speedy to ease the solicitous heart of

Your COLINDA.

Miss Harmel is vastly pleased with your affair: she will be married soon, and intends to invite you to her wedding; do not disappoint her, me and my bride-man, my brother, your humble servant, and many others, by refusing her.

LETTER XXIII.

Miss Pelham to Miss Collet.

You oppress me with your generous lines; yet O how soothing to the distressed heart is the love of a real friend! as such I take pride in my Colinda. But you call on me for the reasons of my demur, as you are pleased to term it; but I wonder not that you think I deliberate. All the world that know it will undoubtedly make remarks on the poor Nancy Pelham. Some will say she is a prude, others a coquette; some that she knows not her own mind, is fickle, vain, &c. I am not to satisfy that world, I would approve myself to God, my conscience, and next, to my dear friends, one of whom is my Colinda. I wish to please every one, but this cannot be. I hope finally to please those who have the best title to order me, those to whom I am most accountable, and you among the rest. You call on me to be explicit; I am when I tell you I do not demur; Mr. Trenchard cannot charge me with that: if he has I shall be sorry for him, because though I cannot consent to be his, yet I too much honour him to be willing he should in any one thing act or speak unworthily himself, as deviation from truth in any one point is.

I repeat, I do not demur. That the matter is not entirely over rests with him. I have repeated to him so often, and so plainly that I cannot be his, and my reasons for it, that I am ashamed to repeat it again, yet he will not let me alone. And what can I do? you say scorn and condemn him, and act accordingly; no, Miss Collet, I cannot do that. I must esteem him until I have reason to alter my opinion of him; I do esteem him, but what then? does it follow I must have him? I esteemed Mr. Tait, I esteem Mr. Digby, Mr. Jones, Mr. Stains, Mr. Eवलant, and others, besides Mr. Trenchard, Mr. Collet, and Mr. Harmel; yet I am under no necessity to have either of those named, or unnamed; or even to marry at all. I know of no law, either human or divine, enacting me to marry, or if I do, to marry Mr. Trenchard. But to be more explicit still, I like Mr. Trenchard as well as I believe I ever shall like any man, while I am single. My objections are not personal, but circumstantial; here you will think the girl's pride is up; as she cannot be received into the family as its head, she will have the honour of rejecting him, who would have placed her in that light. Others have said this; perhaps Miss Collet and Miss Harmel think it. But this is not the case, for could I have prevented it no one should have known I had opportunity to make the refusal. Circumstanced as I was, at the time when the proposal was made, I was forced to acquaint one person with it; that one has faithfully kept the depositum; all that has transpired originally came from Mr. Trenchard. He sent my father word, who thought himself bound to tell Sir William (I am sorry he ever did, I might easier have put an end to it if he had not, but he acquainted me not of it till he had been to the manor) Sir William was the sole cause of its being sent through W——n B——h. We were so careful of Mr. Trenchard's credit, that no one family at E——n knew it, till Mr. Trenchard told it at Sir James Parker's, on his second return here. My cousin at Bath, where Mr. Trenchard came twice while I was there, knows not a syllable of it yet. Our servants dare not lift it; we have but two, both honest faithful creatures, who would not offend my parents for the world, and they are charged. Mr. Trenchard is treated here just as his brother would be if he came, as the sons of my greatest benefactor. I am sorry it is known. I entreated Mr. Trenchard not to make it known. I did at the first of his coming; I have done it again and again; but he will do as he pleases, he has a right so to do, do, you will say; and for me to call him to account any farther, will be to own myself more connected with him than I am. But this is not unravelling my case; I will proceed; my reason is still against yielding; I know Sir William's temper well; I know Mr. Trenchard, though not so perfectly, and if I am not mistaken he partakes a little of each of his worthy parents. He has, I will be so honest as to say, much of my excellent lady's; he can condescend, and when he does, it is, with a good grace; he can love and esteem a virtuous character, even in low life; is generous, is affable, is candid, and has a pitiful heart to objects in distress, and will, I believe, make a good master to his servants; his own servant adores him, and all Sir William's domestics love him; I believe he will make as good a landlord if ever he comes to possess the manor. Yet have I some reason to think he resembles his papa in some things which Miss Collet has spoken very freely of Sir William to me. If this is the case, may not that same temper be one cause of his strange perseverance? if it is, what other effects may I live to see and to feel when that is gratified, and I no way to help myself, and can only sit down and reflect, that I might have foreseen and prevented my situation? I hope if ever I marry, I shall be willing to submit my inclinations and desires to my husband, and be more willing to deny myself for him than for any one else. Yet will I be loth to determine that this is the principle that doth in any degree actuate him, since he could have kept it private, and so spared himself the mortification of having the world know that he put it in a certain person's power to dismiss him. Then again, I think that tho' he really (agreeable to his protestations) is willing to forego a life of affluence, of ease and of state, of general estimation, of popularity, to be excluded from his great connections, to be in a degree sequestered from the great world, and what is more, accounted as an alien from his brethren, and father's house, for the sake of possessing in an irrevocable union that same person; yet human nature is human nature, and natural ties are strong and lasting, therefore in time they will operate, and though his affection continue strong to me, yet will he not, ought he not to love, his own parent, his only brother, his aunt M—, his uncle H—, and others? surely yes, or I could not love him; and will it not be a lasting grief, that he cannot receive and give the mutual tokens of the dearest affection to them? a grief to him, and a grief to me, and the more, because our union being the occasion, he will out of generous tenderness, and from his known manly spirit, try to secrete this grief from me; so will it prey more intensely on him, and the thought of this will be cause of yet more inward anxiety to me.

Added to all this, I account myself as bound in stronger ties of esteem and of gratitude to his family, than to any persons (except my own parents) in the world; that it is my duty to seek their peace and welfare; how then can I answer it to myself to do that (knowing what I know) which will have the greatest tendency to divide and estrange from each other the principal members? What can I expect as the fruit of such a conduct, but to experience ingratitude from all I have, or shall ever oblige and benefit, if I act such an ungrateful part? To be despised by the worthy parent of my (if I marry Mr. Trenchard, it must be with such feeling) dearest, most beloved, and to me most amiable friend and husband; to be hated by him who yet will love my partner, and only for my sake suffers the loss of such a beloved son; yea banishes him from his home; his patrimony, and what is worse, his presence, because he thinks it the less evil of the two, i. e. rather to reject the son, than with that son receive a daughter so disagreeable; no matter what the ground of his aversion to me is; the fact is the thing that is to influence me, not the kind, with this I have no business. He is to judge for himself, and I, even partial as I am to myself, cannot censure him; let him think as he will of me, I ought and will try to reverence him. Further, if a union takes place, will it not be the closest, the strongest, and the tenderest that we can know in life? if we are happy in each other, we shall feel it to be so; our joys and our sorrows must be mutual; we shall esteem those who esteem our partner, our other self; we shall sit loose by those who disaffect them; and if we think any one despises them, we shall go near to hate them; and can I be willing to occasion that awful sensation in Mr. Trenchard towards his own father? how can I think without horror of even setting light by my parent, and so bringing that curse of God upon me, and at his call the curse of all the people of God! and is not his the same interest? O my dear, I cannot think of consenting, while things appear to me as yet they have done. With all this plainness have I dealt with Mr. Trenchard, except that remark on his partaking of Sir William's only disagreeable quality; and as this is only conjecture, and chiefly founded on what you, my friend, used to say of him, I think it would be ungenerous, rous and rude to mention it. This passage is marked thus & c.

I have said little or nothing about his being reduced to low circumstances, tho' here an ample field presents to view, left he think riches and grandeur are what I aim at, when, if I know my own heart, I should not chuse to live the life his mama was obliged to, while health was allowed her. She indeed was above the world, while incircled with its gaieties; but there are few like minded, and she told me herself the best part of her life, in her own estimation, was that wherein sickness called her from state, company, and amusement, to the retirement of a chamber; and when I have been lamenting her weak and pained hours, she has pathetically said, "O Nancy! this is, nothing to suffer, to what I have felt, when my time and my thoughts have been so vainly spent in idle visitings, and gaudy shows. Welcome weakness and a sick room; gladly did I exchange the assembly, and the ball for thee." O how has she warned me to beware of the dissipations that attend fashionable life! the owned "they were too, too alluring; when once we get a taste we are apt to be intoxicated, and then, O then we are liable to go on from one draught to another, till our whole frame is poisoned!" Considerations of my own aptitude to be led astray by these temptations, and the more as not born and used to them, make me rather dread than wish ever to encounter them. I can live on a little. Nature has few real wants, and those are by frugality and temperance pretty easily supplied; I am of Dr. Young's opinion,

The poor are half as wretched as the rich.

And they would not so often be that if they were provident and thankful. But I view this on another account: Mr. Trenchard has not been used to a little; 500l. a year for pocket expenses, and living in such a father's house, where all is grand genteel and generous, is a vast difference from what he has to expect if I accept his proposal: he knows not what it is scarcely to wish for any thing, much less be straitened; and who can tell how it will be with him, when he comes to realize what I foresee? It is time to have done, though I have much more to say why I cannot be his—his in a particular sense I mean, for I shall still be his as well as,

My dear Miss Collet's, (and every amiable friend at R^{te}-n Borough's)

Sincere well wisher,

NANCY PELHAM.

Let not a syllable of this transpire; it is best to make no more room for talk.

Dr. Dodd's Last Prayer, written June 27, in the Night previous to his Suffering.

GREAT and glorious Lord God! Thou Father of Mercies, and God of all comfort! a poor humble publican stands trembling in thy awful presence; and under the deep sense of innumerable transgressions, scarce dares so much as to lift up his eyes, or to say, Lord, be merciful to me a sinner!

For I have sinned, oh Lord! I have most grievously sinned against thee; sinned against light, against conviction; and by a thousand, thousand offences, justly provoked thy wrath and indignation! My sins are peculiarly aggravated, and their burden more than ordinarily oppressive to my soul, from the sight and sense I have had of thy love, and from the high and solemn obligations of my sacred character!

But, oppressed with consciousness, and broken in heart under the sense of guilt, I come, oh Lord! with earnest prayers and tears, supplicating thee, of thy mercy, to look upon me; and forgive me for his precious merit's sake, which are infinitely more unbounded than even all the sins of a whole sinful world! By his cross and passion I implore thee, to spare and to deliver me, O Lord!

Blessed be thy unspeakable goodness, for that wonderful display of divine love, on which alone is my hope and my confidence! Thou hast invited, oh blessed Redeemer! the burdened and heavy laden, the sick in soul, and wearied with sin, to come to thee, and receive rest. Lord, I come! Be it unto me according to thy infallible word! Grant me thy precious, thy inestimable rest!

Be with me, thou all-sufficient God, in the dreadful trial through which I am to pass! and graciously vouchsafe to fulfil in me those precious promises, which thou, in such fatherly kindness, hast delivered to thy afflicted children! Enable me to see and adore thy disposing hand, in this awful, but mournful event; and to contemplate at an humble distance thy great example; who didst go forth, bearing thy cross, and enduring its shame, under the consolatory assurance of the joy set before thee

And oh, my triumphant Lord! in the moment of death, and in the last hour of conflict, suffer me not to want thine especial aid! Suffer me not to doubt or despond! But sustain me in thy arms of love; and oh receive and present faultless to thy Father, in the robe of thy righteousness, my poor and unworthy soul, which thou hast redeemed with thy most precious blood!

Thus

Thus commending myself, and my eternal concerns into thy most faithful hands, in firm hope of a happy reception into thy kingdom; oh my God, hear me, while I humbly extend my supplications for others; and pray, That thou wouldst bless the king and all his family: that thou wouldst preserve the crown in his house to endless generations; and make him the happy minister of truth, of peace, and of prosperity to his people! Bless that people, oh Lord! and shine, as thou hast done, with the light of thy favour on this little portion of thy boundless creation. Diffuse more and more a spirit of christian piety amongst all ranks and orders of men; and in particular fill their hearts with universal and undissembled love:—Love to thee, and love to each other!

Amidst the manifold mercies and blessings vouchsafed through thy gracious influence—thou Sovereign Ruler of all hearts!—to so unworthy a worm, during this dark day of my sorrows: enable me to be thankful; and in the sincerity of heart-felt gratitude to implore thine especial blessing on all my beloved fellow-creatures, who have by any means interested themselves in my preservation! May the prayer they have offered for me, return in mercies on their own heads! May the sympathy they have shown, refresh and comfort their own hearts! And may all their good endeavours and kindnesses be amply repaid by a full supply of thy grace, and abundant assistance to them in the day of distress;—in their most anxious hours of need!

To the more particular and immediate instruments of thy providential love and goodness to me, oh vouchsafe to impart, —Author of all good!—a rich supply of thy choicest comforts! Fill their hearts with thy love, and their lives with thy favour! Guard them in every danger; soothe them in every sorrow: bless them in every laudable undertaking: restore an hundred-fold all their temporal supplies to me and mine: and, after a course of extensive utility, advance them, through the merits of Jesus, to lives of eternal bliss.

Extend, great Father of the world! thy more especial care and kindness to my nearer and most dear connections. Bless with thy continual presence and protection my dear brother and sister, and all their children and friends! Hold them in thy hand of tender care and mercy; and give them to experience, that in thee there is infinite loving-kindness and truth!—Look with a tender eye on all their temporal concerns; and after lives of faithfulness and truth, oh bear them to thy bosom, and unite us together in thy eternal love!

But oh, my adorable Lord and Hope! suffer me in a more particular manner to offer up to thy sovereign and gracious care my long-tried and most affectionate wife! Husband of the widow, be thou her support! sustain and console her afflicted mind! enable her with patient submission to receive all thy will:—and when, in thy good time, thou hast perfected her for thy blessed kingdom, unite again our happy and immortal spirits in celestial love, as thou hast been pleased to unite us in sincere earthly affection! Lord Jesus, vouchsafe unto her thy peculiar grace, and all-sufficient consolation!

If I have any enemies, oh thou who diedst for thy enemies, hear my prayers for them! Forgive them all their ill-will to me, and fill their hearts with thy love! And, oh, vouchsafe abundantly to bless and to save all those, who have either wished or done me evil! Forgive me, gracious God! the wrong or injury I have done to others; and so forgive me my trespasses, as I freely and fully forgive all those, who have in any degree trespassed against me. I desire thy grace to purify my soul from every taint of malevolence; and to fit me, by perfect love, for the society of spirits, whose business and happiness is love!

Glory be to thee, O God! for all the blessings thou hast granted me from the day of my creation untill the present hour! I feel and adore thy exceeding goodness in all; and in this last and closing affliction of my life, I acknowledge most humbly the justice of thy fatherly correction; and bow my head with thankfulness for thy rod. Great and good in all!—I adore and magnify thy mercy: I behold in all thy love manifestly displayed; and rejoice that I am at once thy creature and thy redeemed!

As such, oh Lord, my Creator and Redeemer, I commit my soul into thy faithful hands! Wash it and purify it in the blood of thy Son from every defiling stain: perfect what is wanting in it: and grant me, poor, returning, weeping, wretched prodigal—grant me the lowest place in thy heavenly house; in and for his sole and all-sufficient merits—the adorable Jesus;—who, with the Father and the Holy Ghost, liveth and reigneth ever, one God, world without end. Amen! Amen! Lord Jesus!

Sketch of the Life of an Old Maid.

MISS Eleanor Grizzle was the only daughter of a Pawnbroker, who dying when she was twenty-two years of age, left her in possession of a fortune somewhat above seven hundred a year. Miss Grizzle, who had been always very homely, never met with a suitor during her father's life time : but when her fortune came to be known she did not fail of admirers. She however, began to think that what had been denied to her person ought to be paid to her riches ; and she determined not to listen to the address of any man whose fortune was inferior to her own. It is not therefore to be wondered at, if Miss Grizzle, without the advantages of person or education, had but few admirers : she was, successively, addressed by an officer on half pay, two fortune-hunters, and a tradesman on the verge of bankruptcy ; all of whom pretended to be at least her equals in point of fortune : but her father's business having taught her caution, she examined into their circumstances, and discovered the truth. Having lived from her thirtieth to her forty-third year without a single admirer, she wisely determined to reject all future solicitations, and retired to a house she had purchased in Bedfordshire, attended only by a man and a maid-servant. How to employ her time was now the difficulty. The woman who has wished to be a mother must have some other animal to amuse her in the room of children. Her trusty man-servant sought the country round for lap-dogs ; the maid worried every neighbour for tabby cats ; the honest rustics supplied her with jays, magpies and squirrels ; and the lady herself made three journeys to London, to purchase parrots and monkies. Thus furnished, Miss Grizzle feels very little of that lassitude which arises from want of employment. On her leaving bed her first care is to feed her birds : the dogs and cats breakfast with her ; and the attendance of the monkies and squirrels diverts the rest of the morning. From dinner till tea-time she converses with her parrots, and, if the weather be fine, employs the rest of the day till night, in visiting her neighbours, and recounting the wonderful perfections of her animals. Miss Grizzle is now in her sixty-seventh year ; and recoilects to have purchased, begged, bred, or buried forty dogs, seventy-nine cats, six jays, twenty magpies, fourteen squirrels, ten parrots, and eleven monkies !

The Modern Man of Honour. Illustrated in the History of Mr. Belville. By the late Philip Dormer, Earl of Chesterfield.

THOSE, who attack the fundamental laws of virtue and morality, urge the uncertainty of them, and alledge their variations in different countries, and even in different ages in the same countries. Morality, say they, is local, and consequently an imaginary thing, since what is rejected in one climate as a vice, is practised in another as a virtue ; and, according to them, the voice of nature speaks as many different languages as there are nations in the world.

The dangers and ill consequences of this doctrine are obvious, but surely the falsity of it is not less so ; and the most charitable opinion one can entertain of those who propagate it is, that they mistake fashion and custom, for nature and reason. The invariable laws of justice and morality are the first and universal emanations of human reason, while unprejudiced and uncorrupted ; and we may as well say, that sickness is the natural state of the body, as that injustice and immorality are the natural situation of the mind. We contract most of the distempers of the one, by the irregularity of our appetites ; and of the other, by yielding to the impetuosity of our passions ; but in both cases reason, when consulted, speaks a different language.

I admit, that the prevailing customs and fashions of most countries are not founded upon reason, and on the contrary, are too frequently repugnant to it ; but then the reasonable people of those countries condemn and abhor, though, it may be, they too wittingly comply with, or, at least, have not courage enough openly to oppose them.

The people of rank and distinction, in every country, are properly called the people of fashion ; because, in truth, they settle the fashion. Instead of subjecting themselves to the laws, they take measure of their own appetites and passions, and then make laws to fit them ; which laws, though neither founded in justice, nor enacted by a legal authority, too often prevail over, and insult, both justice and authority. This is fashion.

In this light, I have often considered the word honour in its fashionable acceptation in this country, and must confess, that, were that the universal meaning of it throughout this kingdom, it would very much confirm the doctrine I endeavour to confute : and would be so contrary to that honour, which reason, justice, and common sense point out, that I should not wonder, if it inclined people to call in question the very existence of honour itself.

The character of a man of honour, as received in the beau monde, is something so very singular, that it deserves a particular examination ; and, though easier observed than described, I shall endeavour to give my readers a description of it, illustrated with some original pieces, which have luckily fallen into my hands.

A man of honour is one who pre-emptorily rily affirms himself to be so, and who will cut any body's throat that questions it, though upon the best grounds.—He is infinitely above the restraints, which the laws of God or man lay upon vulgar minds, and knows no other ties but those of honour; of which word he is to be the sole expounder. He must strictly adhere to a party denomination, though he may be utterly regardless of its principles. His expence should exceed his income considerably, not for the necessities, but for the superfluities of life, that the debts he contracts may do him honour. There should be a haughtiness and insolence in his deportment, which is supposed to result from conscious honour. If he be choleric, and wrong-headed into the bargain, with a good deal of animal courage, he acquires the glorious character of a man of nice and jealous honour: and if all these qualifications are duly seasoned with the gentlest vices, the man of honour is complete; any thing, his wife, children, servants, or tradesmen, may think to the contrary, notwithstanding.

Belville is allowed to be a man of the most consummate honour, that this or any age ever produced. The men are proud of his acquaintance, and the women of his protection; his party glories in being countenanced by him, and his honour is frequently quoted as a sanction for their conduct. But some original letters, which I shall give my readers, will let them more intimately into the particulars of so shining a character, than mere description would do.

He had run out a considerable fortune by a life of pleasure, particularly by gaming, and being delicately scrupulous in points of honour, he wrote the following letter to his attorney, after an ill run at play:

'SIR,

'I had a damned tumble last night at hazard, and must raise a thousand within a week; get it me upon any terms, for I would rather suffer the greatest incumbrance upon my fortune, than the least blemish upon my honour. As for those clamorous rascals the tradesmen, insist upon my privilege, and keep them off as long as possible; we may chance to ruin some of them, before they can bring us to trial.

Yours, &c.

BELVILLE.

To Mr. Tho. Goosetree, attorney, in Furnival's Inn.'

But, lest the endeavours of Mr. Goosetree should prove ineffectual, Belville, from the same principle of honour, resolved, at all events, to secure that sum collaterally, and therefore wrote the following letter to the first minister:

SIR,

'I was applied to yesterday in your name by  to vote for the point, which is to come into our house to-morrow; but, as it was extremely contrary to my opinion and principles, I gave him no explicit answer, but took some time to consider of it. I have therefore the honour now to acquaint you, that I am determined to give my concurrence to this affair; but must desire, at the same time, that you will immediately send  to me, with the fifteen hundred pounds he offered me yesterday, and for which I have a pressing occasion this morning. I am persuaded you know me too well to scruple this payment before hand, and that you will not be the first person that ever questioned the honour of,

SIR,

Your most faithful humble servant,
BELVILLE.

I find another letter of the same date, to a lady, who appears to be wife of his most intimate friend:

'MY DEAR,

'I have just now received yours, and am very sorry for the uneasiness your husband's behaviour has given you of late, though I cannot be of your opinion, that he suspects our connection. We have been bred up together from children, and have lived in the strictest friendship ever since; so that I dare say he would as soon suspect me of a design to murder, as wrong him this way. And you know it is to that confidence and security of his that I owe the happiness that I enjoy. However, in all events, be convinced that you are in the hands of a man of honour, who will not suffer you to be ill-used; and, should my friend proceed to any disagreeable extremities with you, depend upon it, I will cut the cuckold's throat for him.

Yours most tenderly.'

The fourth and last letter is to a friend, who had, probably, as high notions of honour as himself, by the nature of the affair, in which he requires his assistance:

'DEAR CHARLES,

'PRYTHEE come to me immediately, to serve me in an affair of honour. You must know, I told a damned lye last night in a mixed company, and a formal odd dog, in a manner, insinuated that I did so: upon which, I whispered him to be in Hydepark this morning, and to bring a friend with him, if he had such a thing in the world. The booby was hardly worth my resentment; but you know my delicacy, where honour is concerned.

Yours,

BELVILLE.'

It

It appears, from these authentic pieces, that Mr. Belville, filled with the noblest sentiments of honour, paid all debts but his just ones; kept his word scrupulously in the flagitious side of his conscience to a minister; was ready to protect, at the expence of his friend's life, his friend's wife, whom, by the opportunities that friendship had given him, he had corrupted; and punished truth with death, when it intimated, however justly, the want of it in himself.

This person of refined honour, conscious of his own merit and virtue, is a most unmerciful censor of the lesser vices and failings of others; and lavishly bestows the epithets of scoundrel and rascal upon all those who, in a subordinate rank of life, seem to aspire to any genteel degree of immorality. An awkward country gentleman, who sells his silent vote cheap, is with him a sad dog. The industrious tradesmen are a pack of cheating rascals, who should be better regulated, and not suffered to impose upon people of condition; and servants are a parcel of idle scoundrels, that ought to be used ill, and not paid their wages, in order to check their insolence.

It is not to be imagined how pernicious the example of such a creature is to society; he is admired, and consequently imitated; he not only immediately corrupts his own circle of acquaintance, but the contagion spreads itself to infinity, as circles in water produce one another, though gradually less marked out, in proportion as they are remoter from the cause of the first.

To such practice and such examples in higher life, may justly be imputed the general corruption and immorality, which prevail through this kingdom. But, when such is the force of fashion, and, when the examples of people of the first rank in a country are so prevalent as to dignify vice and immorality, in spite of all laws, divine and human, how popular might they make virtue, if they would exert their power in its cause? and how must they in their cooler moments, reproach themselves, when they come to reflect, that, by their fatal examples, they have beggared, corrupted, and, it may be, enslaved, a whole nation?

The Progress of Petitioning: or, the History of a Wisher. Written by himself.

AT the age of twenty I began to wish; and I have continued to weary Heaven with one foolish request or another, till within these twenty-four hours. It will not, I judge, be unamusing, nor perhaps uninstrucive, to give the public the general facts of my story: which I shall commence from the time when I first set up the business of a wisher.

At the death of my father I found myself easy enough in point of circumstances, but I did not much relish the life of bachelor. I had no society in my house that could be supposed to care much about me; for servants are mercenary, a dog sleeps too much to be good company, and the purring of a cat is but a poor, melancholy amusement in a long evening. The one dear thing needful soon struck my fancy: I wanted somebody to take a little notice of me; and so I began the work of wishing, by wishing for a wife. The more I considered this, the more essential it appeared. Without more preface I hasten to tell you, that I threw an eye of observation amongst all ranks of my acquaintances on the female side; and became a perfect connoisseur in light hair, clean teeth, handsome hands, good shapes, and pretty features.—Passion seemed to dwell the most upon a young, hale, clear-complexioned woman, whose character and humour I had long known; I obtained her consent, which was independant of friends, and we were soon united. After the ceremony I lived above forty hours without a single wish; but after that period I began my business afresh, by kneeling by my bed-side, folding my hands, and addressing Heaven in the following manner:

“O! Providence! thou great giver of all good things! I acknowledge to have received from thy bounty the blessing of a wife—She is just suited to my taste, and I am convinced we shall be very happy together; but, alas! what is a wife without children? What is marriage, unless the bridal bed is sanctified and rewarded? It is a tree without fruit. I therefore, beseech thee to prosper my virtuous endeavours, and grant me an heir—nay more, let me have both a son and a daughter! then will my happiness be full and competent.”

Heaven assuredly spread the holy dew of benediction upon this petition; for about four months afterwards, the symptoms of pregnancy shewed themselves towards the waist of my wife, and I made a great feast on the occasion, in which I did not forget to acknowledge the goodness of God. Three days more did I remain quiet to smile over the promises of an heir; but on the fourth day I again began to wish.

“Oh! sole disposer of all events that are yet in the womb of time (said I), hear my humble petition, which nature extorts once more from the bosom of a parent! Let the child that is now in embryo be beautiful, beautiful, if it prove of the female kind, and endure it with strength of nerves, if of the other sex !—Consider how my heart is wrapt up in the consequence—I rely, most, submissively, upon thy benignity !”

I rested pretty quietly after this till my child was born: it proved a son. I saw it brought into the world; and delivered upon my knee, an instantaneous address to providence. I desired, in this fresh memorial, that my new-born might be possessed of every thing requisite. I set forth the necessity of power and fortune. I requested that his soul might be aspiring, and that all his aspirings might be successful. I requested that he might prosper under the sun-shine of a court. Grant these blessings, and my happiness will be complete !

Sure Heaven was in a humour to grant me every thing ! even this prayer was heard : my son was born, received from nature a strong constitution, and from fortune a thousand favours.

Satisfied with these blessings, I did not pray for any thing more till my wife again discovered the symptoms of breeding : It proved to be a daughter. I fell upon my knees to implore the beauty of a face, and symmetry of limbs. No sooner had I wished, than my prayer was granted. My daughter was the fairest of the fair.

This was the crisis when I fondly supposed the business of wishing wholly over. Alas ! I little imagined that I should have any occasion to view the rewards of my petitions in a less pleasing light. But mark the issue : my wife in her old age became so addicted to toys and trinkets, that I was obliged often to expostulate with her upon the subject of her frivolousness : these expostulations created quarrels, and these quarrels produced aversion, and this aversion terminated in a separation, which separation ended in mutual hatred in the extreme.

I was now again upon my cushion of prayer, to beseech the tender mercies of providence to make me again as free as a bachelor : again I wished for the society, which before was not thought sufficient. I could have, in exchange for the torments of a wife, been contented with either the snoring of a dog, or the purring of a cat : nay, I could have been perfectly satisfied with a clear house, and any thing, indeed, but a wife in her dotage. My wish, therefore, now was, that I had never been mad enough to wish for a wife.

Another matter was, that my son, when he had suddenly risen to the first dignities in the state (just as I had wished), when he had arrived to a perfection in all the manner of a court, exactly as he was seated on the pinnacle of favour, fell a victim, like Wolsley, never to rise again.—He was disgraced, exiled, and universally execrated. At the receipt of this news, I dropt with great misery upon my knees, and again implored the kind author of all favours. My tears were all shed, to think that I had ever begot a son ; and my wish now was, that I might hear speedily of his death.

Soon after this wish, my daughter turned out the most egregious coquette in the universe. She made fools of all her suitors ; she triumphed in her conquests, and gloried in the misery and duels that she occasioned. She gave encouragement to her lovers, only to deceive them by a laugh. This conduct, as might be expected, reduced her at length to contempt and wretchedness. Upon this occasion you may guess my wish. I need not tell you that I wished either that she had been born without beauty, or that she had never been born.

Thus was every one of my prayers granted in vain ; thus were every one of my hopes frustrated. I meditated upon the whole matter. I execrated my own impatience ; but at length I somewhat quieted myself by this moral consideration, viz. That as Providence knows what to grant, and what to withhold, it is impious to direct the Omnipotent ; as we ourselves are ignorant very often of what is really proper for our felicity, we ought to leave the whole matter to the choice, precision, arrangement, and regularity of that providence, which will, without our interruptions, grant what is sufficient for our real repose.

Trial of John Harrison, at the Old Bailey for a Forgery.

ON Friday, September 12, about half past ten o'clock in the forenoon, Mr. John Harrison, late accomptant to the London assurance company was arraigned at the bar, upon an indictment consisting of no less than twenty-four counts, which would be too numerous and voluminous for us either to inform or entertain our readers. If there had been four hundred and twenty counts, they would all have been resolvable in this short indictment: that the said John Harrison had feloniously forged or altered, certain figures, in a book of account between the bank of England and the London assurance company, from the sum of two hundred and ten pounds, to the sum of three thousand two hundred and ten pounds, purporting that the said latter sum was paid into the bank, that is, by changing the figures 2101. into the

the figures 3210l. authenticated by the signature of ——— Clifford, one of the bank clerks, with an intent to defraud the governor and company of the bank of England, or the London assurance company: these were the two first counts. The counts were then varied, on account of the London assurance company being under two charters; first, for insuring shipping; second, for insuring houses and goods against loss by fire; the company keeping separate accounts for these different branches, though only one account with the bank.

From four counts they were doubled to eight, and then four more counts added, with very little variation; then the counts were numbered from twelve to twenty-four; but neither the clerk nor the opening council thought proper to go minutely through them all, chusing rather to refer to one another, but neither being particular, Mr. Fielding opened in common form; when Mr. Bearcroft, leading counsel for the prosecution, opened at large, with great candour and moderation, nearly in terms as it came out in the proof; it would therefore be improper to particularize any otherwise than by reciting the following evidence, only he informed the jury, that the main stress of the prosecution would hinge upon the following statutes: act 2 of George II. and the 7th of the same reign, and the 31st.

The first witness called was Alexander Aubert, Esq.

Mr. Cooper, counsel for the prosecution. Sir, are you deputy governor of the London assurance company?

A. Yes.

Q. What office did the prisoner bear?

A. The accomptant.

Q. In what manner does the bank keep accounts with the company?

A. On the left hand is placed the date, the clerk's name who receives the cash, and at the end of the line the sum in figures, and makes a bar.

Q. Have you got the book here?

A. Yes. (produces it.)

Q. Did the committee meet in July?

A. Yes, the 9th.

Q. Who had the book in charge?

A. The prisoner.

Q. Had he any money in charge from time to time?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you remember the prisoner being called on the 9th of July, to produce the book to the committee of treasury?

A. Yes.

Q. Did he deliver the book?

A. It was left ready for inspection.

Q. Did he attend the committee that day?

A. We waited for him, but he did not come.

Q. Where did you find him?

A. At Mr. Richardson's in Wapping.

Q. In what situation did you find him?

A. In very great agitation.

Q. Did you inform him of the affair?

A. I told him we had found the account deficient in a large sum.

Q. Did he return with you?

A. Yes, with one of his sureties.

Q. Did you give him any encouragement to come back?

A. I persuaded him to return to the committee, to explain the account; and I would do every thing I could do with propriety and consistency.

Cross examined.

Q. Did you not produce a bond?

A. It was produced to me.

Q. Did you not write an assignment to yourself?

A. It was assigned to me for the use of the company.

Q. How much was the bond for?

A. It was for 7552l.

Q. In consequence of your assurance, did he return to the committee?

A. Yes, he did.

Q. Did he complain of one Macky?

A. He complained that Mr. Macky had borrowed, first small sums, then larger, till at last the sum came to be very large.

Q. When you first saw him he was under no restraint, but in the house of his friend?

A. No, he was under none.

Q. You were sent by the company?

A. I thought it my duty, as deputy governor, enjoined me to do what I could for the good of the company?

Q. When you found him in Wapping, did you make him any promise?

A. He was in so distressed a state of mind, I was afraid he would make away with himself.

Q. Did you use any other means than those mentioned to prevail with him to confess?

A. No.

Q. From Judge Gould. Do you think he would have returned but for that promise?

A. I know not what to say to that; I believe neither he nor I thought the offence capital at that time; only a breach of trust.

Q. From the same. Whether you think that that by that promise he understood you would protect him?

A. I cannot believe he could think that; the offence was too great for me to think of palliating it.

Q. Can you inform the court the whole deficiency of the prisoner's account?

A. About 7570l. or rather more.

Q. Have you a bond from Mr. Macky for the amount of the whole deficiency?

A. Nearly.

Q. What is the amount of the second bond?

A. 7582l. We were advised by our solicitor to take a bond simply from Mr. Macky, and for that sum, being the nearest.

Q. Was this bond in satisfaction of the first.

A. Yes.

Q. Had you any letter of the prisoner soon after he went?

A. Yes; our secretary received a letter from the prisoner soon.

Q. Are you well acquainted with the prisoner's hand-writing, and believe this letter to be his?

A. Yes.

[The letter was read, informing the secretary in the most artless, yet moving terms, of the unhappy situation he had reduced himself to, by lending the company's money to a friend, who had deceived and betrayed him, expressive of the greatest anguish and regret; yet regardless what became of himself, choosing rather any death than the mortification of facing the committee, after such a fatal breach of trust. The letter inclosed an account of his cash with the company, as perfect as his distracted state of mind would permit.]

Q. The prisoner alone had the care of the book?

A. Yes; nobody could come at it but himself, and with his knowledge.

Mr. George Hall examined.

Q. You are secretary to the London assurance company?

A. Yes.

Q. Who produced the book?

A. Mr. Austin produced it to Mr. Aubert.

Q. Did any thing happen to make an enquiry necessary?

A. The company wanted money.

Q. How soon after he went did you receive the letter?

A. Soon.

Q. Was any thing inclosed in it?

A. Yes, this account produced.

Q. You know Mr. H.'s handwriting, you say?

A. Yes.

Q. Have you been long acquainted with it.

A. Yes, seven years.

Q. Look at the book; is there any part of it his hand writing?

A. Yes, the figure 3.

Q. Do you form your opinion from your knowledge of his hand-writing?

A. Yes.

Court. You mean the figure 3 before the name Clifford.

A. Yes.

Court. Look at the figure 3 over head. Is that account brought over by the prisoner or the clerk of the bank?

A. By the prisoner.

Mr. Austin sworn; objected to by the prisoner's counsel, on the ground, that his evidence against the prisoner tended to exonerate himself from the charge of the three thousand pounds in dispute. This was answered by Mr. B. on the ground of the necessity of using the only evidence to a fact existing: and if he was rejected, there would be an end of all evidence by merchants clerks, and others, for the same objection would lie against them all.

The objection being over-ruled, he was examined.

Q. Do you remember the book being asked for the 9th of July; and how did the book come into your hands?

A. The prisoner delivered it to me with a write off for 4000l.

Q. You delivered it; to what clerk did you apply?

A. I did, to Mr. Clifford.

Q. When you delivered it did that produce a discovery?

A. I turned over the leaves for the blotting paper, and cast my eye on the sum 210l. which I had paid in the 16th of June, altered to 3210l.

Q. To whom did you pay the money?

A. To Mr. Clifford.

Q. When he returned the book was the right sum entered?

A. Yes.

Q. Can you take upon you to say that is Mr. Clifford's hand-writing?

A. The 3 is an addition.

Q. Are you acquainted with the prisoner's mode of making figures, and how long?

A. Yes, about ten years.

Q. Can you take upon you to say you believe that is Mr. H.'s, and does he use a similarity of figures?

Answer to both, yes.

Mr. John Clifford sworn.—Objected to for the same reason with Mr. Austin, as in case the charge was not brought home to the prisoner, the transaction lay between them respecting the 3000l. The objection answered

answered and over-ruled on the same grounds, whereupon he was examined.

Q. You enter cash, notes and bills, paid into the bank?

A. Yes.

Q. Look at the article, 16th June, 1777; what money did you receive?

A. Two hundred and ten pounds and no more.

Q. Did you make entry?

A. Yes.

Q. What entry?

A. June 16, bank notes, Clifford 210l.

Q. Did you make a bar before the figure 2?

A. I believe I did.

Q. Did you write the figure 3?

A. It is not my hand-writing.

Q. Did Mr. Austin bring you the money?

A. Yes.

Q. To the amount of cash and bank notes you consider yourselves as chargeable on account of the bank?

A. Yes.

Q. Did any body else make an entry with you?

A. No.

Q. Did the bank notes pass from your hands to Mr. Foster to enter.

A. Yes.

Q. It is usual for you to carry over the account in your check books?

A. We do it for some; others do it for themselves.

Q. Whose hand writing is the line and sum on the top of the page, brought over 35500l. and odd.

A. All of Mr. Harrison's hand-writing.

Mr. Foster examined.

Q. You are entering clerk at the bank?

A. Yes.

Q. Are there any notes entered on the 16th of June, 1777?

A. Yes; London assurance company, 210l.

Q. Mr. Clifford handed these notes to you?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you enter them in one sum?

A. Yes.

Q. Does another clerk enter the notes separately?

A. Yes.

During the examination of witnesses, the book was handed up to the bench, and from thence to the jury, to all of whom it appeared clear there was an erasure of the bar, and the figure 3, in the place of thousands, made with a different hand from the 210l. on the erasure.

The evidence being closed on behalf of the prosecutors, Mr. Howarth, counsel for the prisoner, pleaded that his client's case did not come within any of the acts quoted, upon their own shewing, the 2d act of George II. being only directed against forgeries for money or goods; now bank notes are neither: and before a certain act, the stealing of bank notes was not felony. That the 7th of Geo. II. was made to explain the other, and recited the clause; and further provided, that the penal clause should extend to bills, notes, acquittances, and other securities: in which the matter in question was clearly included, but so as to extend to corporations, but persons only. That the act of 31 Geo. II. extending it to corporations, recites, act 2 of George II. but is quite silent as to act 7th of George II. therefore this last can have reference to nothing but the 2d, and cannot be construed to comprehend the act of the 7th.—After some gentle debate this plea was sustained by the bench, and, by consent, the verdict was to be given subject to the opinion of the twelve judges upon the point of law. Mr. Morgan followed Mr. Howarth, in a few words.

Although Sir Henry Gould principally conducted the examination of the evidence, Sir William Blackstone summed up to the jury, and recapitulated in a very minute, candid and circumstantial manner, much in the terms of the preceding narrative, stating facts precisely, pointing out very humanely not only the apparent unfraudulent design of the unhappy prisoner: but also holding forth the excellent character given him by several respectable gentlemen, particularly Robert Weston, Esq; who had known him 20 years, been connected with him in a very great trust; and in that as well as every thing else, had acquitted himself a worthy honest man. Confirmed by Mr. Randall, Mr. Benjamin Adams, and many others ready to attest. Indeed his lordship observed, his general character needed no support, and remarked further, that Mr. Aubert admitted the prisoner left 1900l. in the desk when he first disappeared. The judge then referred the jury to the consideration of the prisoner's intention to defraud. If they thought he had not, they would acquit him, otherwise they would find him guilty; reminding them, however, that the council for the prosecution had abandoned the first eight counts, and if they found him guilty it would be on the succeeding ones.

The jury withdrew about a quarter of an hour, and brought in their verdict Guilty, upon the 9th, 10th, 13th, 14th, and some other counts.

Just as the verdict was pronounced, an uncommon bustle was heard in the gallery over the Middlesex jury, somebody called out, "The gentleman is dead;" some person had fainted. Mr. Harrison himself behaved, with becoming resignation and fortitude, and left his defence to his council.

On the Origin and Dignity of Free Masonry.

WHEN the almighty architect of the universe had finished his most glorious works, he pronounced them to be all very good; and as he left his creatures to imitate his example in a subordinate degree, hence the origin of masonry, and all the beneficial consequences that have flowed from it. It is uncertain how far free masonry was carried on before the days of Solomon; but all authors have agreed, that when that great prince finished his famous temple, the art was reduced to a system, and ever since that period free masons have lived together as brethren. Many ridiculous stories have been told concerning their form of admission, but this was the effect of ignorance and prejudice. The greatest and the best men in all ages, and in all civilized nations, have considered it as an honour to be admitted into this more than honourable society. Indeed, this is not much to be wondered at, when we consider that all the rules of the societies of this worthy fraternity, obliges the members to do good. No indecent expression is to drop from their lips; no injury is to be done to their fellow-creatures; but, on the contrary, they are to be modest in their deportment; and when their brethren solicit their assistance, they are obliged to relieve them. King Henry the IV. of France, being asked by one of his courtiers what he considered as his highest honours, answered, "The granting toleration to Protestants, and being admitted a free mason." King Charles II. of England, was frequently grand master of the free masons, and many pleasing and innocent amusing evenings he spent with them. It may be asked, why did so many great men desire to become masons? and why does that desire still continue? To this I shall answer, that masonry or architecture is the grandest art in the world; from the construction of a cottage or a farm-house, up to the most noble palace, all are necessarily exerted, and the aid of human learning must be called in. It was by masonry that temples were first erected, for the worship of the Divine Being; and by that useful art, even the poorest are screened from the inclemency of the weather. By architecture, or masonry, we are enabled to enjoy in elegance the fruits of our industry; and by it our ancestors were protected from the rapacious hands of the invading foe. It is therefore not much to be wondered at, that an art so useful and honourable should inspire its members with such sentiments as must ever do honour to human nature. How can we be surprized to find ingenious artists, who have spent many years in acquiring knowledge, first reducing that knowledge to practice in utility and elegance, and then going on to support each other as brothers. Upon the whole, free masonry, whether we consider it as an art, or its members as a society, is one of the noblest institutions for the good of mankind. There never was an instance in which they injured the peace of human society, but there are many of their having relived the afflicted.

Account of the Spanish Barber, or the Fruitless Precaution, a new Comedy of three Acts, performed at the Haymarket Theatre, for the first Time, on Saturday August 30.

Dramatis Personæ.

Count Almaviva, - -	Mr. Palmer.
Dr. Bartolo, - - -	Mr. Parsons.
Lazarillo, - - - -	Mr. Edwin.
Basil, - - - - -	Mr. Blisset.
Argus, - - - - -	Mr. Jackson.
Tall Boy, - - - - -	Mr. R. Palmer.
Arcade, - - - - -	Mr. Egan.
Notary, - - - - -	Mr. Stevens.
Rozina, - - - - -	Miss Farren.

COUNT Almaviva, a Spanish grandee, has accidentally seen Rozina at Madrid, and being enamoured with her beautiful person, discovers that she is an inhabitant of Seville, reported to be the wife of Bartolo, an old, jealous physician of that city. On her quitting the capital of Spain, he follows her to the place of her residence, and the play opens with a scene representing the Count in disguise, reconnoitring the windows of Bartolo's house, in Seville, which holds his mistress. He is interrupted in his amorous soliloquies by the arrival of Lazarillo, who had at Madrid served the Count, and who presently recognizes his old master: a mutual recollection takes place, and after Lazarillo has related the account of his fortunes, and what brought him to Seville, Almaviva declares that the cause of his disguise and present attendance at such a distance from Madrid, was his passion for the fair Rozina, whose good graces he means to endeavour deavour at obtaining under the assumed name of Carlos. The explanation over, they retire on hearing a noise at the window, which is what the French term grillée, in English outwardly guarded with a kind of crossed lattice. The lattice opening discovers Rozina and Bartolo. The lady holds a roll of paper in her hand, which she drops into the street, and sends her guardian to pick up, telling him it is the music of a favourite air in a late new comedy, called the Fruitless Precaution. While the doctor is descending the inward stair-case, Almaviva runs and picks up the roll. The old doctor, on coming out, in vain looks for it, and retires. Lazarillo and the Count then re-enter, and the latter looking into the roll, finds a note, encouraging him to pursue his purpose, and rescue Rozina from the tyranny of an odious guardian. Lazarillo immediately opens to the Count his situation in Bartolo's family, as his barber, his surgeon, and his apothecary, declaring, that in the doctor's house neither razor, lancet, or pestle are moved but by him, and suggesting some practice of his art as a means of service on the present occasion. The Count startles on first hearing the proposition, but on being assured that the Barber will do none of his patients a real injury, Lazarillo's scheme is acceded to, and as the door of Bartolo's house opens, they again retire. The doctor, on coming out, declares his intention to return instantly, to prevent the entrance of any person, laments his folly in going down before to look for Rozina's music, and mentions that his present business is to search for his friend Basil, who has undertaken to arrange every thing necessary for his secret marriage the next day with Rozina. The moment Bartolo leaves the street, the Count and Lazarillo again come forward; the former expresses his alarm at Bartolo's intention so suddenly to marry his ward, and enquiring who Basil is that the doctor spoke of, Lazarillo explains the whole, and after agreeing to prepare a Notary, in order to make a marriage contract, provided the Count can prevail on Rozina to consent to wed him, they separate. The next scene discovers an apartment in Bartolo's house; Rozina enters with a lighted candle in her hand, and while she laments her situation, writes a letter to the supposed Carlos, which she seals and directs, at the same time doubting whether she shall have an opportunity of sending it, and wishing she could exchange a few words with Lazarillo, whom she mentions with some degree of respect, as a very honest, well meaning fellow, and declares she has seen him from her window lattice in close conference with a handsome young fellow. At this instant Lazarillo presents himself; a lively conversation ensues, in which Rozina is given to understand that the person she saw speak with Lazarillo was Carlos. She then confidentially entrusts the Barber with the delivery of the letter, and dispatches him down the back stair-case. Rozina, as soon as Lazarillo quits her chamber, sets herself to her tambour work, when Bartolo enters, cursing Lazarillo for having, in the space of ten minutes, played the very devil with his household, having given his watchful man Argus a narcotic, his talkative servant Tallboy a dose of sternutatory powder, bled his maid Marcellina in the foot, and even put a cataplasm over the single remaining eye of his poor mule. After a short jealous questioning of Rozina from Bartolo, respecting the business of Lazarillo with her in his absence, the old Doctor calls his two servants before him, when, from the perpetual gaping of Argus, and the perpetual sneezing of Tallboy, he finds it impossible to gain the desired intelligence, and sends them both off to bed to compose themselves, following them out himself, and execrating Lazarillo.

The second act opens with Bartolo and Basil; the latter is come to tell Bartolo that he has some bad news for him: that Count Almaviva, who made such enquiry after Rozina at Madrid, is come to town, that he lodges in the great square, and always goes abroad in disguise. Basil recommends scandal as the grand engine for Bartolo to direct against his rival, and very humorously describes, in terms of music, its gradation from a private whisper in pianissimo, to a murmur piano, thence to a rumour andante, thence to a report forte, at length to a general conversation fortissimo, and lastly to an universal chorus of hatred and proscription. Bartolo resolves, as the means of defeating the Count's wishes, to wed his ward forthwith; he therefore gives Basil money to quicken his good will towards him, and dispatches him to prepare every thing for the union, at the same time following him to lock the street door after him. Lazarillo, who has watched the two old fellows, and overheard all they said, now comes forward, and rejoices that he remains to open for the Count the door which Bartolo is gone to shut. Rozina then enters, and learns from Lazarillo her guardian's intention to marry her on the morrow; she is frightened to death at the idea, but is comforted by the Barber, who assures her he'll cut out so much other work for the old fellow, that he shall not have time even to think of a marriage. Hearing Bartolo returning, Lazarillo retires; the Doctor instantly charges charges his pupil with some confederacy with Lazarillo, and insists on her owning what the Barber's business with her was; Rozina says, merely to report to her the ill state of Marcellina's health. The Doctor then spits some ink on Rozina's finger, and questions her whether she has not been writing?—She replies, she burnt her finger in the candle, and therefore dipped it in ink to allay the pain. The old fellow, still distrustful, counts the writing-paper on the table, and finding only five sheets, whereas he had left six in the morning, insists upon it she has written a letter; she tells him she used it to wrap up some sweetmeats which she sent to Lazarillo's little girl. He then takes up the pen, and asks how that came inked?—She replies, "I traced a flower with it for your waistcoat, which I am working on the tambour." While he is arguing upon her conduct, the Count walks in disguised as a bachelor of music; Bartolo is surprized at his entrance, and rudely demands his business. The Count tells him his name is Alonzo, he is the pupil of Basil, organist of the grand convent, who is ill in bed; Bartolo resolves forthwith to visit his sick friend, but is prevented by the Count, who asks if they are alone, as he has something important in charge from Basil to communicate. Bartolo, fearing some trick, bids him not whisper, but speak loud, as he is deaf of one ear: the Count then roars out, "that Count Almaviva, who resides in the great square—" Bartolo, frightened lest Rozina should hear this, claps his hand to the Count's mouth, and begs him, for God's sake, to speak low again.—The Count then tells him that Rozina had written to him, and at length produces the very letter he had received: Bartolo proposes to shew it to Rozina, and make it serve as an instrument to convince her that she has corresponded with a man mean enough to sport with her character, and boast of her favours.—The Count consents, hoping to find an opportunity of giving Rozina a clue to his conduct. Bartolo fetches her, and at sight of the Count she screams. This surprizes Bartolo, but she, with the Count's assistance, makes an excuse, by saying she sprained her ankle as she turned into the room. Bartolo leaves her with the Count, while he runs to fetch her a chair, which affords them an opportunity for some explanation. As soon as she is seated, Bartolo desires the Count to withdraw, as Rozina's accident, he conceives, renders it improper for her to have her lesson of music then; she however begs she may, as she declares she finds herself better, and begs Bartolo to leave her with her master, as he has always said he hates music. He consents she shall sing, but sits himself in the chair to hear her; she then begins the following air *:

LOVE, the soul firing,
Love all inspiring,
Now, my fair,
Nature invites thee to share,
Joyful advancing,
See the hours dancing,
On full wing,
Merrily lead in the spring,
Winter sternly retiring,
The flowers are springing,
Birds are singing,
On every spray;
See, the goats on rocks,
In the meads the flocks
Frolic, sport, and play,
And rejoice in May.
Turtles are cooing,
Sparrows are billing,
Shepherds are wooing,
Maidens are willing.
Spring, with all its treasure,
Brings no joy to me;
Carlos knows no pleasure,
No delight but thee.
Mark his tears,
With his tender caresses,
What'er love expresses;
Anxious fears,
And hope without reason,
And mirth out of season;
Mixing joy with sadness;
Speaking sober madness.
Should some guardian nigh,
With a jealous eye
Watch the am'rous swain,
Then he checks his gladness:
But if fortune cruel,
Adds a galling chain,
Love receives new fuel,
Takes delight in pain.

While she is singing, Bartolo falls asleep, which the Count observing, he and Rozina caress each other, and she leaves off at the word gladness; the orchestra then cease to play. As the noise of the music had lulled the Doctor, the cessation of it rouses him, on which Rozina suddenly resumes the tune, and finishes the air. Bartolo complains of modern tunes, and begins an old fashioned song, which he admires greatly. While he is singing Lazarillo enters behind him. Bartolo instantly opens upon him for playing the devil in his house, and giving physic without his orders. The Barber excuses himself by saying his will to serve him is too prompt to wait for direction. Bartolo asks Lazarillo how his little girl liked the sweetmeats, which throws him into a whimsical embarrassment, from which Rozina relieves him, by giving him a proper hint what to say. As the Count and Rozina wish to get Bartolo away, the Barber tells him it is his day for shaving, and asks if he will retire for that purpose. The Doctor insists on being shaved in Rozina's apartment, and sends off Lazarillo to fetch the basin, &c. the Barber purposely breaks some china without, which draws away Bartolo, but he returns almost immediately, not, however, before the Count has assured her, that he and Lazarillo (the latter having obtained the key) will return at midnight, and come in to rescue her through the window lattice. Bazil presently after this comes in, which alarms the Count, Rozina, and Lazarillo, as much as it surprises Bartolo, who immediately questions him as to his health, and tells him that his pupil Alonzo—Bazil is astonished, and cannot tell what to say, till the Count secretly conveys a purse of gold into his hand, which induces him to coincide with every thing the Count says, and at length he retires, after one of the most whimsical and truly laughable scenes ever produced. Bartolo then sits down to be shaved, and Lazarillo turns his chair away from Rozina; the Doctor, however, returns it, and sits directly facing them, and notwithstanding Lazarillo's endeavours to prevent it, sees the Count making love to his ward, he instantly rises, with the lather on his face, and turns both the Count and Lazarillo out of his house, resolving himself to go instantly to Bazil, and learn from him the meaning of what has passed.

Between the second and third act the scene draws and discovers the inside of the chamber in the house of Bartolo, with the latticed window. A violent storm of thunder, lightning, and rain ensues, during which the orchestra plays a tune suitable to the spectacle.

The third act begins with a conversation between Bartolo and Bazil, the former interrogating the latter relative to his pupil, and Bazil declaring that he has no pupil, and that he knows nothing about the person who called himself Alonzo, but that as he received a purse of gold from him, which he always considers as a conclusive argument in doubtful cases, and as they seemed to be all in a story he took his leave as they requested; he observes, however, that from the largeness of the present, he cannot imagine the giver of it to be less than the Count himself, and therefore he presses the Doctor to wed Rozina without delay, and to blacken his rival to her as much as possible. Before he takes his leave he tells Bartolo that he shall be back at four: the Doctor asking why not sooner, Bazil gives him to understand that the notary is retained by the Barber Lazarillo to contract his niece. This surprises Bartolo, who knowing Lazarillo has not any niece, suspects some plot, and forthwith dispatches Bazil to get the notary to come sooner, giving him the master-key of his doors, declaring, that let what will happen, he'll keep watch, in order to prevent any person's entering, except Bazil and the notary.

After a short soliloquy of Rozina, expressing her anxiety on account of Carlos not coming, although it is past twelve, her guardian re-enters, and insists on speaking with her; having in vain endeavoured to make him postpone his business till next day, she listens to him, and he begins with telling her that he has got the letter she sent to Count Almaviva; this declaration astonishes Rozina, who is still more amazed at being told by Bartolo that the Count is a vile wretch, that Alonzo was but his agent, and that he had obtained the letter from a woman to whom the Count had basely betrayed Rozina, and who had informed him of it, in order, doubtless, to prevent the effects of so powerful a rival as Rozina. The latter, who sincerely loved the pretended Carlos, mortified to the soul at his apparent treachery, in a moment of frenzy offers instantly to wed Bartolo, and confesses that she is in a plot with Carlos and Lazarillo, whom she expects to enter at the lattice of the window, of which the Barber had stolen the key from Bartolo. The Doctor forgives her, and promising that his love shall make her amends for all she has suffered, goes out to procure the assistance of the officers of law. Rozina deplores her hapless fate, the resource she has chosen not appearing to her less disagreeable than that she has renounced; on hearing a noise at the lattice she retires, and Lazarillo and the Count enter, wrapped up in cloaks, wringing wet; after a short dialogue on the possible event of their enterprise, Rozina appears, and dissembling speaks her fear that her lover would not come; he rejoices at her charming anxiety, and after lamenting his want of birth and fortune, throws himself on his knees at her feet, declaring how much he adores her; she then with indignation tells him what a despicable wretch she thinks him, assures him, that as Carlos she should readily have sacrificed every thing to have shared his good or ill fortune; but the low abuse he has made of her favours, and the indignity offered her by that monster, ster, Count Almaviva, to whom he would have sold her, have been the means of restoring to her that mark of her weakness which she then holds (shewing the letter she had written to Carlos, and sent by Lazarillo). The Count, heartily pleased with this profession of a sincere passion for him, accounts for the letter's coming into her guardian's hands, and Lazarillo, congratulating the Count on his at length finding a woman who loves him for himself alone, calls him accidentally by his title; this opens the eyes of Rozina, and the Count throwing aside his long cloak, appears richly habited, and avows himself, owning, that he has for six months entertained the most ardent passion for her. Rozina faints in his arms. The Count calls Lazarillo to assist, but the sly Barber does not budge a foot, telling his lordship that he need not be uneasy, since the sweet emotion of joy rarely is attended by any bad consequences. Rozina presently recovers, and Lazarillo is sent to the lattice to see that all is ready for their escape; he returns instantly with an account that the ladder is taken away, and that somebody is coming in at the street-door. Rozina seems frightened, but the Count bids her be comforted, as he fears no person. Basil and a Notary enter; Basil is much surprised at seeing his pretended pupil. The Notary asks which are the parties to be contracted. The Count replies, "You were to marry Rozina and me this night at Lazarillo's, but we have chosen this house in preference; have you the contract?" The Notary says he has two contracts, one between Count Almaviva and Rozina, the other between Dr. Bartolo and Rozina. The Count and Rozina sign theirs, the former telling Basil that he may serve for a witness. Basil, as before, declares he don't comprehend. The Count throws him a large purse, and bids him sign directly. Lazarillo asking him where's the difficulty, Basil (weighing the purse) owns that there can be none where there are reasons given of so much weight; he therefore takes pen in hand and signs, remarking at the same time, that Bartolo has given him the master-key of his house for some purpose. Bartolo, an Alcade, two Alguazils, and some footmen, immediately enter, and the Doctor, seeing the Count kiss Rozina's hand, seizes the Notary by the throat, bidding the officers of justice do the same with all the rest, as Rozina is among rogues. The Notary announces himself, and Bartolo turning round, sees Basil, and wonders how he came to be there. Basil retorts by asking how he came not to be there. A general explanation takes place, the Count avows his title to Rozina as her contracted spouse, and appeals to the officers of justice for support; the Alcade promises him his assistance in protecting the innocent from injury, and tells Bartolo that it is in vain for him to oppose an honourable marriage, expressing also his fears of his being capable of rendering a good account of his guardianship, which her husband has now a right to demand. The Count promises, upon his consenting to the union, to forgive him all the rest, and Basil hints to him, that as he can't have the woman, the wisest way will be to keep the money; Bartolo therefore signs his consent, and the piece concludes with Lazarillo's observing, that when youth and love agree in attempting to deceive an old man, every thing he can do to prevent it will turn out to be nothing more than A Fruitless Precaution.

This Comedy was prefaced by a very laughable prologue, spoken by Mr. Parsons in the character of Paul Prig; the audience were told in it that he had just returned from Paris, and brought over a new pattern, which a little weaver of Soho had spun and manufactured. Among other objects of satire, the slovenliness of the French, even in their most dressy moments, was well ridiculed, and aptly compared to a May-day chimney-sweeper's appearance. Other fair objects were laughed at with great success. The prologue was written by Mr. Colman, and spoken by Mr. Parsons.

The epilogue, spoken by Miss Farren, turned on the liberties enjoyed by ladies in different countries, which were portrayed with that warmth of colouring, that vivacity and humour, peculiar to the pen of Mr. Garrick.

Hillsborough: a Poem.

THE muse, sweet village, will no longer stay
The pleasing labour till another day,
Too long already was the debt unpaid,
Herself too long inglorious in the shade;
Fear was the matter; that dull passion past,
Harmonious comes the votive verse at last.
Thus some young warbler of the vocal throng,
Fearful at first to try the sylvan song,

Keeps to the bushes, till he can no more
With birds of melody refrain to soar.

Scenes rush upon me, which demand a Pope,
Whose matchless strains could with such beauties
Had these been fated to his nervous lyre, [cease;
What nameless numbers would the work admire!
Careless of fame, I only wish to pay
The tender tribute of a grateful lay,
And celebrate, in artless verse, a place
Which ever led me to the rhyming race.

Eternal honours wait the noble mind, [kind,
That loves to grace the ground, and loath man—
Who owns this pleasing place! this happy feat!
This blissful country! this divine retreat!
This second paradise? each stranger cries:
Illustrious Hill! each knowing tongue replies.
He loves to deck the earth, to bless mankind,
Pour forth the beauties of a learned mind,
Dilate the graces of a calm abode,
And scatter motives to the praise of God,
By means of him, these ravishing retreats,
Delightful gardens, and delicious seats,
Elysian streams, and Eden plains appear,
And all the beauty of the world is here.

Rush into rapture, O my muse, and higher
Exalt thy numbers, and be all on fire,
While next we view, with more than mortal sense,
The peerless prospect that appears from hence.

First to the left, high Moira crowns the scene,
And lovely lavishes her rival green:
Fair in the valley Lagan winds below:
And yonder Collin lifts his coaxing brow:
A flood of beauty huffs upon the sight,
From sylvan Ballydrain, and from the right:
The cliffs of Carrickfergus, and the main,
Resign the view to Hillborough again.

Much, lovely village, could we yet essay
Upon thy pleasant site and groves so gay,
But all such subjects, many thousand times
Already, run in janty modern rhymes;
They now make serious sentiment shal' raise,
Grieve while they charm, and profit while they
As that time flies impatient of delay, [please,
And weeps the glories of the world away.
Where now, imperial Carthage, is thy dome?
And where is Babylon? and where is Rome?
Some dullest ages more, and all is done!
Earth burning to the center! dark the sun!
All perishing, but Virtue: Virtue springs
To meet her Saviour, with triumphant wings.

In the elegy on the death of doctor Colvill,

The Golden Age.

In earliest times, when good old Saturn sway'd,
And this terrestrial world with joy survey'd;
The happy men that first possess'd this earth,
Spent their dear hours in endless rounds of mirth.
They claim'd no titles from descent or blood,
But that which made them noble, made them
good:

Envy was not; none thought themselves oppress'd,
For every one what he best lik'd possess'd.
Then all were friends, no seeming wrongs were heard,

Love was their law, and innocence their guard;
No snarling words from drunken fits ensu'd,
Acorns and strawberries were all their food.
From painful care of luxury they fled,
And on the wholesome herbs of nature fed;
Possess'd of inward peace, they eat their fill,
And drank the chrysal of the murmuring rill.
Unbrib'd by riches, as unaw'd by fear, [sincere.
Their words were thoughtless, and their thoughts
No ships as yet the guilty sea o'er'spread,
Nor axe to tree, nor saw to wood was laid.

But each contented on his native plain,
Scorn'd to explore new worlds in hope of gain.
Immortal springs then bless'd these happy times,
Strangers to vice, as yet unknown to crimes.

But when good Saturn left the seats above,
And all things yielded to the force of Jove,
In course of time an iron age appear'd,
When injuries were felt and wrongs were heard;
All that is evil to mankind is known,
The wife the husband kills, and he the son.
Eternal fraud the highest place demands,
The good and wise are slain by impious hands.
A servile flattery the world attends,
Your greatest enemies will seem your friends;
Deceit and impudence triumphant reign,
Folly and vice a wondrous sway obtain;
Surprising ills surround this stage of life,
Dissain and guilt, ingratitude and strife.
Oh! may we then those happier times behold,
The world reformed, and an age of gold.

Epitaph on Dr. Warren.

GOD spoke and said, "The world to Warren gave,
Honour, and wealth, and glory—and a grave:
No more my earth could do—but I have giv'n
His just reward—by Me a place in Heav'n.

The Retreat, to Miss K——.

———Hæret lateri lethalis arundo. VIRG.

HAIL flow'ry lawns and verdant hills,
And waving woods and smiling vales,
And bleating flocks and murm'ring rills,
And warbling birds and whispering gales!
Hail pendent cliffs and vaulted cells,
Where peace and sweet contentment dwells.

Let others court the pride of state,
And barter happiness for show;
Too soon they scorn or knaves they hate
With servile expectation bow———

I range at ease this bliss retreat,
To be content is to be great.

Let school-men vain the mazes trace,
Of ev'ry philosophic art;
Tir'd with the wild fantastic chace
Perplex the head, nor mend the heart;
I view myself with humble eyes,
To be content is to be wise.

Let fools expect from flattery's voice
The pleasing balm of life to find;
Or place their bliss in guilty joys
More sickle, fleeing than the wind.
I count the self-approving guest,
To be content is to be blest.

Yet ah! why heats my fluttering heart?
Why flows the torrent from my eye?
What means the irritating smart?
These trembling limbs, this rising sigh?
Ah me! too well the cause I guess,
Farewell content, hail soft distress.

Intuding power ordained alone
To rob me of my peaceful hours,
Nor aw'd by splendour from the throne,
Nor yet escap'd in rural bowers.
Oh! bring my fair one to her swain,
And then I'll be content again.

HUGONI.

L O N D O N.

Friday, September 3.

General Prescott, and his aid de camp Mr. Barrington, were surprized and taken prisoners by the American rebels in the following manner:—The troops at Rhode-Island were divided into two large encampments; one covering the town, the other subdivided into three, and stationed toward the northern extremity of the island. For the conveniency of being as near as possible to all these encampments, General Prescott lay every night in the middle between them, about five miles distant from each extremity, and about half a mile from the western coast of the island, which he thought secure by its great distance from the main, and by means of three ships of war which were stationed in a line along that coast, at no greater distance from it than two miles. However, the rebels found an opportunity of passing unseen by any of our ships, and landed about twelve o'clock at the opening of a ravine, up which they crept, and proceeded undiscovered to the General's quarters, burst into the house, and carried off the General and his aid-de-camp almost naked. The guard was at about 300 yards distant; but there was no noise made to alarm them, and by the confusion of the people about the house, no intelligence was conveyed to any part of the army, in time to intercept the rebels with their prize.—The sentinel was taken prisoner.—It is not absolutely certain whether he fired his piece or not: Most people think not, and say it was not loaded. This bold action was executed by a small party of men, headed by major Burton, a hatter, in Providence, always known to be a daring, enterprising man, and perfectly well acquainted with the place.

Was completely finished, and erected in a marble niche, or recess, properly decorated, in the chancel of the church of St. Stephen Walbrook, London, a superb white marble statue, in honour of Mrs. Macaulay, in the character of History, in a singular, easy, and pleasing antique style, and judged to be a good likeness; has a pen in her right hand, apparently as if she had just finished some lines written on a scroll she holds in her left, (on which arm she leans on her five volumes of the history of England), viz.

On the other side of the same table, at top, is left a blank space (we suppose) for an Epitaph. and under which is as follows:

Erected by THOMAS WILSON, D. D. Rector of this Parish, as a Testimony of the high Esteem he bears to the distinguished

Merit of his Friend,

CATHARINE MACAULAY.

A. D. MDCCCLXXVII.

16. This day, at his seat at Newnham, in Oxfordshire, the body of Earl Harcourt was found dead, in a narrow well, in his park, with the head downwards, and nothing appearing above water but the feet and legs.

It is imagined this melancholy accident was occasioned by his over-reaching himself in endeavouring to save the life of a favourite dog, who was found in the well with him, standing on his Lordship's feet. His hat and right hand glove lay by the side of the well. Every possible method for the recovery of drowned persons was made use of three several times, but unfortunately without effect.

17. This evening about nine o'clock, as the hon. Mr. Hawke, son of lord Hawke, was coming to town, between Kensington and Knightsbridge, his horse ran against a post-chaise and fell, and one of the shafts of the chaise penetrating Mr. Hawke's body, killed him on the spot.

22. A duel was fought in the fields near Marybone, between G. B. Esq; and lieutenant B. in consequence of a quarrel which happened on Saturday night in the front boxes of Drury-lane Theatre. The gentlemen both missed upon the first discharge of their pistols; Mr. B. then fired his second pistol, when lieutenant B. broke ground, and walking up to him, bid his antagonist beg his life, or make an apology for his behaviour; which Mr. B. refusing to do, the lieutenant fired his pistol in the air, saying, "The life that was not worth asking for, was not worth taking." Struck with this act of generosity, Mr. B. held out his hand to the officer, and the matter was happily accommodated to the satisfaction of all parties.

23. The last letters from Paris advise, that the late Chevalier, now Mademoiselle D'Eon, lately arrived there in consequence of the king's permission; and the pension which the king has granted her of 12,000 livres, to enable her to pass the remainder of her life in France, is absolutely on condition of her appearing for the future in woman's apparel.

24. There was a general quarterly court, of the proprietors of East India Stock at their house in Leadenhall-street.

As soon as the clerk had read the minutes of the last meeting, he reported the quarterly accounts to the proprietors, when Mr. Fitzgerald spoke a good deal on the manner of stating them; he said, by not bringing the stock in hand in the warehouses to account, and giving all the particulars, it was giving a ricketty child to the proprietor; at least he was sure, he said, it had but one leg. He next adverted to the shipping, and said that some regulation ought to be made in favour of the captains, who, from many circumstances at present, were induced to turn smugglers. He closed his speech with making some animadversions on the Directors accepting such heavy bills of exchange, and reminded the proprietors it was one of the principal causes of their late bankruptcy.

The chairman confessed his obligation to any proprietor who should throw out hints for the good of the company; but in respect to the first part of the gentleman's speech, not giving the whole account, debtor and creditor, it was not usual on a quarterly day; nor did he see the propriety of it, as it was always done annually, in as full a manner as possible. In respect to the captains of East Indiamen, he observed, some regulations for their future benefits were on the tapis; and as to the bills of exchange, he said, the directors had come to a resolution not to accept, at any time, more than 300,000 l. and the reason, it appeared by the account read, why they now accepted more, was in consequence of the accounts of two years back, being in some respect mixed, the draughts not being made regular.

The chairman next acquainted the court, that since the last meeting, draughts of the salaries paid to the president and council of Madras, in lieu of their former perquisites, were laid before council, to know whether such appointments were legal or not? The clerk then read the opinions of the Attorney and Solicitor General, and Mr. Sayre, who all essentially agreed, that such increase of salaries were strictly within the spirit of the charter, and the late act for regulating the affairs of the East India Company, both abroad and at home; nor did it likewise clash against the bye-laws, such being no new appointments.

Before the court closed, Mr. Elliot threw out many useful hints, particularly in respect to the silver currency of the East. He likewise observed on the large salaries allotted to the president and council of Madras, by saying, though he did not dispute the legality of the directors granting them, yet he had no doubt of thinking them too extravagant. And indeed, when we consider this company just emerging from what may be called a bankruptcy, 40,000 pagodas to a president, and 16,000 to each of the council, cannot be classed under the article of economy. As soon as Mr. Elliot had finished, the court adjourned.

26. A wardmote was held at Baker's-Hall, in Thames-street, before the Lord-Mayor, for the election of an alderman of Tower-ward, in the room of alderman Smith, resigned, when Evan Pugh, Esq; a soap-boiler, in Bishopsgate-street, and one of the common-council of that ward, was chosen without opposition.

Extract of a letter from Macclesfield, Sept. 14.

"This morning at eleven o'clock, the congregation at both churches were alarmed with an earthquake, which stopped divine service; many left their hats, gloves, &c. At Capetown chapel, lady Grey fell from her seat, and service stopped when the clergyman was entering the pulpit. At Knottesford, bricks fell from chimnies, but no real harm has been done that we yet hear of. A gentleman sitting on the grass felt the ground twice heave under him."

Extract of a letter from Leeds, Sept. 16.

"On Sunday last, about two minutes before eleven in the forenoon, a slight shock of an earthquake was felt in this town and neighbourhood. A person who was at the parish church when it happened informs us, that he was sensible of a rocking motion succeeded by a trembling, which together continued about two seconds, as nearly as he could judge. The large west window of the church, near which he sat, was shaken during this concussion as if a sudden gust of wind had blown upon it, tho' the wind being N. E. at the time, could have had no effect upon it; nor did the shaking of the window continue after the trembling of the building had subsided.

"We learn likewise from persons who were present in the other places of worship, that the several congregations were sensible of it; but the agitation was so gentle, and of so short a continuance, that few were aware of its real cause, and consequently no permanent alarm was made by it.

"We are told that at Gargrave the shock was so great, that many persons ran out of the church and houses: and at Skipton it was so violent as greatly to alarm most of the town.—The weather was serene the whole day, with a moderate wind from the N. E.

"The earthquake was also felt in different parts of Cheshire, Derbyshire, Nottinghamshire, and the adjacent counties."

Extract of a letter from Manchester, Sept. 15.

"As you, perhaps, have not heard of an earthquake we have had in these parts, I shall now give you some account of it.—It happened yesterday morning about eleven o'clock, the time of divine service; the houses in town shook in a most violent manner, attended with a thundering noise; the windows and doors flew open, and several chimneys, &c. were thrown down. There was a report, that most of the old church was fallen in, but the damage done to it was very trifling. Several people were hurt in endeavouring to get out of the church, the crowd being so great; but no lives were lost. This shock was felt with equal violence for twenty miles round but no estimation has as yet been made of the damage."

Extract of a letter from Southampton, Sept. 21.

"Last Tuesday was committed to our gaol, a young gentleman by the name of Williams, for taking out of the pocket of Mr. Lawrence, of Oxford, a 10l. bank note, and a draft for 10l. while Mr. Lawrence was bathing. The above two persons had lately commenced an acquaintance, and often went to bathe together. Soon after they left the bathing-house, Mr. Lawrence missed his notes, when the other, with great composure, cried, "Poh! you will soon find them again; have them cried, and I will write you a paper for the crier;" which he did, and used other means, in order, as it was then supposed, to find out the thief, whereby he, in some measure, escaped suspicion. The discovery was made by Mr. Smith, at the Star Inn, who pressing Williams pretty hard for cash, he paid him the 10l. bank note. He was apprehended the same night in his bed at the said inn. He will not own where he comes from, nor who are his parents, but says they are opulent people, live in great credit, and that he will sooner suffer death than make a discovery to disgrace them. He has had a good education, and appears to have been brought up very genteely."
the

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

Limerick, September 22.

WE have the pleasure to inform the public, that a new church has been built at Newcastle in the county of Limerick, at the sole expence of lord viscount Courtnay, and was consecrated on Sunday the 7th inst. by the lord bishop of Limerick, in presence of a numerous congregation of about 400 persons. The building is light and elegant, adorned with a lofty steeple, finished above with eight pinnacles and a cupola in the middle; on the whole it is allowed to be one of the handsomest churches in the kingdom, and reflects credit on the person who planned and executed the workmanship.

Limerick, Sept. 25. This day our affizes ended, which proved a sudden one; in the county, Edmond Ryan, for stealing butter, was burned in the hand; in the city, Catharine Fitzgerald, for giving Spanish flies to a young girl, which put her out of her senses, to be whipped and stand in the pillory for two market days.

Extract of a letter from Rathfryland, dated 1st October, 1777.

"Yesterday, a Mr. Fagan was murdered near this town, for which two men are committed to gaol. A few nights since, a shocking murder and robbery was committed in Moira, on a whole family, except a servant girl who escaped by secreting herself under a bed. Five men were apprehended for it this day. The murderers were discovered in the following extraordinary manner. After committing the horrid fact, the villains left behind them a dog, that belonged to one of them, locked up in a room in the house. The servant maid who had escaped alarmed the neighbours, when an expedition occurred to one of them of cutting the dog's ear, who immediately ran home; they pursued him by the track of his blood to a house where they found the five murderers sharing the spoil."

Wexford, Oct. 4. A few days ago, in clearing the ruins of a house in the main street, supposed to have been built before Cromwell's time, below the foundation, and apparently in a rock, was found a piece of silver coin, believed to be of Henry III. and a chain, the composition of which is not yet known.

Tralee, Oct. 6. A few days ago, Mr. William Fuller, of Tubridbeg, gave an order on one of his tenants to Philip Ready and his brother, two smiths, with power to distrain; accordingly they demanded it of the tenant last Monday, being Michaelmas-day, but the man refused paying it, as he paid Mr. Fuller the night before, who forgot to acquaint the Readies of it; upon his refusing to pay, they attempted to drive his cattle, and the tenant endeavouring to rescue them, upon which the Readies killed him upon the spot.

DUBLIN.

History of the present Sessions of the Irish Parliament.

Tuesday, October 14.

THIS day his excellency the lord lieutenant went in state to the house of peers, and opened the sessions with the following speech from the throne:

My lords and gentlemen,

His Majesty has been graciously pleased to honour me with a most distinguished mark of his confidence, in appointing me to the government of Ireland; with ease he might have found an abler minister, with difficulty one more anxiously zealous to justify his choice, in meriting your approbation.

Influenced by that benevolent spirit which may justly command the affections of all his subjects, his instructions to me are to co-operate with his parliament in every measure which can promote the improvement, insure the happiness, and cherish the true interests of this kingdom.

The increase of his Majesty's royal family, by the birth of a princess, cannot but be considered as a most pleasing and interesting event.

With very particular satisfaction I hear of the considerable progress which agriculture is daily making, and that the great source of the prosperity of this country, the linen-manufacture, continues to flourish. No objects can more justly claim your consideration.

The educating the distressed children of the nation in sound principles, and the early training them to habits of industry, is of such importance, that I must not omit recommending the protestant charter-schools to your protection.

Gentlemen of the house of commons,

That you may be perfectly apprised of the true state of your affairs, I have directed the proper officers to lay the national accounts before you, thoroughly confident, that your wisdom, your zeal for the honour of his Majesty's government, and your attachment to the essential welfare of this kingdom, will induce you to make such a provision as may be suitable to the present circumstances of the country, and the exigencies of the public service.

My lords and gentlemen,

I decline making any professions relative to my future conduct: it is by the tenor of my actions that the character of my administration must be determined.

HOUSE of LORDS.

On Tuesday, after the lord lieutenant had quitted the house, the motion for an address to his Majesty, was made by the earl of Ely, and for an address to the lord lieutenant, by lord Longford.

Lord Longford. My lords, it is with great pleasure that I have the honour to introduce an address to your lordships, in consequence of his excellency the lord lieutenant's gracious speech from the throne.—I own, my lords, I am well pleased that his excellency makes no professions of his future conduct, but refers you for the character of his administration, to the general tenor of his conduct. This was the style and language of that great ornament of human nature, and the best governor this country ever saw, the late earl of Chesterfield; this was the principle that pervaded his administration, the improvement and commerce of this country: a fair prospect is now opened to your lordships, and I hope that long arrear of promises and augmentations of the pension list, will not be handed over by the present lord lieutenant to his successor.

Lord Mountmorres. A word my lords, and but a word upon the speech delivered by the new vice-roy this day from the throne, and the address that has been moved in consequence of it, by a noble earl.

After having so often experienced the favour of this assembly, after having so often and for such a length of time, and that too, at a premature and early period of my life—if I am to reason from the past—perhaps a moment's indulgence will be allowed to me now.

It is not, my lords, with a design to say a word that may lead towards a detail, or to excite opposition to the present question, that I appear once more before your lordships; it is to express my approbation of a speech in which, not a word is said to engage the assent and approbation of parliament, to that mischievous contest which is depending on the other side the Atlantic; a war, in my judgment, unjust and unnecessary in its commencement—commencement—absurd and ridiculous in its conduct—ruinous and destructive in its consequences, unless Providence should interfere with a strong hand, and save the empire from perdition.

It must give, I am sure, much satisfaction to all friends to their country, and among that class of men, tho' it may be presumptuous, I think I have some right to rank myself, from a life uniformly devoted to its interests. I say, it must give great pleasure to them to think we are led to enter into no engagements to support such a war; a war carried on by a set of wanderers and knights-errant on the American coasts.

Had a word of that kind been mentioned, I was prepared to have entered into the discussion, and to have entered my protest against any measure of that sort.

So much for the address to his Majesty; as to the address moved to the new vice-roy, it comes strongly recommended by the noble lord, and I think every compliment is due to him. I believe him as yet as irreproachable in public, as he is amiable and exemplary in private life.

My lords, before I sit down, I must repeat the satisfaction which I am sure this will give to a noble duke, to a noble earl, whose principles, with regard to the constitution, are purity itself, and other noble lords, that the exceptionable clauses about America, in the speech of the late viceroy, are omitted in this; that our lives and fortunes are no longer committed in the American crusade; for my own part, I am sure if my opinion is of the least moment, I do not hesitate to give my entire assent and approbation to the motion of the noble earl.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Ordered, That his excellency's speech be entered in the journals.

Lord Jocelyn moved that an address be presented to his Majesty, in answer to his excellency's speech. Which motion was seconded by lord Westport.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to draw up the said address.

Mr. Gardiner moved for an address of thanks to his excellency for his excellent speech from the throne.

Mr. Gardiner prefaced his motion for the address, with observing, that his belief of the zeal and attachment which his excellency professed for the welfare of this kingdom, induced him to propose an address of thanks. He said, that difficult as the task of a panegyrist was, he undertook it now, because, during the short time his excellency resided among us, he had evinced the integrity and uprightness of his intentions. That his excellency had manifested a protection to our trade as far as in his power lay, and that the dawn of his administration opened as fairly, and with as bright a prospect, as the most sanguine patriot could desire; that the few offices of trust which had become vacant since his viceroyalty commenced, were bestowed on the natives of this kingdom; that the chief connections which his excellency made, were among men of the first landed property in Ireland, which circumstance in itself was sufficient to prove that he had no evil designs against the real interest of the kingdom, and that a dependance on such men was the sure and direct means to support our liberty and our constitution: he added, that he would not have it understood that he was become the tool or the devotee of any party; and that although he now said so much in praise of his excellency, yet should any future conduct give him reason to disapprove of the measures of government, or did he find any matter adopted which might be of the slightest injury to this kingdom, he would with as much vigour oppose, as now with warmth he supported the present administration.

A committee was appointed to prepare the said address to the lord lieutenant.

The standing committees of religion, courts of justice, privileges, trade, &c. were appointed.

Ordered, On the motion of Mr. Recorder, that leave be given to bring in heads of a bill to authorize, for a limited time, the putting to hard labour such persons as have been, or may be sentenced to transportation.

Ordered, That the speaker do issue his warrant to the clerk of the crown to make out a writ for the election of a burgess, to represent the borough of Lisburne, in the room of Richard Jackson, Esq; who has made his election for the borough of Coleraine.

Also, For a writ for a member for the borough of Belfast, in the room of Barry Yelverton, Esq; who has made his election for the borough of Donegal, leaving his choice of the county and town of Carrickfergus, for each of which three places he had been returned.—Also, for a writ for the city of Kilkenny, in the room of Sir Haydocke Evans Morris, deceased.—Also, For a writ for the borough of Harristown, in the county of Kildare, in the room of Maurice Keating, Esq; deceased.

Sir Edward Newenham informed the house, that on a future day, he meant to move for a committee to enquire into a most daring insult offered to the civil power, by a band of armed men breaking open the goal of the county of Dublin; that he wished government would prevent such an enquiry, by directing the servants of the crown to prosecute those who were concerned in it; he entirely acquitted the officers of the garrison of any neglect of duty.

Mr. Solicitor General said, that the crown was determined to prosecute the offenders.

Wednesday, October 15.

New writs were ordered to be issued, to fill the vacancies caused by death, promotion, or members being returned for more places than one; but as the house had not been regularly informed of all, they could only provide for such as were made known, viz. for the boroughs of Tralee, Dingle-Isle, and Youghall.

Petitions were next presented, complaining of undue elections and returns for the counties of Clare, Tipperary, Fermanagh, Kilkenny, Leitrim, Carlow, and Mayo; and for the boroughs of Newry, Callen, Roscommon, Dungarvan, Tallagh, Maryborough, Swords, Feathard, and Antrim.

Lord Jocelyn then delivered (from the committee appointed for that purpose) the following address to be presented to his Majesty:

"Most gracious sovereign,

"We your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the knights, citizens, and burgesses, of Ireland, in parliament assembled, humbly beg leave to assure your Majesty, that we have, from the most ample experience, a grateful sense of that benevolent spirit, which constantly governs your royal breast, and ought to command the affections of all your subjects.

"Your Majesty's gracious instructions to his excellency the lord lieutenant, to co-operate with the parliament in every measure that will promote the improvement, insure the happiness, and cherish the real interests of this kingdom, are fresh proofs of your Majesty's paternal care of your people, and claim our warmest acknowledgments.

"With the utmost sincerity we present our humble congratulations to your Majesty, on the happy increase of your royal family by the birth of a prince; not only rejoicing in that pleasing event, as conducive to your Majesty's domestic happiness, but justly considering it as adding still further strength to your royal house, and to that succession on which the security of our liberties and religion so essentially depends.

"We are deeply sensible of your Majesty's goodness, in the protection you have been graciously pleased to give to the agriculture of Ireland, which must engage the attention of all who are desirous of seeing their country flourish in the great articles of population, industry, and plenty.

"Impressed with the warmest sense of the goodness with which those interesting objects of our national prosperity, the linen-manufacture, and the protestant charter-schools, have been recommended to us from the throne, we will not omit to take them into our most serious consideration; the one may justly be regarded as the most certain source of wealth, and the other the most effectual means of reclaiming numbers of people from sloth, ignorance, and vice.

"Animated no less by our attachment to the essential welfare of this kingdom, than by our zeal for the honour of your Majesty's government, we will most cheerfully make such provisions for the exigencies of the public service, as may appear suitable to the present circumstances of our country.

"We cannot do justice to the hopes we entertain of public satisfaction and happiness in the administration of the earl of Buckinghamshire, without most thankfully acknowledging your Majesty's goodness in placing us under the government of a nobleman, whose abilities and integrity have been already so amply proved in a station of distinguished confidence and importance; and who, we are fully assured, will not fail, upon every occasion, to exert his utmost endeavours in fulfilling your Majesty's most gracious intentions, for the benefit and prosperity of the people committed to his care."

The above address was unanimously agreed to, and it was resolved, that the members who are of the privy-council do wait on the lord lieutenant with the said address; and desire the same to be presented to his Majesty.

Mr. Gardiner next reported (from a committee) the following address of thanks, to be presented to the lord lieutenant, for his speech from the throne:

"May it please your excellency,

"We his Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the knights, citizens, and burghesses of Ireland, in parliament assembled, beg leave to return your excellency our sincere thanks for your most excellent speech from the throne.

"Impressed with the deepest sense of his Majesty's paternal regard for the welfare of his subjects, we see it particularly instilled in his appointment of a chief governor of this kingdom, whose approved integrity, and cultivated talents, are ornaments to the high station which he fills, and whose descent from ancestors, eminent for their learning in the law, preface prosperity to the country over which he is to preside.

"We remark with pleasure your excellency's early attention to the improvement of agriculture, and the flourishing state of the linen-manufacture: we shall not be wanting, on our part, to pay them that regard which matters of such great importance deserve.

"As the educating the infant poor in the protestant religion, and the training them in habits of industry, are acts of humanity, as well as policy, we are doubly bound to give encouragement to the charter-schools of this kingdom.

"We shall carefully consider the state of the public accounts, and cheerfully grant such a provision, as may be suitable to the present circumstances of this country, and the exigencies of the public service.

"We ground our hopes of your excellency's administration, upon better omens than those of mere assurances; and we are happy in having a chief governor who chooses rather to rest his character upon his future conduct, than upon present profession."

The above address being also agreed to, without one dissenting voice, it was resolved, that the speaker do present the same to his excellency the lord lieutenant.

Mr. Grattan, when the question was put for the address to his excellency, said, he heartily joined in both the addresses, and could not omit declaring his highest approbation of the speech from the throne. He was happy, he said, to find no mention in it of the destructive, ill-concerted, and ruinous war, now subsisting against the Americans. He was happy to find there was no mention of any arrear to be provided for by parliament; which the absence of half the troops on our establishment, and sundry other savings, must have prevented. He was happy to find the circumstances of this circumscribed nation were adverted to, and that they were not asked to support any establishments but what should be found absolutely necessary, and they were not precluded from making any retrenchments that may be proper to be made. He was happy to find the lord lieutenant did not make any splendid promises, which are generally broken in proportion to the profusion with which they were made, but rather left the character of his administration to be taken from his future conduct, than his large professions; a method which would procure, as it certainly merited, a greater degree of confidence. One extravagant and lavish viceroy, by his prodigality, left a very large arrear, which another could ask to be provided without a blush for the profusion that caused it, or a pang of pity for the burthened country which was to pay it; sheltering himself under the comfortable excuse, that he had not produced it. He was happy also, not to find in the speech from the throne, that hackneyed, that prostituted word, æconomy; which seemed to say, you have nothing to do but to provide amply, and let us manage it with our usual æconomy. He hoped that no minister would make a mere blank of our viceroy; but, if such a measure was attempted, from what his excellency had assured them, of his being instructed to co-operate with parliament for the public good, the house would join to add lustre and strength to vice-royalty.

Thursday, October 16.

The speaker, attended by several members, waited on his excellency with the addresses, and on their return his excellency's answer was read, and ordered to be entered on the journals.

Writs were ordered to be issued for new elections for the boroughs of Cashel, Old Leighlin, and Kilmallock.

Mr. Recorder gave notice of his intention, after the recess, to move for an enquiry into the legality of the embargo on Irish provisions.

The public accounts, (the basis of the supplies) were presented by the proper officers, and ordered to be printed. Lists of all the present pensioners, and of such pensions as had ceased since the 25th of March, 1773, together with monthly returns of the forces now in this kingdom, were moved for by Sir Edward Newenham, and were likewise ordered to be made out.

The rev. dean Pery was ordered to preach before the house of commons, at St. Andrew's church, on the 5th of next November. The house then adjourned to the 27th instant, to give time for the printing, &c. of the different accounts.

We have received an account, verified by the affirmation of more than twenty neighbouring housekeepers, that on Friday evening last, about four o'clock, the earth, for almost a mile square, beginning at the church of Castle-Ellis, and terminating at Oulart, appeared to receive a very great shock; which was immediately succeeded by an unequalled whirlwind, levelling houses, trees, corn, hay-stacks, &c. in its course. It is even averred that sundry household articles were forced through the windows. It is a fact that the consequent damage is not easily conceived. The people not being able to account for the cause, attribute it to a collection of supernatural spirits; and such an effect had it on their senses, that many imagined they saw the fairies.

On Saturday morning, Sept. 27, between two and three o'clock, the house of the right lady Ann Burton, in Marlborough-street, was attempted to be broke open by two fellows, armed with a blunderbuss and other weapons, and were it not for a servant boy who lay in the lobby and alarmed the family, they would have effected their design. Before they attempted the house they broke into the stable and killed a large parcel of valuable pigeons.

No less than twelve robberies were committed on men and women about Donnybrook-road, on Saturday night last, by a gang of armed villains, some of them attended with barbarous and indecent circumstances.

Extract of a letter from Loughbrickland, dated Sept. 30, 1777.

"I suppose you have heard of the daring attempt that was made on doctor Sheil, rector of this parish, and his family; it happened in the following manner:—On the night of the 25th inst. between twelve and one o'clock, when the family were all in bed, Mrs. Sheil was awakened by the noise of one of the doors shutting, and presently saw the light of a candle through the chinks of her own door. Being apprehensive that some of the family was ill, she immediately got up and opened it, not chusing to disturb Mr. Sheil, and in a low voice asked who was there? these words were scarce uttered when she was laid hold of by the hair of her head, and at the same time received a blow on her forehead, and the candle put out that she might not discover who they were. These inhuman villains (for there were three in number) then dragged her forward and attempted to wrench her head off her body, by turning it round with all their force, as a woman would a chicken that she was going to kill; but being a strong woman, they could not execute it; one of them made a stroke at her neck with a sword, which hit her cheek, and left a horrid gash in it: they then dragged her through all parts of the room, but could not get her off her feet; not content with this cruel treatment, they then stabbed her in the arm and belly. At length her shrieks and cries awakened her sister, Miss Henry, who came running into the room to her assistance, was immediately knocked down, and received a large wound on her head; she, however, got to one of the windows, which she opened, and called out murder! murder! but at that instant the heart-piercing cries of her sister brought her back again, she begging of the villains to have mercy on her husband and children, who, she imagined they were murdering in the next room. Mr. Sheil had attempted to come out, but was struck at with a sword and drove back into the room again, whom they followed and beat in a most unmerciful manner, he being destitute of any kind of weapon whatsoever; the villains went back to the women and thought to finish them first, being sure of finding him afterwards; he, in the mean time, thought it the most prudent way to get out of the window, which he accomplished, though two stories high, to alarm the neighbours. His cries in the street was the first thing that alarmed the villains, and by this time the remainder of the family were up, all the windows thrown open, help! murder! was cried from all parts, this with Mr. Sheil's cries in the street, determined them to make their escape, which they effected, leaving behind them a hat, sword, and a long pole. Nothing has been left undone hitherto to discover these inhuman monsters, but without effect. Mrs. Shiel, though prodigiously weak and low from her wounds and loss of blood, is in a fair way of recovery, and it is to be hoped, will live to see those villains brought to a just punishment, for their more than Savage cruelty and barbarity."

O R,

Compendium of Entertaining Knowledge,

For NOVEMBER, 1777.

Memoirs of the late Samuel Foote, Esquire. With an elegant Engraving.

MR. Foote was born at Truro in the year 1721; he descended from a very ancient family in Cornwall. His father was member for Tiverton, and his mother was sister to the late sir Dinely Goodiere. He was first placed at a grammar school, and, at a proper age, was sent to Worcester-college, at Oxford, which college was founded by one of his ancestors. When of age he came into possession of a very genteel fortune, and commenced student at law in the Temple, where he resided for some time, but this being too dry a study for his lively genius, he made but little proficiency in it. He married a young lady of a good family and some fortune; but their tempers not agreeing, a perfect harmony did not long subsist between them. He now launched out into all the fashionable foibles of the age, gaming not excepted, and in a few years dissipated all his fortune. His wants and necessities made his imagination fertile: he courted the muses, but they did not smile upon him; this led him to the stage, and he made his first appearance in the character of Othello: he next performed Fondlewife with far more success, and indeed this was ever one of his capital parts. Lord Foppington he attempted, but prudently gave it up. To speak impartially, he was far from a capital actor, as he experienced by his salary, the smallness of which compelled him to contract various debts, that led him for refuge into the verge of the court.

He was relieved from this embarrassed situation by a very whimsical stratagem. Notwithstanding he had appeared upon the stage, and there not in the most elevated stile, being always considered as a gentleman, he still kept the best company occasionally. The late sir Francis Delaval was his particular friend; but alas! at that time poor Frank's finances were nearly in the same predicament as Sam's, and he was lying in wait for some expedient to recruit them. Mr. Foote was also intimately acquainted with lady Nassau Pawlet. This lady, who might with propriety be stiled a rich wanton widow, would willingly have given Foote her hand, but it was pre-engaged. This, however, was a fine opportunity for his friend Delaval. The matter was to be managed; a scheme was to be framed; her ladyship's foibles were to be consulted. Bent upon a matrimonial plan, who could a credulous woman apply to more properly than a conjurer to consult her fate in the choice of a mate? No man in life was better calculated than the late Jemmy Workdale, of facetious memory, to personate a conjuror. He was made acquainted with the most striking anecdotes of her ladyship's life, her prospects, and pursuits. Foote strongly recommended the conjuror in the Old Bailey as a man of amazing skill and surprizing penetration. Wordsdale took a lodging the very next door to the conjuror, and personated him so well, that even those who had seen him might easily have been imposed upon. Her ladyship waited upon him—he amazed, he astonished her; some of the greatest secrets of her life he told her. It was by this time necessary to enquire about the chief purpose of this errand—a husband. He depicted Frank Delaval at full length, described the dress he would be in, the place where she would meet him, and the hour she would see him. Every circumstance coincided, and they were married in a few days. Frank did not, upon this occasion forget his friend; but amply requited Foote for his services, which enabled him once more to emerge from obscurity.

U o u u

He then first appeared in a mimic character at the Hay-market, and gave what he called Tea in a Morning; but the jealousy of one of the managers of Drury-lane theatre stopped his career in this pursuit, by applying to the lord chamberlain. He for some time lived en gentleman, and soon got rid of an annuity that Frank Delaval had settled upon him, by selling it for a mere trifle, and was once more compelled to appear upon the boards as a mere actor under Mr. Garrick's management; but at length he obtained a licence from the lord chamberlain to perform again at the Haymarket. He now proved very successful, having written several pieces of great merit, in all which he performed. As they conveyed personal satire upon the most ridiculous characters known in the gay and polite world, they filled his houses, and of course his pockets.

A party of pleasure with the late duke of York, lord Mexborough, and sir Francis Delaval, proved at once a fatal and a lucky adventure to Mr. Foote. Being thrown from his horse, he broke his leg, which turning to a mortification, he was compelled to undergo an amputation. This accident so sensibly affected the late duke of York, that he made a point of obtaining for Mr. Foote a patent for his life, which he procured (in 1766) whereby he was allowed to perform from the 15th of May to the 15th of September, every year.

He now became a greater favourite of the town than ever: his very laughable pieces, with his more laughable performances, constantly filled his house; and his receipts were some seasons almost incredible. Parsimony was never a vice to be ascribed to Mr. Foote; his hospitality and generosity were ever conspicuous. His table was not only attended by his particular friends and acquaintance, but even by the first nobility; and he was sometimes honoured even by royal guests.

The season before he disposed of his property in the theatre, he was more particularly honoured by his audience than ever, for their majesties vouchsafed to be among the number of his auditors, a favour never before conferred upon any performer or performance at that theatre.

Finding his health decline, he judged it expedient to enter into an agreement with Mr. Colman, according to which this gentleman was to pay Mr. Foote 1600*l.* per annum, besides a stipulated sum whenever he chose to perform.—Mr. Foote made his appearance two or three times last summer, in some of his most admired characters; but being suddenly affected with a paralytic stroke one night whilst upon the stage, he was compelled to retire, and the remainder of the part was done by another actor. From this time the public have lost our justly styled Aristophanes. He was advised to bathe, and accordingly went to Brighthelmston; from hence he proposed making a tour into France, and repaired to Dover, where he was again seized with his former complaint, and departed this life on the 21st of October, in the 56th year of his age.

Mr. Foote, as a dramatic writer, aimed more at character, or rather caricature, than fable, denouement, and catastrophe; but there was always such a richness of colouring in his portraits, such a gal attica in his dialogue, such a vein of pleasantry in his satire, and such a strong imitation of nature in his mimicry, that we could easily forego the critical laws of the drama, and were compelled, in despite of the most rigid stoicism, to relax the risible muscles. As a man he was friendly, generous, and sincere; as a companion, he was, perhaps, the most finished bon vivant that has appeared this century; take him all in all, we, perhaps, ne'er shall see his like again.

That he had his foibles and caprices, no one will pretend to deny; but they were so amply counterbalanced by his merit and abilities, that they were as a speck upon a mountain of snow.

It is generally believed that his literary altercation, with a certain then duchess, or rather her agents, much affected him, tho' his volatility of spirits appeared to surmount all impressions from that quarter. It is, however certain, from that time his health declined.

He has bequeathed the bulk of his fortune to a natural son, a minor.

Some of the Circumstances which inevitably retard the progress of a Northern Army through the uninhabited Countries of America.

THE whole army, with all their artillery, stores, and provisions, are to be transported in flat-bottomed batteaux (about the size of below-bridge wherries), carrying from a ton to a ton and a half, down the rivers and creeks, with almost incredible difficulty and fatigue. To instance, in such a place as Wood-Creek (see Gazette extraordinary) the natural obstructions to the passage are numerous and great.

The American woods, literally in a state of nature, are all covered with trees close to the water's edge, whether they form the border of a lake, a river, or a creek. The inland rivers, forming the immediate and indeed the only communication between Albany and Montreal to the northward, and between Albany and Oswego on Lake Ontario to the westward, may certainly, with the strictest attention paid to truth and justice, be ranked amongst the most extraordinary waters in the known world. From some time in December till the latter end of April, they are either in a vast frozen state, or the ice is not sufficiently cleared for boats to proceed. Immediately upon this succeeds a flood, occasioned by the melted snow pouring in from the creeks and vallies. A private adventurer, with a few boats, may make great advantage of the flood, arrive with his cargo at a good market, and perhaps return before the water falls. If I must suppose any person hasty enough to enquire what hinders an army doing nearly the same, the old observation, that great bodies move slow, (though perfectly in point,) needs a very minute explanation.

The boats, the baggage-waggons, the provisions, the artillery, the naval and engineers stores, are all to be carefully surveyed, and the proper reports made.—Coopers, carpenters, wheel-wrights, collar-makers, smiths, &c. are all set to work to put every necessary in order for a march; which cannot be done sooner, because the bulky articles, as gun-carriages, mortar-beds, and boats, are but just dug out of the snow to undergo the proper repairs. Whilst these preparations are making with the utmost expedition, and during the march of the army to these most astonishingly difficult waters, a month or six weeks may elapse. The benefit of the deep water is hereby totally lost, there not being, with the least shadow of reason, the smallest cause to charge, or even to suspect, any individual of the land or sea service with having materially contributed to the delay.

Obstacles entirely insurmountable by ir-resolute minds, and within a few degrees of forming real ne plus ultras, next ensue. These obstacles (I repeat it upon weighing the declaration) immediately ensue, and continue till October. By the middle of May, the sun has gained great power; and in the months of June, July, and August, the land-waters, which alone make these rivers with any tolerable convenience passable, being dispersed and gone no man knows whither, the creeks and small rivers are almost dry. This is the cause of the demand for many hundred flat-bottomed boats.

Thus situated, one half of the business of the batteau-men is to get out of their boats, positively in some places every quarter of an hour, and, by an exertion of strength, and many dangerous strains, for several days together, to hoist them over pieces of rock, stumps of trees, and gravelly banks. Even where a river is forty or fifty yards broad, it frequently happens that there is no channel but for single boats; and when the channel itself is, barely deep enough to float the boat, (no uncommon case,) it really requires some faith on the score of the marvellous, not having seen a similar circumstance, stedfastly to believe how much an army must be delayed by these causes: however, truth not being a wholesale dealer in worldly interest, authorizes us to represent things as they are, leaving to falsehood, as a sufficient punishment for her forgeries, a dread, eternally terrifying, of beholding a just mirror.

Another great impediment arises from the carrying-places, where both boats and stores are to be transported in waggons, to avoid falls or rifts. This is a piece of service tedious enough, if it was generally understood, to become proverbial; but is only one plague upon the list when necessity is commander in chief.

A third obstacle arises from the accidents of boats getting staved and blocking up the channel, which indeed, though a common circumstance, may nearly be said to complete the chapter of accidents, and close the mortifying representation of remediless delays, too well authenticated to admit of a dispute, by much too vexatious ever to be forgotten.

A fourth inconvenience is occasioned by bad steerage of the boats, amidst a continual succession of trees, stumps, and stones. A number of men, chiefly residing at Albany and Schenectady, and called batteau-men, get their living by working batteaux up and down the rivers; and their dexterity in turning and steering a heavy-laden flat-bottomed boat, with setting poles, against a rapid stream, is truly wonderful: in the unskilful hands of soldiers, bred to no such business, expedition, without some months practice, is impossible. An American campaign is incomparably well calculated to correct the wishes, and new model the mistaken expectations, of mankind; and an European may very safely be credited, on his bare word, returning from such a service, that he never carried out with him above one half of the stock of patience he has brought back.

Overcharged this representation is certainly not; yet full-charged as it may probably appear, the worst part of the story, and the labour the nearest approaching to Herculean, is absolutely yet untold. It relates to the creeks. In their natural state, you will find numbers of fallen trees covering the stream; and as they grow close to the water, an enemy has nothing more to do for the stoppage of an army, but to cut down, if they have time, sufficient to choke it up entirely. Not a single tree needs removing one inch from the spot where it is cut and must fall.

The marquis de Montcalm, about the year 1756, when he retreated from Fort Stanwix and Oswego to Montreal, set the first example of this superlatively-distressing manœuvre. In Wood Creek, at the head of the Mohawk River, and leading to the Oneida Lake, between the wood naturally fallen and what he cut down, the water was in a manner hid by the trunks and branches of trees for about twenty-four computed miles.

Lord Amherst's army, in the year 1760, had the very laborious honour of cutting through these trees for a passage to their boats; a task which nothing short of absolute necessity could ever engage even an army of men for a moment seriously to think of executing. Justice requires it should be acknowledged as a great military exploit, and truth will bear witness it is in no respect magnified. When individuals magnify ordinary events, they either call no witnesses, or none who can prove any thing. Every body knows hearsay is no evidence in law. Can any middling reason be given why it ought to be allowed as such in politics, geography, or tactics?

Lord Loudon, in the year 1757, was much censured in England for trifling away a campaign. At that time, not having viewed the woods of America, or met with any view in England like them, I own I thought it exceeding strange the army made so little progress. Nothing short of the most undeniable facts can possibly controvert general opinions. The roads from Albany to the Lakes George and Champlain, and Lake Ontario, were all, or chiefly, made in his time; and all the American road-makers since his time are his scholars.

The difference between making a road through a wood in England and the woods in America, is simply this: we have, comparatively speaking, but a very few trees and a little underwood to clear away, and the road is made, and, without one barrowful of gravel, far superior to any road in the desolate, uninhabited lands of America; except it may be a road of a mile or two at a carrying-place, or five or six miles about some capital fort, which the garrison may have mended for their convenience.

The American woods have in some places a great deal of underwood, in other parts none at all. The difficulties of making roads in such situations may be reduced to four. First, the trees in general, in their natural state, are very close to each other. In the second place, fallen trees, lying in all directions, some found, blown down by winds, others in a rotting state, are as plenty as lamp-posts upon a high-way about London, and frequently as thick as the lamps upon Westminster-bridge: these being irremovable, and almost innumerable, the road is continually upon the turn to one side or the other to get clear of them. In the third place, about every two or three miles, probably there is a bridge to be made, twenty, thirty, or forty feet high, and twice or three times as long, over a creek, or rather a great gutter, between two hills, and the avenues, when the ground is very high, want levelling. The sum of the perplexity must be charged to the account of swamps. The cure of these is very troublesome. The whole army may be out of humour about it. But when they are got into the thickest of the work, one hint about the connection between their present actions and the future history of their country, will cure them all of the vapours, and make their eyes flash with indignation at the idea of their being conquered even by the most rugged baulks of nature.

To make a swamp passable for heavy artillery, they cut down small trees in lengths of about ten or twelve feet; and laying them close to each other, a carriage can pass. There is a piece of road between the Oneida Lake and the Seneca River, twelve computed miles, almost entirely a swamp, and covered in this manner. When I travelled it, being of an age qualified to walk on tiptoe, I got over it in company, and, driven by necessity, I shall only say indifferently well. One hundred and thirty-three of these bridges, I was assured, were really to be reckoned in this distance. I do believe it true, but I was not in a humour to count them.

General Burgoyne's situation, and the advances he had made, as appears by the last Gazette, I hope, may be better understood by the above descriptions. Most people allow he has made great advances; but such persons who think or say he has done nothing very particular in reaching Hudson's River, will do well to consider and enquire before they condemn.

Substance of Some Trials at Doctor's Commons, respecting American Captures, and, among others, the following:

THE William and Grace, a Dutch Jew merchant, who had resided at Surinam and Eustatia, claimed the ship and cargo as his property, which he swore it to be; and, among other things, set forth, that he had bills due to him, drawn by persons at Philadelphia, upon merchants in Holland; that they were returned protested; on which he went to Holland, and gave bail to his creditors, and then went to Philadelphia, where he was obliged to take Congress money, and with that purchased the ship and cargo, and was returning in it to Holland when taken. The ground of his claim was, that this was a trade of necessity, and not such a trade with America as was prohibited by the act. But the court was of opinion, that the act left no discretion to the judges of the admiralty; that all ships and goods, whether Americans or others, going to or coming from the rebellious colonies, after a limited time, were a forfeiture to his majesty; that even cargoes remitted to subjects in England and Ireland, after a certain time, were confiscable; and that this Dutch Jew could not expect to be upon a better footing than British subjects; that no sort of trade was admissible; besides, that it was against the colonizing laws of all Europe, for foreigners to traffick for and carry away the produce of their colonies; that, in a letter annexed to his affidavit, there was a proof that part of the cargo belonged to some other persons. A distinction was made between the case determined on the 29th of July last, in favour of a Mr. Baird, a king's officer, who came away with a few casks of indigo for his support, being banished by the pretended government of South Carolina, for refusing to swear allegiance to them, and abjure the king, which was in evidence; as also the case of the Rev. Mr. Angus Macaulay, under the same circumstances. Also the case of the Polly was noticed, for that was a ship re-purchased from the rebels by an English master who had been taken by them; he loaded her with rice, &c. was in the midst of Hopkins's fleet at Rhode Island, when the king's fleet appeared; he did not sail up the river with Hopkins, or try to escape; and swore he intended, after carrying his cargo to Portugal, in order to save his bail, which he had given at the Congress custom house, to have come home to England; yet the ship and cargo were condemned, because the setting-up an intention would be liable, if admitted, to great collusion.

Another cause determined was the Friendship, in which Mr. Wells, late marshal of the superior court of admiralty at Charles Town, was a claimant. He came away in 1775, being driven from thence by force, because he would not join an association against government, leaving his daughter and family; she left the colony a few months ago, and came on board this ship, having two barrels of indigo for her support, and the ship was bound to Nantz. The court restored the indigo claimed, as also one barrel in favour of a Mr. Millegan, late chief surgeon of the king's garrison in that colony, who was forced away at the same time. This indigo was brought over by his wife. Millegan came over with government dispatches in 1775. The court said, that it should be careful how it gave ear to petitions, from which large consequences might follow to defeat the act. But here were two officers of the crown compelled; their families made a part of themselves, and the quantity brought over was very small, and for immediate maintenance of the ladies. It was proved, by the examination, that there were ladies on board; it was reasonable, therefore, to take this case out of the rigor of the law; for as the Congress governor permitted British subjects to take away their property with their persons, it would be injustice to friends to rob them of what foes had spared; but all depended on circumstances, and no one case can be a precedent for another. On the other hand, in the case of the Bell Savage, the court condemned one cask of indigo, claimed by the said Mr. Wells, which was under the care of a passenger, and said to be remitted by some persons not named, his attorneys at Philadelphia, to some persons at Nantz; and in the preparatory examinations his claim was contradicted by the witnesses swearing that the whole cargo belonged to persons resident in America. The danger of admitting these sort of claims was animadverted upon, as the act might be entirely defeated; and all sorts of people, under one pre-

tence or other, let in to cover the trade of the rebel Americans.

In the case of the Commerce, in which governor Bull, late the king's governor, was claimant of sixteen casks of indigo, which he brought with him, the court restored the indigo. The governor had an estate in the province, and this indigo he swore to be the produce of it. He said there some time after the Congress had deprived him of all authority.

The case of the Betsy, was a determination of great consequence to the officers of his majesty's navy. She was laden with government stores, and the navy board contested the demand of Sir James Wallace for an eighth salvage; because the act of parliament only expressed that salvage should be given to the officers and mariners of any of his majesty's ships of war, or vessel, or boats, under his majesty's protection, for ships and goods of his majesty's subjects retaken from the enemy.—It was insisted on, that the officers of the king's ships having their pay, it was sufficient, and they did no more than their duty in retaking the king's goods; but the court held, that common right of salvage is always due for re-captures; that it would be very liberal to construe the act of parliament narrowly, which was meant by the policy of the legislature to encourage all the king's officers to do their duty, by coupling the principle of interest with the principle of honour: that the pay was not, in most cases of the service, adequate to the risk, and danger, and fatigue; that private merchant-ships, who never fought but where something was to be gained, would be better off than the king's ships, if the latter were denied salvage; that in queen Anne's war, the Winchelsea man of war being retaken by the Chester, the king's proctor claimed the re-captured ship, and salvage was decreed to the Chester, in these especial words, "according to law and custom." It was said, that the king's stores are the public stores, voted and paid for by the public, of which his majesty has the application; that salvage had always been allowed where any thing was recovered from an enemy; and that although the quantum of salvage had been floating, as to what the courts of admiralty allowed, at different times, before the prize acts of parliament had fixed that quantum, yet it was always settled, that re-captors, were to be rewarded according to their merit. Dr. Marriott, the king's advocate-general, and Dr. Calvert, argued in favour of the men of war; and Dr. Harris, the advocate of the admiralty, and Dr. Wynne, for the commissioners of the navy.—The case of the Rising States was quoted; a transport ship re-taken by a king's ship, and adjudged about a month ago, when the admiralty proctor prayed restitution of the king's stores, paying the salvage; so it seemed singular, that it now should be made a question for the navy board.

In the cases above-mentioned of the private adventures of banished subjects, the king's advocates, Dr. Marriott, and Dr. Harris, argued the causes with great candour and tenderness towards the loyal unfortunate sufferers, although on the side of the captors, who prayed condemnation of the forfeitures to his majesty, the interest of which is vested in the captors eventually, being first finally adjudged lawful prize to his majesty, according to the terms of the act of parliament.

The Rat in the Statue.

IN Father Du Halde's account of China are several rules of morality and good government, which the politest nation in Europe may adopt with honour, and practice with advantage. Many of them are conveyed in allegories and fables, according to the Eastern custom. Among many is the following:

Hoen-Kong one day asked his prime minister, what was most to be feared in a government? He answered, "In my mind, sir, nothing is so much to be dreaded as what they call The Rat in the Statue." The emperor not understanding the allegory, the prime minister explained it to him: "You know, sir, (said he,) 'tis a common practice to erect statues to the genius of the place. These statues are of wood, hollow within, and painted without: if a rat gets into one of them, we don't know how to get him out; we dare not set fire to't, for fear of burning the statue; nor can we dip it in water: this will wash off the paint; so the regard we have for the statue, saves the rat. Sir, such are those in every government, who, without virtue or merit, have gained the favour of their prince so far as to prevail upon him to shut his ears against the petitions of his people, who think themselves oppressed; and rather than give up their favourite schemes, will ruin every thing, even their prince himself. The prince's faithful subjects see and lament it, but don't know how to prevent it."

I much approve of the moral of this story; for I think nothing is more to be dreaded in a limited monarchy than this Rat in the Statue. As to the allegory itself, the parallel drawn between the emperor and the wooden statue, at first hearing, seems very uncourtly; for, in reality, it is making little or no difference between the anointed head of the emperor, and the wooden head of the statue. A rat rat may nibble himself into a wooden statue, unseen and unsmelt; but I think it impossible for a minister to prevail on his master to turn a deaf ear to the complaints and groans of his desolated and ruined people, unless his head is not so far above the head of the statue as one could wish. However, to do justice to this Eastern minister, I don't impute his way of reasoning, though false, to his want of parts; I rather think it a piece of ministerial logic, used in other countries besides China, to connect the king and minister so close as his Rat and Statue: nay, I've heard in some states they are thought one and the same; for whoever attacks, or but censures the all devouring Rat, alias the minister, are exclaimed against as enemies to the king. I adopt the first part of the allegory, "that nothing can be more fatal to the existence of a state, where there is the least remains of liberty, than for a minister, without virtue or merit, to get into favour with his prince, to the detriment of the people." But I entirely object to the latter part: "though 'tis seen and lamented, yet, out of regard to the prince, one don't know how to remedy it." That very regard to the prince should excite every good subject to endeavour it, and common sense points out the means.

Of entertaining a true Idea of the Necessaries of Life.

THERE is a peculiar phrase which the generality of people use as a description of what would establish their happiness; that is, to have the necessaries of life.—If we examine this expression of the necessaries of life, how plain it seems; yet how undetermined is its meaning, few annexing the same ideas to the sound of the words. The ancient philosophers restrained this phrase within a narrow compass, and meant only by it to have coarse victuals, and a plain garb. What was sufficient to support life, they thought was alone necessary to it. Diogenes, particularly, comprized all his necessaries in a scrip to hold his meat, and a bowl to drink out of: yet even here he found a superfluity; for seeing a boy one day on a river's side, sucking up water out of the hollow of his hand, he with great indignation threw away his bowl as an unnecessary burthen.

When Rome was in its infancy, its heroes and consuls were of this philosophical way of thinking: they tilled their lands with their own hands, and on public occasions they were often taken from the plough to command armies: nor when the war was finished, had they any esteem for pomp, but laid down the purple, and took up the spade and plough again. Though they reckoned the conveniencies of life to be only such as were necessary for nature, yet, as their posterity grew more polite, their necessaries grew more extensive; that is, they began to conceive other ideas of what was or was not so; and under the title of Conveniencies of Life, they understood all that art could invent, and luxury introduce.

The different idea of Necessaries, at different times, is not more applicable to the Roman people than any of our modern nations; and the people of this island have even in a century or two mightily enlarged their notions in this respect; for many articles, which in Queen Bess's days were unknown, are now placed in the list of the necessaries of life.

When we hear persons thus express themselves about the use of any thing, O! I should die without it, it demonstrates that they think it absolutely necessary to support their being, without which life and soul could not be kept together; it cannot, therefore, but make any one smile to observe what a whimsical list of necessaries a modern conversation would furnish.

Spleenetta cannot live without her tea, though it gives her the cholic, the which she must cure by a large cup of brandy. Bellaria cannot live without her wine, though it gives her the stone, the which she must cure by a large cup of brandy. The country Squire could not live without his fox-hounds; and Billy Butterflying would as soon be out of the world, as out of the pink of the mode.—But as fantastical as these necessaries may seem, a great part of the world have so habituated themselves to these, or others as ridiculous, that it would be next to an impossibility for them to lay them down.

Wrong ideas being annexed to words, though always leading to introduce error, are never of worse consequence than when they are instilled into children. It is with some concern I have observed, that, in this polite age, children are, by the example of their parents, taught to regard the superfluities of life as things necessary, and indeed what it is impossible for them to live without. From hence there flows a torrent of evils which are notoriously discernible, and the chief causes of that extravagance which has been for some years so universally complained of.

In this examination into the false meaning of the Necessaries of Life, I would not be understood to advise all mankind to turn stoics, and not allow themselves such indulgencies which are requisite to soothe the cares and fatigues of life: so far from it, that I think a wise man may enjoy the elegancies elegancies of life; nor does he offend against decency, so long as he avoids running into luxury and extravagance.

But having found fault with the mistakes which mankind fall into by the misconstruction of this phrase, the Necessaries of Life, it may seem proper to shew what I think a natural construction of these words.

Nature requires but a few necessities: it would be prudent, therefore, not to raise imaginary wants. If we view the vices and follies of those who have a more affluent fortune than ourselves, we should make their estates and equipages moderate our ambitious desires; which, instead of being necessary to contentment, are too often attended with misery and disquietude. We should change the prospect, and then we should immediately behold thousands and ten thousands of unhappy fellow-creatures, among whom the Necessaries of Life are truly wanting. The moderation of our desires can alone give an idea of what is necessary or superfluous; and he is more rich, whose wishes are bounded by his fortune, than he, who possessing empires, still desires somewhat more:

For, that somewhat unpossess'd,
Corrodes and leavens all the rest.

Of all wishes as to fortune, "Give neither poverty nor riches," seems the best calculated for true happiness.

Description of Bandon-Bridge.

Bandon-Bridge, a large walled market town, is situated at each side the river of Bandon, about 12 miles S. of the city of Corke, and 135 S. W. of Dublin. It was built by the first earl of Corke, and by its amazing increase in a very few years, shews what great improvements can be made by one man, who has the good of his country at heart, and who makes every other consideration give way thereto.

The town is divided by the river into two parishes, in each of which is a handsome church and market-house.—The north church is called Christ Church, and was built anno 1625, in the form of a cross: it is well pewed and strongly roofed with oak.

In the other parish church is a very fine monument to the memory of Francis Bernard, Esq; a Justice of the Common Pleas. On the right side is a statue of Minerva reclining on her Ægis, and on the left is Justice leaning on her arm, her sword in her hand: Over an obelisk of fine Egyptian marble, is the coat of arms of the deceased, with an inscription denoting his age, &c.

There is likewise in this town a Dissenting and a Quakers Meeting-house.

The market-houses are neat handsome buildings, in one is a market on Wednesday, and in the other on Saturday, weekly.

No Roman Catholic is suffered to dwell in the town, nor even to enter the gates if he is known to be such.

The town is very populous; they can raise 1000 men fit to bear arms, so that the total number of souls must be five or six thousand.

The inhabitants are very industrious, being mostly employed in the woollen manufacture. There are two county quarter sessions held here yearly.

The noble founder of the town, established a public school here, the master of which has an income of 30l. per annum.

The streets of the town are so disposed, that almost every house has a garden to it, which being planted with trees, make the town appear as if built in a wood.

Over the river is a good stone bridge, of six arches.

The following part of a letter from the earl of Corke, I find quoted by Dr. Smith in his excellent history of the county of Corke, which being apropos to the subject of this account of Bandon, I here annex.

April 13, 1632.

"Upon conferring with the Commissioners, I have been desirous to satisfy myself whether the works done by the Londoners at Derry, or mine at Bandon-bridge exceed each other: All that are judicious, and have viewed them both, and compared every part of them together, do confidently affirm that the compass of my new town, is greater than that of Londonderry: That my walls are stronger, thicker and higher than theirs, only they have a strong rampier within, which Bandon wanteth. There is no comparison between their ports and mine, there being in my town three, each containing 26 rooms: the castles with the turrets and flankers being platformed with lead and prepared with ordnance, the number of houses and goodness of the building in my town far exceed theirs.

"In my town is built a strong bridge over the river, two large session houses, two market-houses and two fair churches, which latter are so filled every Sunday with neat orderly and religious people, as would comfort every good heart to see the change and behold such assemblies. The sight of Bandon-bridge 24 years ago was a mere waste, serving for a retreat to thieves and wolves, yet now the country 5 miles round the town is entirely inhabited by a numerous body of industrious Protestants, &c.

The town is governed by a Provost, 13 Burgesses and 12 Common-Councilmen, who return 2 representatives to Parliament.

BRITISH and IRISH BIOGRAPHY,

FASTOLFF (John) knight and knight-banneret, a valiant and renowned general in the fifteenth century, was descended of an ancient and honourable family in Norfolk, and is supposed to have been born at Yarmouth in that county, about the year 1377. In 1413 he received a grant of the castle and dominion of Veires in Gascony. Two years after, he was entrusted, in conjunction with the earl of Dorset, with the government of Harfleur; and it appears that he was present at the battle of Agincourt, where he greatly distinguished himself. After the death of Henry V. he was appointed by the regent, John duke of Bedford, grand master of his household, and venschal of Normandy. In 1423 he was constituted lieutenant for the king in Normandy, in the jurisdictions of Rouen, Evreux, Alencon, and the countries beyond the river Seine; and also governor of the counties of Anjou and Maine. He afterwards took the castles of Tenue and Beaumont le Vicompt; and also the castle of Sillie-le-Guillem, from which he was dignified with the title of baron. In 1425 he took St. Guen D'Estrais near Laval, with other places of strength, from the enemy, for which services in France, he was invested with the order of the garter. In 1428 he gained great honour by his valour and conduct, in totally defeating four thousand French at the head of two thousand five hundred English, in the famous battle of the Herrings, and conducting a convoy in triumph to the English camp before Orleans. In 1429 our brave commander appears to have been somewhat infected with the epidemical panic which had then taken possession of most of the English, on account of the Maid of Orleans; for he was among those who fled from the enemy at the battle of Patay. But, notwithstanding, his general character for courage and ability was so well established, that in 1430, the duke of Bedford preferred him to the lieutenancy of Caen in Normandy.

In the year 1432 Sir John Fastolff was sent ambassador to the council of Basil, and was afterwards appointed to negotiate a final or temporary peace with the French. The duke of Bedford dying in 1435, gave a manifest evidence of his esteem and regard for Sir John Fastolff, by appointing him one of the executors of his last will; and Richard duke of York, who succeeded him in the regency of France, granted our knight an annuity of twenty pounds.

Hib. Mag. Nov. 1777.

In 1440 Sir John made his final return to England, where he shone as bright in virtue as he had in valour abroad; and became as amiable in his domestic, as he had been admirable in his public character. He was a benefactor to both the universities, bequeathing a considerable legacy to Cambridge for building the schools of philosophy and civil law; and at Oxford, he was so bountiful to Magdalen-college, through the affection he had for his friend William Wainfleet, the founder, that his name is there commemorated in an anniversary speech. He died in 1459, when he was upwards of eighty years of age; and, at the time of his death, was possessed of considerable estates in Norfolk, Suffolk, Yorkshire and Wiltshire.

Shakespear has been highly censured by some writers, for perverting, they say, with an unaccountable licence, the character of this great and good man, under his Sir John Falstaff; while others will not allow that he drew his Falstaff from any part of Sir John Fastolff's character. These latter urge, as arguments for their side of the question, the difference of their names, a difference in their ages, and above all, that this character of Sir John Falstaff was written and acted originally under the name of Sir John Oldcastle; with whom, however, it will no better agree, except as to age, than with Sir John Fastolff. This, at least, is certain, that nothing can be more different than the characters of Shakespear's Falstaff and the real Fastolff. The poet's Falstaff is a whimsical, boasting, cowardly, lewd, lying, drunken debauchee; whereas the real Sir John Fastolff was a grave, discreet, valiant, chaste, and sober commander, continually advanced to honours and places of profit, for his brave and politic achievements; military and civil; and, when finally settled at home, was constantly employed in acts of hospitality and munificence.

The Life of Elijah Fenton.

Fenton (Elijah) an English poet, was born at Shelton, near Newcastle under Line, in Staffordshire, towards the latter end of king Charles the Second's reign; and being designed for the church, was sent to the university of Cambridge, where, embracing principles very opposite to the government, he became disqualified for entering into holy orders. On his quitting that seminary of learning, he attended the earl of Orrery, as his secretary, to Flanders; and at his return, became master of the free-school of Sevenoak in Kent. This laborious employment, however, he soon quitted, at the request of lord Bolingbroke, who promised to provide for him; but before his lordship was able to perform

perform his promise, he was himself obliged to abandon his country. Being thus disappointed, Mr. Fenton had recourse to his literary abilities; and collecting his poems, by the advice of his friends, he published a volume of them in 1717.—About the same time he was taken into the family of Mr. secretary Craggs, in order to read the classics to him; and that amiable statesman would certainly have made his fortune, had he not been carried off by the small-pox in the flower of his age. In 1723 Mr. Fenton brought upon the stage his tragedy of Mariamne, and with the profits of this play he discharged all his debts, which amounted to little less than one thousand pounds. Soon after, being invited by lady Trumball, relict of Sir William Trumball, to undertake the education of her son, he accepted the offer; and settling in that family, continued to reside there during the remainder of his life. He published a fine edition of the works of Mr. Edmund Waller, with notes of his own; and, after a life of ease and tranquillity, died at East-Hamptstead-Park, near Oakingham, on the 13th of July, 1730, much regretted by all men of taste, particularly by Mr. Pope, who honoured him with the following beautiful epitaph:

“ This modest stone, what few vain marbles can,
“ May truly say, Here lies an honest man :
“ A poet, blest beyond a poet’s fate, “ Whom heaven kept sacred from the proud and great ;
“ Foe to loud praise, and friend to learned ease, [peace.
“ Content with science in the vale of “ Calmly he look’d on either life, and here “ Saw nothing to regret, or there to fear ;
“ From nature’s temperate feast rose satisfy’d, “ Thank’d heaven that he had lived, and that he dy’d.”

The Life of Henry Fielding.

Fielding (Henry) a well-known and justly celebrated writer, was born at Sharp-ham-park, in Somersetshire, on the 22d of April, 1707. His father, Edmund Fielding, Esq; served in the wars under the duke of Marlborough, and arrived to the rank of lieutenant-general; his mother was the daughter of judge Gould, and aunt to the present Sir Henry Gould, one of the judges of the court of common pleas. By these his parents he had four sisters, Catharine, Ursula, Sarah, and Beatrice; and one brother, Edmund, who was an officer in the marine service. Sarah Fielding, his third sister, is well known to the literary world by many ingenious performances. Our author’s mother having paid her debt to nature, his father married a second time, and the issue of that marriage was six sons, all of whom are dead, except the present Sir John Fielding, now in the commission of the peace for Middlesex, Surry, Essex, and the liberties of Westminster.

Henry Fielding received the rudiments of education at home, under the care of the reverend Mr. Oliver, of whom he has given a very humorous and striking portrait in his Joseph Andrews, under the name of parson Trulliber. From this gentleman’s care he was removed to Eton school, where he became acquainted with lord Lyttleton, Mr. Fox, Mr. Pitt, Sir Charles Hanbury Williams, &c. When he left this great seminary, he was uncommonly versed in the Greek and Latin classics; for both which he ever retained a strong admiration. From Eton he was sent to Leyden, and there he studied the civil law, for about two years, at the expiration of which time, remittances not coming so regularly as at first, he was obliged to return to London; where, though under age, he found himself his own master. From this source flowed all the inconveniences that attended him afterwards thro’ life. The brilliancy of his wit, the vivacity of his humour, and his high relish of social enjoyment, soon brought him into request with the men of taste and literature, and with the voluptuous of all ranks. His finances were by no means adequate to the frequent draughts made upon him by the extravagance which naturally followed. He was allowed, indeed, two hundred pounds a year by his father; but, as he himself used to say, any body might pay it that would. The fact was, general Fielding, as we have already observed, having married again soon after the death of his first wife, had so large an increase of family, and that too so quick, that he could not spare any considerable disbursements for the maintenance of his eldest son. Of this truth Henry Fielding was sensible: and he was therefore, in whatever difficulties he might be involved, never wanting in filial piety. Disappointments, indeed, were observed to provoke him into occasional peevishness, and severity of animadversion; but his general temper was remarkably gay, and, for the most part, overflowing into wit, mirth and good-humour. Disagreeable impressions never continued long upon his mind; his imagination was fond of seizing every gay prospect; and, in his worst adventures, filled him with sanguine hopes of a better better fortune. To obtain this, he flattered himself that he should find resources in his wit and invention; and accordingly commenced a writer for the stage in the year 1727, being then twenty years of age. His first attempt in the drama was a piece called Love in several Masques, which, though it immediately succeeded the long run of the Provoked Husband, met with a favourable reception. He produced, in a few years, many other theatrical performances, some of which were very successful.

About six or seven years after Mr. Fielding had commenced dramatic writer, he married Miss Craddock, a young lady of great beauty; and his mother dying about the same time, a moderate estate at Stower in Dorsetshire came into his possession. To this place he retired with his wife, of whom he was extremely fond, with a resolution of bidding adieu to all the follies and intemperances of a town life. But unhappily, a kind of family pride here gained an ascendant over him, and he began immediately to vie in splendor with the neighbouring country squires.

With an estate of little more than two hundred pounds a year, and his wife's fortune, which did not exceed fifteen hundred pounds, he encumbered himself with a large retinue of servants, all clad in costly yellow liveries; and his chief pleasure consisting in society and convivial mirth, hospitality threw open his doors, and in less than three years, entertainments, hounds and horses, entirely devoured his little patrimony, which, had it been managed with economy, might have secured to him a state of independence for the rest of his life. Sensible of the disagreeable situation to which he was now reduced, he immediately determined to exert his best endeavours to recover, what he had so wantonly thrown away, a decent competence; and being then but thirty years of age, he betook himself to the study of the law. His application, while he was a student in the Temple, was remarkably intense: he has been frequently known to retire late at night from a tavern to his chambers, and there read, and make extracts from the most abstruse authors, for several hours before he went to bed. After the customary time of probation, he was called to the bar. He attended with assiduity, both in term-time and on the western circuit, as long as his health permitted: but the gout soon rendered it impossible for him to be as constant at the bar as the laboriousness of his profession required; so that he could only pursue the law by snatches, at such intervals as were free from pain; which could not but be a dispiriting circumstance, as he saw himself at once disabled from ever rising to the eminence he aspired to. However, under the severities of pain and want, he still pursued his researches with uncommon eagerness; and, though it is wittily remarked by Wycherly, that Apollon and Lyttleton seldom meet in the same brain, yet Mr. Fielding is allowed to have acquired a respectable share of jurisprudence, and in some particular branches he is said to have risen to a great degree of eminence, especially in crown law, as may be judged from his leaving two volumes in folio on that subject. This work remains still unpublished, in the hands of his brother Sir John Fielding; and is deemed perfect in some parts. It will serve to give us an idea of the great force and vigour of his mind, if we consider him in pursuing so arduous a study amidst the exigencies of family distress, with a wife and children, whom he tenderly loved, looking up to him for subsistence, with a body tortured by the acutest pains, and with a mind distracted by a thousand avocations, and obliged, for immediate supply, to produce, almost extempore, a play, a farce, a pamphlet, or essays for a news-paper. A great number of fugitive political tracts, which had their value when the incidents were actually passing on the grand scene of business, came from his pen; and the periodical paper, called the Champion, owed its chief support to his abilities.

In the progress of Henry Fielding's talents, there seem to have been three remarkable periods; one, when his genius broke forth with an effulgence superior to all the rays of light it had before emitted, like the sun in his morning glory; the second, when it was displayed with collected force, and a fulness of perfection, like the sun in meridian majesty; and the third, when the same genius, grown more cool and temperate, still continued to cheer and enliven, but shewed at the same time that it was tending to its decline, like the sun, abating from his ardor, but still gilding the western hemisphere. To these three epochs of our author's genius there is an exact correspondence in his Joseph Andrews, Tom Jones, and Amelia. It will not be improper here to mention, that the reverend Mr. Young, a learned and much esteemed friend of Mr. Fielding's, sat for the picture of parson Adams. Mr. Young was remarkable for his intimate acquaintance with the Greek authors, and had as passionate a veneration for Zelchylus as parson Adams; the overflowings of his benevolence were as strong; and his fits of reverie occurred too upon the most interesting occasions. Of this last observation a singular instance is given, by a gentleman who served, during the last war, in Flanders, in the very same regiment to which Mr. Young was chaplain: on a fine summer's evening, he thought proper to indulge himself in his love of a solitary walk; and accordingly he sallied forth from his tent: the beauties of the hemisphere, and the landscape round him, pressed warmly on his imagination; his heart overflowed with benevolence to all God's creatures, and gratitude to the Supreme Dispenser of that emanation of glory which covered the face of things. It is probable that a passage in his dearly beloved Æschylus occurred to his memory on this occasion, and seduced his thoughts into a profound meditation.—Whatever was the object of his reflections, certain it is, that something did powerfully seize his imagination, so as to preclude all attention to things that lay immediately before him; and, in that deep fit of absence, Mr. Young proceeded on his journey, till he arrived very quietly and calmly, in the enemy's camp, where he was, with difficulty, brought to a recollection of himself, by the repetition of qui va la from the soldiers upon duty. The officer who commanded, finding that he had strayed thither in the undesigning simplicity of his heart, observing an innate goodness in his prisoner, very politely gave him leave to pursue his contemplations home again.

Soon after the publication of Joseph Andrews, Fielding's last comedy, the Wedding Day, was exhibited on the stage with very indifferent success. His ill state of health, and his necessities, now made him grow cool to the study of the law; besides, to his distress, his beloved wife daily languished and wore away before his eyes, and her death brought on him such a vehemence of grief, that his friends were apprehensive of his losing his reason.—When the first emotions of his sorrow were abated, he engaged in two periodical papers successively. The first of these, called the True Patriot, was set on foot during the late rebellion, and was conducive to the excitement of loyalty in the breasts of his countrymen: the second, entitled the Jacobite Journal, was calculated to discredit the shattered remains of an unsuccessful party, and, by a well-applied railery and ridicule, to bring the sentiments of the disaffected into contempt. By this time Fielding had attained the age of forty-three; and, being incessantly pursued by reiterated attacks of the gout, he was rendered incapable of following the business of a barrister any longer. He therefore accepted the office of an acting magistrate in the commission of the peace for Middlesex. That he was not inattentive to the calls of his duty, is evident from the many tracts he published relating to several of the penal laws, and to the vices and mal-practices which those laws were intended to restrain; particularly a Charge to the Grand Jury, delivered at Westminster, on the 29th of June, 1749; An enquiry into the causes of the increase of robberies; and a proposal for the maintenance of the poor. Amidst all the laborious duties of his office, his invention could not lie still; but he found leisure to amuse himself, and afterwards the world, with the History of Tom Jones. And now we are arrived at the second grand epoch of Mr. Fielding's genius, when all his faculties were in perfect unison, and conspired to produce a complete work, eminent in all the great essentials of composition; in fable, character, sentiment, and elocution; and, as these could not be all united in so high an assemblage, without a rich invention, a fine imagination, an enlightened judgment, and a lively wit, we may fairly here decide his character, and pronounce him the English Cervantes. Thus have we traced our author in his progress to the time when the vigour of his mind was in its full perfection; from this period it sunk, but by slow degrees, into a decline. Amelia, which succeeded Tom Jones, has indeed the marks of genius, but of a genius beginning to fall into its decay.

At length Mr. Fielding's whole frame of body was so shattered by continual inroads of complicated disorders, that by the advice of his physicians, he set out for Lisbon. The last gleams of his wit and humour faintly sparkled in the narrative he wrote of his voyage to that place. In this his last sketch, he puts us in mind of a person, under sentence of death, jesting on the scaffold; for his strength was now quite exhausted; and, in about two months after his arrival at Lisbon, he yielded his last breath, in the year 1754, and the forty-eighth of his age. He left behind him (for he married a second time) a widow and four children, three of whom were living in 1762, and were then training up in a handsome course of education under the care of their uncle, with the aid of a very generous donation, given annually by Ralph Allen, Esq; for that purpose. This gentleman, who is now dead, bequeathed to the widow and to each of the children a legacy of one hundred pounds.

"We have seen (says Mr. Murphy in his life of our author) how Mr. Fielding very for the repair of the bank has passed, no water comes into the river, the grain that was sown is scorched, and the country produces in some places $\frac{1}{2}$, and in other places $\frac{1}{3}$ only of the usual crop. As the Nabob's people prevented me from digging earth for the repair of the bank according to custom, I was under the necessity to bring earth from my own country for that purpose, this was effected with great difficulty and at ten times the cost, which would otherwise have been required. After having been at this expence of labour and money, and the bank not being sufficiently strengthened, I every week informed you of my situation; and now, out of your great goodness, you are pleased to speak to the Nabob, and have obtained permission that the bank should be repaired as usual, by which you have obliged me very much. Col. James waited upon me here, told me that the order was come, and promised that if any interruption happened, he would go there in person, and see it enforced. I will now send a person from hence to oversee the work.

You have further desired "that I would take pains to prevent the inhabitants of Tanjore from making incursions into the Nabob's country, as many complaints had arrived of the disturbances which the Padecot people had formerly raised, and were now raising;" that upon a representation from the Nabob to you, to this effect, you told him "that many complaints had arrived from me, of disturbances created in my country by the Tondeman Polygars, and that the Nabob promised the necessary orders should be given to prevent the like in future." My renters never have entered, nor shall they enter the Nabob's country to create disturbances there. If proof can be brought that they have at any time done so, they shall be severely punished, I before wrote you to the same purpose. If you want to know whether the Nabob and the Tondeman's people make incursions into my country, pray write to Colonel Harper, from whom you will obtain information. You will highly oblige me, by obtaining orders from the Nabob, for preventing the like in future. I have received great relief from the two orders you have already sent to me. Myself and my Amuldar have given strict orders to the same purpose.

You are likewise pleased to write me, that you have received my letter of the 2d instant, with a flundi for pagodas 20,000, and that you will acquaint me when you receive the money. The time limited by the Soncar is now expired, and the company must have received the money; you will therefore be pleased to send me a receipt.

Lib. Mag. Nov. 1777

You have been pleased to write, "that you have ordered two companies of Seapoys from Vellum, for the collection of the revenues, and that you had, in consequence, given the necessary directions to Col. Harper." This country requires, that two battalions should be stationed in it; one battalion to continue in the forts and the country, and another battalion is wanted for the collection of the revenues. As the produce of my country does not wholly belong to the farmers, as soon as the grain is cut down, the revenues must be collected, through the different districts; two companies of Seapoys will be very insufficient for this purpose, you will therefore be pleased to give orders for stationing another battalion here, this is the time in which the revenues should be collected, and if there is a scarcity of men, those revenues must remain as a ballance in the hands of the country people. I have none but you to whom I can make my complaints, I therefore take the liberty of troubling you often.

You write me "that you have obtained from the Nabob two orders, one for the Amuldar of Arialour, and the other for the Amuldar of Warriourpollam, which were delivered to my Vakeel, that if hereafter any of these people came to disturb the peace of my country, that I must severely punish them, and that if my people molested them, they would do the same." What power have I in my hands, with which I can inflict punishment? It is the company that must punish them; what is said, with regard to my people's entering the Nabob's country, and committing disturbances there, is groundless; let the servants of the Nabob come here under this pretence, let them quietly make the necessary enquiry, and if they can prove any thing against my people, I will punish such of them as have offended. As you are the mediator in every dispute; you render any extraordinary attention, on my part unnecessary; however, I think it proper briefly to state my situation to you. I have dispatched the two orders you were pleased to send me, to the Amuldars of Arialoor and Warriourpollam. You would oblige me by sending orders to Col. Harper, to apprehend such Polygars as make incursions into my kingdom from these places.

You are likewise pleased to write, "that I must have received the letter wrote me by Lord Pigot, on the 20th of August, and one wrote by you on the 25th of October,

ber, that in these you informed me of the resolutions of the governor and council, which were, that the produce of the government's share of my revenues for the last year, was the property of the Nabob, as he had borne the expences of government, sowed the ground and reaped the crop; that you therefore earnestly requested, that I would send just and true accounts of the government's share of the crop, together with the accounts which the farmers deliver into the Cericar; that if I properly considered this business, it would appear to me just that these accounts were sent, that this did not diminish what I ought to receive, that you will not desire that I pay the whole now, and that I receive the entire produce next year, as it might be attended with many inconveniencies, and that it is by no means your wish to distress me." I have at two different times wrote you, that Lord Pigot addressed no such letter to me as you mention. In the copy you send me of Lord Pigot's letter, is the following passage, that, "a paragraph was sent me, of the orders of parliament, with regard to Mr. Benfield's claim, which would direct me how to act." You have not, however, sent me this paragraph. I am unacquainted who the parliament are, what is their name, what is the nature of their institution, or the rules they have laid down for me. You will much oblige me by making me acquainted with these circumstances. The Nabob took my kingdom by force, carried away my jewels, my furniture, my horses, elephants, and other cattle, plundered my houses, my treasury and my armoury, and enjoyed the revenues of my country for two years and a half, collected a great sum of money in it, carried away all the accounts and records belonging to the kingdom. After having suffered all these losses by the Nabob, is it just that I should pay him the produce of the country, because he sowed the ground, did there ever any instance happen of such a determination having been made? the year the Nabob took my country by force, I sowed the ground, did he, or did he not, then enjoy the produce? he seized my country by violence, my own is again restored to me, I have taken no man's possessions, nor has the Nabob bestowed any favour on me. The Nabob himself collected all the revenues for last year. When Lord Pigot arrived from Europe at Madras, the Nabob hearing that the company had sent orders for restoring my kingdom to me, gave people tankas upon it for more than double the amount of their debts. He advanced no money to the farms, as was customary, he collected all the money that was in the country, and left it in a state of desolation. That I might get no insight into the Amuldar's accounts, he carried every page of them out of the country, and notwithstanding this, and my entire ignorance of them, I am desired to make them out. The little money that remained in the country, at the time the company was so good, as to restore it to me, did not prove sufficient for my expences. When Lord Pigot was here, I stipulated in the treaty, addressed to him, "that whatever grain was in the country, over and above what was wanted for the consumption of the inhabitants, should be delivered to the company at a reasonable price." This grain has accordingly been delivered. If I had no right to the produce of my country for last year, would the company purchase it from me? Having strictly enquired into every thing, it appears to me, that the Nabob has no right to the produce of my kingdom, after it was delivered over to me. Your justice can penetrate into every thing; when you decide, you should, from the regard you bear both parties, inform yourself particularly, hear what each has to say, and determine without partiality; but if, without taking this method, and without hearing me, you listen to my adversary only, I must, tho' with reluctance, deny my assent to your measures. Your conduct in this respect, does not appear equitable; if, after knowing every circumstance relating to my situation, you decide in this manner, it will be very difficult for me to govern my kingdom. The company at home have distinguished me with their favour, and with a proper regard to the faith of the treaty, and the friendship by that means established; have given orders to you, gentlemen, for reinstating me in my kingdom; if they at the same time ordered, that whoever sows a country, should receive the produce of it; if they have given directions, that when the country was taken from the Nabob, and delivered to me, that the produce of it, for the year, should be given to me or the Nabob; if they have formed resolutions, with regard to every thing that has passed, and every thing that is to come; be so obliging as to make me acquainted with these instructions, and I will study how I can comply with them.

You have further declared, "your wish is, that as the company have become the support and protection of all the Carnatick, to distribute justice to all, and as I may find some difficulty in paying the Nabob out of the present year, that he would have no objection to receive it out of the produce of next year; that your government government was desirous of shewing every mark of regard, to assist me as much as lay in their power, and that I might firmly depend upon them." This is likewise my wish, I am one of those who are distinguished in the Carnatick, it is therefore just and proper that I should be protected. I am besides, under the shadow and protection of the company, and it rests with them to promote the happiness of my kingdom. When you do me the favour to look at me and my adversary, with equal regard, my confidence in you will be entire; my dependance is at present placed on you alone. When it is unjust for the Nabob to make any demand on me, what occasion is there for granting the delay you mention? You are wise, and know every thing, do me the favour to shew your friendship for this kingdom, and use such means as will make it proper? My dependance is upon you and upon the council. The company are my sole support, my honour or dishonour depends upon them. My request to the governor and council therefore, is, that you would impartially examine, and consider the contents of this letter, and act in my affairs without partiality. Believe me to be your sincere friend.

What can I say more?

A Masquerade is one of the most incontestable proofs of a general licentiousness; for you are disguised in this form, or represent this character, and your excellence consists in keeping up to that character of figure with life, expression, and wit. Why, you say, this is laudable, it exercises genius. I grant you it has the appearance of being praise-worthy, so have many other customs here the same appearance; but are nevertheless the very opposite to every thing deserving praise; so with a masquerade, for thus screened by a mask to cover the face, the tongue deals in familiarities, offensive to delicacy: all are not wise, all are not equally qualified to support their character with decorum, wit and sense, or endued with grace, to confine themselves to the rational and more refined pleasures of agreeable society, and mirthful innocent conversation, agreements are made, intrigues carried on publicly, and yet unknown, under these disguises, and all the fearful consequences of incontinence and infidelity, too fully propagated, amidst those nightly meetings, which end in impurity, riot, debauchery, and great expence of constitution and wealth; for the dresses are very dear, and the hour of retirement far advanced in the ensuing day. But I have hurried on so fast, I believe, you cannot possibly conceive what I mean, you have never seen a mask—a mask represents part of the human visage, either naturally, or much deformed; it is a case, that fits on close to the features, with holes for the eyes, for the mouth, and to convey the air up the nostrils; this is tied on by ribbands on the back part, and a garb is then added, representing a friar, or a buffoon; a prostitute, or nun; an eastern prince, or a peasant, or a preacher; in short every possible character or figure thought on, nay brutes, such as bears, &c. inanimates, coffins, wind-mills, and all such out of the way fancies. They meet, thus habited, in a great hall most superbly adorned, about the middle of the night. Here the furniture, lights, fruits, meats, preserves and wines, tempt to mirth, to unrestrained joy, to unbounded voluptuousness, to sensuality, unguardedness, at last to a fall from innocence and virtue. The musick, the lascivious movement of the dance, the poignant meats, the enlivening wines, the whispers boldly told (under the protection of these disguises, and heard without a blush, or uneasiness) too often disarm the fair one of her pride, rob her of her chastity, and plunge her and her destroyer in the gulphs of uncleanness and Sin. Those abominable meetings were banished for a long time, from this country, and but lately introduced again; but by what I can learn, the people acted very nearly as filthily in their other assemblies, without masks, as they do now disguised; with this difference, however, that the contagion was not so general; it was confined, among a few abandoned great ones. Now, alas! it has descended, and invaded the only order of general happiness, here, the middling kind of people, who until this period, enjoyed the uninterrupted sweets of ease, bestowed by virtue, unhurried by the bustle of grandeur, which afflicted those above them, or grieved by the necessities which sometimes afflict those of an inferior condition. But happiness has flown from this island along with innocence; they are however, the visitants of a few, while immorality and dissipation tyrannize over all the rest: but to have it otherwise would almost be miraculous; for if heretofore a gloomy superstition held Europe under the grossest darkness, almost as general a glare of scepticism scepticism has attracted the inhabitants of this quarter of the globe, on the opposite and as far distant tracts from virtue and true religion. They seem to have only heard of a Supreme Being, and that he governs all things wisely; but they think no more of him, until sickness, or loss of property, awakes them out of their dreams of pleasure, then they begin to learn to know the Almighty, too often too late: they misconceive his attributes, they either abuse his mercy or his justice, representing him to themselves, as all forgiving, or, as it were, such an one as themselves, or else to asure that satisfaction cannot be made to his offended Majesty. Ignorant of our blessed Saviour's merits and sufferings, they hurry into his presence, with an additional aggravation to their other crimes, they slay themselves. But, my friend, education is the true pilot to guide us through life: if that is neglected what fearful risques do we run, if we escape? but generally how do we fall into the most extravagant, unheard of crimes? The education of the women here, is not so much neglected as perverted, and I think, I or any person from our country, the best judges in this matter, for there we see the proofs of modest behaviour and conjugal felicity, terms scarce heard of here, much less goods known or possessed. With pleasure I come now to say something in favour of this people, that, notwithstanding this tide, this overwhelming sea of corruption and immorality, they are blessed with courage, a love of their country, an honesty and innate honour. How can these be compatible, you demand, with the general account I have already given? thus, my friend, their courage, which they glory in, and for which they have the most sincere regard, for want of obeying the dictates of reason, occasions the greatest faults being committed, against that very favourite, which can be imagined. Many, nay, almost numberless instances of heroism can be produced, among this people, from the meanest subject to the crowned heads, in which they have held life in the greatest contempt, and sought death as a pleasure; the many wars they have maintained against the other nations of Europe are full of them; yet as I mentioned in a former paper, duelling, the greatest slur on true courage, is practised here, in all its various ways, on the most trifling occasions, and the fear of being accounted cowards, hurries this people into the crimes of murder, and every species of injustice; for although I offend you, if you should require gentleman's satisfaction (as here termed) in too rough or peremptory a manner, it would be deemed an impeachment of my valour, if I made a submission—I must fight you, and perhaps after giving you some gross insult, I may deprive you of life, if you thus in a menacing manner happened to require justice; yet among all these heroes, there is not a man to be found of such real spirit and true generosity, as to propose a plan for eradicating this barbarous, this unchristian custom. Nay, some plead for the utility of it—alas! alas! how would they curse their love of punctilio (a term used for this false honour) if they had slain their friend for so nice a subtlety? and yet such horrid accidents have happened here. I have spoken to several in this city about it, and have received in general for answer, why we should wear continual marks of violence on our faces: every meeting would be a scene of confusion, abuse and riot; brutal force would carry all before it—our females would be shocked with rude and improper behaviour and expressions; we should be struck or treated with the most lessening behaviour and language, by every man who happened to excel us in strength; but a pistol or sword deters people very much from such practices, still placing men of inferior strength on an equality with the most robust. I have replied with astonishment, do not your laws punish those who dare strike? and your education instil principles to prevent such rude behaviour as you mention, among men of any rank? they alledged, custom is against one gentleman's applying for protection to, or redress from the law against another for a stroke; he who would not right himself immediately would be deemed a coward, a man of no spirit. As for the other occasions of duels, gaming, party, gallantry, and drunkenness afford sufficient opportunities. Why there, I have returned, your deviation from morality is the true reason for this tyranny of false honour; true morality forbids all these pursuits, from whence arise quarrels and their consequences, duels. So you would make Quakers of us all, if smote on one cheek to turn the other. No, I would not have you particularized by any denomination, but that of Christian, act up to it; happiness and real pleasure shall even here be the result. What! although at present through the neglect of education and contempt of religion, you find a difficulty to punish offending brawlers or foul mouthed retailers of scandal in pursuance of our Saviour's advice and method, first to admonish your offending brother in private; if still refractory, to tell him of his faults before two or three mutual friends; if after all he remains incorrigible, to complain complain of him before the assembled members of your church, a body composed of your intimates, friends, and neighbours, and if this will not soften him and bring him to a sight of his error, let the whole congregation exclude him from society and intercourse, until by repentance, confession of his faults and reparation, he entitles himself once more to be restored to the arms of christianity and true friendship; but until you can arrive at this pitch of gospel discipline, suppose certain grave, honest and well disposed men were chosen in each city, as a tribunal for judging of the heinousness of an insult, and awarding the restitution the injured ought to receive. Would not this be a better method of terminating disputes, than by having a rash recourse to the instruments of death? the laws to decide where a stroke has been given, and the claimant of their protection to suffer no imputation of lack of valour. Let courage be shewn in its proper place, in the defence of your laws, your liberties and country; that they possess a love for their country, every quarter of the globe can bear testimony how freely they bleed for her. This you may say is the result of pride, give it a gentler name, a praise-worthy desire of excellence. It is a passion planted in our nature, deserving cultivation, and when properly directed, abounds with every quality great and good; for our country we suffer every pain, every kind of death cheerfully; we are careful of preserving her honour unsullied by any unworthy behaviour in ourselves, influenced by christianity it flames out in the most amiable attractive splendor; but like every other virtue, may become corrupt and run in the channels of licentiousness and confusion: nothing more common here. For thus designing men work up the minds of the people to however absurd, nay wicked actions they can desire, representing the dangers of their country, and pointing out the remedies to prevent her from destruction. Some years ago a man of this sort overthrew the very appearance of the constitution of this land, and on the ruins of limited monarchy, piled a most rude and absolute authority: he brought his king to a trial, and beheaded him for crimes alleged to have been committed by him against the state; the perpetrator of all this seized on the government, and except the title, exercised more absolute rule than any king ever dared to aspire in this country to. Crafty and politic, he maintained his seat, and with amazing impudence, at his death bequeathed these kingdoms and his fellow-subjects, as a legacy to his offspring. Sick of the heavy and unnatural yoke, the nation soon repented after his decease, and returned to their allegiance under the descendants of their ancient and rightful princes. Men of such designing minds and principles have now attempted treading in the same cruel path; but may they be disappointed, and plainly see their errors; may they sincerely repent and turn to their duty; may the dangers the peaceable and faithful subjects escape, awake them to virtue and the restoration of morality and religion. Honesty and innate honour are to be traced with pleasure among all ranks of men, but, alas, not so generally as heretofore, for schemes to raise speedy fortunes, to administer to luxury and the sensual enjoyments; if baffled, tempt too often and too much to baseness, cheating, and corruption, from the man styled noble, to the meanest mechanick: however virtue has still her advocates, and whether thro' policy or conviction, the majority at least seem to join with her. The son of an Irish nobleman having wedded on upright principles, with a woman deserving every advantage and preferment, so displeased his old parent (a man too much prepossessed in favour of the riches and mistaken honours of this world) that he determined to leave his estates to his own brother, an admiral in the fleets of Britain. Thus resolved the aged peer. Perceiving his death approaching, sent for the admiral, and acquainted him with his intended will; "and for what purpose do you mean to dispose of your property in this manner," says the admiral—"to punish a disobedient son," returns the peer—"I grant you," replied the admiral, "he has acted very wrong, very imprudently, in not consulting you and procuring your consent; but on the other hand, he has made so happy, so wise a choice, that it rather ought to administer to your joy, that in his youth he shewed so great a degree of goodness and wisdom, thus attaching himself to so amiable a woman, and should mitigate if not suppress whatever chagrin you may entertain at his not getting a larger fortune, it pleads so powerfully in his behalf with me, that the instant you die, I will restore all his just rights to him; but I would much rather, you should have his thanks, the gift would come better and dearer from your hands; besides you would depart this life more composed and pleased, receive the last sad office of filial affection from a good son and deserving daughter a truly sorrowful farewell and sincere tear."—Goodness was prevailing, the peer was melted, thanked his his brother and followed his advice.— Marriage, my friend, is not esteemed here, as with us; the noble ends are forgot, it is too usually to satisfy ambition, avarice or lust, that these connexions are formed. Why should we wonder then at the frequent separations which take place, and the little conjugal happiness that is to be met with here? In this land women have large fortunes, they consequently become the objects of avarice, and are sought after although destitute of every accomplishment, a Prince would seek in a wife. Riches, O Jonadab, are to be avoided, a nation cursed with too rich individuals, is in fact the poorest, the most distressed. Manufactures become dear, that source of population, industry and good manners. The fall of good manners is the signal for distress, for every species of fraud and vice to enter and possess the people; it is too plainly pictured in this country, and where can we look for this contempt of virtue and frugality and for this strange unconquerable desire of wealth and pursuit after luxury, unless the neglect of education points out the reason? Thus all owing to parents educating their children according to their own caprice and leisure. For parents in England are not obliged to send their young ones to certain properly regulated schools, neither doth the government trouble themselves how the growing stock of subjects are trained, as with us, neither are parents answerable for their childrens conduct as in China.

Female Virtue and Greatness displayed in Principle and Conduct.

MISS Collet was astonished when she had read her Amanda's epistle—she knew not how to answer it; and yet she did not like to admit all the ideas, or allow the force of the reasoning. "Oh (thought she) how greatly is this noble creature above us all! I wonder not Mr. Trenchard admires her so. I like not what he can do; he must admire her the more for rejecting him. But where is the man thus admiring, that would take up with a repulse? he will be like the rebounding ball, the oftner it is thrown back, the more forcibly it returns. I can say nothing, I can do nothing but sit and silently wait the issue. Yet I cannot bear the imperious covetous spirit of Sir William should be gratified; for 'tis only a sordid attachment to rank and fortune that influences him. I cannot be so noble, so generous as Nancy, for I want to see him mortified, unworthy as he is of such a daughter as she would be to him: but so it is, proud spirits combat with their real happiness. On the contrary, the humble one of my Amanda will secure felicity. Thus was it, when by her humble carriage (though I rallied her severely at the time) she won the heart of Mr. Trenchard;" (for he had owned to Miss Collet he loved her before that.) She would not pretend a full answer, but contented herself with the following short epistle.

LETTER XXIV.

Miss Collet to Miss Pelham.

YOUR epistle, my dear, has more than answered my expectations—for it has silenced me, not that I think all you say unanswerable, but that I am not cautious enough to be the opponent. I wish you had fallen into Dr. Butler's hands—he can defend your Strephon's case. (Do, my dear, let me show him your letter; I want to do it, but will not without your leave. I was there on a visit the other evening, (before I had your letter) and your affair came on the carpet; there were only he and Mrs. Butler, I, and you can guess who. The Doctor said, "he had heard you did not give much, if any, encouragement: he knew your principles and steady temper; but as Mr. Trenchard was so deserving a gentleman, and had such a great esteem for you, he wondered he had not prevailed. Every one knew Sir William's motives, and if that was what you sick at, he did not know whether you would not be blame-worthy to countenance such a temper, and make the innocent suffer for the guilty. Do, my dear, weigh this suggestion. You could if it was mine or any one's case beside your own. Suppose I had been free, and Mr. Trenchard had made me the offer he has you; and Sir William had acted as now you think he has, would you have thought I ought to refuse him, although I preferred him to any body else? I trow not: but I'll say no more until I know whether you will allow of my proposed referee, viz. Dr. Butler. Do be good, Miss Pelham, and consent; I'll love you dearly if you will—for honestly I am of your Strephon's party; yet I must and shall, let the event be as it will, love, esteem, and honour the Amanda of that Strephon, of each worthy member of our circle that used to delight in your presence, the most gratified of which was your

COLINDA.

Miss Nancy felt the lively sensations of grateful love to Miss Collet, for thus interesting herself, but chose not to refer the case. She wrote to Miss Collet expressing this, this, and that put an end to their writing on this article, though they corresponded with freedom on other subjects. Miss Pelham returned to her cousin at Bath, when Mr. Trenchard left E——n, to fulfil a promise she made to Miss Amherst, a maiden lady who was there for her health, and resided at Mr. Briscoe's. Miss Amherst being pleased with Miss Pelham, begged her to stay there and bear her company, nor would she have another bed-fellow. Their taste and sentiments suiting well, they were always together. On her return Miss Amherst observed her to be very thoughtful—sometimes even to absence; and finding she had little sleep, took the freedom to ask if something did not oppress her mind? Nancy was cautious, and declined to satisfy her: but the lady told her that while she was gone home, she had heard a report that Mr. Trenchard, who had spent an evening there on her account, paid his respects to her, and that his father was against the match, and asked if it was not true? The honest heart of Miss Pelham could not deny it; and Miss Amherst telling her she heard of it in the assembly room from Lady Allop of W——n B——h who spoke in favour of it, and blamed Sir William, our young friend could not dissemble; her silence and sensibility confirmed the report. In Miss Amherst she found her fellow-mind, and this attracted and opened hers. She laid the whole of her case to view. Miss Amherst was rational, and had a delicate sensibility and a refinement, a kin to her own. She entered into every circumstantial with her, and neither pressed her to accept, nor encouraged her to refuse, but helped her to balance. The case of Mr. Trenchard she pitied; but as she had no acquaintance with him, could not be his advocate; and indeed as to his person he needed no help—Nancy herself owned she was far from being blind to his merits. Miss Amherst gave her an invitation to go home with her to G——n, and was so urgent, that Mr. and Mrs. Pelham, and Miss Nancy were prevailed on. All this time Mrs. Briscoe never had heard nor suspected the case, so careful were the Pelham family of making it public, and so friendly was Miss Amherst. It was while they were at Bath that Miss Pelham wrote Letter XXIII. but Miss Amherst had not then hinted to her that she had heard of it, though she did before she sent it away, and upon discoursing freely she shewed it to Miss Amherst. Miss Amherst thought of it as Miss Collet did when she read it, and said some things to invalidate some of her objections, but she knew not Mr. Trenchard well enough to answer all. To him therefore she left it to plead his own cause; and as she had drawn his mistress so much farther from his home, she judged it but a piece of justice to him to acquaint him with it, and invite him also, which she did in these terms.

LETTER XXV.

From Miss Amherst to Mr. Trenchard.

S I R,

IT may surprise you to find an invitation to G——n, and that from one you have but a small knowledge of. I have the pleasure of an acquaintance with one of the most amiable young ladies in this part of the kingdom, and have been so happy as to draw her to this peaceful retreat. I have nothing to allure a young gentleman of your reputed taste, but that attachment which lady Allop has told me you have to my agreeable guest; nor if I can judge of you by myself, need I present any stronger inducement. Happy indeed shall I account this period, if I may in the least promote the felicity of this lady, and that of so worthy a person as I hear the young gentleman is who seeks her hand. If I can be in this way acceptable to you in the character of a friend, you may be assured of my warmest efforts, and as free to command as I am conscious I am sincere to offer. Miss Pelham is ignorant of my writing; but common humanity and justice commands me to give you this intimation, which precludes an apology. The pitying heart will seek an occasion to comfort the oppressed, such an occasion seems now to present, and is gladly embraced by, Sir,

Your most humble servant,

DIANA AMHERST.

In consequence of this letter he acquainted his father that he was going to visit Miss Nancy again, and hoped he would think more favourably of his design. For the answer, see No. 36. He went to G——n, No. 37, waited on Miss Amherst. Found her a sensible, polite, benevolent lady. They discoursed freely about it, until Miss Nancy came in, who was at one of the neighbours on a visit, but returned on Miss Amherst's sending for her. The young couple withdrew; he was very pressing for acceptance; she was free to own she had no objections to him or his character, but her other objections being still the same, how could she comply? He endeavoured to remove them; but she was fearful, and told him, she was not so much afraid of suffering as of sinning. He urged his right to chuse for himself. She assented to it, how could she do otherwise? But may you not chuse, said she, where Sir William will consent? That, he replied, was uncertain, were she out of the question; since, had he never thought of her, he might as likely have been attached (if any beside her attracted him) to one who had no rank to boast: since it was the mind and mental wealth he sought, and agreeable companion for the retired hour, not merely one who could make a graceful figure at his table, and shine bright at an assembly. But suppose Sir William should say, Son, you shall have no one under the rank of a lord's daughter: might he not as well? Must I then have sought after connections with such, merely because they were a kin to a coronet? how hard, Miss Nancy, how pitiful my case! No, believe me, no such motives bias me; love, and love only, is the loan for love; and in general there is little of that in made matches. 'Tis this that has done more to ruin the morals of our gentry, with all its consequences, have come in like a flood—and indeed, he that marries for a purse or a name of honour, generally weds seven plagues, and misses all the generous delights of the married state. Miss Nancy said all she could to represent her difficulties. They sat thus in close debate till midnight: at length he made this proposal, that they should each retire—he would sum up her arguments, and make his reply in writing; and give them to her, to consider all anew; and if she could not answer them, she would consent to be his. After half an hour's talking of this and some reflections in her own mind, she complied, and they separated for the night. Nancy slept none, but lay and conversed with Miss Amherst on this. It was Miss Amherst who suggested this expedient to Mr. Trenchard, unknown to Nancy.—What end can this answer? said she: he can offer nothing new; he may pour out a flood of eloquence, and show himself master of composition; in this and every manly accomplishment, he is superior to me; nor do I wish him otherwise; but 'tis fast, and its probable consequences that alone can influence my judgment.—As to my passions they are easily moved; and I have had enough to do to keep them, in any tolerable degree, in due subjection to my reason. I am afraid now to receive his written remonstrance. I know he will try to move me in melting strains, and in such a mood I may give in to a thing wrong in itself. What shall I do? I cannot refuse it now that I have consented to it. But why did he suggest this method? I cannot conceive what he meant by it when he sees me every day. Miss Amherst told her she thought she need not be anxious about it; if his arguments had not force enough to convince, she could refute them, and then the matter would be ended, if he was persuasively eloquent, what was there in that more than she had been used to from him? Mr. Trenchard was as graceful in personal address, as he could be in the other way, and she should think if she could withstand that, aided by a melting voice, and eyes that spoke ardent affection and tenderness (as she saw, and every one must see who observed him, when they were not alone, and talking only of other subjects)—and doubtless more when they were alone) showing his heart to be in his words. She could much easier resist a written memorial, which she would read and study, and deliberate on word by word all alone. For my own part I wish this affair terminated for both your sakes: he has been long enough engaged in it—and you see is not to be moved from his purpose by any consideration, so long as he can keep your company—and for your sake, Miss Pelham, you know him, and you know the state of things with his father as much as you can. If you keep him company, you will be more and more perplexed.—'Twill be more difficult to get rid of the affair. It will look so odd to the world, few will believe you never encouraged him—though I do, because both of you have told me the whole affair. You have often told him your doubts and difficulties; and have been plain and open—yet you see he will persist, and what can you do with him? Will you tell him that you never will see him again if he comes to see you? You would not be so rude.—Nancy said, I would not say rudely, nor look nor act rudely, but I would be so honest as to tell him I would not see him on this account again, and should think it unhandsome in him to press me any further. I should really, Miss Amherst, (do not look so unbelieving I pray) think it an imposition, and I should let him know I thought so, and that in such case he depended more on his outward superiority than on his intrinsic merit to effect his purpose with me. If I tell him this is my mind, I know Mr. Trenchard will not force himself on me. If he does, he will be less generous and less polite than I ever thought him. Well, says Miss Amherst, I like your notions quite well: but this way will be smoother, and an easier letting down for him, if you are not overcome, and let down yourself. You will deliberate and answer his paper; and finally, in a pretty manner, with your easy gentle language, express your esteem for him, and take as kind a leave as one would wish with to do of a condemned man whom we are about to execute—but let him make this his last speech I beg you. Miss Amherst gave this lively turn to it at that time, that Nancy might leave off and go to rest, for she saw she was more discomposed than was common. Nancy was too serious to be witty, and as she knew Miss Amherst was too sensible to think lightly of it, took it in the kind way she meant it, and bade her good night.

In the morning, the ladies did not resume the conversation; they met Mr. Trenchard in the parlour at 9, breakfasted, and chatted of the weather, the prospects, &c. and then Nancy withdrew; he arose and gave her his letter. (See No. 37.) She went up stairs and sat alone all the afternoon in deep thought. She weighed and re-examined every article. She reflected on all that had passed on what lady Parker, Miss Collet, Dr. Butler, and Miss Amherst had said, all corroborating with Mr. Trenchard's arguments. She considered all Sir William had said against it to her father. She reflected on what her own father said to her on his return from Sir William, which was, I will not controul you, Nancy; but remember this, "the prudent man looketh well to his going; he foreseeth the evil and hideth himself; but the simple pass on and are punished;" and added, your way ought to be as clear as the sun, if you accept Mr. Trenchard. For to enter with a doubtful mind, and that contrary to a parent's declared will, will lay a foundation for anxiety all your days; and this to a mind naturally thoughtful, as I know yours is, will be distressing indeed. Endeavour by prayer and a constant regard to duty, to know the divine mind. In all your ways acknowledge God, and he will, my child, direct your paths. Be willing to know and to do what he chooses: this disposition will secure you, for the meek he will guide in judgment, and the meek he will teach his way. She had seriously from the first sought the direction of heaven. She hoped to have it not in the way of unaccountable impulse, but by attending to every circumstance; by comparing providences; by submitting her inclinations to the government of virtuous principles; by reading her bible; by conversing with the impartial and serious; for though she made not a confident of many, yet with her own pious judicious mother and Miss Amherst, she had been free, though Mrs. Pelham said very little to it, and though the general rules she laid down had been of little service to Nancy till now; yet, upon recollection, she got much by them. She again, before she would open the paper, committed her case to her heavenly Father, and implored his sovereign direction, resolving to do nothing that appeared to her inconsistent with the maxims of piety. In this way she spent the morning, and her mind was calm and resigned: she had more favourable thoughts of it than ever before: she could not get over some parts of his paper. All her doubt now was, how she could get over what she had hitherto thought was ingratitude to Sir William: in this she could not be satisfied; yet things appeared to her as though she must comply. However, she was not determined; in this posture of mind was she when she received a summons to dinner at three. She went down and staid the afternoon. (See No. 37.) sweetly composed—the natural result of a temper cast into the mould of the gospel. A soul that can say, "not as I will, but as thou, O my Heavenly Father, willest," must be at peace with itself, must feel a divine calm. To say, this is the language of true christian piety, is saying what every christian knows; to pretend to prove the consequences of such a temper to be rest, satisfaction and peace, is no other than to prove that the attendant of a clear sunshine, without troublesome winds, is a perfect pleasant calm. Mr. Trenchard made his own observations on her conduct, and flattering hope took again possession of him. (See No. 37.) He once asked her to withdraw, but as she was not determined, she wisely declined it. All this time she said not one word about it to Miss Amherst, because she thought that lady was so inclined for it as might influence her too much. The next morning they again met in the parlour. She had been part of the night and all the morning, exercising her mind about it: had in a solemn manner again implored divine help, and with importunity and sincerity begged to "have every wrong and dangerous path darkened, or in the emphatical terms of inspiration, hedged up with thorns, so that she could not surmount them; and the path of duty, though ever so difficult and mortifying to corrupt desires, pointed out." She had also great freedom within her own mind to leave all the unknown consequences of her conduct to the will and rule of Providence, and as she afterward told Mr. Trenchard, felt ashamed and humbled, that she had pretended to so much foresight, and talked as though she had strength as well as wisdom sufficient to guard against future disagreeable contingencies. Many and various were the movements of her mind. On the whole she could not reject Mr. Trenchard—she could not answer his arguments; and what else in this situation could she do but yield to his proposal? The only drawback was, how could she reconcile it to the gratitude she owed his father? But for this objection all was plain; but she had this to lighten the heavier scale, that she studied, she desired, she aimed to be grateful; that she did not say or do any one thing designedly contrary thereto; that she never thought, much less sought, to engage Mr. Trenchard; that she had done much to discourage him, and held on till she was convinced he could not be prevailed on voluntarily to recede; and that now she thought of giving way she did it with reluctance, purely on Sir William's account. That if she had Mr. Trenchard, she was firmly resolved and desirous to study the good of each, and however ill Sir William treated her, never to retaliate on him, but to behave with reverence, respect, humility and caution to him, and patiently wait the desirable period of a thorough reconciliation. With a mind occupied by such sentiments, and a heart fraught with such a temper, she met Mr. Trenchard at breakfast; he saw a sunshine in her aspect, importing benignity and softness—he would have followed her when she withdrew, but such a gentle sensibility in a mind so firm as she evinced—made him to deny himself. (See No. 38.) They saw each other at dinner, but agreeable to Miss Amherst's advice (See No. 38.) he said nothing to her till towards night; when he did, she frankly, though modestly, owned herself convinced. She told him all her reasonings with herself—how she came at last to settle. He was overjoyed. She saw and made allowances for his youthful passions—but chose to retire herself. She did, and in her closet renewed her devout supplications for him and for herself. Her struggles about her duty in this respect were now at an end, but she felt she needed further help and guidance from above. She desired all her mercies might come in this way, viz. devout prayer and humble trust in superior wisdom and power. She felt the happiness of a soul resting on the only refuge of souls; and however it may be ridiculed by the generality of the fashionable, and as they call themselves rational, world, she had been taught by the excellent lady Trenchard, and it had been confirmed to her by her own experience, that these parts of vital religion, as well as all others, will bear the touchstone of truth. Miss Pelham, though blessed with fine natural parts, with a sagacity and prudence uncommon to her years; adorned with the external charms of person, and the yet greater advantage of a polite education; used to genteel company; well read and much esteemed; was not backward to own that all these were of inferior value to the internal ones of a heart devoted to the Honour, and a will subservient to the commands of God; and if she had any serene moments, wherein she felt the pleasures of an approving heart, it was when she referred with dutiful submission herself and all her concerns into the hands of her divine master, and was meekly content to take up with whatever he allotted for her. Such a self complacency she now enjoyed, and whatever some of my readers may think, it was a complacency well founded, and such as they can never duly value till they also come to enjoy it. (For Mr. Trenchard's account, see No. 38.) Several things were then talked of between Miss Amherst and Mr. Trenchard. (See No. 39.) The next day he tarried there, proposed his scheme of further conduct. (See No. 39.) and the day after left her, and rode to E——n, discoursed with her parents and with Sir James Parker. (See No. 40.) and the morning after set out for Trenchard manor. (See No. 41.) After talking with his father and visiting his aunt, Masham, he sat about preparing to leave the manor, in order to the celebrating his marriage. Many things grievous to bear he met with, and many little tender things gave him delicate sensations of pleasure and pain. From his father he met rigour and haughtiness; from Mrs. Masham a seeming indifference (and but seeming it was, for in her heart she approved, and in approving felt for him) as we shall see in the sequel. From some of his acquaintance contempt, from some rudeness, from others a silent demeanor; while others, of more noble minds, treated him with proper regard. As Sir John Denham, Madam Warburton, Mrs. Barrister, Dr. Butler and his wife, and above all for distinction Lord W——y of P——, a nobleman of eminent virtue among his young acquaintance at W——n Borough, Messrs. Collet and Harmel, Jones, Stains, Digby, and Evelant were his cordial friends, as were Miss Collet, Miss Harmel, Miss Wolfe, and the Miss Brices, to Miss Nancy Pelham, and all at heart were pleased with his match.

Of the tenants all who knew her rejoiced at the prospect of such a patroness, as did every domestic at Trenchard Manor.

IS about six leagues in circumference, and lies only three or four miles south of St. Christopher's. The soil is fruitful, and the staple commodity sugar.—Here are sometimes violent rains and tornadoes, as in the other islands, and the air is even hotter than that of Barbadoes. There are many remarkable insects and reptiles, as the flying tyger, the hornfly, and fly-catcher, and a kind of snail called the soldier; and some of the lizards are of a monstrous size. The sea abounds with a variety of excellent fish, as groopers, rock-fish, old wives, cavallies, welshmen, mud-fish, wilks, cockles, lobsters, &c. Land crabs are very common on this isle: they are smaller than sea-crabs, and make little burrows, like rabbits, in the woods, towards the tops of the mountains. The only venomous creatures are scorpions and centipedes.

They have plenty of asparagus here, and there is a tree called diddle-doo, which bears a lovely blossom of the finest yellow and scarlet colours, and is esteemed a sovereign remedy against the green sickness. The liquorice bush runs wild along the stone walls of common fields, like the vine; but the butter of this island is not good, and new cheese far worse. The sheep have no horns nor wool, but are hairy and smooth skinned, and generally full of small red or black spots, resembling those of a fine spaniel. They breed twice a year, if not oftener, and generally bring two, three, or four lambs at a time; and what is uncommon, suckle them all. The rams are of a red pale colour, with a thick row of long straight red hair hanging down from the lower jaw to their breast, as far as the fore legs. The hogs, being fed with Indian corn, Spanish potatoes, and sugar-cane juice, are exceeding sweet food, white and fat; and so are the fowls and turkeys, which are fed with the same diet. The ground doves are about the size of a lark, of a chocolate colour, spotted with a dark blue, their heads like that of a robin-red-breast, and their eyes and legs of a moist pure red.

There are excellent game cocks and fierce bull-dogs in this isle, notwithstanding the notion that they both degenerate out of England, besides large cur-dogs.

In the mountain plantations they have fine cucumbers, common lettuces, kidney beans, cellery, &c. The English beans blossom here, but never pod.

An English shilling goes for one shilling and six-pence, and the French, Spanish, and Portuguese coin bear near the same proportion.

The only town of this island is Charles-Town, which is defended by a fort of the same name; and has a regular weekly market every Sunday morning.

The English sent the first colony to this island 1628. A few regular troops are maintained at his majesty's expence. The perpendicular height of the mountain, which composes the island, is said to be a mile and a half. In the east part there is a river, which affords excellent mullets, and other fish; but there is no good harbour in the whole island.

Here and in the other Caribbees, it is said, if a white man kills a black, he cannot be tried for his life for the murder; and all that he suffers is a fine to the master, for the loss of his slave. If a negroe strikes a white man, he is punished with the loss of his hand; and if he should draw blood, with death. A negroe cannot be evidence against a white man.

The Nevians are said to have three public annual fasts, to implore the divine protection against hurricanes: and if none happen in July, August, or September, they have a public thanksgiving in Oct.

MONTSERRAT,

Was discovered by Columbus in 1493. It lies twenty-five miles almost south east from Nevis; twenty west south-west from Antigua; forty north-west from Guadaloupe, and two hundred and forty from Barbadoes. It is of an oval figure; about three leagues in length; the same in breadth; and eighteen in compass. The Spaniards gave it the name of Montserrat from a fancied resemblance that it bore to a mountain of that name near Barcelona, in Old Spain; where is a famous chapel dedicated to the Blessed Virgin.

The climate, soil, and produce of Montserrat are much the same as those of the other English Caribbee Islands. The mountains yield cedars, the Cypress-tree, the iron-tree, with other woods, and some odoriferous shrubs. It is well watered and fruitful. The surrounding seas produce some hideous monsters, particularly two, which from their remarkable ugliness, as well as the poisonous quality of their flesh, are called sea-devils. The lamanture, by some called the sea-cow, is found in this island, and generally at the entrance of fresh water rivers. It is an amphibious animal, feeding mostly on herbage. Its flesh is reckoned very wholesome food, when salted; and they are so large, that two or three of them load a canoe.

The residence of the governor of the Leeward Islands is either upon Nevis, Antigua, Montserrat, or St. Christopher's; but each of the three islands, where he does not reside, has a deputy governor of its own, who is appointed by the crown likewise, and who presides both over the assembly and the council; the latter of which, in each island, is nominated by the governor general. Within the term of about twenty years there is commonly a general assembly of the councils and assemblies, or their deputies, from all the four islands, for the good of the whole. The functions of the lieutenant-governor are superseded by the governor general.

BARBUDA

Is a small island, fifteen miles north-east of Montserrat; its length being about twenty miles, and its breadth twelve. It is the property of the Codrington family, who have the appointment of the governor. Part of the estate arising from it, with two plantations in Barbadoes, were bequeathed, in 1710, by Christopher Codrington, esq; governor and captain general of Barbadoes, to the society for propagating the gospel, towards the instruction of the negroes in the Caribbee Islands, in the christian religion, and the erection of a college at Barbadoes for teaching the liberal arts.

This island lies low, but is fertile; the inhabitants apply themselves chiefly to the breeding of cattle, and raising provisions, with which they supply the neighbouring islands. Many of the commodities, however, which are raised in the other West India islands, may also be raised here, such as citrons, pomegranates, oranges, raisins, Indian figs, maiz, cocoa nuts, cinnamon, pine apples, and the sensitive plant, with various kinds of woods and drugs, such as Brasil, ebony, pepper, indigo, and the like. There are some large serpents on the island; but they are so far from being poisonous or noxious, that they destroy rats, toads, and frogs; tho' the sting or bite of others are mortal, unless an antidote is applied to them in two hours. On the west side of the island is a good well sheltered road, clear from rocks and sands.

ANGUILLA,

So called from its snail like form, is about thirty miles long, and ten broad; and lies thirty miles north-west of St. Christopher's. The inhabitants, as at Barbuda, apply themselves chiefly to the breeding and feeding of cattle, planting Indian corn, and other parts of husbandry; though they still plant some sugar, and the island is, in general, said to be capable of great improvement.

DOMINICA

Lies between Martinico and Guadeloupe, about eight leagues from each, being near twenty-eight miles long, and thirteen broad. Before the late peace, by which this and the two following islands were ceded to Great Britain, it was a neutral island, and served occasionally to wood and water in. When it was reduced by lord Rollo towards the close of the late war, he found almost the whole windward coast settled by the French, notwithstanding it had been formally declared to be neutral by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1748. There is no commodity or vegetable produced by the richest of our other islands, that may not be raised here in great abundance. The declivities of the hills may be cultivated to the very tops, so gentle is their rise; and they often terminate in beautiful, well watered, fruitful vallies. The soil is of a black mould, and remarkably rich. It contains about thirty rivers, one of them navigable up the country for some miles. Here, as in some others of the Caribbees, is a sulphur mountain, and hot spring, equal in salubrity to those of Bath in England; and the fine fruits, particularly the pine apples, are superior to any that grow on the French islands; and no better timber of every kind is to be found, than what grows in Dominica. At the north-west end of the island, is a deep, spacious sandy bay, called Prince Rupert's, and well secured from the winds by mountains on all sides. By the latest advices, it appears, that the sale and settlement of the lands in this and the other neutral islands advance very fast.

ST. VINCENT

Is about twenty-four miles in length, and eighteen in breadth, lying about fifty miles north-west of Barbadoes. It is generally allowed, that St. Vincent is one of the best of all the Antilles Islands. The soil is excellent, as likewise the water and the woods. Tobacco, it is said, may be cultivated here to great perfection. It was ceded by the treaty of Versailles in 1763, to Great Britain. There is a fine bay to leeward, besides others.

TOBAGO

Lies forty leagues south by west from Barbadoes; about thirty-five south-east from St. Vincent; forty east from Granada, and between thirty and forty from the Spanish Main. It is thirty-two miles in length, about 9 in breadth, and seventy in circumference ; so that it is rather larger than Barbadoes, or indeed any of our Leeward Islands : and, near the north-east extremity, lies a small island, called Little Tobago, which is two miles in length, and one in breadth.

The climate of Tobago is far more temperate than could be expected in an island that is but 11° . 10 . north from the equator ; for the force of the sun is diminished by the sea breezes. The spice and gum-trees, with which it abounds, contribute to its salubrity. Tobago lies out of the tract of those hurricanes that often prove so fatal to the other West India islands. The north-west extremity is mountainous ; but the rest of the island agreeably diversified with risings and fallings. The soil, in general, is a rich black mold. There are many springs, together with commodious bays and creeks. But the trees which grow here are, perhaps, its greatest riches ; for besides the different kinds of wood that are found in the other West Indian Islands, it is said, that the true nutmeg-tree, and the cinnamon-tree, with that which produces the real gum-copal, are found on this island. The fig-trees on Tobago are reckoned equal to those in Spain and Portugal. India and Guinea corn, French beans, various kinds of peas, the custhou-apple, that is both meat and drink, and yields an excellent lamp-oil ; the prickly-apple, the banana, pomegranate, pine-apple, sweet and bitter orange, lemons, and sugar, tobacco, indigo, ginger, sarsaparilla, semper vivum, citrons, vanelloes, limes, guavas, plantanes, tamafinds, grapes, custard-apple, the four-apple, the papaw-apples, mammie-apple, the yellow-plum, cherries, the cocoa-tree, that yields both meat, drink, and cloathing ; musk, cucumbers, water-melons, pompions, gourds, potatoes, yams, carrots, turneps, parsneps, onions, cassada-root, natural balsam, balm, silk-grass ; five different sorts of pepper, the long, the cod, the bell, the round, and the Jamaica ; and tea is said to be either the spontaneous production of the island, or may be raised by cultivation.

The animals are wild hogs, pickerees, which resemble a hog, armadilloes, guanoes, which are of the alligator kind, Indian conies ; and badgers, horses, cows, asses, sheep, deer, goats, and rabbits.—No island in the world, we are told, can boast a greater variety of fishes, both shell and others, particularly turtle and mullets, of a most delicious taste. Of the feathered species there are also a great variety. Lastly, in different parts of the island are found green tar, soap-earth, with many curious shells, stones, marcasites, and minerals.

Not only some natives, but also Europeans were settled upon this island, when it was by the last treaty of peace yielded up to Great Britain.

GRENADA

Lies in west longitude 61° . 40 . and north latitude 12° . thirty leagues north of New Andalusia, on the continent of Terra Firma. It is about thirty leagues in length, and in some places fifteen in breadth. Near it is a cluster of small islands, called the Grenadines. These islands produce very fine timber, sugar, indigo, tobacco, pease, and millet ; but the cocoa-tree does not thrive so well in them as in the other islands. There is a lake in a mountain about the middle of the island, that supplies it with fresh-water, and several bays and harbours lie round it, that might be fortified to great advantage : so that it is very convenient for shipping, not being subject to hurricanes.

The chief port is called Lewis, which stands on the middle of a large bay, with a sandy bottom.

The SPANISH WEST INDIAN ISLANDS.

C U B A

Extends in latitude from 20° . $20'$ to the tropic of Cancer, and from 74° . to 85° . 15 . west longitude, being about six hundred and sixty miles in length, from east to west, but very narrow in proportion ; for, in some parts, it is not above twelve or fourteen leagues, and, at most, but one hundred and twenty miles in breadth. It lies sixty miles to the west of Hispaniola, twenty-five leagues to the north of Jamaica, one hundred miles to the east of Yucatan, as many to the south of Cape Florida, and commands the entrance of both the gulphs of Mexico and Florida, and Windward Passage ; so that the Spaniards, who are the only possessors of it, may, with a tolerable fleet, not only secure their own trade, but annoy their neighbour.

There are no winters in this island ; but in July and August, when the sun is vertical, the rains and storms are great, otherwise the country would be intolerably hot. The fairest season is when the sun is furthest off, and then it is hottest in the morning ; for, towards noon a sea-breeze springs up, which blows pretty brisk till the evening. The trade-winds in these seas blow from the north east.—At the full and change of the moon, from October to April, there are brisk winds at north and north-west, which in December ber and January often turn to storms, though this is called the fair season. It is finely watered, and agreeably diversified with woods, lawns, and valleys. The soil is capable of producing, in the greatest plenty, every thing that we have mentioned to grow in other American islands; but the Cuba (commonly called the Havannah) tobacco is thought to excel that of all the world. The pine apples here are excellent, and their sugars would equal their tobacco in goodness, had they hands to cultivate their canes. The other products are, ginger, long pepper, and other spices; cassia, mastic, aloes, large cedars, and other odoriferous trees; oaks, pines, palm-trees, plenty of large vines, fine cotton trees, plantains, bananas, ananas, guavas, lemons, cocoas, and two sorts of fruit, called camilor and guanavana; the first like a china-orange, and the other in the shape of a heart, with a juice between sweet and acid. The copper mines here furnish the Spanish plantations with a sufficiency of that metal for all their brass guns. Gold dust is found in the sands of the rivers; but it is uncertain whether there are any gold or silver mines. A chain of hills runs through the middle of the island: but the land near the coast is generally a level champaign country.—The interior parts lie quite uncultivated and uninhabited: and the island contains more churches than farms, and more priests than planters.

Cuba has many good ports and harbours, which are of great advantage to ships for passing the gulph in safety; but there are scarce any navigable rivers.—Both the coasts and rivers abound with fish, and also with alligators. There are great conveniences for making salt; but very little of it is made. The cattle brought hither by the Spaniards have multiplied exceedingly, vast numbers now running wild in the woods, of which many are killed chiefly for their hides and tallow, that are sent to Spain. Their flesh also, being cut into pieces, and dried in the sun, serves to victual ships. These cattle are often so fat, that they die thro' the burthen of their grease. Cuba has likewise abundance of mules, horses, sheep, wild boars, and hogs, together with wild and tame fowl, parrots, partridges, blue heads, large tortoises, quarries of flint, and several fountains of bitumen. Upon the whole, the island is pleasant and flourishing, the Spaniards having every year, for a considerable time past, particularly since the taking of the Havannah, added something to its improvement.

It is divided into seven provinces, the civil government of which is dependent on that of St. Domingo, or Hispaniola; and as to spirituals, its bishop, whose see is at St. Jago, though he commonly resides at the Havannah, is suffragan to the archbishop of St. Domingo. The east part of the island is said to be under the governor of St. Jago, and the west of the governor of the Havannah. There are many considerable towns in the island, but the two just mentioned are the chief.

St. Jago, which still retains the name of the capital, though now much inferior to the Havannah, stands at the bottom of a large bay, about two leagues from the sea, on the south-east side of the island. It is distinguished from St. Jago in Chili by the addition of di Cuba, as the other is by that of di Chili. Since the unsuccessful attempt made by the English under admiral Vernon and general Wentworth, the fortifications have been repaired, and the town hath recovered some degree of its former lustre, carrying on a good trade with Old and New Spain, and above all with the Canaries.

Memoirs of the late Earl Harcourt.

THE late Simon Earl Harcourt was 20th in descent from Robert de Harcourt, sheriff of Warwick and Leicester in the years 1199, 1201 and 1202, the representative of Gervaise Count de Harcourt, who with his two sons attended the Conqueror in his invasion of England in 1066. This Count was of the Harcourts of Normandy, so named from a place in that province where the family has usually resided, and of which the present head is the Duke of that name, Governor general of Normandy. His Lordship's grandfather, being bred to the law, was first made Solicitor-general to Queen Ann, and afterwards Attorney-general, which office he soon resigned; but was afterwards, in 1710, recalled to it, and the same year promoted to be Keeper of the Great Seal. In 1711 he was created a Baron; and, as the preamble of this patent tends to establish, in some measure, his character, the reader will not be displeased with an extract from it.

“There is nothing,” says her Majesty, “wherein we more willingly exercise our royal authority than by rewarding men of merit, whose ancestors have been remarkably famous in their generation: among these none is more conspicuous than our well-beloved Sir Simon Harcourt, Keeper of our Great Seal; a gentleman recommended to us by a long descent of progenitors, renowned for their warlike actions ever since the Norman times”—[here some of his ancestors who fell in the civil wars] wars are particularized; then the preamble reverts to the Lord-Keeper,] “ who having suffered in his paternal inheritance, though not in his glory, he, as a lawyer, has advanced the same by the force of his wit and eloquence; for we have understood that his faculty of speaking is so full of variety, that many doubt whether he is fitter to manage causes in the lower courts, or to speak before a full Parliament; but it is unanimously confessed by all, that among the lawyers he is the most eminent orator, and among the orators the ablest lawyer. To this praise of his eloquence he has added those domestic virtues, magnanimity and fidelity, supported by which he has resolutely persevered in maintaining the cause he had undertaken, and in despising danger, and has kept his engagements of friendship, whether in prosperity or adversity, sacred and inviolable. Whom, therefore, furnished with such great endowments of mind, all clients have wished to defend their causes; and not without reason we have preferred, &c. &c. And that the same feat, which is known at this time, and has been for 600 years, by the name and patrimony of Harcourt, be honoured with the title which we now confer,” &c.

It must not, however, be forgotten, that this great man, while yet a youth, married rather indiscreetly*; for which reason most of the Peerages have either

Soon after he was ejected his wife died, and left him only one daughter, who was entertained in the families where he was Chaplain. He lived in that capacity with Sir Anthony Irby ten years. Upon his there becoming acquainted with Sir Philip Harcourt, Lady Irby's nephew, who came often to visit her, he was so extremely pleased with Mr. Clark's conversation, that with great importunity he prevailed with him to leave Sir Anthony and live with him. He then (in 1675) carried his daughter down with him to Stanton-Harcourt, in Oxfordshire; and soon after he came thither, Sir Philip's only son, Simon Harcourt, Esq; (afterwards Lord Harcourt,) clandestinely married her: after which Mr. Clark removed out of the family, and went to Portsmouth, where he spent the remainder of his days.”

omitted or misrepresented this marriage†, though other marriages are mentioned by whom he had no issue.

In 1712 he was created Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain; and, being in that office at the demise of the Queen, August 1, 1714, was one of the Lords of the Regency till the arrival of K. George the first; four days after which the great seal was delivered to Lord Cowper. For some time he remained unnoticed; but in the year 1721 he was created a Viscount. His only son, Simon, who has been immortalized by Pope ‡, died, extremely regretted, in the life-time of his father, in 1720, leaving one son, the subject of these memoirs, who succeeded his grand father in his honours and estates July 29, 1727. Soon after his coming of age, he married, in 1735, Rebecca, only daughter of Charles Le Bas, of Pipewell-abbey, in Northamptonshire, Esq. Being one of the Lords of the Bedchamber, he attended his late Majesty in the campaign of

 Dettingen,

Dettingen, 1743: in 1745 he was one of the noblemen who raised a regiment for the service of the crown: in 1749 he was created an Earl: on the demise of Frederick, Prince of Wales, in 1751, he was appointed Governor to his son, our present Sovereign: and the regret of the nation when he resigned that important trust, in 1752, is the best eulogium on his merit: in 1755 he was promoted to the rank of Major General, in 1759 to that of Lieutenant-General, and in 1772 to that of General in the army: in 1761 he was appointed Master of the Horse to the intended Queen, and sent as Ambassador-extraordinary to the court of Mecklenburgh-Strelitz, whence he had the honour of conducting her Majesty to England: in 1763 he was sworn of his Majesty's Privy-Council, and constituted Lord-Chamberlain of the Queen's Household: in 1766 his Lordship was appointed Ambassador to the Court of France, where he acquitted himself to the satisfaction of both Courts, and resided with universal esteem till 1772, when he was appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. In that high station he was equally acceptable, and stemmed the torrent of party like an able and experienced pilot. Returning from thence at the beginning of this year, he retired to his seat at Nuneham in Oxfordshire, where the act of humanity (if it may be so called) which preserved the life of his four-footed friend at the expence of his own, Sept. 16, is too recent to need being here repeated. For it is by no means supposed (as has been hinted) that "he was reaching for water for himself or this faithful domestic," but rather that he over-reached himself in endeavouring to save his dog's life, who in leaping over the bushes which surrounded this well had accidentally fallen in, his Lordship's hat and right-hand glove lying by the side. Humanity, indeed, was the characteristic of this amiable Peer, no man being more justly beloved, or more generally regretted, by his family, friends, and dependents. Among his friends, and consequently his mourners, may be reckoned the two greatest Personages in this Kingdom, of whom the one esteemed him as a parental friend, and the other lamented him, she said, as her husband by proxy. His Lordship left issue, two sons and a daughter; viz. George Simon, the present Earl, born in 1736, and married in 1765 to Elizabeth, daughter of Lord Vernon; and William, born in 1743, Lieutenant-Colonel of Burgoyne's dragoons, in America, who has distinguished himself this campaign by taking Gen. Bce prisoner. Lady Elizabeth, the daughter, born in 1733, is married to Sir William Lee, Bart. of Hartwell, Bucks.

The following letter from his Lordship to a gentleman, whom (to use his own expression) he had been instrumental in bringing to light, will shew that his humanity was tempered with prudence; and that while it gave him the highest pleasure to assist the distressed, he had also an additional satisfaction from a consciousness that the object of his recommendation was deserving of his notice.

"Sir, I saw ——— last night, and am truly happy to find that I have not been unsuccessful in my attempt to serve you; and hope it will be an earnest of something better. My friend had the happiness to lay your case before a King possesd of every virtue that can adorn a crown. Don't call on me to-morrow, for I am going to Chatham: any other time I shall be happy to see a man possesd of so fair a character, which I value beyond every thing in this life.

"Carvendish-square, Your friend,
Friday morn. and humble servant,
May 8, 1767. HARCOURT."

His Lordship was about 60.

Exalted Friendship; or the Generous Surrender. A Tale for the Ladies.

IT has been asserted by some writers, who pretend to make deep enquiries into the nature of the female heart, that friendships between women and women, though violent for a while, are seldom of so long a duration as those contracted between men and men. Numerous cases in point might, doubtless, be produced to justify such positions, but it must be owned, at the same time, that many of the fair sex have distinguished themselves in a striking manner, by the solidity, and the permanence of their attachments to each other: attachments which have remained unimpaired during the lives of the amiable contractors; in spite of the rudest shocks which they have received either from the malicious attempts of those who envied their constancy, or from some delicate distresses arising from their connections with the other sex.

The friendship which commenced between Harriot Stapleton and Sophia Manton at the school to which their parents sent them at an early age, gathered strength in their advancing years; and when they were introduced into the world, after having finished their education, they were never so happy as when they enjoyed each other's society. Entertained with the same books, addicted to the same pursuits, and captivated by the same diversions, they were were almost inseparable companions: and as their parents, on both sides, were people in very genteel life, they always appeared, in point of dress, to the greatest advantage. They were both handsome, but in so different a style of beauty, that they felt none of the corrosions of rivalry, while they made an advantageous display of their persons; and as they gained, each of them, a considerable deal of admiration, when they appeared in public, each of them was sufficiently satisfied with her share of it.

By the nomination of Sophia's father to a lucrative post in one of our Leeward islands, Harriot was robbed of her friend, as Mr. Manton, in consequence of his being obliged to reside several years abroad, chose to take his family with him.

Sophia received the first news of her father's appointment without that joy which she would otherwise have felt, upon his having obtained a considerable addition to his income, because she could not help thinking of the separation from her Harriot; and her reflections, occasioned by the sincerity, as well as fervour of her friendship, threw her mind, for a time, into so painful a state, that she frequently regretted the event which was to divide her from the only person among all her acquaintance, for whose sake she wished to remain in England. However, when she came to reflect coolly, and with composure upon her father's profitable post, and considered also, that being his only child, she might be greatly benefited by the opportunities put into his power to enlarge her fortune, she began to be reconciled to her destined voyage, tho' she could not refrain from tears when the hour of embarkation approached.

During the absence of her friend from England, Harriot became a rich heiress, by the death of her father, and was strongly solicited by numbers to enter into the marriage state. She had, before her father's decease, indeed, received addresses from several men, with fair characters, and in suitable circumstances, but as Mr. Stapleton would not, from an inherent fordidness in his disposition, advance a shilling in his life time, the men who courted an alliance with his family, soon took leave of the lady who had attracted them, not caring to trust to any posthumous donations.

As an heiress, and as a rich heiress, Harriot was surrounded by admirers, and among them, some of her former solicitors made their appearance; but as they had evidently proved themselves to have been actuated by mercenary (at least not very generous) motives, she discarded them upon the renewal of their addresses to her, and would not hear any of the apologies which they attempted to frame for their conduct.

The man whom Harriot most favoured was a Mr. Moore, a gentleman by birth and education, but by no means upon an equality with her in regard to fortune: yet, as he had every requisite, in her opinion, fortune excepted, to render the marriage state happy, and as she was, herself amply furnished with that agreeable supplement to all other qualifications, she did not imagine that she should act with the slightest indelicacy, by encouraging her diffident lover to suppose that his addresses would not be rejected.

Moore, though not a professed fortune-hunter, could not see the overtures made to him by a fine woman, with large possessions, unflattered by them: he was not, it is true, literally in love with her, but her many amiable qualities operated so powerfully upon him, that he ventured to assure himself he could not be unhappy with such a wife. With the highest veneration, therefore, for her virtues, and charmed with her accomplishments, he availed himself of the encouragements she delicately threw in his way, and was extremely well received.

When the preliminaries were settled between him and his future, Moore set out upon a journey to Portsmouth, to see an old uncle there, who, according to a letter received from his house, lay at the point of death, and wanted very much to see him before his dissolution. On his arrival at Portsmouth, however, he was greatly surprised to find his uncle heartier than he had been for some years, and soon afterwards discovered that he had been drawn from the capital by one of those facetious gentlemen, who, for the sake of what they call fun, take an infinite deal of pleasure in throwing people into situations not at all agreeable to them: into situations sometimes not only whimsically, but often seriously distressing.

While he was drinking a chearful glass one evening with his uncle, the arrival of a lady, with her daughter, flung the old gentleman into a state of astonishment.

"Bless me, Madam," exclaimed he, "I can hardly believe my eyes."

"You may well be surprised, my good Sir," replied Mrs. Manton, "but to tell you the truth, the climate agreed so ill with me and my daughter, that we desired Mr. Manton to send us home; and to endeavour to procure his own return to England as soon as he could: for what is all the money in the world without health to enjoy it?"

A a a a

Moore

Moore soon found from the conversation between this lady and his uncle, that her daughter was the very intimate friend of his Harriot: he found also, after a few interviews with her, that she had made an impression upon his heart not easily to be eradicated: he found, in short, that while he only esteemed Harriot Stapleton, he loved Sophia Manton; and from the different sensations which he felt from the conflict in his breast between love and honour, he was in a state of disquiet which he had never till now experienced. He now wished he had not gone so far towards an union with Harriot; and he would willingly have relinquished all his golden prospects to be released from his engagements: but as he looked upon himself already married to her, though the ceremony was not actually performed, his principles would not suffer him to act in a manner which would injure his reputation.

Poor Sophia, at the same time, had her conflicts: her tender heart throbb'd so much in favour of the first man who had occasioned any tumult in it, that she was deprived of her usual tranquility by day, and robbed of her wonted rest by night. Her mother, whose concern for her was extreme, because her affection for her was excessive, administered all the consolation in her power, and urged her to try not to think of him for a husband, who was too far engaged with another woman, to her dearest friend, to leave her without appearing in a very ungentle, not to say, dishonourable light.

The consolations of her mother were kindly intended, and her arguments were rationally applied, but Sophia was neither calmed by the one, nor convinced by the other. Her heart was at variance with her head, and the sensations of the former overpowered the reflections of the latter.

While Mrs. Manton and her daughter were thus situated at Portsmouth, in the house of Mrs. Benson, by whom they were accommodated in the most friendly and most hospitable manner, Miss Stapleton was acquainted with the real situation of her friend and her lover, from their own letters, in spite of all their efforts to conceal it: and wrote a pressing invitation to the former, to come and stay a few weeks with her, if Mrs. Manton had no material objection to the compliance with her request. This invitation brought her to town, and she was accompanied by Moore, who now thought it high time to return to his generous mistress, lest she should imagine he would be a man equally destitute of gratitude and honour by deserting her.

The first interview between the two female friends was very affecting: the pleasure which each of them felt from their meeting, being strongly dashed with the pain which they mutually endured from their mutual recollections.

Like a man of strict honour, Moore began, in a few days, to forward the preparations for his wedding-day. Harriot, as she really loved him, did not know how to put a stop to them, and yet her pity for her dear friend Sophia often made her so unhappy, as to determine to give up the man of her heart, to preserve the life of a woman to whose happiness he was become absolutely necessary. Severe was the combat in her tender bosom, between her feelings for her lover, and her feelings for her friend: at length, the latter prevailed.

Having overheard a little conversation one day between this unhappy pair, in which they both exhibited themselves in the most amiable, as well as the most pitiable light, she broke in upon them, with an abruptness, for which she would have keenly reproached herself, had she not believed that the cause of her intrusion would forcibly apologize for it. Addressing herself to them alternately, she assured them that she could not think of seeing them devoted to infelicity on her account, and that the pleasure of seeing her lover the husband of her friend, would sufficiently alleviate the uneasiness she might feel during the first pressures of disappointment.

* In consequence of this address (there is no describing the behaviour of the two lovers, melted by the generosity of sentiment breathing through it) preparations were now made for the union of Moore with his Sophia; and Mrs. Manton came to town, with no small satisfaction, to be present at her daughter's nuptials. Before that day arrived, she received a letter from a friend of her husband's, which shocked her exceedingly: she was informed by it, that Mr. Manton, having one night met with losses at the gaming-table, which his whole fortune could not repair, had destroyed himself.

This intelligence, while it shook Harriot's tender and sympathizing heart, afforded her an opportunity, which she immediately seized, to appear to greater advantage than ever. The moment she heard of it, she settled an handsome annuity upon Mrs. Manton, and then gave Sophia as genteel a fortune as she had reason to expect from the supposed circumstances of her father before that night, which, by stripping him of all his possessions, drove him to add the criminality of the suicide, to the folly of the gamester.

On Sentimental Writings.

THE present age may be termed, by way of distinction, the age of sentiment, a word which, in the implication it now bears, was unknown to our plain ancestors. Sentiment is the varnish of virtue to conceal the deformity of vice; and it is not uncommon for the same persons to make a jest of religion, to break through the most solemn ties and engagements, to practise every art of latent fraud and open seduction, and yet to value themselves on speaking and writing sentimentally.

But this refined jargon, which has infected letters and tainted morals, is chiefly admired and adopted by young ladies of a certain turn, who read sentimental books, write sentimental letters, and contract sentimental friendships.

Error is never likely to do so much mischief as when it disguises its real tendency, and puts on an engaging and attractive appearance. Many a young woman, who would be shocked at the imputation of an intrigue, is extremely flattered at the idea of a sentimental connexion, though perhaps with a dangerous and designing man, who, by putting on this mask of plausibility and virtue, disarms her of her prudence, lays her apprehensions asleep, and involves her in misery; misery the more inevitable because unsuspected. For the who apprehends no danger, will not think it necessary to be always upon her guard; but will rather invite than avoid the ruin which comes under so specious and so fair a form.

Such an engagement will be infinitely dearer to her vanity than an avowed and authorised attachment; for one of these sentimental lovers will not scruple very seriously to assure a credulous girl, that her unparalleled merit entitles her to the adoration of the whole world, and that the universal homage of mankind is nothing more than the unavoidable tribute extorted by her charms. No wonder then she should be easily prevailed on to believe, that an individual is captivated by perfections which might enslave a million. But she should remember, that he who endeavours to intoxicate her with adulation, intends one day most effectually to humiliate her. For an artful man has always a secret design to pay himself in future for every present sacrifice. And this prodigality of praise, which he now appears to lavish with such thoughtless profusion, is, in fact, a sum economically laid out to supply his future necessities: of this sum he keeps an exact estimate, and promises himself at some distant day the most exorbitant interest for it. If he has address and conduct, and the object of his pursuit much vanity, and some sensibility, he seldom fails of success; for so powerful will be his ascendancy over her mind, that she will soon adopt his notions and opinions. Indeed, it is more than probable she possessed most of them before, having gradually acquired them in her initiation into the sentimental character. To maintain that character with dignity and propriety, it is necessary she should entertain the most elevated ideas of disproportionate alliances, and disinterested love; and consider fortune, rank, and reputation, as mere chimerical distinctions and vulgar prejudices.

The lover, deeply versed in all the obliquities of fraud, and skilled to wind himself into every avenue of the heart which indiscretion has left unguarded, soon discovers on which side it is most accessible. He avails himself of this weakness by addressing her in a language exactly consonant to her own ideas. He attacks her with her own weapons, and opposes rhapsody to sentiment.—He professes so sovereign a contempt for the paltry concerns of money, that she thinks it her duty to reward him for so generous a renunciation. Every plea he artfully advances of his own unworthiness, is considered by her as a fresh demand which her gratitude must answer. And she makes it a point of honour to sacrifice to him that fortune which he is too noble to regard. These professions of humility are the common artifice of the vain, and these protestations of generosity the refuge of the rapacious. And among its many smooth mischiefs, it is one of the sure and successful frauds of sentiment, to affect the most frigid indifference to those external and pecuniary advantages, which it is its great and real object to obtain.

A sentimental girl, continues our Essayist, very rarely entertains any doubt of her personal beauty; for she has been daily accustomed to contemplate it herself, and to hear of it from others. She will not, therefore, be very solicitous for the confirmation of a truth so self-evident; but she suspects, that her pretensions to understanding are more likely to be disputed, and, for that reason, greedily devours every compliment offered to those perfections, which are less obvious and more refined. She is persuaded, that men need only open their eyes to decide on her beauty; while it will be the most convincing proof of the taste, sense, and elegance of her admirer, that he can discern and flatter those qualities in her. A man of the character here supposed, will easily insinuate himself into her affections, by means of this latent but leading foible, which may be called the guiding clue to a sentimental heart. He will affect to overlook that beauty which attracts common eyes, and ensnares common hearts, while he will bestow the most delicate praises on the beauties of her mind, and finish the climax of adulation, by hinting that she is superior to it.

And when he tells her she hates flattery, She says she does, being then most flatter'd.

But nothing, in general, can end less delightfully than these sublime attachments, even where no acts of seduction were ever practised, but they are suffered, like mere sublunary connexions, to terminate in the vulgar catastrophe of marriage. That wealth, which lately seemed to be looked on with ineffable contempt by the lover, now appears to be the principal attraction in the eyes of the husband; and he, who but a few short weeks before, in a transport of sentimental generosity, wished her to have been a village maid, with no portion but her crook and her beauty, and that they might spend their days in pastoral love and innocence, has now lost all relish for the Arcadian life, or any other life in which she must be his companion."

On the other hand, she who was lately

An angel call'd, and angel-like ador'd, is shocked to find herself at once stripped of all her celestial attributes. This late divinity, who scarcely yielded to her sisters of the sky, now finds herself of less importance in the esteem of the man she has chosen, than any other mere mortal woman. No longer is she gratified with the tear of counterfeited passion, the sigh of dissembled rapture, or the language of premeditated adoration. No longer is the altar of her vanity loaded with the oblations of fictitious fondness, the incense of falsehood, or the sacrifice of flattery.—Her apotheosis is ended!—She feels herself degraded from the dignities and privileges of a goddess, to all the imperfections, vanities, and weaknesses of a slighted woman, and a neglected wife. Her faults, which were so lately overlooked, or mistaken for virtues, are now, as Cassius says, set in a note-book. The passion, which was vowed eternal, lasted only a few short weeks; and the indifference, which was so far from being included in the bargain, that it was not so much as suspected, follows them through the whole tiresome journey of their insipid, vacant, joyless existence.

An Account of a peculiarity of Vision in three Brothers. The Person from whom it was taken, lived at Maryport in Cumberland.

HIS name, says the writer, was Harris, by trade a shoe-maker. I had often heard from others that he could discern the form and magnitude of all objects very distinctly, but could not distinguish colours. This report having excited my curiosity, I conversed with him frequently on the subject. The account he gave was this: That he had reason to believe other persons saw something in objects which he could not see; that their language seemed to mark qualities with confidence and precision, which he could only guess at with hesitation, and frequently with error. His first suspicion of this arose when he was about four years old. Having by accident found in the street a child's stocking, he carried it to a neighbouring house to inquire for the owner: he observed the people called it a red stocking, though he did not understand why they gave it that denomination, as he himself thought it completely described by being called a stocking. The circumstance, however, remained in his memory, and together with subsequent observations led him to the knowledge of his defect. As the idea of colours is among the first that enters the mind, it may perhaps seem extraordinary that he did not observe his want of it till earlier. This, however, may in some measure be accounted for from the circumstance of his family being quakers, among whom a general uniformity of colours is known to prevail.

He observed also that, when young, other children could discern cherries on a tree by some pretended difference of colour, though he could only distinguish them from the leaves by their difference of size and shape. He observed also, that by means of this difference of colour they could see the cherries at a greater distance than he could, though he could see other objects at as great a distance as they; that is, where the sight was not assisted by the colour. Large objects he could see as well as other persons; and even the smaller ones if they were not enveloped in other things, as in the case of cherries among the leaves.

I believe he could never do more than guess the name of any colour; yet he could distinguish white from black, or black from any light or bright colour. Dove or straw-colour he called white, and different colours he frequently called by the same name: yet he could discern a difference between them when placed together. In general, general, colours of an equal degree of brightness, however they might otherwise differ, he frequently confounded together. Yet a striped ribbon he could distinguish from a plain one; but he could not tell what the colours were with any tolerable exactness. Dark colours in general he often mistook for black, but never imagined white to be a dark colour, nor a dark to be a white colour.

He was an intelligent man, and very desirous of understanding the nature of light and colours; for which end he had attended a course of lectures in natural philosophy.

He had two brothers in the same circumstances as to sight; and two other brothers and sisters who, as well as their parents, had nothing of this defect.

One of the first mentioned brothers, who is now living, is master of a trading vessel belonging to Mary-port. I met with him in December 1776, at Dublin, and took the opportunity of conversing with him. I wished to try his capacity to distinguish the colours in a prism, but not having one by me, I asked him, Whether he had ever seen a rain-bow? He replied, He had often, and could distinguish the different colours: meaning only, that it was composed of different colours, for he could not tell what they were.

I then procured and shewed him a piece of ribbon: he immediately, without any difficulty, pronounced it a striped and not a plain ribbon. He then attempted to name the different stripes: the several stripes of white he uniformly, and without hesitation, called white: the four black stripes he was deceived in, for three of them he thought brown, though they were exactly of the same shade with the other, which he properly called black. He spoke, however, with diffidence as to all those stripes; and it must be owned, the black was not very distinct: the light green he called yellow; but he was not very positive: he said, "I think this is what you call yellow." The middle stripe, which had a slight tinge of red, he called a sort of blue. But he was most of all deceived by the orange colour; of this he spoke very confidently, saying, "This is the colour of grass; this is green." I also shewed him a great variety of ribbons, the colour of which he sometimes named rightly, and sometimes as differently as possible from the true colours.

I asked him, Whether he imagined it possible for all the various colours he saw, to be mere difference of light and shade; whether he thought they could be various degrees between white and black; and that all colours could be composed of these two mixtures only? With some hesitation he replied, No, he did imagine there was some other difference.

Humorous Essay upon Gluttony and the Luxury of the Table; by the late Philip Dormer, Earl of Chesterfield.

TASTE is now the fashionable word of the fashionable world. Every thing must be done with taste: that is settled; but where and what that taste is is not quite so certain; for, after all the pains I have taken to find out what was meant by the word, and whether those who use it ofteneft had any clear idea annexed to it, I have only been able negatively to discover that they do not mean their own natural taste; but, on the contrary, that they have sacrificed it to an imaginary one, of which they can give no account. They build houses in taste, which they cannot live in with convenience; they suffer with impatience the music they pretend to hear with rapture, and they even eat nothing they like, for the sake of eating in taste: Not for himself, he sees, or hears, or eats, Artists must chuse his pictures, music, meats. Pope.

It is certain the commandments, now so much neglected, if not abrogated, might be observed with much less self-denial, than these imaginary laws of taste, to which so exact and scrupulous an obedience is paid.

I take taste, when not used for the sensation of the palate, which is its proper signification, to be a metaphor, to express that judgment each man forms to himself of those things, which are not contained in any certain rules, and which admit of no demonstration; thus circles and equilateral triangles allow of no taste, they must be as they are; but the colours they are drawn in, or the materials they are made of, depend upon fancy or taste.—In building, there are certain necessary rules founded upon nature, as, that the strongest must support the weaker, &c. but the ornamental and convenient parts are the objects of taste. Hence arises the propriety of the metaphor, because taste in every thing is undetermined and personal, as in the palate, and all our other senses; nay even our minds are as differently affected as our palates, by the same things, when those things are not of a nature to be ascertained and demonstrated.

However, this right of tasting for one's self, which seems to be the natural privilege of mankind, is now totally surrendered, even in the proper sense of the word; and, if a man would be well received in good company, he must eat, though with reluctance, according to the laws of some eminent glutton at Paris, promulgated here by the last-imported French cook, wishing all the while within himself, that he durst avow his natural taste for good native beef and pudding.

good

The absurdity, as well as the real ill consequences, of this prevailing affectation, has, I confess, excited my wrath; and I resolved that the nobility and gentry of this kingdom should not go on to ruin their fortunes and constitutions, without hearing at least the representations and admonitions of common sense.

Eating, itself, seems to me to be rather a subject of humiliation than of pride, since the imperfection of our nature appears, in the daily necessity we lie under of recruiting it in that manner. So that one would think the only care of a rational being should be to repair his decaying fabric as cheap as possible. But the present fashion is directly contrary: and eating, now, is the greatest pride, business, and expence of life, and that too, not to support, but to destroy nature.

The frugal meal was anciently the time of unbending the mind by cheerful and improving conversation, and the table-talk of ingenious men has been thought worth transmitting to posterity. The meal is now at once the most frivolous and most serious part of life. The mind is bent to the utmost, and all the attention exerted, for what? The critical examination of compound dishes: and, if any two or three people happen to start some useful or agreeable subject of conversation, they are soon interrupted, and overpowered by the extatic interjections of excellent! exquisite! delicious! Pray taste this, you never eat a better thing in your life. Is that good? Is it tender? Is it seasoned enough? Would it have been better so? Of such wretched stuff as this does the present table-talk wholly consist, in open defiance of all conversation and common sense. I could heartily wish that a collection of it were to be published for the honour and glory of the performers; but, for want of that, I shall give my readers a short specimen of the most ingenious table-talk I have lately heard carried on with most wit and spirit.

My lord, having tasted and duly considered the bechamele, shook his head, and then offered as his opinion to the company, that the garlick was not enough concealed, but earnestly desired to know their sentiments, and begged they would taste it with attention.

The company, after proper deliberation, replied, that they were of his lordship's opinion, and that the garlick did indeed distinguish itself too much; but the maître de hôtel, interposing, represented that they were now stronger than ever in garlick at Paris; upon which the company one and all said, that altered the case.

My lord, having sagaciously smelt at the breech of a rabbit, wiped his nose, gave a shrug of some dissatisfaction, and then informed the company, that it was not absolutely a bad one, but that he heartily wished it had been kept a day longer. Ay, said Sir Thomas, with an emphasis, a rabbit must be kept. And with the guts in it too, added the Colonel, or the devil could not eat it. Here the maître d'hôtel again interposed, and said that they eat their rabbits much sooner now than they used to do at Paris. Are you sure of that? said my lord, with some vivacity. Yes, replied the maître d'hôtel, the cook had a letter about it last night. I am not sorry for that, rejoined my lord; for, to tell you the truth, I naturally love to eat my meat before it stinks. The rest of the company, and even the colonel himself, confessed the same.

This ingenious and edifying kind of conversation continued, without the least interruption from common sense, through four courses, which lasted four hours, till the company could neither swallow nor utter any thing more.

A very great person among the ancients was very properly asked, if he was not ashamed to play so well upon the fiddle? And one may surely with as much reason ask these illustrious moderns, if they are not ashamed of being such good cooks?

It is really not to be imagined with what profound knowledge and erudition our men of quality now treat these culinary subjects, and I cannot but hope that such excellent critics will at last turn authors themselves; nay, I daily expect to see a digest of the whole art of cookery by some person of honour.

I cannot help hinting, by the way, to these accurate kitchen critics, that it does not become them to be facetious and satirical upon those dissertations, which ladies sometimes hold upon their dress, the subject being by no means so low nor so trifling.

Though such a degree of affected gluttony, accompanied with such frivolous discourses, is pardonable in those who are little superior to the animals they devour, and who are only 'fruges consumere nati,' I am surprised and hurt when I see men of parts fall into it, since it not only suspends the exercise of their parts for the present, but impairs them, together with their health, for the future; and, if fools could contrive, contrive, I should think they had contrived this method of bringing men of sense down to them; for it is certain, that, when a company is thus gorged, glutted, and loaded, there is not the least difference between the most stupid and the wittiest man in it.

What life in all that ample body, say,
What heavenly particle inspires the clay?
The soul subsides, and wickedly inclines
To seem but mortal even in sound divines.
Pope.

Though an excess in wine is highly blameable, it is surely much more pardonable as the progressive steps to it are chearful, animating, and seducing: the melancholy are for a while relieved, the grave are invigorated, and the witty and the gay seem almost inspired; whereas in eating, after nature is once satisfied, which she soon is, every additional morsel carries dulness and stupidity along with it.

Moreover, these glorious toils are crowned with the just rewards of all chronical distempers; the gout, the stone, the scurvy, and the palsy, are the never-failing trophies of their achievements. Were these honours, like simple knighthood, only to be enjoyed by those who had merited them, it would be no great matter; but, unfortunately, like baronetship, they descend to and visit their innocent children. It is already very easy to distinguish at sight the puny son of a compound extremity, from the lusty offspring of beef and pudding: and I am persuaded the next generation of the nobility will be a race of pale-faced, spindle-shanked Lilliputians, the most vigorous of whom will not come up to an abortion of John de Gaunt's. Nor does the mischief even stop here; for as the men of fashion frequently condescend to communicate themselves to families of inferior rank, but better constitutions, they enervate those families too, and present them with sickly helpless children, to the great prejudice of the trade and manufactures of this kingdom.

Some people have imagined, and not without some degree of probability, that animal food communicates its qualities with its nourishment. In this supposition it was, that Achilles, who was not only born, and bred, but fed up too for a hero, was nourished with the marrow of lions; and we all know what a fine lion he turned out at last. Should this rule hold, it must be a melancholy reflection to consider, that the principal ingredient in the food of our principal nobility is essence of swine.

The Egyptians, who were a wise nation, thought so much depended upon diet, that they dieted their kings, and prescribed by law both the quality and quantity of their food. It is much to be lamented, that those bills of fare are not preserved to this time, since they might have been of singular use in all monarchical governments; but it is reasonable to be conjectured, from the wisdom of that people, that they allowed their kings no aliments of a bilious or a choleric nature, and only such as sweetened their juices, cooled their blood, and enlivened their faculties, if they had any.

The common people of this kingdom are dieted by laws; for, by an act passed several years ago, not less advantageous to the crown than to the people, the use of a liquor, which destroyed both their minds and their bodies, was wisely prohibited, and, by repeated acts of parliament, their food is reduced to a very modest and wholesome proportion. Surely then the nobility and gentry of the kingdom deserve some attention too, not so much indeed for their own sakes, as for the sake of the public, which is in some measure under their care: for if a porter, when full of gin, could not do his business, I am apt to think a privy counsellor, when loaded with four courses, will but bungle at his.

Suppose, for instance, a number of persons, not over-lively at best, should meet of an evening to concert and deliberate upon public measures of the utmost consequence, grunting under the load and repletion of the strongest meats, panting almost in vain for breath, but quite in vain for thought, and reminded only of their existence by the unfavourable returns of an olio; what good could be expected from such a consultation? The best one could hope for would be, that they were only assembled for shew, and not for use; not to propose or advise, but silently to submit to the orders of some one man there, who, feeding like a rational creature, might have the use of his understanding.

I would therefore recommend it to the consideration of the legislature, whether it may not be necessary to pass an act, to restrain the licentiousness of eating, and assign certain diets to certain ranks and stations. I would humbly suggest the strict vegetable as the properest ministerial diet, being exceedingly tender of those faculties in which the public is so highly interested, and very unwilling they should be clogged or incumbered.

But I do most seriously recommend it to those who, from their rank and situation in life, settle the fashions, and whose examples will in these sorts of things always be followed, that they will by their example, which will be more effectual than any law, not only put a stop to, but reform, the ridiculous, expensive, and pernicious luxury of tables; they are the people whom all inferior ranks imitate, as far as they are able, and commonly much farther. It is their fatal example that has seduced the gentry, and people of smaller fortune, into this nasty and ruinous excess. Let their example then, at last, reclaim them; let those who are able to bear the expence, and known not to grudge it, give the first blow to this extravagant folly; let them avow their own natural taste, for nature is in every thing plain and simple, and gratify it decently, at a frugal and wholesome table, instead of purchasing stupidity and distempers at the expence of their time and their estates. And they may depend upon it, that a fashion so convenient, as to the fortunes and the constitutions of their fellow-subjects, will cheerfully be followed, and universally prevail, to the great advantage of the public.

Thoughts on Quacks of all Denominations.

By Mr. Voltaire.

PHYSICIANS in general live in great cities, there are few of them in the country. The reason of this is obvious. In great cities, there are rich patients, and among these debauches, the pleasures of the table, and the gratification of the passions give rise to a variety of diseases. Dumoulin, not the lawyer, but the physician, who was a no less famous practitioner, observed at his death, "that he had left behind him two great physicians, regimen and river water."

In 1728, one Villars told his friends in confidence, that his uncle who had lived almost an hundred years, and who died only by accident, had left him a certain preparation, which had the virtue to prolong man's life to an hundred and fifty years, if he lived with sobriety. When he happened to observe a funeral procession he shrugged up his shoulders in pity: if the deceased, said he, had taken my medicine, he would not be where he is. His friends, among whom he distributed it generously, observing the condition required, found its utility, and extolled it. He was thence encouraged to sell it at a crown the bottle; and the sale was prodigious. It was no more than the water of the Seine mixed with a little nitre. Those who made use of it, and were attentive, at the same time to regimen, or who were happy in good constitutions, soon recovered their usual health. To others he observed, "It is your own fault if you be not perfectly cured; you have been intemperate and incontinent; renounce these vices, and, believe me, you will live at least an hundred and fifty years." Some of them took his advice; and his wealth grew with his reputation. The Abbe Pons extolled this quack, and gave him the preference to the Marischal de Villars: "the latter" said he, "kills men; the former prolongs their existence."

At length, it was discovered that Villars's medicine was composed chiefly of river water. His practice was now at an end. Men had recourse to other quacks.

Villars was certainly of no disservice to his patients, and can only be reproached with selling the water of the Seine at too high a price. He excited men to temperance, and in this respect was infinitely superior to the apothecary Arnoup, who filled Europe with his nostrums for the apoplexy, without recommending the practice of any one virtue.

I knew at London a physician, of the name of Brown, who had practised at Barbadoes. He had a sugar-work and negroes; and having been robbed of a considerable sum, he called together his slaves. "My friends" said he, "the great serpent appeared to me during the night, and told me, that the person who stole my money should, at this instant, have a parrot's feather at the point of his nose." The thief immediately put his hand to his nose. "It is you," cried the master, "that robbed me; the great serpent has just now told me so." By this method the physician recovered his money. This piece of quackery is not to be condemned: but, in order to practise it, one must have to do with negroes.

Scipio the first Africanus, a man in other respects so different from Dr. Brown, persuaded his soldiers that he was directed and inspired by the gods. This piece of fraud had been long and successfully practised. Can we blame Scipio for having recourse to it? There is not, perhaps, a person who does greater honour to the Roman republic; but how came it, let me ask, that the gods inspired him not to give in his accounts?

Numa acted better. He had a band of robbers to civilize, and a senate that constituted the most intractable part of them. Had he proposed his laws to the assembled tribes, he would have met with a thousand difficulties from the assassins of his predecessor. He adopted a different method. He addressed himself to the goddess Egeria, who gave him a code, sanctified with divine authority. What was the consequence?

consequence? He was submitted to without opposition, and reigned happily. His intentions were admirable, and his quackery had in view the public good; but if one of his enemies had disclosed his artifice, and said, "let us punish an impostor, who prostitutes the name of the gods to deceive mankind," he would have undergone the fate of Romulus.

It is probable, that Numa concerted his measures with great prudence, and deceived the Romans, with a view to their advantage, with an address, suited to the time, the place, and the genius of that people.

Mahomet was twenty times on the point of miscarrying; but, at length, he succeeded with the inhabitants of Medina, and was believed to be the intimate friend of the angel Gabriel. At present, should any one announce himself at Constantinople to be the favourite of the angel Raphael, who is superior in dignity to Gabriel, and insist that they must believe in him alone, he would be impaled alive. Quacks should know how to time their impostures.

Was there not somewhat of deceit in Socrates, with his familiar Demon, and the precise declaration of the oracle, which proclaimed him the wisest of men? it is ridiculous in Rollin to insist, in his history, on the sincerity of this oracle. Why does he not inform his readers, that it was purely a piece of quackery? Socrates was unfortunate as to the time of his appearance. An hundred years sooner he might have governed Athens.

The leaders of philosophical sects have all of them been tinctured with quackery. But the greatest of all quacks are those who have aspired to power. How formidable a quack was Cromwell? he appeared precisely at the time when he could have succeeded. Under Elizabeth he would have been hanged; under Charles II. he would have been an object of ridicule. He came at a period when the English were disgusted with kings; and his son at a time when they were disgusted with protectors.

English Theatre.

SINCE our last the managers of the two Theatres have endeavoured to entertain the town with altered pieces, and actors thrown into new characters. October 7, at Drury-Lane, Mr. Henderson performed the part of Richard III. for the first time upon that stage. He went thro' the character with great applause, and he was at least equal to his performance of it at the Haymarket.

A comic opera was afterwards presented, called the Quaker, written and composed by Mr. Dibdin. It appears that this little piece was before represented for a benefit. It must be impartially confessed, that the dialogue and business cannot lay claim to any great share of merit; but the music made ample compensation for any deficiency in other respects. Mr. Linley has composed an additional air for Mrs. Wrighten, who performed her part with great spirit and propriety. Indeed all the characters were well supported. Mr. Bannister in particular hit off the character of the Quaker, and sung the songs admirably well. Mr. Parsons, in friend Solomon, supported his part with that characteristic dry humour for which he is celebrated.

The following will serve as a specimen of the airs:

Mr. Vernon.

I lock'd up all my treasure,
I journey'd many a mile,
And by my grief did measure
The passing time the while.
My business done and over,
I hasten'd back again,
Like an expecting lover,
To view it once again.
But this delight was fled,
As it began to dawn;
I found the casket rild,
And all my treasure gone.

Miss Walpole.

A kernel from an apple core,
One day on either cheek I wore;
Lubin was plac'd on my right cheek,
That on my left did Hodge bespeak;
Hodge in an instant dropt to ground,
Sure token that his love's unsound;
But Lubin nothing could remove,
Sure token his is constant love.

To find the man who loves me best,
Fly, said I, south, north, east, and west;
The lady-bird is westward flown,
For westward is my Lubin gone.
Last Valentine, at break of day,
Before the stars were chas'd away,
I met, or may he faithless prove,
Lubin, my Valentine, my love.

Last May I sought to find a snail,
That might my lover's name reveal,
Which finding, home I quickly sped,
And on the hearth the embers spread;
When if my letters I can tell,
I saw it mark a curious L.
Oh! may this omen lucky prove,
For L's for Lubin and for Love.

In verity, damsel, thou surely wilt find
That my manners are simple and plain,
That my words and my actions, my lips and my mind,

By my own good will never are twain.

I love thee—umph!

Would move thee—umph!

Of love to be partaker:

Relent then—umph!

Consent then—umph!

And take thy upright Quaker.

Tho' vain I am not, nor of fopp'ry possess,

Would'st thou yield to be wedded to me,

Thou should'st find, gentle damsel, a heart
in my breast,

As joyful as joyful can be.

I love thee, &c.

To the donor of the dower.

Mr. Henderson has appeared as a rival to that veteran actor, Mr. Macklin, who has always maintained his ground upon the stage, in despite of all competitors in the character of Shylock, in the Merchant of Venice. Mr. Henderson's best friends blame him for this competition, as they foresaw he would gain no additional reputation by it; and his prudence, we think, will, upon a future occasion, induce him to lay aside this rivalry.

That the Beggar's Opera has long had a vicious effect on the minds of the ignorant, is a fact ascertainable by a volume of evidence easily collected from the various Newgate Calendars which have been printed in the course of the last twenty years; and that it is obnoxious to the legislature, is evident from the reproachful manner in which it has been repeatedly mentioned in both houses of parliament; to take out its sting, therefore, and to render it an instrument of virtue, is in itself very laudable, however the manner of bringing about so salutary a change may be liable to objection.

The Beggar's Opera, as performed at Covent-Garden theatre, ends in a new manner. After Macheath (which character is performed by Mrs. Farrel) is carried from prison to his supposed execution, the Beggar and Player enter, and hold a colloquy on the intended catastrophe of the piece, and the fate of the hero. The former, instead of bringing the captain back to his wives in triumph, declares his intention of making his drama moral, as well as entertaining, and in order to effect this, he proposes that Macheath's execution shall be respite, and his sentence changed to that of three years labour as a ballast heaver; this, he says, will be a serious lesson to mankind, and may operate to the benefit of society. He produces several reasons in justification of his intention, all calculated to enforce the beauty and advantage of a virtuous life, and at length retires to practise what he had declared. The scene instantly changes, and an exact representation of Woolwich Reach, with the Justitia hulk, and the Buft, round which the convicts have formed an embankment, is exhibited.—Macheath enters, accounted as a ballast-heaver, and surrounded by a number of companions, under similar circumstances, attended by a guard, he sings an air to soft music, in which he acknowledges the justice of his fate, and the mildness of the law, which destines him to three years labour. Polly and Lucy are then introduced as come to take their farewell, and see his embarkation. They settle their matrimonial claims, Macheath promising to marry Polly at the expiration of his sentence, and the whole concludes with a chorus song, to the burthen of

“The wicked to-day, may be virtuous to-morrow.”

This alteration, our readers will perceive, is extremely moral, they must not, therefore, wonder, if they find it somewhat dull in representation. Morality and dullness are frequently stage companions, and to say the truth, to give a grave conclusion to a merry performance, must, of necessity, favour of heaviness. In order, however, to render the matter as entertaining as possible, two new airs, of Dr. Arne's composing, are introduced, and as they are in a capital style, the musical connoisseurs at least will be pleased. With regard to the writing, it is but a poor sort of a composition, and extremely different from Mr. Gay's penmanship. In justification of it, however, it may be remarked, that it enforces poetical justice by punishing the vicious; and, what renders it still more palatable is this, if any part of the audience dislike it, they need not sit the performance out, the original opera being in a manner untouched, saving the omission of the scene between Mrs. Trapes, and Peachum and Lockit, which had no very material connection with the plot, and which is now left out to afford time for the performance of the addenda, which are of themselves too long, and will have a much better effect if shortened.

The hunting song introduced by Macheath at the table, with the women of the town, town, is Dr. Arne's composition, and was originally sung at the doctor's entertainment of catches and glees.—It was received with the highest satisfaction, and though it violently exercised the singers lungs, was encored, and repeated with universal and uncommon applause.

The scene representing Woolwich Reach, the Justitia, &c. &c. is a most beautiful stage picture, and does Mr. Richards infinite credit.

Mrs. Farrel made her first appearance in the character of Macheath, which she performed extremely well, and sung the songs with great taste and judgment: yet we cannot help thinking there is a great delicacy in her appearing in breeches upon such an occasion; and to heighten the impropriety, one of her doxies was a man, and appeared to be a grenadier: indeed he was so tall that he could not go in and out of the stage door without stooping very much. A hunting song composed by Dr. Arne, was introduced, though no way applicable to the business of the piece, and the last air at Woolwich was beneath all contempt. We had like to have omitted a very important part of the catastrophe, which is, that Macheath very cheerfully submits to his three years labour and confinement, at the expiration of which he promises Polly, who attends him upon the occasion, to marry her—though if we mistake not Gay's meaning, they were married already.

Mr. Macklin, that doughty champion of the boards, has had the boldness to attempt the character of Sir John Brute, in the Provoked Wife. The theatrical critics differ upon the occasion; some say he entered into the true spirit of the author, and conveyed his ideas in a forcible manner: whilst others pronounce peremptorily, that he was a disgrace to the part, and call upon the managers for obtruding him upon the town in a character so very different from his line of acting. The medium line may be adopted with partiality, and the friends of that veteran performer advise him not to attempt it again.

An Address to the Public.

On the too soon laying out Persons supposed to be dead.

AS the following address relates to a subject in which every individual is interested, the writer wishes to render the knowledge of it as general as possible.

The custom of laying out the bodies of person supposed to be dead as soon as respiration ceases, and the interment of them before the signs of putrefaction appear, has been frequently opposed by men of learning and humanity in this and other countries. Mons. Bruhier, in particular, a physician of great eminence in Paris, published a piece about thirty years ago, entitled, "The Uncertainty of the Signs of Death." In which he clearly proved, from the testimonies of various authors, and the attestations of unexceptionable witnesses, that many persons who had been buried alive, and were providentially discovered in that state, had been rescued from the grave, and enjoyed the pleasures of society for several years after.

But notwithstanding the numerous and well-authenticated facts of this kind, the custom above-mentioned remains in full force. As soon as the semblance of death appears, the chamber of the sick is deserted by his friends, relatives, and physicians, and the apparently dead, though frequently living body, is committed to the management of an ignorant and unfeeling nurse, whose care extends no farther than laying the limbs straight, and securing her accustomed spoil. The bed clothes are immediately removed, and the body exposed to the air; which, when cold, must extinguish the little spark of life that may remain, and which, by a different treatment, might have been kindled into a flame.

I am willing, however, to hope, that since it has of late been so frequently demonstrated that the vital principle may exist, where the characteristics of death, except putrefaction, are present, the rational part of the community are at length disposed to pay some attention to this subject.

With that hope I shall venture to particularize a few of the cases in which the fallacious appearance is most likely to happen, and point out the mode of treatment which, according to the best of my judgment, should be respectfully adopted.

In apoplectic and fainting fits, and in those arising from any violent agitation of mind, and also when opium or spirituous liquors have been taken in too great a quantity, (a) there is reason to believe that the appearance

N O T E.

(a) I should think myself extremely culpable, if I neglected this opportunity of cautioning parents and nurses against the free use of a certain cordial. It is a strong solution of opium, and I am persuaded that the sleep it produces has proved the sleep of death to thousands of children. When this poisonous cordial has been given in a dangerous dose, and a discovery of it is made before the power of swallowing it is lost, it will be advisable to give the child a tea spoonful of Ipecacuan wine every quarter of an hour, till the contents of the stomach are discharged.—See also page 29 of the examination of the Rev. appearance of death has been frequently mistaken for the reality. In these cases the means recommended by the humane society for the recovery of drowned persons, should be persevered in for several hours; and bleeding, which in similar circumstances has sometimes proved pernicious, should be used with great caution.

In the two latter instances it will be highly expedient, with a view of counteracting the soporific effects of the opium and spirits, to convey into the stomach, by a proper tube, a solution of tartar emetic, and by various other means to excite vomiting.

From the number of children carried off by convulsions, and the certainty arising from undoubted facts, that some who have in appearance died from that cause, have been recovered, (b) there is the greatest reason for concluding, that many, in consequence of this disease, have been prematurely numbered among the dead: and that the fond parent, by neglecting the means of recalling life, has often been the guiltless executioner of her own offspring. To prevent the commission of such dreadful mistakes, no child, whose life has been apparently extinguished by convulsions, should be consigned to the grave, 'till the means

Wesley's primitive physic, interspersed with medical remarks and practical observations, published by the present writer.

(b) A remarkable fact of this kind may be found in the Ephemerid. Medico-Phys. Germ. Ann. Oct. the substance of which is as follows: A girl about seven years of age, who had been for some weeks before troubled with a bad cough, was suddenly seized with a fit. A physician was immediately sent for; who finding that the heart and lungs had ceased to perform their functions, that her lips and cheeks were pale, and her temples sunk, concluded that life was irrecoverably lost. For the satisfaction, however, of her afflicted parents, a clyster was administered, and her wrists were chafed with spirituous water: but no signs of life appearing, the soles of the feet were ordered to be rubbed with strong brine; and the friction was continued without intermission three quarters of an hour, at the end of which time she began to breathe. The friction was then increased, and some cordial liquor was given, which she easily swallowed: two or three deep inspirations followed; and in a short time the child, who was supposed to be dead by the physician, as well as the by-standers, was, to the surprise of both, and the great joy of her parents, restored to life and health.

of recovery, above recommended in apoplexies, &c. have been tried; and, if possible, under the direction of some skilful practitioner of medicine, who may vary them as circumstances may require.

When fevers arise in weak habits, or when the cure of them has been principally attempted by means of depletion, the consequent debility is often very great, and the patient sometimes sinks into a state which bears so close an affinity to that of death, that I am afraid it has too often deceived the by-standers, and induced them to send for the undertaker, when they should have had recourse to the succours of medicine.

In such cases volatiles, as Eau de luce, for example, should be applied to the nose, rubbed on the temples, and sprinkled often about the bed: hot flannels, moistened with a strong solution of camphorated spirit, may likewise be applied over the breast, and renewed every quarter of an hour; and as soon as the patient is able to swallow, a tea spoonful of the strongest cordial should be given every five minutes.

Even in old age, where life seems to have been gradually drawing to a close, the appearances of death are often fallacious.—Not many years since, a lady in Cornwall, more than eighty years of age, who had been a considerable time declining, took to her bed, and in a few days seemingly expired in the morning. As she had often desired not to be buried 'till she had been two days dead, her request was to have been regularly complied with by her relations. All that saw her, looked upon her as dead, and the report was current through the whole place: nay, a gentleman of the town actually wrote to his friend in the island of Scilly that she was deceased; but one of those who were paying the last kind office of humanity to her remains, perceived some warmth about the middle of the back; and acquainting her friends with it, they applied a mirror to her mouth, but, after repeated trials, could not observe it in the least stained; her under jaw was likewise fallen, as the common phrase is; and, in short, she had every appearance of a dead person. All this time she had not been stripped or dressed; but the windows were opened, as is usual, in the chamber of the deceased. In the evening the heat seemed to encrease, and at length she was perceived to breathe.

It was the intention of the writer to publish a work upon this subject; but as his various avocations will not permit him to carry that design into execution, he thought it his duty to throw out the above hints; and if they should be the means of preventing one person from being laid out, or, what is more horrible, buried alive, it will afford the writer a pleasure of the noblest kind, that arising from the consciousness of doing good to his fellow creatures.

P. S. If that regard be paid to the above address which the subject of it seems to demand, and any life or lives be saved in consequence of the hints that I have thrown out, the communication of any such instances of success will be esteemed a particular favour, as it will afford me the most solid pleasure, and be a satisfactory evidence that a man who labours to promote the interests of humanity will be attended to by the public.

The Excursion : By Mrs. Brooke.

Part IV. and Last.

Maria's Distress—Her unexpected Relief—Meets with an old Friend—Character of Lady Sophia Herbert—Of Colonel Herbert—A rural Excursion—An unexpected Event—A capital Legacy—The Conclusion.

THE abrupt visit of the young officer gave lord Melville a thousand suspicions of Maria's character. He was soon after visited by his father, who mentioned to him the great riches of Miss Harding, the lady he proposed for his bride ; and insisted upon his waiting on her the next morning, with which proposal the young nobleman acquiesced, with some reluctance.

Maria's finances were now quite exhausted, and a very abrupt demand, made upon her by her French millener for fifty pounds, threw her into so great a dilemma, that she determined to app'y to her supposed friend lady Hardy, to favour her with 100 guineas. Her ladyship, on the receipt of the billet, containing this request, turned it into the utmost ridicule, communicated the contents to lady Bliff, and the rest of her censorious acquaintance, who took every opportunity to represent our heroine as a needy adventurer, who was totally undeserving, from her irregular conduct, the countenance of any ladies of fashion or character.

Maria was exceedingly mortified at this unmerited treatment, and began to perceive the dreadful situation her sanguine expectations had plunged her into.

Mr. Hammond, an amiable gentleman, who had many years before known Maria's uncle, colonel Dormer, while he was at college, accidentally heard from his acquaintance, Mrs. Merrick, some particulars, which made him conclude the young lady was not only embarrassed in her circumstances, but in a very dangerous situation with respect to her future happiness. With that generosity peculiar to great minds, he determined, if possible, to preserve her, and directly inclosing a bank note for 100l. he sent it to her in a blank cover. The receipt of this extraordinary favour filled her with joy and astonishment, and, after a few moments pause, she fell on her knees, and returned thanks to the Almighty for a gift, of which her feelings told her she was intirely unworthy.

Mr. Hammond, a few days after, paid a visit to his old friend colonel Dormer, where he found a young gentleman, Mr. Montague, who had been received by the colonel as the future husband to his niece Louisa. The old gentlemen were mutually happy at the sight of each other, and Mr. Hammond heard the colonel with no small pleasure express the greatest desire to see his niece, who had lately made the excursion to London. The former took no notice of the information he had received relative to her, but pretended business of importance, the next day returned to town, resolving to restore this lovely girl to the arms of her family, without the least delay.

Maria, not hearing any thing of lord Melville for several days, after resolving, doubting, re-resolving an hundred times, she sat down, and wrote him a letter full of confidence and sentiment, and then dispatched John to his lordship's house, with orders to deliver it to himself, if at home, and to wait his answer.

Her chariot, which she had determined indeed to keep only that little week (a week could not make much difference in the expence) drove up to the door about a quarter of an hour after John set off; and in five minutes was obliged to give way to another, which Miss Villiers took for granted was that of lord Melville. Interested as she was in the question, she had not courage to satisfy herself by going to the window. The door opened, and she saw—not lord Melville, but Mrs. Herbert, whom she supposed to be still in France.

'My dear Miss Villiers, need I say how charmed I am to find you in town?'

'My dear madam—no words—'

'I was afraid you had company, as I saw a chariot at your door.'

Maria blushed—

'By the way, my dear, you will pardon the digression?—May I ask whose chariot it is?—She hesitated—'It is—it is mine, madam.'

madam.' 'Yours, my dear? Are you then married?'

'Not yet—but I am so happy to see you—'

At this moment John entered, and informed Miss Villiers, that, having asked for lord Melville, he was informed his lordship was gone into the country, to the seat of his intended father-in-law, Mr. Harding, and would not be in town till after his marriage.

His marriage!—her misery was then certain—she sunk motionless into a chair.

As Miss Villiers had too little art to hide her feelings, and Mrs. Herbert too much knowledge of the world to mistake them, the latter was soon au fait as to the interest her friend took in all that related to lord Melville. She however spared her confusion, told her she looked pale, that she saw the town did not agree with her, and insisted on taking her for three or four days to the villa of her mother-in-law, lady Sophia Herbert, about twenty miles from town. Our heroine was too unhappy at home, and too weary of her own society, not to be delighted with the proposal. She endeavoured to hide the motion she could not absolutely restrain; and Mrs. Herbert, who saw her distress, and wished to give her time to recover from the shock, pretended to have visits to pay, and left her till dinner to herself.

We have said Miss Villiers had a mind, which, though full of sensibility, was naturally carried to see every thing on the brightest side. She sat down, she read the letter John had brought back; she dropped a tear of regret—she dropped a second.

Her folly in writing that letter was only known to herself. It had not swelled the triumph of the intended lady Melville.

She also felt that certainty of evil is more supportable than doubt. These reflections were interrupted by her friezeur.

A fresh object of consolation now offered.

She approached the glass—

O vanity! benevolent goddess! how much are human miseries alleviated by thy celestial influence!

Our fair heroine, dressed with the utmost taste, and with an air of ton which surprised Mrs. Herbert, arrived a little after four at the house of that lady. They dined; Miss Villiers wished to unbosom herself to her friend, but wanted courage.

Her presence, however, restored some part of her tranquility. They talked of Belfont, of Col. Dormer, of her sister:

her heart seemed lightened of half its load.

They were drinking their coffee in Mrs. Herbert's dressing-room when a servant threw open the door.

'Blockhead! did I not give orders to be denied?'

'It is Col. Herbert, madam.'

'My brother? You will excuse me, my dear Miss Villiers; I am never denied to him.'

Maria rose, and, turning her head, saw enter the room the man who had broken in on her tete-a-tete with lord Melville. He was even in the same dress; it was impossible she could be mistaken. She blushed—she looked down—Mrs. Herbert introduced her brother; he addressed Maria without shewing any consciousness of having ever seen her before. His eyes had, however, betrayed him. Maria had remarked a glance of mixed enquiry and surprise, from which he recovered in a moment, but which convinced her he had not forgot the adventure. She felt his delicacy, and was charmed with it; but it humbled her infinitely in her own eyes. Her reverie was interrupted by Col. Herbert, who acquainted his sister he came ambassador from lady Sophia to invite her to spend a few weeks with her in Surry.—

'And I my dear brother, have this morning sent William to acquaint lady Sophia of my intention to pass some days with her, and to have the pleasure of introducing this young lady.'

'What say you, Miss Villiers? will you do the maddest thing in the world, despise the danger of travelling in the dark, and set out for Surry this moment?'

Col. Herbert looked at his sister: he had been surprized at finding her with a person whose character appeared to him something beyond equivocal. He was much more so to find she intended to introduce her to his mother. He must be mistaken: she could not be the person whom he had surprized at midnight tete-a-tete with lord Melville. It was necessary to clear his suspicions before the visit to lady Sophia was undertaken; yet he would have died rather than have hinted those suspicions to Mrs. Herbert. He called her into another room on pretence of business, and, after speaking in raptures of the beauty of her visiter, asked, but in a careless manner, as if a mere accidental question, who she was. Mrs. Herbert, who observed the emotion which he endeavoured to hide, and who attributed it all to the charms of Miss Villiers, smiled at his affectation of unconcern, and assured him her friend was as amiable as she was lovely, and had but one fault in the world, which was,

was, that her fortune was inadequate to her birth.

‘My acquaintance with her began last summer in Rutland, where I found her in the bosom of domestic happiness, with her uncle, one of the most respectable characters I know. A man of the finest understanding and politest manners; and who, I believe, never did a foolish thing but when he suffered Miss Villiers to come to town unprotected. In short, it is amazing to me how a man of col. Dormer’s turn of mind could suffer his niece.—’

‘Col. Dormer! let me understand you, sister: did you say Miss Villiers was the niece of Col. Dormer?’

‘I did.’

‘Is it possible you can be in earnest? You have no idea, my dear sister, how happy you have made me. ‘I began my military life a cadet of seven years old in Colonel Dormer’s regiment: he is the man on earth to whom I am most obliged.’

Mrs. Herbert’s chariot, and her brother’s horses, came to the door; they set off, though it was almost dark, and reached lady Sophia’s little villa exactly at ten o’clock.

If virtue—gentle, indulgent, feminine virtue, had chosen to descend on earth in an human form, she would have assumed that of lady Sophia Herbert. With a figure still elegant, and a face which wanted only the bloom of youth to be beautiful, she had an air which spoke her birth to have been the most distinguished: an air which would have been commanding, had not its impression been softened by the smile of undissembled goodness. Left a widow extremely young, she had devoted her whole time to the care of educating Col. Herbert, her only child, and pointing out his road to glory, by shewing him the paths marked out by his illustrious ancestors. Mr. Herbert’s estate had been inherited by his eldest son, born of another mother, the husband of Miss Villiers’s friend. On his death, without children, what remained of the family-fortune had descended to Col. Herbert.

He had entered into the army a perfect child, where he had acquired all the frankness and generosity of the military character; to which, by the cares of his mother, he had added a competent share of learning, and a particular taste for polite literature. He had travelled, not in the modern style, under his own guidance, at nineteen, with some needy dependent French adventurer as an apology for a tutor, but with a nobleman, his near relation, who had been Ambassador at one of the first courts in Europe. He was open, brave, generous, sincere, well-bred; and, being in perfect good-humour with himself, was extremely inclined to be so with others. He loved women, but he also esteemed them, because he had been accustomed to the society of the most estimable; and had besides seen the female character in its most beautiful light at home.

But it is now time to return to the worthy Mr. Hammond, who, on his arrival in town, went to Mrs. Merrick’s; where, finding the good woman at home, he learned that Miss Villiers was at Lady Sophia Herbert’s in Surry. His heart glowed with pleasure; half his work was done to his hand; he was the intimate friend and near relation of Lady Sophia, knew her virtues, the estimation in which they stood; and the importance of the visit to Miss Villiers. He inquired into the state of her finances, and, venturing to act as her parent for the time being, paid the few debts she had remaining, discharged her lodging and her chariot, wrote to Col. Dormer that she was in the country on a visit to the most respectable woman in the world, where he intended to join the party, and, attended by Miss Villiers’s faithful old John, who had been left behind, set out for Lady Sophia’s villa,

Col. Herbert had been struck en passant with Miss Villiers’s person the first moment he saw her, but thought no more of her till they met at Mrs. Herbert’s. When he found her not only a woman of honour but the niece of his friend, her charms appeared with redoubled lustre. From that evening he determined to gain, at least, her friendship. Charming in London, at Greenwood he found her diving. Having with him no designs, no pretensions, no views either dictated by ambition or love, she was with him perfectly at ease; and only exerted that general desire of pleasing, which a young and beautiful woman naturally feels with an amiable man who shews her particular attention. It was not her beauty, her genius, her various accomplishments, which had rivetted his chains; but her noble sincerity, and the feelings of her heart. She expressed sentiments for Lord Melville, of which he died to be himself the object. A momentary silence had taken place, and both seemed immersed in thought, when they were aroused by the sound of carriages. As the road was directly under the low wall on the top of which they were leaning, Miss Villiers immediately knew Lord Melville, who was in a splendid chariot with—Lady Melville—for their hands had been joined about an hour. A glow of mingled disdain, expiring love, and and wounded vanity, suffused her cheek. It is necessary to account for the new-married pair's having passed Lady Sophia's wall. The seat of Mr. Harding, tho' we did not find this of consequence enough to mention sooner, was only two miles distant from the villa of Lady Sophia. Our heroine was embarrassed, and Col. Herbert a little at a loss how to resume the conversation, when they were relieved by the arrival of the ladies and Mr. Hammond, who had accidentally met at the gate. He approached her with all the gallantry of sixty five; proclaimed his passion before the whole company; and observed, after St. Evremond, that there was not the least impropriety in an old man's loving, though there might be in his expecting to be beloved, to which happiness he assured her he made not the smallest pretension. After a turn round the garden, Lady Sophia proposed adjourning to a party at loo in the drawing room. Mr. Hammond soon after produced a proposal of making a tour of a week, in which he was to be master of the revels, with unlimited power to amuse them in whatever manner he thought proper. Miss Villiers, who, not having money to settle her affairs, was unable to quit London intirely, who dreaded returning to it, who wished to avoid even the possibility of meeting Lord Melville, and who was too happy in her present society to think without reluctance of changing it, accepted the proposal with transport. They set out at nine the next day; Lady Sophia and Mr. Hammond in her Ladyship's post-chaise; and Col. Herbert, with Miss Villiers and his sister, in that of Mr. Hammond.

The plan of our travellers was to have no plan at all, which we take to be the most rational and eligible that human invention can suggest. They went every day exactly as far as they chose, without giving attention either to hours or mile-stones; flew like the wind, or passed leisurely to observe the face of the country, just as inclination pointed out. They mounted every hill that promised an agreeable prospect, whether it lay in or out of the direct road; stopped at a twelve-penny hop, at a strolling play, at a wake, at a village-wedding; and partook of twenty more little innocent amusements which we have not time to specify. The sixth day of their tour arrived: the proposed week was almost at an end. Lady Sophia first observed it was time to think of returning to town. Miss Villiers's heart sunk at the proposal: return to town! return to anxiety, to solitude, to distress! A sudden damp pervaded every bosom: they lamented that the hours of happiness should ever have an end; that friends so well suited to each other should ever part. A sigh of regret escaped Maria; Col. Herbert observed it, and pressed her hand by an involuntary impulse. The dreaded order was given; the horses heads were turned towards London, from whence they were now distant eighty miles. They travelled later this evening than they had ever done before, in order to reach an inn which Mr. Hammond strongly recommended, and which was kept by one of his servants, for whom he had a great affection. In vain the host of the inn they left exhausted all the common-place rhetoric usual on these occasions; assured them the roads were bad, being cross the country; that there were highwaymen abroad; that it threatened a storm. Mr. Hammond was obstinate, the ladies compliant, and the chaises moved forward. After they had gone about ten miles in a very indifferent road, the night came on almost imperceptibly. To render its shades more gloomy, a thick cloud obscured the whole horizon. They were now at the entrance of an extensive common: the postilions stopped, declared themselves utterly unacquainted with the road, and unable to proceed farther without a guide, which it was now impossible to procure. It was happy for them that Col. Herbert had been accustomed to reconnoitre: he quitted the chaise, mounted his servant's horse, and, directing the postilions to stop till his return, undertook to be their avant courier. The storm now broke at once upon them; the big tempest rose, the winds whistled round and shook the trees to their lowest roots, the rain descended in torrents, the thunder rolled, the streaming lightnings ran along the ground, and produced a luminous glare more terrific than darkness itself. Col. Herbert had been gone from them half an hour; an interval of which my reader will imagine all the horrors. Mr. Hammond said every thing he could to encourage them, but to no purpose: their apprehensions were raised to the highest pitch, all contributed to make them pant for an asylum, when Col. Herbert returned, and informed them, that, dark as it was, he had discovered the track of wheels, and had heard, though faintly, the barking of village dogs. With what transport they received this intelligence, none but those who have been in a similar situation can conceive. They advanced, though slowly and with caution, in the track Col. Herbert pointed out, and in about an hour had the happiness to hear a clock clock strike, and to see, through a coppice of trees, a glimmering light at a little distance. Directed by the light, they turned the corner of the coppice, and passed a row of cottages, at the end of which, a little detached from the road, on a gently rising ground, they saw a house, from whence the light, which had directed them proceeded. They rang at the bell; two servants came with lights, a lady and gentleman followed them to the gate, and, on getting out of the chaise, Miss Villiers found herself in the arms of her sister.

‘ Maria !’

‘ Louisa !’

They could say no more : astonishment and joy rendered them breathless. Col. Dormer, though not less happy to see her, was less agitated, and enough master of himself to do the honours of his house.

It is unnecessary to paint the joyous evening at Belfont ; but it may not be amiss to observe, that Mr. Hammond was in such spirits after supper, that he fairly owned the meeting of this group of friends to have been, not accidental, but a surprise of his contriving ; and that he had communicated the scheme, by letter, to Col. Dormer, who therefore had expected and prepared for them, but without betraying the secret, even to Louisa, who was as much astonished at the meeting as her sister.

‘ I protest, however,’ said he, ‘ that I did not act in concert with the storm, tho’ I found it a very useful auxiliary.’

The hours passed on so rapidly, that it was four in the morning before even the female part of the company thought of retiring. The leaden god kept possession of the whole company till eleven the next day, when, on assembling in the breakfast parlour, they met Mr. Montague with his son and daughter, who, having heard of Maria’s arrival, with her friends, came to invite them to a little ball the next day at the manor-house. The invitation was accepted, and the Montagues consented to spend the day at Col. Dormer’s. Col. Herbert, after making a thousand apologies to Col. Dormer, asked his permission to address his lovely niece :

‘ I love Miss Villiers, and my reason and my heart are equally touched. Besides regarding her as the most lovely of women, I find myself unhappy at the idea of losing her society. My mother is at this moment pleading my cause with Miss Villiers ; may I ask you to add your persuasions ?’

‘ Here she comes herself, my dear Charles, and I leave you to settle the point with her. I have only to observe,

Hib. Mag. Nov. 1777.

that, gain my niece’s consent, and your are sure of mine at any time.’

There is no eloquence so successful as the language of an impassioned heart : before this conversation ended, Miss Villiers was convinced of two truths very important to female happiness, that it is possible to love twice, and to be happy without either a coach and six, or a title.

Essay on Patriotism.

—Whene’er our country calls,
Friends, sons, and fires should yield the treasures up,
Nor own a sense beyond the public safety
Brooke’s Gustavus Vasa..

THE love of our country is an inflexible determination of mind to promote, by all justifiable means, the happiness of that society of which we are members ; to attend to it with a warm and active zeal ; to neglect no opportunity by which we may, without violating the great law of universal benevolence, advance her honour and interest, and generously to sacrifice to this governing principle all inferior regards, and less extensive claims of what nature soever

This is that elevated passion, of all others the most necessary, as well as most becoming to mankind ; and yet, if we believe the common complaints, of all others the least visible in the world. It lives, we are told, rather in description than reality, and is now represented as an antiquated and forgotten virtue. Wretched picture of the human race ! If this be a just representation, we are degenerate indeed, insensible to all social duties, counteracting the common bond of alliance with our species, and checking the source of our most refined satisfactions.

There is in the souls of men a certain attractive power which leads them, insensibly, to associate, and to concert the plan of mutual happiness. If any thing be natural to us, it must be that passion which conduces to the preservation of the species. But nothing so manifestly contributes to that end, as this combining principle of fellowship, which must, therefore, be as certainly derived from nature, as the love we bear to our offspring, or that which they have for each other. The public is, as it were, one great family : we are all children of one common mother, our country : she gave us all our birth, nursed our tender years, and supports our manhood. In this light, our regards for her seem as natural as the implanted affection between parents and children. It is then from the very frame of man that the sense of a national brotherhood arises, and a public is recognized by the suffrage of unerring nature.

the

Whenever, therefore, this uniting instinct is obstructed in its operations, by the unequal indulgence of private affection, the balance of the passions is destroyed, and the kind intention of the Creator no less imprudently than impiously perverted.

I might here enlarge on the mutual delights given and received in the social entertainments and conversation of a people connected together with the same language, customs, and institutions, and from thence shew the reasonableness of an affectionate attachment to the community; but I chuse to point out the obligations to this associating virtue, as they arise from higher and more interesting principles.

The miseries of the state of nature are so evident, that there is no occasion to display them. Every man is sensible that violence, rapine, and slaughter, must be continually practised where no restraints are provided, to curb the inordinancy of self-affection. To society we owe our security from those miseries; and to a well poised government—such as ours—we stand indebted for our protection against those who would encroach upon the equal share of liberty which belongs to all, or would molest individuals in the possession of what is fairly appropriated. And what an unspeakable satisfaction is it to be free; and to be able to call any thing one's own! Freedom and security diffuse cheerfulness over the most uncomfortable regions, and give a value to the most contemptible possessions; even a morsel of bread in the most frozen climates would be more worth contending for, if liberty crowned the meal, than the noblest possessions and greatest affluence under the mildest skies, if held at the merciless will of a civil or religious tyrant. As such an happiness is only to be established by the love of society, and as all the blessings which we enjoy, spring from this source, gratitude calls upon us to cultivate a principle to which we owe such transcendent obligations.

But the obligation rises upon us, when we consider that from society is also derived a set of amiable duties unknown to man in a detached, unconnected state. It is from this fountain, that hospitality, gratitude, and generosity flow, with all the pleasing charities which adorn human nature. For where have those virtues their theatre, where is their scene of action, or how can they exert themselves, in society? It is there alone we have opportunities of displaying the moral charms, and of exhibiting the glorious manifestation of good-will to mankind. On this account, therefore, society has an high demand for our affectionate regard.

To be unmindful of the public is not only an argument of an ungrateful, it is also a proof of a dishonest temper of mind. He who injures particulars is, indeed an offender; but he who withholds from the public the service and affection to which it is entitled, is a criminal of a far higher degree; as he, by such a behaviour, robs a whole body of people, and deprives the community of her just demand. If one man has a good understanding, and he does not exert it for the general advantage by advice and council; if another has riches, and he will not assist with his liberality; if a poor man has strength, and will not aid with his labour; if, in short, any man be wanting in pursuing the benevolent principle, by exerting his talents to their proper ends, he deserves to be treated as a common spoiler; as he takes what does not, properly, belong to him, the title of each man's share of the benefits of society arising only from that proportion to which he has, himself, contributed.

Public good is, as it were, a common bark, in which every individual has his respective share; and consequently whatever damage that sustains, the individuals unavoidably partake of the calamity.—If liberty be destroyed, no particular member can escape the chains. If the credit of the associated body sink, his fortune sinks with it. If the sons of violence prevail, and plunder the public stock, his part cannot be rescued from the spoil. If then we have a true affection for ourselves, if we would reap the fruits of our industry, and enjoy our properties in security, we must stand firm to the cause of public virtue. Otherwise we had better return to the raw herbage for our food, and to the inclemencies of the open sky for our covering: go back to uncultivated nature, where our wants would be fewer, and our appetites less.—Such a situation, notwithstanding all its inconveniences, is far preferable to a barbarous government, and far more desirable than the lot of slaves.

We see then how closely the supreme Being has connected our interest with our duty, and made it each man's happiness to contribute to the welfare of his fellow-citizens.

But still the more noble motive to a generous soul is that which springs from the satisfaction of diffusing the joys of life to all around him. There is nothing he thinks so desirable as to be the instrument of doing good; and the farther it is extended, the greater is his delight, and the more glorious his character. Benignity to friends and relations is but a narrow-spirited quality compared with this, and perhaps as frequently the effect of caprice or pride, as of a benevolent temper. But when our flow of good-will spreads itself to all the society, and in them to distant posterity; when charity rises into public spirit, and partial affection is extended into general benevolence, then it is that man shines in the highest lustre, and is the truest image of his divine Creator.

Considerations on Female Virtue.

WHEN a woman once determines to soar above every debasing object, her mind seconds the noble purpose with a force equal to that of men. Understanding has no sex; and this is a truth of which women cannot be too often reminded, as a powerful motive to detach them from all those trifles which they seem to make their supreme good.

Of female virtues, the most indispensable, and of greatest weight with us, is modesty. This lovely virtue has such an influence on the features, air, mind, and temper, that where it is wanting every thing disgusts. It is, in women, what sense and courage are to men, the very centre of their point of honour.

Our forefathers, who were not behind us in plain, sound sense, made the sum and substance of all virtues to consist in these two points; in men courage, in women chastity. These are the subjects of all the old romances: the knights overcome frightful giants, and their ladies withstand the severest trials. If writings be the representation of manners, the romances of these times will certainly transmit to posterity no very high character of our purity or heroism.

It is manifest, and may be said without any great flattery, that women have generally better hearts than men, are more tender, and more compassionate. In this I appeal to sick husbands, who for years together have been tended with indefatigable care by a lovely wife, burying herself in their chambers. Nothing is more common than to see women sit up with, and nurse their relations and acquaintance, whilst men only drop some little advice, or look in upon them now and then for a few minutes.

This wonderful sensibility of women is, both to themselves and us, a copious source of exquisite delights, and sometimes likewise of bitter pangs. Sentiment is their universal motive: it is born with them, and with them lives and dies: it produces in all ages, those amiable virtues which make us so fond of them; and to it are also owing those particular vices with which we upbraid them. The more sensible a heart is, the deeper root, on any offence, will jealousy, resentment, and revenge, strike in it: the wounds of the heart are not easily closed, and a woman of a tender disposition carries the sense of such an injury to her grave.

But whatever mixture of good and evil is allowed to be in women, still it must be granted, that, in general, they are truer in their affections, have a greater regard to honour, more fidelity, constancy, and lead a more regular life, than the bulk of men. How many distinguish themselves greatly in the management of their household, the education of their children, and affection for their husbands! but these worthy women are not the most fond of being seen: virtue seeks concealment as much as vice delight to shew itself.

A slender acquaintance with history furnishes proofs of the capacity and firmness of the sex. If the resolution of Scævola deserved applause, Rome about the same time, saw a Clelia boldly swim her horse over the Tiber, amidst a shower of arrows. In that calamitous juncture, when the tyranny of the Triumviri bore down all before it, Hortensius's daughter, fearless of their cruelty, alone dared to employ her nervous eloquence in defence of the Roman ladies; and, in the heat of the proscriptions, Arria encouraged her husband to die resolutely, and even put into his hands a poniard reeking with her own blood, coolly assuring him, that it did not hurt.

The history of all nations bears testimony, that women have often displayed an intrepidity which, in appearance, should be our peculiar endowment. Boadicea, a queen of the Britons, after the loss of fourscore thousand men, in an action against the Romans, rushed among the thickest of their forces, and fell sword in hand. The Cimbrian army having been defeated by the Romans, the women got together, and made a vigorous stand; and, fighting in their chariots, greatly galled the enemy with stones, till, seeing themselves surrounded, they killed both themselves and their children.

These actions, however, are cruel, and redound not to the real honour of the sex, whose characteristic should be softness and delicacy. I shall mention here a passage, which sets forth the goodness of heart, not of one particular woman, but of the whole sex in general; and I am inclined to doubt, whether, in the like circumstances, circumstances, men would have given such a proof of generous affection.

The emperor Conrad III. having pent up Henry the Proud, duke of Bavaria, in the town of Veinsberg, and preparing to carry it by storm, the women petitioned the emperor to allow them to withdraw from the place; carrying with them what they could. This being granted, the women, to the emperor's astonishment, came out of the place with their husbands on their backs; and Conrad moved at the sight, immediately pardoned both the town and the duke.

It is inconceivable how many virtues there are, quite unknown, in the sex. We are perpetually talking of noisy folly, and fluttering vanity, but take no notice of a thousand placid virtues, which yet are the very soul of domestic happiness. It is in the regulated families, rather than at balls and assemblies, that women are found who tacitly vindicate their sex. They are to be sought for in our churches, in those houses where indigence and distress seem to shun the looks of those who are able to relieve them. There it is that female piety and benevolence distinguish themselves: if there be some who, confining themselves to a punctilious devotion, only (if I may be allowed the expression) pay their compliments to virtue, a very great number of them are illumined by a real religion, ardent in the constant practice of solid piety, and free from the excesses of a superstitious zeal.

Virtue and wisdom are joined with the graces much oftener than the slanderers of the sex are willing to think. Men are so enamoured with beauty, that they would make it the whole of the women's merit, never talking to them of any thing else. A fine woman is really, as they say, nature's master-piece; but this master-piece is not complete where any thing is wanting to the soul. This is the proper object that calls for women's ambition: when beauty is combined with solid merit, it may be said to do honour to human nature. Virtue heightens beauty, and beauty adds a fresh lustre to virtue, which, in the person of an amiable and discreet woman, becomes in some measure personified, and all its charms shine forth in their full glory.

Abstract of the Trial of the Rev. Mr. Benjamin Ruffen, for Ravishing Three Children belonging to the Charity-School at Bethnal-Green, at the Old-Baily.

ON Friday, the 17th of October, the rev. Mr. Benjamin Ruffen, clerk, master of the charity-school at Bethnal-green, and assistant-preacher at the Lock-chapel, was tried before Mr. Baron Eyre, Mr. Justice Ashurst, the right hon. the lord-mayor, and several other justices in the commission of jail-delivery, upon four different indictments, rendered capital by a statute; on the first of which he was fully convicted, viz. that of carnally knowing a female infant, under the age of ten years. As an exhibition of the particulars attending this equally unnatural, and singular business, would be highly improper in a publication which meets the general eye, we are restrained to the following general account. The prosecutrix was the child of a poor woman in the parish of Bethnal-green, and a charity scholar in the Subscription-school; she was strictly questioned respecting the nature and consequence of an oath, to which she gave such answers as induced the court to receive her testimony. She said, that the prisoner employed her to light his fire in an apartment abstracted from that in which his wife and family resided; and partly by threats, and partly by soothing, accomplished his purpose; and committed the same offence on her some time after in the committee-room.

An eminent surgeon was examined, who described the situation in which he found the witness, and confirmed her in that part of her evidence respecting what constituted the fact, as described by the act of Parliament; inasmuch that the jury were but a very short time consulting upon their verdict, and brought him in guilty. The prisoner, who seemed not very much affected at his unhappy situation, was then charged on the second indictment exactly similar, and the infant prosecutor examined with the same caution, and admitted to proceed in her testimony, which she delivered very distinctly, and which was almost an echo of the former. She added, that the prisoner had used her ill nine different times when she attended to light his fire, and cautioned her not to discover for fear of bad consequences to any thing. She said that this deterred her from acquainting her mother, who also appeared as an evidence, and confirmed some part of the relation. The surgeon who examined her, being sworn, assigned several chirological reasons in contradiction to the capital part of her evidence, and was confirmed in his report by another gentleman of the profession who appeared on the part of the prisoner. But the court seemed to think that their account was a contradiction in itself. The jury, however, thought proper to acquit him of the charge.

The third indictment was of a different description, viz. for having committed a rape upon a girl above the term of infancy. The prosecutrix upon this charge seemed to be about the age of fourteen, and deposed that the prisoner carried her with him in a coach coach to the Lock-hospital upon Sunday the 14th of June, in order to hear him preach: that, after he had performed the duty, they returned in the same manner: that on their return he made several rude proposals and attempts; that she told him she was afraid to comply with his request, as it was a very bad action, but, he assuring her it was not a crime with a minister, he at length by force accomplished his desires.

The same medical gentlemen were called upon to report the condition of this witness, and they agreed that she had been treated ill. The prisoner called upon Justice Wilmot, to declare whether or not the girl did not own before him, that she had consented; but at the same time that he had not actually committed the fact. Mr. Wilmot agreed that the prosecutrix did say before him the fact was not actually committed, and for that reason he did not think it necessary to bind over the parties. However, a subscriber to the charity, then in the court, deposed she actually did swear before the last witness, that the fact had been committed. Upon this contradiction, the jury consulted a short time, and acquitted the prisoner of the charge.

The fourth indictment was only read over, the proofs being thought insufficient; and of this also the prisoner was discharged.

Being desired to proceed on his defence, the prisoner produced a paper, which, he said, contained many things tending to his justification; but, the Court demanding if the paper was wrote with his own hand, and being told it was only a copy, the request was over ruled, and he was obliged to proceed verbally. After apologising for the effects of a violent cold, he said that the prosecutions were founded in nothing but malice; that the Justices Wilmot and Durden were his mortal enemies, and wanted nothing more than, at the expence of his life, to remove him from the school; that twelve months ago Mr. Wilmot, upon a dispute concerning pedigree, applied to the different subscribers for that purpose, but was refused; and that ever since he omitted nothing that could render him unhappy; upon his first examination he said the Justices permitted him to depart, upon a promise of appearing to any future charge. That they afterwards went up and down the parish like bloodhounds, seeking the means of his destruction: he said that, Mr. ———, a curate of a parish, having an intimacy with the wife of a parishioner, he had mentioned it; and that Mr. ———, another curate, having had a bastard child by a young woman of the same parish, that affair he had also spoken of; and that these gentlemen were his active and inveterate enemies; he said, when he found other charges set up against him, he went voluntarily to the keeper of Tothill Bridewell, and surrendered himself. That, the Justices stopping his salary, he remained a prisoner, without the aid of money to employ an attorney, or to retain counsel; and that he was thereby precluded from several advantages upon his trial. He concluded with acquainting the Court and jury, that such was the extreme cruelties of his enemies, that, the day after he was confined, his wife and children were turned into the street, without habitation or provision of any kind whatsoever.

The learned Judges, who heard him with great patience and humanity, observed, that, as he had not proved by evidence any part of the combination, his defence was not properly before the Court, or for its consideration; that if he had proved in evidence the malice, of which he complained, it would no doubt have due weight with the jury: but as it then stood they did not conceive that it should be in the least attended to. In summing up the evidence, and in their remarks upon the youth and situation of the prosecutors, they made every tender and judicious distinction, but seemed notwithstanding to approve intirely of the different verdicts. This unhappy delinquent appeared to be about forty-five years of age, and a man of strong faculties. Upon leaving the dock, he repeated that he was a sacrifice to the malice of his enemies—but that it was his fate, and he must submit.

Irish Parliamentary Intelligence.

Monday, October 27.

WRITS were ordered to be issued for electing members for the boroughs of Hillborough, Sligo, and Donegal.

Petitions were presented, complaining of undue elections and returns for the university of Dublin and the county of Sligo.

Sundry accounts were ordered in.

It was agreed to grant a supply to his Majesty.

Mr. Grattan asked some questions of the gentlemen in office, relative to what plans for reduction of public expence, had been settled, which produced a short conversation, but no answer, as the ostensible minister had not yet taken his seat in the house; and no motion was made. In this conversation, Mr. Ogle observed, that “every new lord lieutenant, as soon as nominated, became, by an odd kind of metaphysics, endued with every virtue of his predecessor, without any atom of his vices; but in a few weeks after, the fall of the leaf came on, and he cast his virtues.” On this Sir Henry Cavendish replied, “he expected every good from his present Excellency, but would cast him off, whenever he cast his virtues." And Mr. Prime Serjeant alluded to his now sitting on the ministerial side of the house, by saying with Horace, Cælum non animum mutant qui trans mare currunt.

Those who cross the sea, change the climate indeed, but not their mind.

Adding, he had ever opposed prodigality, and ever should continue to do the same.

Tuesday, October 28.

Mr. Recorder brought in heads of a bill to punish by hard labour, instead of transportation, which is to be printed and committed the 14th of November.

Writs were ordered for electing members for the boroughs of Baltimore and Doneraile.

Some petitions were presented and accounts ordered in.

Wednesday, October 29.

More petitions were presented and accounts ordered.

Heads of a bill to give further time for persons in office to qualify, were ordered on the motion of Mr. Robert Fitzgerald; and heads of a bill to shorten the duration of parliaments, on the motion of Sir Edward Newenham.

The committee of supplies ordered to sit this day fortnight, and the committee of accounts to open to-morrow.

It was also ordered, that the house would censure all persons whose complaints of undue elections were found to be frivolous and vexatious.

Thursday, October 30.

The committee of accounts sat, and having spent three hours reading of accounts and ordering in of others, adjourned till to-morrow.

The Speaker took the chair, and two new members were sworn in.

Mr. Recorder mentioned, that by law no person could sell ale or spirituous liquors, without a licence from the commissioners of the revenue, previous to which the person was to obtain a certificate from the two nearest magistrates of their good characters, and enter into recognizances not to suffer gaming, tipling, or any disorderly proceedings in their houses; which recognizances were to be filed by the clerk of the peace. But he had found on examination that most of the certificates were forged, and the recognizances never returned to be filed, which procedure was the chief cause of the great corruption of morals that prevailed, and the debauchery, riots, and robberies, now so frequent. It was therefore high time, to put a stop to these evil practices by punishing such publicans who procure licences by forged certificates and false pretences. He therefore, as the previous step, moved that the collectors of the inland excise for the city and county of Dublin, should return all the original certificates on which licences had been obtained for two years past, and the clerk of the peace should return such recognizances as he had filed. And when those returns were made, he declared, he should then have the magistrates before the house, that they may know in what certificates their hands had been forged, in order to punish the offenders.

Some resolutions were entered into to punish bribery and undue influence in members or candidates, and suborning or intimidating witnesses, at contested elections, (on the motion of Mr. Monfell) some fresh papers were ordered in, and adjourned till to-morrow.

Friday, October 31.

Several motions were made, but nothing material was transacted.—The house broke up very early, and adjourned till to-morrow.

Saturday, November 1.

The committee of accounts sat, and received some papers; and then adjourned till Monday.

Sir Edward Newenham presented heads of a bill for regulating the price and affize of bread, and preventing frauds and impositions in the sale of flour, meal, potatoes, butchers meat, and other articles, in the county of Dublin. He said, that the bill ought to be entitled, "The humble petition of some thousands of industrious tradesmen, mechanics, and manufacturers, in the county of Dublin," who not only laboured under encreasing county charges, heavy rents, and the high price of provisions, but suffered much from the impositions used in bread, flour, and other articles of life, owing to bad weights and false measures. That it would reflect equal honour on the legislature which passed it and the government under whom it received the royal assent. The bill was received, and ordered to a committee of the whole house.

Mr. Denis Daly, in pursuance of his promise, then moved the house to come to the following resolution: "That a committee be appointed to enquire into the state of the exportation of provisions for the two last years." Mr. Daly prefaced this motion by observing, that it was unnecessary to enlarge on the subject matter. Every gentleman was well acquainted with it, would soon receive the most accurate examination. Our trade, he said, for these two years past, laboured under the greatest disadvantages; the public property was injured, the people suffered severely, and were still to suffer more, unless parliament interfered. The conduct of the British administration towards this country, he said, was such, that from them no relief was to be expected, unless the Irish House of Commons insisted upon it. The whole kingdom, he observed, was converted into a magazine, to support the unnatural war with the colonies. The southern and western parts of the kingdom were in a deplorable situation; that this was a matter well known to most of the gentlemen in the house; and that something was necessary to be done, which might afford immediate relief. He said, that if the house had any respect for its own character, or for the people it represented, they would readily concur in adopting some measure which might ease our trade from the burthen it now laboured under; and he added, that he would have our situation in that respect ascertained to the house, upon the fullest and the clearest evidence. An enquiry of this kind, a matter of such moment, he said, must convince the world that we were determined to preserve our trade inviolate, at the same time that the resolution would appear, not the spirit of faction, but the united voice of the whole people, praying redress. He flattered himself, from the benevolence of the present vice-roy, and from his general good character, that his excellency had no other design but to rescue this country from the hand of oppression, which has hitherto borne so hard against it. The feebleness which the British administration had shewn in their friendship to this kingdom, and their making their designs to enslave America a pretence to oppress us, he said, was a proof that we had now as little to expect from their compassion, as we formerly experienced from their gratitude.

Sir H. Langrishe said, that he rose, not to give any opposition to his honourable friend's motion, but that he would offer a few observations. The matter of the measure, he said, was incontrovertible; nor could he, if he was inclined to oppose, say any thing against a motion, which on the face of it carried nothing but a desire of information. He however observed, that the avowed purpose, the latent design of the motion was, to interpose on the legality of the proclamation respecting the embargo on provisions. This was a matter in which he wished the house not to interfere, as it would make them the expositors of law; and as a suit was now depending in a court of justice, wherein the legality of this proclamation was to be argued, any resolution on that head by the house of commons would be in some measure, prejudging the affair.

Mr. Prime Serjeant Burgh understood, that the motion related merely to the exportation of beef; but he saw nothing in the resolution, nor in the very able discourse of the hon. member who introduced it, which glanced at the illegality of a proclamation. That it seemed to him to be merely for the purpose of information in respect to our trade; and that if there was a necessity for seconding it, he would be the man to stand up for that purpose; and he said, God forbid that there would be any design in government to shut the door of information; but that if ever the legality of proclamations came to be argued before the house, he had not the smallest doubt upon his mind but that he should be able to satisfy gentlemen, that the laying on an embargo was legal in the crown, innoxious to the subject, and necessary to the state. He said, however, that he did not wish such matter should be argued in the house, or that the prerogative of the crown should be attacked on slight occasions. Enquiries of that nature, he said, were a two-edged sword; and there were times when that sword was more likely to wound, than to defend the constitution. He concluded with saying, that he gave his hearty concurrence to the hon. gentleman's motion.

A committee was then appointed to make the enquiry, and report to the house.

The petition of the governors of the Workhouse and Foundling-hospital, and the petition of Messrs. Taylor and Skinner, (the two surveyors) were reported from the committees, to which they were referred, and declared to be deserving the aid of parliament.

Mr. Robert Fitzgerald presented to the house heads of a bill, to allow further time for persons in office to qualify, pursuant to the act for preventing the further growth of Popery, which were committed for next Monday.

Sir Edward Newenham observed, that the sums charged for building and repairing barracks were enormous, and moved for a particular list of the barracks, and the sums expended on each of them.

Could wake to song my trembling lyre,
My raptur'd fancy warm.
To me, the pride of summer's bloom
Seems dreary as the winter's gloom;
Th' enliv'ning sweets of spring,
May now in rain o'er ev'ry vale,
Borne by the health-inspiring gale,
Their balmy odours fling.
But tho' with joyless steps I range,
Regardless of the season's change,
Nor tune the warbling lay;
Thé Bard must yet an offering bring,
His voice tho' faint, still raise to sing,
Maria's natal day.

Oh happy day! beyond the rest,
By fate so eminently blest,
In gentle B——s birth;
Thro' all thy hours may peace abound,
May ev'ry heart with joy rebound,
And soft expanding mirth.
Let Ceres, from her plenteous horn,
Thro' ev'ry rolling year, adorn
With golden gifts thy fields;
Still may thy hospitable board,
With all th' ambrosial fruits be stor'd,
That rich Pomona yields.

To hail thy morn, the rural throng
Shall join in festive choral song;
The sprightly dance shall lead;
Oh may ambition, care or strife,
That oft imbibers human life,
Their pleasures ne'er invade.

And thou, dear maid, for whom I prove,
The pangs of unrequited love,
For whom I sigh in vain,
Tho' by a father's stern decree
Depriv'd the blissful sight of thee.

Yet, will I not complain:
If Heav'n, propitious to my prayer,
Gives you—life's choicest gifts to share,
—Makes ev'ry blessing thine;
Let these, thro' life on B—— wait,
I leas'd I'll resign my lot to fate,
Nor at that lot repine.

Verse xiii.—Alluding to his generous interposition in favour of those who had met with an unexpected injury from a pretended friend.

LONDON,

L O N D O N .

Friday, September 26.

BARON de Kutzleben, the Hessian Minister, made a complaint to Sir John Fielding that a trunk, containing property to a considerable amount, had been broken open at his lodgings in Bolton-street, Piccadilly, during his absence in the country, and that a brilliant ring of great value, a pair of silver candlesticks, and Bank notes to the amount of 80*l.* with 30 guineas in cash, had been taken away. On the Baron's mentioning his suspicions of his own footman and a person of the house, they were both taken into custody. Upon an investigation of the affair, it appeared the Baron's servant lay in his master's bed chamber, where the trunk was placed, on Thursday, and that early in the morning the neighbours were alarmed with an outcry of fire. On examining the house, part of the trunk was burnt, but no other appearance of the misfortune could be discovered. On the Baron's arrival in town, he found he had been robbed of the above articles. The person of the house, who has lived many years in the neighbourhood with reputation, was discharged; but several circumstances of a suspicious nature appearing against the footman, he was remanded for further examination.

A young lady of great family and fortune complained to Sir John Fielding of being assaulted by one of her domestics. It appeared, that being in bed, at her house near St. James's, she was awaked about three o'clock the same morning by a noise in her room; that on drawing the curtain, she felt a man's head; on her shrieking out, he said, "Don't be frightened, it is only I, the coachman." Greatly alarmed at this circumstance, she jumped out of bed, and called up some of the servants, who secured the offender. The fellow seemed exceedingly sensible of his misbehaviour, and said, that in consequence of his mistress having employed a master to teach him to read and write, he had been induced to believe, by some of his acquaintance, that she was in love with him. The magistrate, after severely rebuking the man for his impudence and folly, ordered him to be discharged.

29.] A Common-hall was held at Guildhall for the election of a Lord Mayor of this City for the ensuing year. The Court being opened, Mr. Nugent, the Common Serjeant, read aloud the names of the following Aldermen, as persons that had served the office of Sheriff, viz. Eldaile, Kennett, Oliver, Lewes, Hayley, Newnham, Lee, and Hart: Their names were severally put up, and the show of hands was greatly in favour of Eldaile and Kennett. The Sheriffs declared the election had fallen on Mess. Eldaile and Kennett, upon which the Lord Mayor and Aldermen returned to the Council-chamber, and in a short time came on the hustings, and declared the election had fallen on Sir James Eldaile.

Oct. 1.] A general court of the Governors of Bethlehem and Bridewell hospitals was held, when the report of the Committee of Enquiry, who sat to investigate the charge urged against one of the governors, accused of appropriating part of the hospital victuals, beer, &c. to his own use, was made, and it appearing that the charge was fully supported, the Court passed a vote of censure upon the delinquent, which (unfortunately) is the only punishment in their power to inflict.

2.] At a music-meeting held at Cornham church, in Wiltshire, about three hundred of the nobility and gentry of Bath and Bristol were present. On their return home at night, about a mile from Bath, few of them escaped being robbed by two highwaymen: they took from one gentleman 20 guineas and a gold watch. They likewise robbed the Bath and Bristol Diligence, and every post-coach and carriage that passed them. It is supposed they made a booty of upwards of 400*l.*

Admiralty-office, Oct. 6, 1777.

Copy of a letter from Lieutenant Bouchier, commanding his Majesty's sloop the Druid, to Mr. Stephens, Secretary of the Admiralty.

S I R,

Druid, at Spithead, Oct. 3, 1777.

"I beg you will please to acquaint the right honourable the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, I arrived at this place at nine o'clock this morning, with his Majesty's sloop Druid under my command, under the directions of the honourable Captain William Clement Finch, of his Majesty's ship Camel, and to inform their Lordships, the 4th of September, in the latitude of 80. 33. N. longitude 50 17. W. at half past four o'clock in the evening, we discovered a strange sail on our larboard quarter bearing west, and steering for us. We were then (from the irregularity of the flat) about five miles distant from the Camel, to windward, repeating the signal for the convoy to go under the Camel's stern, and obliging those ships to bear down. The Weazle at a great distance to leeward, and out of our sight. We cleared ship for action, and turned all hands to quarters. At five o'clock she came within pistol-shot, when I could plainly perceive her to be a rebel privateer, mounting 38 or 40 guns, her decks and tops full of men. She hailed, and desired us to strike to the honour of the Congress's colours, hoisted her ensign, and began to engage. The first broadside sent a shot through Captain Carteret's thigh-bone, and killed the master.

"I then took command on the quarter-deck, and continued the action. At half past five she came close along-side, and kept an irregular but very hot firing. At six she made sail a-head. I attempted to do the same, and keep her broadside on, but the shattered condition of the rigging rendered the sails almost useless to the ship: as the head-sails only were of service, we edged away, and kept her nearly on our bow till twenty minutes past six. She then had the wind abaft, sheered off, hauled down her colours, and made sail. I attempted to wear ship and rake her; but the rigging being entirely shot to pieces, could not bring her round. I then tried to make what sail I could, and pursue the enemy, but found most of the masts and yards shattered, and the rigging, &c. as in the inclosed defects of the ship, with four feet ten inches water in the hold.

"At half past seven we brought to with our fore-sail and mizen on our larboard-tack, to plug the shot holes between wind and water, clear the wreck, and pump the ship out.

"I then

"I then perceived another rebel privateer laying to, bearing S. S. W. six or seven miles off; and by her appearance I suppose she mounted about twenty guns. The Carnel was then in chase about two or three miles distant; soon after the Weazle spoke to us, and gave chase also.

"I am sorry to inform their Lordships, that the first broadside which was fired killed the master, and wounded Captain Carteret in the left thigh, of which he died the next morning, after undergoing an amputation. I should do the greatest injustice, was I to omit acquainting their Lordships, that although Capt. Carteret was so dangerously wounded, it was with great difficulty he could be persuaded to quit the deck: his fortitude and intrepidity was such, that he wished to have remained on deck to have seen the service performed, but the loss of blood was so great, it was absolutely necessary to carry him to the surgeon. And I should be wanting in gratitude and justice, if I omitted to mention the remarkable bravery of the officers, seamen, and marines, during the action, and the alertness they shewed, with the fatigue they went through to put the ship in the state of service when action was hourly expected; for three days and nights the rebels were in sight. Inclosed you have a list of the killed and wounded.

I have the honour to be,

S I R,

Your most humble servant,

JOHN BOURCHIER."

A list of men killed and wounded on board his Majesty's sloop Druid, Sept. 4, 1777, in action with a rebel privateer, viz.

"Mr. John Will'n, master; John Cambion, seaman; George Baker, marine; Simon Salisbury, ditto; Lawrence Macely, ditto; Henry Hullcott, boy.

Died of their wounds since action.

"Peter Carteret, Esq; commander, Sept. 5. George Smith, invalid, ditto. George White, marine, ditto. Patrick Lowry, seaman, Sept. 19. John Fennegun, ditto, Sept. 21.

Wounded.

"Mr. John Wiggan, master's mate; Mr. James Nicholson, lieutenant of marines; John Dumbley, James Connel, James Stanton, Daniel Butler, Peter Chapman, John Scully, Richard Austin, William Walbrook, Charles Robertson, James Thomas, Thomas Conolly, and John Wood, seamen; Mr. Nicholas Poulson, surgeon's mate; Thomas Dunn, James Miller, Thomas Allbutt, James Murray, Robert Osborne, marines; and Samuel Kerton, a boy.

JOHN BOURCHIER."

9.] Beside the proclamation formerly issued by Gen. Burgoyne, another has been published since, in which he says, "Be it known to all who will remain in peaceable possession of their habitations and effects, that they may stay unmolested in their respective dwellings, and follow their usual occupations; and that, excepting the customs and duties which are payable to the King of Great Britain, nothing will be required of them, either in money or merchandizes, but what is absolutely necessary for the subsistence of the army; and that for all such provisions they shall bring in they shall be paid in ready money; on the contrary, if, notwithstanding this declaration, the inhabitants of the towns or villages carry away their effects or provisions, and abandon their dwellings, such delinquents shall be treated as enemies, and their towns, villages, houses, or dwellings destroyed."

Mrs Ogilvie, who escaped out of Edinburgh jail, for the murder of her husband, is now in a convent at Lisle, a sincere penitent.

13.] The following is a true state of the different methods of getting money by Lottery-office-keepers, and other ingenious persons, who have struck out different plans of getting money by the state lottery of 1777.

First, His majesty's royal letters patent for securing the property of purchasers.

2dly, A few office keepers who advertise, "By authority of Parliament," to secure your property in shares and chances.

3dly, Several schemes for shares and chances only, entitling the purchasers to all prizes above twenty pounds.

4thly, A bait for those who can only afford to venture one shilling.

Then come the ingenious sett of Lottery merchants, viz. Lottery magazine proprietors—Lottery taylor—Lottery stay-makers—Lottery gloves—Lottery hat-makers—Lottery tea-merchants—Lottery snuff and tobacco merchants—Lottery handkerchiefs—Lottery bakers—Lottery barbers (where a man, for being shaved, and paying three-pence, may stand a chance of getting ten pounds).—Lottery shoe-blacks—Lottery eating-houses; one in Wych-street, Temple-bar, where, if you call for six-penny-worth of roast or boiled beef, you receive a note of hand, with a number, which, should it turn out fortunate, may entitle the eater of the beef to sixty guineas.—Lottery Oyster-stalls, by which the fortunate may get five guineas for three-penny-worth of oysters. And, to complete this curious catalogue, an old woman, who keeps a sausage-stall in one of the little alleys leading into Smith-field, has wrote up in chalk, Lottery sausages, or five shillings to be gained for a farthing relish.—The whole of what appears above, our correspondent assures is strictly true.

Admiralty-Office, Oct. 13, 1777.

Extract of a letter from John Montague, Esq; Vice-Admiral of the White, and commander in chief of his Majesty's ships and vessels at Newfoundland, to Mr. Stephens, Secretary of the Admiralty, dated on board his Majesty's ship Romney, at St. John's, August 25, 1777.

"I have the pleasure to inform you, that on the 15th inst. Lieut. Lloyd, commanding his majesty's armed sloop Penguin, of ten carriage guns, 10 swivels, and 45 men, in the lat. 43. 10. on the Banks of Newfoundland, fell in with an American brig privateer, of Beverly, called the Retaliation, commanded by Eleazer Giles, mounted with 12 carriage guns (four of which were six pounders,) 11 swivels, two organ guns, and 66 men; after a smart engagement of an hour and a half took her, and brought her into this port the 20th instant. The Penguin had one man killed, the master, midshipman, and five men wounded. The privateer had two men killed, the commander and eleven others wounded; the masts, sails, and rigging of both were very much shattered."

16.] A most horrid and barbarous murder was discovered to have been perpetrated on the body of a French gentleman, a jeweller, at his lodgings, No. 9, in Princes-street, Cavendish-square, by a Swede, who was his interpreter, in the following manner: The maid-servant of the house, not having seen the deceased since the time he went to bed on the preceding Saturday, was very uneasy, and made frequent enquiries concerning him to the interpreter; but was always answered, "He was out of town." The maid's suspicions increasing, she was determined to see into the deceased's apartments, and accordingly reared a ladder to the back window, which she opened, and, to her surprise, perceived the floor floating with blood. She went directly to Justice Gretton's, in Margaret-street, and made him acquainted therewith, and of her strong suspicions of the interpreter having murdered the deceased. The Justice immediately repaired to the house, broke open the door, and upon search, found the deceased most inhumanly mangled and bruised, and his body thrust into a trunk in the dressing-room, with his head bent down on his left breast, his knees forced up to his chin, and almost putrefied. The murderer was apprehended the same evening, by Justice Gretton in person, just as he arrived at his lady's lodgings in Castle-street, in a post chaise from a country jaunt. On his examination he confessed being guilty of the murder.

The following is given as a circumstantial account of this atrocious murder.

Mr. Joseph Moudroyte, the person murdered, was a jeweller of repute at Paris. He came from thence, about six weeks ago, on business of importance to himself, but being unacquainted with the language and customs of this country, he employed (on a good recommendation) Le Mercier as his interpreter. The deceased treated Mercier as a confidential friend, and he therefore soon got an insight into his most private concerns; and finding that Mr. Moudroyte was possessed of very valuable property, he determined to rob and murder him, imagining that to be the only expedient to prevent a discovery. Accordingly, on the Wednesday preceding the murder, he went to a smith's, and had a hammer made on purpose for the horrid deed, which he was determined to perpetrate as soon as opportunity offered.

He accordingly attended more assiduously than usual, but found no opportunity until last Saturday week; in the morning of which the deceased shewed him several valuable articles which he had not before seen, which rather heightened his inclinations. He then went out; returned at six in the evening, after agreeing with two confederates to be ready to help him, and share the spoil. He brought in with him the fatal instrument, and laid it under the bed's head. After drinking coffee, cards were proposed by Le Mercier, to which the deceased readily agreed. They played till half past ten: went to supper: and at half past eleven renewed their play, and continued playing until near two on Sunday morning: when the deceased proposed the murderer's sleeping with him, as it was too late for him to go home. This was refused; saying, that the people where he lodged would be uneasy at his staying out, and that he would sleep out and see if he could get a coach; if not, he would return and sleep there. Accordingly, under pretence of getting a coach, he went out, and acquainted his confederates how his scheme had taken. They determined to put it into execution instantly—That he would return—They should wait near hand until the deceased was gone to bed, when he would come down and let them in. He then returned, acquainted the deceased that he could not get a coach, and not thinking it safe to walk home, would sleep with him.

The deceased shortly afterwards went to bed; and Le Mercier, under pretence of going down to ease the calls of nature, opened the street-door and let in his two confederates. By the time he went up again, the deceased was asleep. That he struck him under the left ear with the hammer, and repeated his blows until he was dead, when he and his confederates dragged him from the bed to the dressing-room, where Le Quinte (now in custody,) his confederate, and the other not yet taken, beat him on the belly and testicles with a poker, and then determined to cut his body in pieces, and each to carry away a part, and bury it separately. But not agreeing in that scheme, they forced him into a trunk about two feet three inches long, whereby his body was bent in a most astonishing manner, as were his legs and thighs.

He had no cut or other wound on him than what was made with the hammer and poker. They then broke open the bureau and escrutoire, from whence they took a very valuable booty, about seventy-five guineas, and three French crowns, sixteen gold watches, one silver ditto, and one metal ditto, besides a very large quantity of valuable jewellery, particularly two very capital rings, most of which are actually recovered.

Le Quinte, the confederate, was taken on the following Saturday afternoon. After his examination on Saturday, he denied the charge very strongly, and endeavoured to prove an alibi; but yesterday, on his re-examination, he confessed the fact, and owned where part of the property was.—The persons of the house, with the property, were brought before Mr. Gretton; but as it was found in the room Le Quinte had taken, and other sufficient proofs that they were no ways criminal, they were discharged.

17.] As a great person was taking an airing on horseback in Hyde Park, attended only by two grooms, he was stopped by a man on foot, who seized the reins of his horse's bridle. The grooms secured the man, and he was carried before Sir John Fielding. On his examination it appeared that he was insane.

20.] A young woman at Paris, enraged at being abandoned by her lover; after many useless reproaches, at length waited on him a few days ago, and told him, that being unable to survive his perfidy, she was determined to fight him, and that she had brought two pistols with her for that purpose. The gentleman took one, and, making light of the matter, fired it into the air; but she, not imitating his example, and become perfectly mad through despair, fired her's at him, and wounded him dreadfully in the face. The gentleman's name is handed about; he is said to be a man of quality, and an officer in the navy.

Admiralty-Office, O.S. 21, 1777.

Extract of a letter from Captain Hughes, of his Majesty's Ship Centaur, to Mr. Stephens, dated at sea, O.S. 16, 1777.

"I am to desire you will be pleased to inform my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, that on the 12th inst. I fell in with, and took an American schooner called the Betsey, from Nantz, bound to Edington, in North Carolina, laden with gunpowder, arms, tents and woollens, for the use of the rebel army, salt, and several other articles; the whole consigned to the Congress; and I have sent the said prize into the port of Plymouth, under the charge of the first lieutenant of the Centaur."

The long depending and much talked of question was agitated and determined, "Whether the Chamber of London shall discharge the debts Mr. Alderman Wilkes contracted in his mayoralty?" The arguments, as was to be expected, were carried on by the friends, and the avowed opposers of the Alderman, with all that zeal and heat of language with which party-matters in the city have those many years been disputed. Mr. Wilkes absented himself, and risked his cause in the hands of some very warm advocates. The question being put and seconded, "Whether the petition should lie upon the table?" The Lord Mayor declared the shew of hands to be in the affirmative; but a division being demanded by the friends of Mr. Wilkes, the avenues were cleared, and there appeared to be seven aldermen, seventy-one commoners, and the two tellers, to throw out the petition; and to negative the question, one alderman, seventy commoners, and ten tellers; so that there was a majority of seven against Mr. Wilkes. The aldermen who voted to lay the petition upon the table, were the Lord Mayor elect, Alsop, Kennett, Oliver, Hart, Pugh, and Clark. On the contrary, Mr. Alderman Buil.

23.] Arrived at Gloucester-house his Royal Highness the Duke of Gloucester, attended by the Dukes, and the rest of his train: his Highness appears to be in the most enfeebled state; notwithstanding which there are flattering appearances of his recovery. — Soon after the news arrived at the Queen's Palace, a Great Personage sent a message to enquire after his Highness's health, couched in terms of the most tender affection.

Extract of a letter from Dover, O.S. 22.

"Yesterday died here, on his way to Paris, Samuel Foote, Esq. He left London, as we are told, on Sunday, and when he arrived here he was taken ill; soon after which he was seized with an apoplectic fit, and never recovered. He was attended on his journey only by a menial servant. Immediately on his expiring, an express was dispatched to acquaint his friends with his death."

Mr. Foote has left the bulk of his fortune to his natural son, a child about seven years of age; but in case he should die before he arrives at the age of twenty-one, then his property is to go to Mr. Jewell, late treasurer of the Hay-market theatre, who is left executor.

25.] A commission passed the seal, giving full powers to Colonel Fawcett to treat with some of the German Princes, and to hire troops for the American service for next campaign.

29.] This morning a packet arrived from General Howe (but brought no officer) with dispatches from him, saying, that the army landed on the bank of the river Elke (near the top of Chelapeak Bay) on the 22d of August, in good health; that they marched, without opposition, to the Head of the Elke, about 55 miles from Philadelphia, and that General Washington, with 15,000 Continental troops, besides militia, &c. was advantageously posted but a few miles distant, covering the country, as well towards Lancaster as Philadelphia. His letter is dated from the Head of Elke, on the 30th of August, and contains no other particulars of moment.

A letter from Benjamin Franklin and Silas Deane, Esqrs. to Lord Stormont, the English Ambassador at Paris.

Paris, April 2, 1777.

"My Lord,

"We did ourselves the honour of writing some time ago to your Lordship on the subject of exchanging prisoners. You did not condescend to give us any answer, and therefore we expect none to this. We, however, take the liberty of sending you copies of certain depositions, which we shall transmit to Congress, whereby it will be known to your court, that the United States are not unacquainted with the barbarous treatment their people receive when they have the misfortune of being your prisoners here in Europe; and that if your conduct towards us is not altered, it is not unlikely that severe reprisals may be thought justifiable, from the necessity of putting some check to such abominable practices."

"For the sake of humanity it is to be wished, that men would endeavour to alleviate, as much as possible, the unavoidable miseries attending a state of war. It has been said, that among the civilized nations of Europe, the ancient horrors of that state are much diminished; but the compelling men by chains, stripes, and famine, to fight against their friends and relations, is a new mode of barbarity which your nation alone had the honour of inventing; and the sending American prisoners of war to Africa and Asia, remote from all probability of exchange, and where they can scarce hope ever to hear from their families, even if the unwholesomeness of the climate does not put a speedy end to their lives, is a manner of treating captives that you can justify by no other precedent or custom except that of the black savages of guinea. We are your Lordship's most obedient humble servants,

B. FRANKLIN, S. DEANE."

Lord Viscount Stormont.

To the above letter the following reply was made:

"The King's Ambassador receives no letters from rebels, except when they come to ask mercy."

Winchester, O.S. 11. On Wednesday evening last, as Mr. Thomas Holland, of Exton, blacksmith, was returning home from Soberton, he was met near his own house by two bloody ruffians, who knocked him from his horse, gave him him several cuts on the head, and took from him his hat and whip, and were proceeding to rob him of his money; but he making some resistance, they overpowered him, beat him in an unmerciful manner, cut his throat, and flung him into a ditch, where, by his piteous cry, he was discovered, but almost speechless; and as he was carrying home expired in great agonies. — A hue and cry immediately pursued the assassins, who were soon apprehended in a little alehouse all bloody, and with the deceased's hat on one of their heads, and whip in their custody. They were the next day carried before the Bench of Justices then sitting at Winchester, before whom they did not deny the fact, the bloody knife being found in their pockets; and they were accordingly committed to the county gaol, where they are ordered to be kept apart from each other, and separate from the rest of the prisoners.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

Cork, October 31.

THIS morning a dreadful fire broke out in the house of Mr. Peter Eagan, cooper, in Morrison's Island, which in a few hours entirely consumed his concerns, in which were upwards of 1200 barrels, 200 tierces, a large quantity of timber, staves, hoops, and other cooper's materials; his house and furniture, though not consumed, were torn in pieces in the confusion attendant on such occasions. The rapidity of the flames was so violent, that notwithstanding every assistance of the engines, and the exertion of the chief magistrate, sheriffs, the military, and the public in general, who were all particularly active, they could only prevent the fire's communication with the adjacent buildings. This melancholy accident has reduced to ashes the property of an honest and industrious young man. The fire was occasioned by the flue of a chimney bursting.

Cork, November 3. In the garden of Thomas Walton, of Walton's-Court, Esq; a potatoe happened accidentally to fall into an onion-bed; it, a few days ago produced 50, which weighed 27lb. This extraordinary produce was allowed to be owing to the richness of the soil, and keeping the ground earthed.

Yesterday morning the body of a new-born infant was found murdered in a shocking manner, in a field near the Red Horse Walk. It is supposed to have been served so by an inhuman parent.

MONDAY last came on at Instigoe, the election of members to represent that borough in parliament; in the room of Edward Tighe and John Lloyd, Esqrs. who vacated their seats for that borough, on their having made their elections for other places; when John Flood and John Parnell, Esqrs. were unanimously elected.

DUBLIN.

King's Bench, November 7, 1777.

THIS day Mr. serjeant Wood moved the court for an information against Patrick Duignan, L. L. D. at the suit of the new Secretary of State, and now provost of Trinity College. — Mr. Wood stated from the affidavits all the offensive words in a book said to be written by Dr. Duignan against Mr. Hutchinson, which book is dedicated to the king, and entitled, "Lachrymæ Academicæ; The Tears of the College." The court granted an information, unless cause, which is almost a rule of course.

Same day Mr. Yelverton, on the part of the king, at the prosecution of Arthur Brown against the printer of the Hibernian Journal, applied to the court in order to put off the trial of an information depending in this cause from Monday the 10th to another day. This was opposed by Mr. Sheridan, on behalf of the printer, as a grievance to his client, whose council were prepared, and that it would put the defendant to additional expence in retelling his lawyers.

The court put off the trial to the day following, Tuesday the 11th.

Mr. Yelverton then mentioned that the theffs had returned only 126 Freeholders, out of which list the special jury was to be struck.

Mr. Fitzgibbon said it seemed very extraordinary that Mr. Brown, the prosecutor, should conceive, that out of 126 Freeholders of the city of Dublin, twelve honest men could not be found to try his information.

Mr. Justice Robinson said, the court are not to guess at the number of freeholders in this city;—there is no affidavit, and there ought to be no rule.

Mr. Fitzgibbon moved for two criminal informations against two persons of the name of Myers, filed in the affidavit Mafons; the one for sending, and the other for bearing a challenge to Duigoan; the court granted a rule to shew cause.

It is said, that in consideration of the evils consequent on the number of brothels, and street-walking prostitutes, some worthy members of parliament, intend this next session, to propose a law for putting them under some prudent regulations.—In Leghorn, there is a particular number of brothels licensed by the state, which pay annually a large tax for the privilege of being infamous; and are obliged to so circumspect a behaviour, that neither ignorance nor intoxication can expose a guest to any ill treatment; but that his purse and his person are as secure as if he were in his own house.—Stipulated prices are fixed by the government for the usual hire of beauty: and surgeons of eminence appointed to visit these places constantly, and examine into the health of the residents. By this prudent regulation, an infinite number of robberies and murders are prevented, and all thole diseases in a manner cut off, that, among us, daily mangle such multitudes, and hand down a complication of fatal distempers to posterity.

A few days ago, a man who lives in St. Michan's parish was summoned to the court of conscience by a pastry-cook in High-street; when the parties appeared before the president, the plaintiff alleged that he had suffered a loss of two shillings worth of tarts, devoured by a goat belonging to the defendant, which had come into his cellar, and artfully taking an opportunity, had committed this depredation on his goods. The defendant replied, that it was possible his goat might have done this, but if so, the plaintiff had taken his full satisfaction by the cruel usage he gave the poor animal, whose ears he cropped, and cut and houghed him in such a manner that he was languishing under the wounds, and immediately produced the mangled object of the pastry-cook's brutality. Alderman Bevan, after making the defendant declare upon oath the value of his goat, which he swore to be six shillings, ordered the pastry-cook to pay him that amount, and to take the goat and make pyes of it if he thought fit: he paid the money, but with indignation refused taking the goat, lest it should be thought he would convert him to such a use, and thus hurt the reputation of his pyes.

A correspondent observes, that of all the national and commercial subjects, none demands attention more than the state of the fishery on the North West coast of this kingdom, which (notwithstanding the extraordinary encouragement it has met from parliamentary bounties) does not increase in a proportion sufficient to answer our demand; and we are indebted to Cottenburgh, and other ports in the East Country, for so considerable a part of our supply, that the duty on foreign herrings imported in the year ending Lady-Day 1777, was 2841*l.* which exceeded that of the preceding year 674*l.* as the duty paid therein was only 1167*l.* An extraordinary fact; certainly worthy of investigation is, that from Sweden, where no such munificent bounties are given to encourage the fishery, a merchant can import herrings, running the risk of a navigation equal to a West-India voyage, into Ireland, the coast of which abound with inexhaustible Myriads of the same fish, and there under sell the natives. This incontrovertible truth would almost persuade one, that indolence and poverty had for ever taken up their abode in this infatuated island.

Robert Wilson, Esq; committed to Kilmainham goal, one Patrick Manning an old offender, against whom there were also bills of indictment found last sessions, for riotously assembling with many others at the Naul, and violently assaulting Mr. C. Spence, a surveyor of excise, whom they way-laid with an intent to murder; a crime too frequently practised of late, and deserving the particular notice of the legislature.

Several people were robbed on the road leading from Sligo to Ballyshannon, by three men, whose names were Clarke, Tute, and Dalton, very fortunately a stop was put to their career by attempting to rob a poor man, who making some resistance, one of them discharged a pistol which happily missed him, but broke Dalton's thigh bone, the thigh was obliged to be cut off, and he now lies dangerously ill in the barrack of Sligo; the other two are in jail, Tute has turned king's evidence.

Between the hours of nine and ten at night the tide being full in, a post-chaise boy belonging to Mr. Torington, went to water his horses at the watering place in Barrack-street; the great descent from the piers to the water forced the horses out of their depth, and instead of returning back made towards the piles; the horses being entangled in the harness were immediately drowned, and the boy with much difficulty escaped by getting on the roof of the carriage.

The worshipful the lord mayor, sheriffs, aldermen, and common council, of the county of the town of Drogheda, having unanimously voted the freedom of said town, in an elegant silver box, unto Lambert Brabazon, Esq; of his majesty's navy, in consideration of his intrepid and attentive conduct, in protecting the trade and commerce of this kingdom, while the coast was infested with American privateers; and at request of their corporation, William Mead Ogle, Esq; one of their representatives in parliament, on Tuesday last delivered lieutenant Brabazon this distinguished mark of their approbation.

And the principal merchants of the city of Dublin

Dublin have presented by their representative, Dr. William Clement, a memorial to his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant, representing the spirited and active conduct of lieutenant Brabazon, and the essential service rendered by him to the commercial and trading interest of this kingdom, and in particular to the merchant of this city, praying that their representation be laid before his majesty, that this officer might receive a reward equal to his merit and services; we cannot but conclude, with our sincere wish, that such meritorious and gallant officers may receive promotion due to their deserts, and that in this instance, the request of the people may for once supersede parliamentary influence, and the sunshine of court favour and interest.

The bill now in its progress, "to authorise for a limited time the punishment by hard labour of offenders who are or shall become liable to be transported to any of his majesty's colonies and plantations," enacts among other particulars, that those convicts that shall be ordered to hard labour in the river Liffey, or Dublin harbour, shall be employed to dig, raise, and take up the gravel, sand, and soil from the shelves and sand banks in said river and harbour, and in discharging the same upon the shore; but are to be in no case employed in delivering ballast to ships: that they are to be fed with bread, and any coarse or inferior food, and water or small beer, and to be clothed; and not to be permitted to have any other food, drink, or cloathing, but such as shall be allotted them: that the overseers shall be authorised to punish by whipping, or other moderate punishment, such of the convicts as shall refuse to work, or otherwise misbehave themselves: that at the end of the term they shall be adjudged to suffer the punishment of hard labour, or sooner if it appears from their industry and good behaviour they be found deserving the royal mercy, they shall be restored to liberty, decent cloathing given them, and a certain sum in money: that houses of correction shall be established in different parts of the country for like purposes: any offender that shall break prison, or escape from the place of confinement, shall, upon conviction, for the first offence, have the term of their confinement doubled, and for the second suffer death: that physicians shall be paid salaries to attend said places of confinement, as also the several gaols in the kingdom.

The last Chester fair, called the October one, the Irish liness, particularly the low-priced, sold reasonably well, and much more would have been sold had they been at market. The scarcity of liness at this time was occasioned by the indifferent sale the liness met with there at the July sale.

As the funeral of a citizen passed in melancholy pomp along George's-quay, a woman, after viewing the sad procession with a fixed attention for some moments, went up to one of the conductors, and giving him a key, desired him, when the funeral was over, to go to a certain house in Abbey-street, (the number of which she gave him) and describing a room therein, desired he would open a box he would see in it, where he would find sufficient to defray the expence of burying her in a decent manner; she did not wait for a reply, but running to the water side, threw herself into the flood; she was taken up without other damage than dripping cloaths.

The new regulations in respect to keeping the Sabbath-day more holy than heretofore, reflect great honour on the Lord-Mayor, and all who enforce them. Yet there are people so lost to every sense but that of interest, who dare to find fault with an obedience to the laws of God and their country. Dram-shops and tippling houses had rather have an universal drunkenness and depravation of morals, than they should sell one naggin of whiskey the less. The only plea that can be made, with any degree of reason, against shutting up butchers, and other shops, on Sunday is, that many poor workmen are not paid their week's wages till too late on Saturday night to furnish their families. But this may be easily obviated, by journeymen refusing to work for any master who will not pay them at a reasonable hour: combinations are frequently entered into for unworthy purposes, but for this it would be laudable, and nobody could find fault with an obedience to the great law, Remember, thou keep holy the Sabbath-day.

It may be proper to acquaint the public, that by law every person has authority to kill any swine which he finds at large, roving about the streets of this metropolis, without the owners being able to procure any redress or satisfaction. If this was properly attended to, that shameful nuisance would be speedily suppressed, as he who had once lost one of his swine, would be careful to keep up the rest of his flock from being troublesome to the public.

The best means of preventing the number of robberies, which now spread terror throughout this city, and detect offenders, would be for a vestry to be held in every parish, and all the reputable inhabitants to join in an association for a patrol from dark, till 12 o'clock. No citizen would refuse to join in it, and in many parishes it would not come to the turn of an inhabitant above once a month; for ten or twelve persons well armed, would form a sufficient patrol; and if every housekeeper would subscribe but half a crown, it would constitute, in each parish, a sufficient fund for rewards for apprehending robbers in that district.

Some time ago, the public were amused with an account from port St Louis, in the province of Brittany, in France, concerning a galley slave, who had been condemned to death for murder, but was promised life, liberty, and a considerable reward, on condition of suffering himself to be dressed in a certain apparatus, and pushed off the top of a building 70 feet high, for the purpose of ascertaining the powers of the air, in supporting a superincumbent weight. A farther experiment, with some improvements, was to be made, last Michaelmas-day, in presence of many persons of the first distinction. A correspondent, who is extremely curious in every branch of mechanics and natural philosophy, having written to a friend at Nantz, relative to this affair, received the following account:

"That the slave in question, whose name is Dominic

Dominic Balfour, aged about 24 years, on the morning of the 29th ult. ascended to the leads of the arsenal, 145 feet from the terras of the esplanade, dressed in a suit of feathered tissue, somewhat different from that formerly described, accompanied by the Duke D'Aguillon, governor of Brittany, the Abbe De Fleury, and the King's professor of mathematics in the academy of Rennes. A strong cephalic cordial being given him, he was pushed very gently off the parapet of the building, in sight of more than 10,000 spectators, and after fluttering a moment, in a brisk wind, began to descend in a steady, uniform manner, at the distance of about ten feet from the wall of the tower, amidst the acclamations of the people, whose joy, for his success, would have been immoderate, if not checked by some anxiety for the event, which soon relieved them; for the successful convict alighted on his feet in perfect safety, being exactly two minutes, and 13 seconds, in his descent. He was immediately let blood and conducted through the principal streets, with drums and trumpets, to the town-hall; where the magistrates gave a splendid dinner to many nobility and others, who came from all parts of the country to behold so extraordinary a sight. A handsome collection was made by the company, and the prisoner released, with a certificate of his performance, to intitle him to his majesty's bounty, and most gracious pardon, with which he set off next day for Paris. Mr. De Fontagne, who is the original designer of this invention, has applied for an exclusive patent for his natural life, as such an apparatus may be invaluable in cases of sudden accident, particularly fire, for which purpose it was chiefly intended."

The Provost prison near the Postern Gate in the Lower Castle-yard is taken down, as also the Provost master's house adjoining to it. No building is to be erected in their place, but the site of the gate there is to be changed by walling up the present and opening another opposite to Little Ship-street; this entrance will be built of hewn stone, and correspond in grandeur of its architectural design with the gates leading to Dame-street and Cork-hill. The board of works have also given orders for a number of large lamps with suitable burners to be fixed at small distances from the mews to the new gate, and a man is to be employed to sweep the Lower Castle-yard; so that in future this place will not vie in dirt and darkness with the most neglected parts of Dublin.

On Thursday the 15th November, his Grace the lord Primate relinquished his claim to the great living of Benburb, which has again returned to the college; and the day after a board was held to dispose of it, when Dr. Leland, who is first in seniority, refused to accept of it. This may seem an extraordinary step to the public, when it is considered, that the income of a senior fellowship falls short of 700l. a year, whereas the living now vacant exceeds 10 cl. But those who are acquainted with the present state of the college, and importance of Dr. Leland at the board will be at no great loss to account for this instance of his conduct. Mr. Andrews, whose infirm state of health has obliged him for some years past to reside in Bath, is next in seniority, and his determination is hourly expected. Should he also decline it, it is much to be feared that either Dr. Murray or Dr. Kearney will go our, which at this particular time would be an irretrievable loss to the University.

HIBERNIAN MAGAZINE:

O R,

Compendium of Entertaining Knowledge,

For D E C E M B E R, 1777.

Willing to oblige our Readers, by furnishing them with the Portraits of remarkable or illustrious Persons, we have procured an elegant Engraving of George Ogle, Esq; Representative for the County of Wexford, being certain the Picture of a Gentleman, who is an Ornament to his Country, will be acceptable to all.

Further Memoirs of the late Samuel Foote, Esquire.

To the Editor of the Hibernian Magazine.

S I R,

IN your last you gave some memoirs of the late Mr. Foote, which were, I believe, strictly true, but probably for want of time or room, you omitted some anecdotes of his life which your readers may be curious to be made acquainted with. I have, therefore, transmitted you the inclosed for your next number, and have selected some of his most remarkable bons mots that have not appeared in print.

Foote more than once proposed writing his own memoirs, and had actually made some progress in them at the time of his death; but he said it was so difficult to divest himself of impartiality on the one hand, and so mortifying to tell all the truths (considering the number of follies he had been guilty of) on the other, that he would leave the task to some other pen, which would, probably, do him more justice than he could do himself.

When he began to give his mimic exhibitions at the Hay-Market, first under the title of Diversions in the Morning, and then Tea (to evade the necessity of being licensed by the lord chamberlain) the principal objects of his ridicule were Dr. Taylor, the oculist, Dr. Lawton, a gentleman remarkable for his affectation and pedantry, Mr. Cock, the auctioneer, and many of the actors. Several of these gentlemen were so blind to their own foibles that they could not discover their own portraits, though every feature was pencilled in the most striking colours.

Among a variety of extraordinary plans which constantly filled the head of Sam, he resolved to turn small-beer brewer, and actually entered into partnership with Mr. Price, who was in that business. Foote puffed off his small beer so well to the nobility, that it became as much in vogue as Mrs. Allen's claret. He soon, however, quarrelled with his partner upon the small beer turning sour, and lost his credit as the greatest puffer and small beer brewer in Europe.

Besides Foote's dramatic productions, which he brought upon the stage as originals, he translated a collection of French plays, and prefixed his name to them.— This free translation had considerable merit, as he entered into the true spirit of their authors, and conveyed their ideas in a masterly manner in English.

His strict intimacy with the late Sir Francis Delaval, rendered him his constant companion in all his parties, and Frank consulted him upon most occasions. When Frank Delaval gave that celebrated performance at Drury-lane theatre (which Mr. Garrick complimented him with upon the occasion) Mr. Foote, with

Mr. Macklin, had the casting of the parts, and the instructing of the actors.—Frank Delaval performed Othello, and gained great applause in that part; but his brother, now Sir John Delaval, surpassed the most sanguine expectations of his friends, in the character of Iago. The other parts were also very well filled by gentlemen who had never performed upon any stage, and the late Mrs. Quarme (sister to Miss Roche, now lady Echlin) appeared in Desdemona, greatly to the satisfaction of the most brilliant audience that ever assisted at one time in any theatre; for as the tickets which were distributed did not specify any particular seat, as many stars and ribbons were seen among the gods as in the boxes. In a word, almost every person of rank and quality in the metropolis were present upon the occasion, and promiscuously seated. Considerable sums were offered for tickets, but it is believed none were sold, as no more were printed than would conveniently fill the house.

About the year 1752 a party was formed to make a voyage up the Mediterranean.—It was to have consisted of the late Sir Richard Atkins, Fanny M——y, Frank Delaval, Miss Roche, Zachary Moore, Mr. Foote, Jemmy Worrdale, Captain Stephens, and several other geniuses.—A yacht was accordingly built, at the joint expence of Sir Richard and Mr. Delaval.—It was equally elegant and convenient, there being every accommodation that could be suggested. It was launched at Deptford, in the presence of numerous spectators, and the party who were to sail attended, when a very elegant repast was provided, and a band of music. It were needless to say that the bottle circulated very briskly, and at every toast being drunk, there was a discharge from the yacht of six guns, which was re-echoed from the shore by six more. The evening passed in great harmony and conviviality, and concluded with a ball, which continued till morning.

All the guests were so elated with their intended expedition, the elegance and accommodations of the yacht, and the agreeableness of the party, that they were emulous to outvie each other in their preparations for the voyage. In less than a week every member of this sans-fouci society was prepared, and had shipped their baggage. Even the wine, and provisions in great abundance, live and dead, were put on board; two eminent cooks and a celebrated confectioner were engaged, as was a band of music, and several excellent vocal performers.

It was the general report at that time in the gay circles, that Frank Delaval, a genius of a very enterprising disposition, proposed going to Corsica, and offering himself a candidate for that throne. It is certain that several Corsicans of the first rank, who were then in England, had frequent conferences with him, and were to return to their native isle on board this new built yacht. It was, indeed, said that most of his household officers were appointed, and were going with his (intended) majesty, and that captain S——s, who had been very serviceable to him upon many occasions, was nominated to the post of master of the horse.

But how transitory are the events of this world!—At this very critical juncture, when there was such a glorious perspective of pleasure, and the gratification of almost unlimited ambition, Sir Richard Atkins was carried off with a violent fever. The whole project was laid aside, the yacht was sold, the provisions given to the poor, the cooks, confectioner, and musicians were dismissed, and sung small indeed!

Foote's mother was sister to the late Sir Dinely Goodere, and heiress to the Dinely and also the Goodere family.

Upon the demise of her brother, she became possessed of a very capital fortune, which our hero, after having squandered his own, took special care to dispose of.—By this liberality in favour of her son, many years before his decease, she was compelled, from her distressed circumstances, and the many debts she had created, to keep within the jurisdiction of the board of green cloth. It must, however, be acknowledged that when his affairs began to wear a more favourable aspect, he not only visited, but made her an annual allowance. He had likewise made a provision for her in his will, which was drawn up before her death.

Some years ago, when he was in Dublin, he took off upon that stage the celebrated printer, George Faulkner, so famous for his whims and singularities.—The picture was so striking that every one knew it, and George Faulkner became the subject of such universal ridicule, that he could not walk the streets, or even stand at his own door, without being insulted. This so much irritated Faulkner, that he commenced an action against Foote, and considerable damages were awarded him. This induced Foote to decamp à la fourdine, and return to England, where, however, the severity of his satire, so far from being blunted, was by this judicial sentence, sharpened so keen, that he neither spared George Faulkner nor his counsel, whom Foote rendered truly ridiculous.

When

When he had the misfortune of breaking his leg, by being thrown from his horse [and which proving a compound fracture, it became necessary to submit to amputation above the knee, in order that he might avail himself of an artificial leg to resemble nature] he was upon a visit at lord Mexborough's country seat. Assistance was immediately sent for to London, and Mr. Bromfield, with another surgical gentleman, went down to him, and performed the operation, when the fortitude Mr. Foote testified upon the occasion, greatly astonished all present.

During the night after the operation had been performed, from some accident the wound began to bleed afresh. There was no assistance at hand, and the consequence must have been fatal if Mr. Foote had not had the presence of mind to recollect that sponge would be the most proper application to stop the oozing, but where to get any at that time in the morning was the difficulty. In this very desperate dilemma it occurred to him that he had in his portmanteau a tooth-brush, one end of which had sponge to it, and by this lucky thought, and so trifling an object, the bleeding was stopped.

About six years ago he went to Edinburgh, to play for one winter, and met with much applause, the receipts of the theatre having never before been so great as that year; he, nevertheless, was not induced to repeat his journey to Scotland, but has since visited Ireland, where he has constantly been received in the most cordial manner.

The malicious prosecution that was commenced against him some time ago by his servant, was the chief inducement for disposing of his theatre to Mr. Colman, fearful that the town might receive some unfavourable impressions from the daring accusation brought against him. But the generous public received him with their wonted candour and applause.

Foote's life was chequered with a variety of vicissitudes. At one time he was disposing of his side board of plate for a song, to preserve himself from a gaol; at another he was driving his duns, as they had drove him; alternately, in a spunging house and a drawing-room. To-day messing with bailiffs followers upon leg of beef, to-morrow assisting at the table of the first nobleman in England. He had such amazing spirits, that no misfortunes, however great, could damp them. Even the loss of his leg did not seem to affect him, and he would be jocular with his friends upon the occasion, whilst they were lamenting the melancholy accident.

He was certainly one of the most facetious companions that ever existed; he was also a man of learning and clear judgment, and could enter into the most serious disquisition the moment after he had been setting the table in a roar with his wit and pleasantry.

New Character of the Earl of Bute, and the late George Grenville, from the Independent Whig's Address to the People of England, just published.

Reign of George the Third.

THE earl of Bute first took the lead in this reign. He was short and decisive in his operations. He insulted and displaced the good old duke of Newcastle, the virtuous Cavendish, and the pride of Englishmen—Mr. Pitt; and he swept the Whigs and their connections, from every department high and low of the state.—This he did without the least management, with most indecent expedition, without the least attention to the memory of king George the second (thus wounded through his ancient and faithful servants), or to the character of his royal master. And after making this trial of your temper, he relinquished the public ostensible direction of affairs to George Grenville, who was appointed to the treasury, and was understood to lead the king's councils, under the secret controul of lord Bute. Of Mr. Grenville much hath been said. Many have represented him as a minister of uncommon ability, and even some of those * who approved not his measures, have al-

N O T E.

* An ingenious writer, Mr. E. B. who had sufficient opportunities of knowing his character, hath represented it in a very favourable light, at least hath shaded its material defects, in one of his speeches which hath been given to the public, and which, like all the works of that great master, hath been much admired. They acted for some time in opposite parties, each of which treated the other with much asperity. The injudicious measures of administration subsequent to lord Rockingham's time at the treasury, drove these parties to seek their mutual defence in an union. Connections in party beget strong attachments; and no doubt Mr. G's parliamentary weight and ability, as a member of opposition, contributed a little to erase from Mr. B's mind the impression which his conduct in administration had made upon it. For the rest, his memory must stand indebted to Mr. B's indulgence and forgiveness.

lowed him much merit. For my part, speaking my mind honestly to you, I see not the least cause for either opinion. Never, as I think, did man shew less capacity for, or fall more miserably short of the situation in which he stood, and the duty which lay before him. Without perceiving the happy opportunity that the nation then had; without taking into view the various affairs of the empire, and from thence forming and pursuing a system of conduct which would have led to power and glory not equalled in the records of the world, he sat down to your business as if he had been about to adjust and regulate the affairs of a trifling corporation. In no one measure of his administration did he shew any thing like comprehension of understanding, or enlargement of mind. When he should have been raising a mighty empire upon the foundation which he had before him, increasing its people, and extending its commerce upon great and liberal plans, he was fretting and fatiguing himself in, and giving up all, his time and attention, and directing all the operations of government to the suppression of a little smuggling, the bringing a few thousand pounds a year into the exchequer from America, and the gratifying the court's resentment against an individual who had abused lord Bute, and first proclaimed his designs to the public. Such were the mighty objects of this mighty minister. Bounded in his views, and intirely attached to forms, his little technical mind was just calculated to see that America did not contribute to the public burdens of the nation in one particular mode of revenue, and utterly incapable of perceiving that the colonies, in the way in which they had been managed, had been the great source of our wealth, and brought this country from what it was at the discovery of the new world, to the point of glory at which we have seen it.—He was the first man in public authority in this kingdom, who, by his conversation and conduct, insinuated into your minds a jealousy of your brethren in America, and who, when there was the greatest need of concord and union for all great national purposes, when every knot by which the two countries were held together, should have been pulled as close as possible, began to break the bonds asunder. We all, my countrymen, remember too well the language of that unfortunate day, when the stamp act was passed. Fatally did he lose sight of the absolute submission in which we held the labour and industry of the inhabitants of that extensive country, by the navigation act, and the whole system of our trade laws, then quietly and universally acquiesced in and he was willing to put the whole to hazard, and stake the intire authority of your legislature, for a paltry parliamentary duty. I will not say that the authority actually exercised before the date of the stamp act, by your parliament over America, was not reconcilable to reason.—I will not say that to tie the hands of the inhabitants of a great continent, abounding with raw materials, to restrain them from using the gifts of nature, and to force them to take the products of your own labour, was sacrificing that continent to this little island; but this I will say, whether such a power grew up accidentally, or was the fruit of design, the wit of man could not have devised one more extensive, or one that so effectually answered the ends of this powerful and commercial state.

For the government of Canada, that extensive country, acquired by the peace, no solid plan of improvement or establishment appeared. Every thing there was left to operate as it might. The only act of government that administration put forth relative to that country was, the proclamation, since so shamefully falsified by that authority which ought to have been its defender and vindicator. Nor did the limited spirit of the minister appear more conspicuously in any part of his conduct than in the use made of the desert islands acquired in the West Indies, and known by the name of the Ceded Islands. Instead of copying the laudable example shewn by the French in their sugar settlements, where the governor is authorized to appropriate a moderate portion of land to every individual who comes in, adapted to his circumstances and means of cultivation, without reserving even a quit rent, or putting the planter to the expence of a grant; these desert lands too were to bring their pepper corn, to which every proper and rational purpose of government was sacrificed by this sordid financier.

These are some of the great delinquencies of Mr. Grenville, whom I am yet far from charging with a criminal intention to injure his country. My objections go intirely to his want of penetration, capacity and genius for the situation in which he was placed; and surely if ever a minister was deficient in these capital points of qualification, Mr. Grenville was the man. Whatever he was, he pointed out the high road, which others, with worse intentions, were looking for, to the destruction of our country. If the project of imposing a trifling tax upon America had not taken possession of the obstinate mind of this weak man, we had still called America our own.

An Impartial Sketch of the Characters of the present King and Queen of France.

THE queen of France is in her person what the English people of fashion would call a fine showy woman, rather than an elegant genteel figure; yet upon the whole, every man would at first view proclaim her a lovely woman; and her taste in dress is so very refined, that it makes amends for any defect in the gentility of her person. Whatever fashion she sets is so becoming and graceful, that it is universally followed by all the fine women in France; not because it is the queen's, but on account of her superior judgment in female attire.

The fashion of wearing feathers, which soon flew over to England, owes its origin to the queen of France, who one day finding some peacock's feathers on her toilette, which had been placed there accidentally, being designed to decorate some curious work, in her usual vein of vivacity she stuck one upon her head; pleased with the effect, she adjusted a second, and then demanded small ostrich feathers; in short, before she quitted her dressing-room, by a beautiful arrangement of these feathers with artificial flowers and jewels, she astonished her attendants. The king admired this new fancy at first sight, and declared it was the prettiest ornament he had ever beheld on a lady's head: the queen continued improving on the plan daily, and the fashion spread through the kingdom. This amiable princess possesses good natural abilities, which have been cultivated with great care by her illustrious mother, the empress dowager of Germany, a lady who formerly possessed very great political talents, and no small share of ambition, but is now sunk into the arms of bigotry. Instructed by her how, at less expence and trouble, to captivate and win the affections of her subjects, she might be universally beloved, if she was not too young and too giddy to attend to these maxims: she sometimes indeed condescends to take notice of, and relieve objects in misery of the lowest classes; but she does not render herself so generally popular, as good policy seems to require.

Blessed with a great flow of spirits, and a warm inclination for all the public pleasures and elegancies of life attendant upon her elevated situation, to contemplate her as queen of the gayest kingdom of Europe, one would imagine she was the happiest of her sex, especially as the queens of France do not shut themselves up, and think no subject worthy of unbending with in private; they are permitted to lay aside the trappings of majesty, and to be on a friendly footing with persons of high rank of both sexes. But all the pleasures that surround her cannot compensate for two severe mortifications she undergoes: the one of a private, the other of a public nature.

The king is by no means what we should call a fond admirer of the sex; he has a down cast look, and is totally destitute of that vivacity which characterises his countrymen, and this may probably proceed from discontent and want of resolution, for it is said he labours under a bodily infirmity, which will prevent his being a father if he persists in refusing, as has hitherto been the case, to undergo a trifling chirurgical operation attended with as little hazard as that of inoculation. This private misfortune must be sufficiently mortifying, especially if the ancient custom of France was to be adhered to with rigour; that is, to send back their queens to their native countries, if, after ten years cohabitation, they had no children. In the present case, it would be manifestly unjust, but regal policy does not always follow the line of moral rectitude.

But to the daughter of such a mother disappointed ambition must be the deepest of all mortifications, and this the poor queen of France experiences in a degree unknown to her predecessors.

France for many ages has been governed by her queens, or by the mistresses of her kings: yet the present monarch, a man, to judge by appearances, the most liable to be controuled in every respect, is proof against every address of the queen, and of a powerful party, who have in vain exerted every effort to establish her authority in state affairs. She has feigned sickness and depression of spirits: her physicians have told the king, that something lay heavy upon her mind, but though he guessed the cause, yet upon every hint of the remedy, he silences the suitors, by declaring that he is well satisfied with his ministry, and desiring the queen to interfere only in her own department. This being their situation, as the king cannot govern her, nor she the kingdom, it will readily be conceived that politeness, rather than affection, makes them live upon good terms with each other.

What remains of the king's character may be comprised in a few words. He is a very honest well-meaning man, of a religious turn of mind; averse to war, and all acts of cruelty; very desirous of rendering his kingdom great, by making his subjects happy. He employs many hours of the day on state affairs; and I have seen a warrant only to seize the person of an invalid soldier on duty near the Pyrenean

The King against Horne for a Libel.

ON Wednesday morning, Nov. 19, between ten and eleven o'clock, the Rev. Mr. Horne attended the court of king's bench, agreeable to a notice issued by the attorney-general.

The several documents being read necessary to substantiate the charge against him, and the grounds of his conviction being then stated to the court, the attorney-general prayed judgment in behalf of the crown. Lord Mansfield was about to pronounce the sentence, when Mr. Horne entreated the attention of the court to a matter which he should urge, in arrest of judgment. He grounded his motion on the following arguments :

First, That the information, on which he had been tried, did not specifically charge him with any crime. That the whole of the charge was of a constructive nature. But it was an established maxim in law, that indictments and informations should expressly set forth the nature of the crime, as not to leave any thing to the construction of the court. In the present case, Mr. Horne contended that there had not been any thing averred in the information which could amount to a crimination ; he was only charged with having printed and published, or caused to be printed and published, a certain advertisement, which had been deemed a libel. This was the act charged. The guilt, or innocence of a paper deemed a libel, depended on construction. Not any thing of guilt being charged in the information, the conviction might reasonably be supposed a mistake of the jury, which the judges, as guardians of the law, would rectify.

The attorney-general, in reply, confessed he expected a very different kind of argument would have been insisted on by the defendant. To say that not any thing like a criminal charge had been averred in the information, was surely to be attributed to a perversion of the understanding. The charge was too obvious to be mistaken. The information did not merely set forth that the defendant had printed and published a paper, but that he had printed and published a false, scandalous, and seditious libel, which set forth, 'That the king's troops, employed by government, had murdered our American brethren, for no other reason than because they had been faithful to the character of Englishmen, in preferring death to slavery.' Of such an act the defendant had been found guilty. The information had charged him with it. The crime had been substantiated by the verdict of a jury. The exception was now, therefore, improper in point of time, and frivolous in point of weight. So frivolous, that the attorney-general expected the defendant would have rested his motion on a very different ground. He expected to have heard it contended, that the libel was not of the nature which it had been stated to be in the information. That it was not false. That it was not scandalous. That it was not seditious. That government had not been maligned, nor the king's troops charged with having committed murder. Those were the propositions he expected. And the argument in support of them he was well prepared to answer. Nor any thing which bore the smallest affinity to such arguments having fallen from the lips of the defendant, the attorney-general repeated his prayer that the court would proceed to judgment.

Mr. Horne in reply observed, that, however the expectations of the attorney-general might have been excited, he would answer for it that his wishes had not kept pace with them. Mr. attorney-general might expect it to be proved that the advertisement was neither false, scandalous, nor seditious. But he could not wish for such proof. It would entirely defeat the design of the prosecution. The attorney-general had therefore spared him the trouble of advancing such arguments with effect, by not chusing to combat them on the trial. The crown officer had also been extremely obliging in another respect. He had not perplexed the business with cases and precedents. Nor had he enlivened the dulness of the argument by either his oratory or his wit. Both Mr. attorney-general might possess. But he had not chosen to make a display of either. It was so much the more for the advantage of the defendant to have the cause thus simplified, and reduced to a point which common sense could easily comprehend. Happily there was a case in point so applicable to that of the defendant, that merely to read it would serve in the place of a laboured argument. It was the case of Lord Russell. That nobleman was charged with a design 'to seize the king's guards,' as a means to effect his purpose. The opinion of judge Atkins on the case was this, 'that the words king's guards' were too loose and indeterminate. That the law knew not of any such persons. The love and good-will of subjects had frequently been styled, 'the king's guards.' The judges had been also called 'guards of the king.' To charge lord Russell with a design to seize the king's guards, without specifying what, or whom were meant by the terms, was too indefinite a style of averment to be admitted in an indictment.

Mr. Horne hinted the applicability of this case. Who were the 'king's troops,' alluded alluded to in the information? They had not been defined. But, admitting that they had, was it physically impossible that any of the king's troops should commit murder?

As to the epithet of 'libel,' so frequently adopted by Mr. attorney-general, what was a libel? Was the word technically descriptive? By the court of king's bench the act of 'sending a wooden gun' to a man had been deemed a libel. As in the case of Thicknesse, who was sentenced for the libel of sending a wooden gun to lord Orwell. The language about libels was only the jargon of uncertainty.

The words 'of,' 'concerning,' as they stood in the information, were strongly objected to by Mr. Horne on account of their legal informality. The word 'concerning' meant seeing together, and was applicable to persons who participated, at the same time, in the sight of a thing. In this, which was the only sense of the word, it was not applied in the information. And, if the meaning of one word might be tortured, that of many might be misapplied. A charge could only be specified by the most rigid attention to the meaning of words.

Mr. Horne expressed an hope that these observations would have weight with the court. He considered them to be of validity. And therefore it was that he had urged them as sufficient to render the prayer of the Attorney-general for judgment nugatory.

Lord Mansfield with the greatest moderation imaginable observed, that even if there were any thing indefinite in the terms 'king's troops,' abstractedly considered; yet the information had stated those troops to have been employed by government. This was a sufficient specification. On the other hand there appeared weight in the objections sufficient to induce the court to hear the matter argued without prejudice. There might be errors in the information. If such should be the case, the defendant was entitled to the benefit. The facts charged in the several counts of the information had been clearly proved. The deposition of the money in the hands of a banker for Dr. Franklin; the hand-writing of the defendant; the delivery of the advertisement to the printers; the merit of the objections urged by the defendant only remained to be considered.

Lord Mansfield then proposed, that Mr. Horne should be committed, and brought up on Monday next.

Mr. Horne then proposed this question: 'Will your lordships commit me before I am legally convicted?'

The commitment was dropped. Mr. Horne is to attend on Monday morning, when his objections in arrest of judgment will be argued.

Mr. Horne's conduct was cool, sensible, and manly. His arguments were well delivered, and he did not, as upon his trial, use any asperity or unbecoming warmth of language.

Decision of the court of king's bench in the Case of Mr. Horne.

Monday, November 24, about 11 in the morning, the Earl of Mansfield, with the judges Aston, Willes, and Ashurst, came into court. Mr. Horne entered at the same time, accompanied by his attorney, and stood before the bench. After a few minutes spent in clearing the court, Mr. Solicitor-general and Mr. Attorney-general took their seats.

Lord Mansfield then, holding a paper in his hand, observed that the defendant had urged on Wednesday last, as a plea of defence, an affidavit made by a captain Gould relative to the engagements between his majesty's troops and the Americans at Lexington and Concord, which was published some time ago in the Public Advertiser, and was intended in some sort to give authority to Mr. Horne's advertisement respecting that affair, which were the grounds of the Attorney-general's prosecution; and his lordship, having omitted it in his notes, thought proper to read it then in court.

After reading the affidavit, his lordship acquainted Mr. Horne, that, having duly weighed the merits of his motion in arrest of judgment, and having resorted to precedents, the court was of opinion, 'that no certain form of expression was technically necessary, where the words want no innuendos—Had even the word Lexington been left out, it would still have been a libel, as the meaning of the words was self-evident, though the place and other circumstances had been omitted. As to the objections made by the defendant to the words 'of and concerning the king's government,' as laid in the information, they were found to have no weight. Those words were so proper in fixing the charge, that, in the case of the king against Alderton, the information was found bad, because not laid in the words 'of and concerning the Justices of Suffolk.' An information in the same form, and of the same offence, had already been found a libel by five juries, on the different prosecutions against the Printers, and on which even the defendant himself gave evidence. A number of learned counsel had approved of the proceedings, and there was not, in fact, a colour of doubt with respect to the formality. It was therefore the unanimous opinion of the court, that the objections could not lie, and consequently that the conviction was legal.

Mr. Attorney General.—The defendant has has been convicted of an audacious, false, and wicked libel, charging his majesty's troops and government with no less a crime than that of wilfully murdering the king's loyal and faithful subjects; points directly to time, place, and action, and with intent to try how far he can insult the justice and humanity of his country, boldly stands forth here, as he has on other occasions, "Am not I the man that dares to do it?" Such audaciousness surely calls for the highest punishment that this court in such cases can inflict. The defendant has thought it consistent with his views to prove the king's troops were surrounded with rebels, impeded in their operations, the country hostile, and in arms; and, as far as their strength lay, endeavoured to cut them off, firing off alarm guns (the intention of which was well understood) and collecting of magazines to make head against the king's forces in aid of the rebellion. All this the defendant has most industriously proved to point out and strongly to mark that he was the man in aid and support of that very rebellion meant to insult the justice and dignity of the mother-country. Another part of his proof is, that contributions in support of rebellion were actually set on foot and carried into execution; the money raised, and transmitted, and that the defendant was the man who dared commit such a crime and insult. Never, surely, was a libel more scandalous, more malignant, more dangerous, and as such will not be suffered to pass unpunished.

The usual punishments are fine and imprisonment for such offences, ever since the time of that real patriot and great man, chief justice Holt; and being a libel against the king's troops and government is much greater than an individual, for the justice and humanity of the kingdom is insulted. It was my duty, on the first appearance of so gross an attempt, to prosecute to conviction. Your lordships are to judge between us. I am not interested, nor have I any malice against any man. Perfectly satisfied with the wisdom and justice of the court, I leave the whole to your lordships disposal.

Mr. Horne.—May it please your lordships: I hope I am not to be reviled and laughed at for my misfortunes. I came here to-day with a full persuasion that I was to return again with the same liberty. I object, if I am in time, and now move an arrest of judgment; for no information can be supplied by evidence; and I thought Mr. Attorney General and I were ordered to look for precedents; but, after what I have heard to-day, I should not have said a word, if Mr. Attorney General's rancour was not such as calls on me to deny and confute his suggestions.

To-day he has stript me of all common sense, by opening the impropriety and im-prudence of others he would suppose to have acted otherwise.

It is not incumbent on me to take notice of what has dropped from the Bench, but Mr. Attorney General has been guilty of gross misrepresentation. I am as little given to audacity as he or any other gentleman in this Court. He says my language and style is low, and looking only for the praise of a mob. This is his language, not mine. It has been my misfortune to have a liberal education; and that mob has paid him as much tribute as they have to me. It is likewise my misfortune not to be poor; I never said I was. If I had, I should here have joined with the Attorney General, and craved the lenity of the court; but I never did ask a favour of them, and I hope never will.

It is unfortunate, but my notions of humanity differ widely from Mr. Attorney General's; and it cannot be flying in the face of justice not to shrink from her presence. I believe I did say, formerly, I even dared any thing your lordships could pronounce against me; and I now do; for I am confident your lordships dare not do wrong. There are many more things I intended to have troubled your lordships with, but with the Attorney General I trust the whole in the wisdom of the Court.

Mr. Justice Aston.—John Horne, you stand convicted for writing and publishing a very gross libel concerning the king's troops and government; and it appears to this court, and by your own evidence, that you glory in the crime. You very artfully attempted to gloss over the charge, and insisted the information was not explicit and full. No man really can mistake it; most seditious and scandalous in its nature, and but too industriously propagated by you, and too well known for me to enter into the contents of a paper, that to be read is only to be understood and abhorred by all good men and lovers of their country. The sentence of this court is, that you pay 200*l.* fine to the king, and be imprisoned for the space of twelve months, and afterwards find sureties, yourself in 400*l.* and two sureties in 200*l.* each for your good behaviour for three years.

Anecdote of Mr. Quin.

MACKLIN having applied to Quin to use his interest with the manager for the introduction of a piece which the former had written, received a promise of compliance; but being put off once or twice with a trifling excuse, he at length determined to have a peremptory answer. He accordingly applied once more, and asked the humourist with an air of dissatisfaction, how long he was to wait? "Till the day of judgment," replied Quin, "when you and your piece may be damned together."

BRITISH and IRISH BIOGRAPHY,

FINCH, (Heneage) earl of Nottingham, was the son of sir Heneage Finch, knight, speaker of the house of commons in the first year of Charles I. and for some time recorder of London. He was born in 1621, educated at Westminster-school, and in 1634 was entered a gentleman-commoner of Christ-church college, Oxford: from this seminary he removed to the Inner Temple, where he became successively barrister, bencher, treasurer, reader, &c. At the restoration of Charles II. he was made solicitor-general, and advanced to the dignity of a baronet. In April 1661 he was chosen member of parliament for the university of Oxford, and in 1665 was created doctor of civil law.

In May 1670 the king appointed him his attorney-general: about three years after, upon the removal of the earl of Shaftesbury from the office of chancellor, he was made keeper of the great seal; and in the fifteenth year of Charles II. was created baron of Daventry in Northamptonshire. In the month of December, 1675, he was appointed high chancellor of England. He performed the office of lord high steward at the trial of William viscount Stafford, who was convicted of high treason by his peers, for being concerned in the popish plot. As a reward for his many faithful services, he was in 1681 created earl of Nottingham; but he did not long survive his elevation to that dignity; for he died on the 18th of December, 1682, in the 62d year of his age. Though he lived in very troublesome and ticklish times, yet he conducted himself with such even steadiness, that he preserved the good opinion both of his prince and of the people. He was distinguished by his integrity, wisdom and eloquence, and his zeal for the church of England. Several of his speeches in parliament, &c. have been published.

His character is thus described by Mr. Dryden, in his Abraham and Achitophel, under the name of Amri:

“ Our list of nobles next let Amri grace, “ Whose merits claim’d the Abethdin’s high place,
 “ Who, with a loyalty that did excel,
 “ Brought all th’ endowments of Achitophel.

Sir William Blackstone speaks of the earl of Nottingham in the following terms of commendation: “ He was a person of the greatest abilities and most uncorrupted integrity: a thorough master and zealous defender of the laws and constitution of his country; and endued with a pervading genius that enabled him to discover and to pursue the true spirit of justice, notwithstanding the embarrassments raised by the narrow and technical notions which then prevailed in the courts of law, and the imperfect ideas of redress which had possessed the courts of equity. The reason and necessities of mankind, arising from the great change in property, by the extension of trade and the abolition of military tenures, co-operated in establishing his plan, and enabled him, in the course of nine years, to build a system of jurisprudence and jurisdiction upon wide and rational foundations, which have also been extended and improved by many great men, who have since presided in chancery; and from that time to this, the power and business of the court have increased to an amazing degree.

The Life of Daniel Finch, Esq.

Finch (Daniel) earl of Nottingham, son of the former, was born about the year 1647, and received his education at Christ-church college, Oxford. He served in several parliaments in the reign of Charles II. for the city of Litchfield, and the borough of Newton in Hampshire. In 1679 he was appointed first commissioner of the admiralty, and sworn of the privy-council; and at the end of the next year, spoke with great vigour in the house of commons against the bill for the exclusion of the duke of York. Upon his father’s decease, he succeeded him in his titles and estates; and in the reign of James II. was one of the chief arguers among the temporal lords against abrogating the test-act. After the prince of Orange had landed in the west, the earl of Nottingham was one of the commissioners sent by king James to treat with that prince. On the advancement of king William and queen Mary to the throne, he was offered the post of lord high chancellor, which he excused himself from accepting; but was appointed one of the prinprincipal secretaries of state. In 1690-1 he attended his majesty to the congress at the Hague; and James II. took such umbrage at his behaviour, that in his declaration upon his intended descent in 1692, the earl was excepted out of his general pardon. In March 1694 he resigned his post of secretary of state; and in the year following a public testimony was given to the integrity of his conduct; for, upon an examination in parliament into the bribery and corruption of some of their own members, in order to obtain a new charter for the East-India Company, it appeared that his lordship had absolutely refused to take five thousand guineas for his interest in promoting that charter, and five thousand more on the passing of the act for that purpose. Immediately after the accession of queen Anne, he was again appointed secretary of state; in which office he had a vote of the house of commons passed in his favour, viz. "that he highly merited the trust her majesty had reposed in him;" and the like sanction from the house of lords. However, on the 17th of April, 1704, he resigned that employment, and accepted of no other during the whole reign of queen Anne, though, upon the change of the ministry in 1710, large offers were made to engage him in the measures of the court; his refusal of which so exasperated that party, that he was attacked with great virulence in several libels both in verse and prose. On the death of the queen, he was one of the lords justices for the administration of affairs till the arrival of king George I. and on the 24th of September, 1714, was declared president of the council. Some time after, he retired from all public business to a studious course of life, the fruits of which appeared in his elaborate answer to Mr. Whiston's letter to him on the subject of the Trinity, for which on the 22d of March, 1721, he received the unanimous thanks of the university of Oxford, in convocation assembled. He also wrote a letter to Dr. Waterland, printed at the end of Dr. Newton's Treatise on pluralities. His lordship died the 21st of January, 1729-30, at a very advanced age. He was remarkably skilled in the whole system of the English law, as well as in the records of parliament; and these qualifications, joined to a copious and ready eloquence, gave him great weight in all public assemblies.

Life of John Fisher, Bishop of Rochester.

Fisher (John) bishop of Rochester, was born at Beverley in Yorkshire, in the year 1459, and was taught grammar-learning in that town, from whence he was removed to Michael-house, Cambridge. He took the degrees in arts in 1488 and 1491; and was one of the professors of the university in 1495. The same year he was elected master of Michael-house; soon after which, he entered into holy orders, and greatly distinguished himself as a divine. In 1501 he took the degree of doctor in divinity. The fame of his learning and exemplary virtues reaching the ears of Margaret countess of Richmond, mother to king Henry VII. she appointed him her chaplain and confessor; in which station he so far gained the esteem of that pious lady, that she resigned herself wholly to his direction. It was chiefly by his advice and persuasion, that she undertook those magnificent foundations at Cambridge which have rendered her name illustrious. In 1502, Dr. Fisher was appointed the lady Margaret's first divinity-professor at Cambridge, and in 1504 was promoted to the see of Rochester, at the recommendation of Fox bishop of Winchester. The same year he was chosen high chancellor of the university of Cambridge. In 1505 he accepted the headship of Queen's college in that university, which he enjoyed for the space of three years.

When the affair of the king's divorce was set on foot, in 1527, his majesty, who entertained a high opinion of Fisher's integrity and learning, desired to know his sentiments on the subject of his marriage with queen Catherine of Arragon: the bishop declared, that there was no reason at all to question its validity; and from this opinion he never could be prevailed upon to recede, though he thereby lost the king's favour. In 1531, the question of giving king Henry VIII. the title of supreme head of the English church, being debated in convocation, Fisher opposed it with all his endeavours; and soon after brought himself into much trouble, by countenancing the impostures of Elizabeth Barton commonly called the Holy Maid of Kent, an account of whom the reader will find in this work. He was adjudged guilty of misprision of treason, for concealing the maid's treasonable speeches; condemned to forfeit his goods and chattels to the king, and to be imprisoned during his majesty's pleasure. About the same time an act was passed, by which the king's marriage with Catharine was declared void, his marriage with Anne Boleyn confirmed, and the crown entailed upon her issue. In pursuance of this statute, an oath was taken by both houses of parliament, March 30, 1534, whereby they swore "to bear faith, truth, and obedience to the the king's majesty, and to the heirs of his body by his most dear and entirely beloved lawful wife queen Anne," &c. Fisher refusing to take this oath when tendered to him, was committed to the Tower on the 26th of April following, and shortly afterwards deprived of his bishopric. During his confinement, pope Paul III. created him a cardinal; which unseasonable honour precipitated his destruction. When the king heard of this promotion, he gave strict orders that none should bring the hat into his dominions; and sent lord Cromwell to examine the bishop about the affair: after some conference between them, Cromwell asked him, "my lord of Rochester, what would you say, if the pope should send you a cardinal's hat; would you accept of it?" Fisher replied, "Sir, I know myself to be so far unworthy any such dignity, that I think of nothing less; but if any such thing should happen, assure yourself that I should improve that favour to the best advantage I could, in assisting the holy Catholic church of Christ; and in that respect I would receive it upon my knees." When this answer was reported to the king by lord Cromwell, Henry said in a great passion, "yea, is he yet so lusty? Well, let the pope send him a hat when he will, Mother of God, he shall wear it on his shoulders then, for I will leave him never a head to set it on." From this time the bishop's ruin was determined on: but as nothing which had been hitherto proved against him was sufficient to take away his life, Rich, the solicitor general, went to him, and in a fawning treacherous manner, under pretence of consulting him (as from the king) about a case of conscience; gradually drew him into a discourse on the subject of the king's supremacy; concerning which the bishop inconsiderately uttered these words: "As to the business of supremacy, I must needs tell his majesty, as I have often told him heretofore, and would so tell him if I were to die this present hour, that it is utterly unlawful; and therefore I would not wish his majesty to take any such power or title upon him, as he loves his own soul, and the good of his posterity." The bishop being thus caught in the snare that was laid for him, a special commission was drawn up for trying him; and on the 17th of June, 1535, after a short trial, he was found guilty of high treason, in denying the king's supremacy, and condemned to suffer death. On the 22d of the same month he was beheaded on Tower-hill, and his head was fixed up the next day over London-bridge.

Bishop Fisher was a tall, strong, well-made man; his complexion was dark, his forehead broad, his features regular, and his countenance grave and venerable. He was a great lover of learning, and a patron of learned men; and was remarkable for studying the Greek language when he was an old man. Erasmus represents him as a person of the highest integrity, of deep learning, incredible sweetness of temper, and greatness of soul. He was the author of several works, viz. 1. A Commentary on the seven penitential Psalms: 2. Assertionum Martini Lutheri Confutatio: 3. Defensio Assertionis Henrici Octavi de septem Sacramentis contra Lutheri Captivitatem Babylonicam: 4. Epistola Responsoria, Epistolæ Lutheri: 5. Sacerdotii Defensio contra Lutherum: 6. Pro Damnatione Lutheri; and other pieces.

Life of John Flamsteed.

Flamsteed (John) the famous astronomer, was born at Derby in Derbyshire, on the 19th of August, 1646. He was educated at the free-school of Derby, where his father lived; and at fourteen years of age was afflicted with a long and severe illness, which prevented his going to the university, as had been intended. He was taken from school in the year 1662, and within a month or two after had John de Sacrobosco's book de Sphæra put into his hands, which he applied himself to read without any instructor. This accident, and the leisure which he now had, laid the foundation of all that mathematical and astronomical knowledge, for which he became afterwards so justly celebrated. He had already perused a great deal of history, ecclesiastical as well as civil; but this subject was entirely new to him, and he was extremely delighted with it. Having translated so much from Sacrobosco, as he thought necessary, into English, he proceeded to make dials by the direction of such ordinary books as he could procure; and changing a treatise on astrology found among his father's books, for Mr. Street's Caroline Tables, he attempted to calculate the places of the planets. He spent some part of his time also in astrological studies, yet so as to make them subservient to astronomy.

Having calculated by the Caroline tables an eclipse of the sun, which was to happen on the 22d of June, 1666, he communicated it to a relation, who shewed it to Emanuel Halton, Esq; of Wingfield-manor in Derbyshire. This gentleman was a good mathematician, as appears from some pieces of his, published in the appendix to Foster's Mathematical Miscellanies. He came to see Mr. Flamsteed soon after; and finding he was little acquainted quainted with the astronomical performances of others, sent him Ricciolus's Almagestum Novum, and Kepler's Rudolphine Tables, with some other mathematical books, to which he was before a stranger. From this time he prosecuted his studies with great vigour, and with equal success. In 1669 he calculated some remarkable eclipses of the fixed stars by the moon, which would happen in 1670; and wrote an account of them to lord Brouncker, president of the Royal Society. This piece, being read before the Society, was so much approved, that it procured him letters of thanks from Mr. Oldenburgh their Secretary, and from Mr. John Collins. In 1670, his father, who had hitherto discountenanced his studies, taking notice of his correspondence with several ingenious men whom he had never seen, advised him to make a journey to London, that he might become personally acquainted with them. Mr. Flamsteed gladly embraced this proposal, and visited Mr. Oldenburgh and Mr. Collins; and they introduced him to Sir Jonas Moore, who presented him with Mr. Townley's Micrometer. At Cambridge, he visited Dr. Barrow and Mr. Isaac Newton; and at the same time entered himself a student of Jesus College. In 1673 he wrote a small tract concerning the true and apparent diameters of all the planets, when at their nearest or remotest distances from the earth. The next year he wrote an Ephemeris, in which he shewed the falsity of astrology, and the ignorance of those that pretended to it, and gave a table of the moon's rising and setting carefully calculated, together with the eclipses and approaches of the moon and planets, to the fixed stars. In 1674, Mr. Flamsteed passing through London in the way to Cambridge, Sir Jonas Moore informed him, that a true account of the tides would be highly acceptable to the king, upon which he composed a small Ephemeris for his majesty's use. Having taken the degree of master of arts at Cambridge, he resolved to enter into orders, and to settle in a small living near Derby, which was in the gift of a friend of his father's. In the mean time, Sir Jonas Moore having notice of his design, wrote to him to come to London, whither he returned in February, 1675. He was entertained in the house of that gentleman, who had other views for serving him; but Mr. Flamsteed persisting in his resolution to take orders, he did not dissuade him from it. On the 4th of March following, Sir Jonas brought Mr. Flamsteed a warrant to be king's astronomer, with a salary of 100*l.* per annum. This, however, did not abate his inclination for entering into holy orders; so that the Easter following he was ordained at Ely-house by bishop Gunning. On the 10th of August, 1675, the foundation of the Royal Observatory in Greenwich was laid, and as Mr. Flamsteed was the first royal astronomer for whose use this edifice was erected, it still bears the name of Flamsteed-house. During the building of it he lodged at Greenwich; and his quadrant and telescopes being kept in the queen's house there, he observed the appulses of the moon and planets to the fixed stars. In 1681 his Doctrine of the Sphere was published in Sir Jonas Moore's System of the Mathematics.

About the year 1684 he was presented to the living of Burslow, in Surry. Of the manner in which Mr. Flamsteed obtained this living, the following account is given by Mr. Roger North: "Sir Jonas Moore once invited the lord keeper North to dine with him at the Tower; and, after dinner, presented Mr. Flamsteed. His lordship received him with much familiarity, and encouraged him to come and see him often, that he might have the pleasure of his conversation. The star-gazer was not wanting to himself in that; and his lordship was extremely delighted with his accounts and observations about the planets, especially those attendant on Jupiter; shewing how the eclipses of them, being regular and calculable, might rectify the longitude of places upon the globe, and demonstrating that light did not pass instantaneously, but in time with other remarkables in the heavens. These discourses always regaled his lordship; and a good benefice falling void, not far from the observatory, in the gift of the great seal, his lordship gave it to Mr. Flamsteed; which set him at ease in his fortunes, and encouraged his future labours, from which great things were expected; as applying the Jovial observations to marine uses, for finding longitudes at sea, and to correct the globes, celestial and terrestrial, which were very faulty. And in order to the first, he had composed tables of the eclipses of the Satellites, which shewed when they were to happen, one after another; and of these, finely painted upon neat board, he made a present to his lordship. And he had advanced his other design of rectifying maps, by having provided large blank globes, on which he might inscribe his places corrected. But plenty and pains seldom dwell together; for as one enters the other gives way: and, in this instance, a good living, pensions, &c. spoiled a good cosmographer and astronomer; for very little is left of west of Porta de la Plata, and forty, north west from St. Domingo.

The chief towns belonging to the French are

Cape St. Francois, situate on the north side of the island, in a flourishing opulent condition, having a fine harbour, brisk trade, and about eight thousand inhabitants.

St. Lewis, or Port Lewis, standing on a small island on the south west coast of the island, and having a good harbour with a fort, but labouring under a scarcity of fresh water.

Port Paix, a place of considerable strength, lying opposite the island of Tortuga, on the north-west coast of the island.

Petit Guaves and Leogane, which stand on Donna Maria Bay, near Cape St. Nicholas, at the west end of the island. The former is the oldest French settlement in the island, and a place of considerable trade; and the latter is the residence of the French governor-general, and of the royal judicature, with that of the supreme council, whose jurisdiction extends from Cape Mougou to the river Artibonite.

Two other small places belong to the French called La Petite Riviere, and L'Esterre, the latter of which stands a little within land.

The little island of Tortuga has its name from the turtles with which it formerly abounded. It is about six leagues long from east to west, and three where broadest.—The French have a populous flourishing settlement called Cayona, with a harbour in the south part of the island. It yields all the commodities found in the other West-Indian islands, together with wild boars; but has little or no fresh water. The islands of Savona and Mona belong to the Spaniards. Hispaniola is separated from Cuba and Jamaica by what is called the Windward-passage.

PORTO RICO

Is parted from Hispaniola by a narrow channel, being about a hundred and twenty miles long, and sixty broad. The air here is excessively hot and unwholesome during the rainy season. The island is subject to great droughts and hurricanes, and much exposed to the descents of privateers. The principal commodities in which the inhabitants deal are sugar, ginger, hides, cotton thread, and raw cotton, cassia, mastic, &c. Their pork is excellent, and so is the flesh of their kids, but their mutton is poor, dry food. They have good ship-timber, and fruit-trees, with rice and Indian corn. A number of brooks and rivers descend from the mountains, which run from east to west, and are planted with woods.

The north part of the island, which is the most barren, is said to contain various mines, some of them of silver and gold; but it does not appear that any of them are worked, though it is confidently affirmed, that gold dust is often found in the sands of the rivers. The woods are stored with parrots, wild pigeons, and other fowl. European poultry is here in plenty, and the coasts abound with fish.

Infinite pains have been taken by the Spanish government to prevent an illicit trade at this place; but such is the convenience of its situation for that traffic, that all the severe edicts issued against it have been ineffectual.

The capital of the island is St. John's, situated on a small island on the north coast, within the harbour, which the Spaniards called Porto-Rico, from the treasures they found there. It is well built and populous, and the seat of a governor, as well as a bishop's see. Both the town and the entrance of the harbour are strongly fortified. The former is also joined to the main island by a causeway.

The other places of note in Porto Rico are Port del Agnada, where the floata provide themselves with water, and other necessities, in their voyage to Spain; and Boraba d'Inferno, famous for an excellent turtle fishery. A small island on this coast is called Crabs Island, from the great number of crabs found there.

TRINIDAD

Is separated from the continent of Andalusia, in Terra Firma, by the narrow strait of Boco del Drago, eighty miles north-west of the river Orinoco. This island is the largest on the coast, being about twenty-five leagues in length, and twenty in breadth. The air is said to be unwholesome, but the soil fruitful, producing sugar, tobacco, indigo, cotton, ginger, and Indian corn. The number of inhabitants is very small, in proportion to the extent of the island.

MARGARITA,

Situate two hundred miles west of Trinidad, is about thirty-five miles in compass. It abounds with verdant groves and pastures, fruits, and Indian corn, and was formerly highly prized for its pearl-fishery; but the rapaciousness of the Spaniards hath since destroyed that fishery; nor do pearls bear the same price now as when America was first discovered. The greatest inconvenience of the island is the want of fresh water.

Belonging to the Spaniards are several other islands in these seas, as the Golden Island, Isle of Pines, the Samballas Islands, the Babilmentos, and Sotocutos, on the coast of Terra Firma, besides those in the South Sea.

THE FRENCH WEST-INDIAN ISLANDS.

MARTINICO,

The most considerable of the French West Indian Islands, is situated a hundred and twenty miles north-west of Barbadoes, between the fourteenth and fifteenth degrees of north latitude, being about sixty miles long, but scarce twenty broad in any place.

The inland part is mountainous, and many rivulets fall from thence into the surrounding sea; and there are several safe and commodious harbours, all well fortified, with good roads for shipping. The produce of the island consists of sugar, tobacco, cotton, ginger, indigo, cacao, aloes, pimento, cocones, plantains, and other tropical fruits. The coasts abound with turtles.

Though Martinico is by some accounted beautiful, yet it is certain that the vast quantity of water which runs through it, creates a humidity which is very noxious to the constitution of the inhabitants.

Martinico is not only the residence of the governor general and intendant, but likewise of a sovereign council, which superintends all their other islands, and even the settlements on St. Domingo and Tortuga. The governor general is commonly a man of quality; and is paid in sugar, amounting to sixty thousand pounds weight, with a pension of one thousand crowns from Old France. The lieutenant governors have twenty thousand pounds weight, and five thousand livres salary. The king's judges, attorneys, and other officers, have each an allowance of six thousand weight; but the counsellors of the sovereign's council have no more than twelve hundred weight, or twelve of their negroes exempted from the capitation tax. This is a tax paid by the white men and the free negroes, who are hired servants, and consists of a hundred weight of coarse sugar a year, for each domestic or negroe, who is employed in manufacturing it; and of six livres for every other. All provisions imported into the island are subject to a duty of one per cent. in specie; and the third of all forfeitures and fines goes to the crown. Martinico owes its flourishing state to the French government having transplanted thither, by way of punishment, great numbers of its protestant subjects, some of whom voluntarily settled there.

The most considerable places in the island are

St. Pierre, a handsome town, extending along the shore, and washed by a river on each side. There is a strong fort, besides several batteries, and other works, that command both the town and road, the former of which is also walled.

Fort Royal, lying at the distance of seven leagues by land, and nine by water from St. Pierre. It is also well fortified; but is otherwise far inferior to St. Pierre.

Trinity Town, a flourishing settlement at the bottom of Trinity Bay.

The harbour or bay called Cul de Sac Tobert, is a very fine and safe one, being two leagues deep, and having water enough for the largest ship, with two islands at its entrance to break the force of the waves.

GUADALUPE.

Guadalupe, so named by Columbus, from its resembling those of that name in Spain, is situate in 16° north latitude, thirty leagues north west from Martinico. It is said to be near an hundred leagues in compass, but is cut in two by a deep gulph or bay, on each side, and a channel called the Salt River.

The air of this island is preferable to that of Martinico, being more salubrious, and less sultry. Its products are sugar, coffee, cotton, bastard cinnamon, indigo, ginger, and many other vegetables, particularly the copau-tree, from which is extracted a most excellent balsam; the milk shrub, yielding a substance like milk, little inferior to the capau balsam; the moubane-tree, which bears a yellow plum, with which the natives fatten their hogs; and the corbary-tree, the gum of which, when hardened in the sun, becomes so translucent, that the Caribbeans wear it formed into beads and bracelets. Many of the mountains with which Guadalupe abounds are covered with wood; and the plains below are large, fruitful, and beautifully variegated.

One of the mountains is said to emit a continual smoke, and to communicate a sulphurous taste to the neighbouring streams.

The fertility of Guadalupe is such, that it hath been asserted, if it was as well peopled, and cultivated as Barbadoes, it would yield sugar enough for all Europe. The most remarkable bird upon the island is that called the Devil, which is peculiar to this island and Dominica: it is a bird of passage, of the size of a pullet, and all its plumage coal black: it lives on fish, which it it catches in the sea at night, being unable to bear the light in the day-time, when flying; so that they often run against interpoling objects, and fall down. After their fish-hunting in the night, they repair to a mountain, called the Devil's Mountain, where they lodge by pairs in holes like rabbits. Their flesh is good nourishing food, though of a fishy taste.

The island is pestered with an insect called a ravet, shaped like a cock-chaffer, of a stinking smell, and preying upon books and furniture; and whatever they do not gnaw, is discoloured by their ordure: but great numbers of them are destroyed by a kind of spiders, some of which are as big as a man's fist. The bees of Guadalupe are very different from those of Europe, being black, smaller, and without stings. Their bees, instead of making combs, lay their honey in bladders of wax, about the form and size of a pigeon's egg. The only use that is made of their wax, which is of a dark purple colour, is to secure the corks of bottles: the honey is never of a thicker consistence than that of olive oil.

The Cul de Sacs, or gulphs about this island, abound with turtle, sharks, land crabs, and various other fishes.

One of the two divisions of the island is called Grande-Terre; and the other is divided into Capes-Terre, or Cabes-Terre, and Basse-Terre, which last is also the name of the capital, a considerable town, situated on both sides of Bailiff River, and well fortified.

Several small islands lie about it, three of which are called the Santos Xaietes, or All-Saints Islands; one the Aves, or Bird Island.

MARIGALANIE,

Lying a little to the south-east of Guadalupe, is about five leagues in length, and four in breadth. It was discovered by Columbus in his second voyage to America, anno 1493; and named by him Marigalante, or the Gallant Mary, after the name of his ship. This island abounds with tobacco, cinnamon-trees, and other products of the Caribbee Islands; and contains a great many grottos, where large crabs are found; as also several rivers, and ponds of fresh water. Along the eastern shore run high perpendicular rocks, which gave shelter to vast numbers of tropical birds, they being as full of holes as a pigeon-house.

Before the last reduction of it by the British arms, it manufactured about one thousand hogheads of sugar yearly. The French began to send colonies about the year 1647.

St. L U C I A,

One of the islands formerly called Neutral, but by the last definitive treaty of peace, ceded in full right to France, lies two miles south of Martinico, and is about twenty-two miles in length, and eleven in breadth. It is said to be much the finest and most convenient of any of the Caribbee Islands, being diversified with hills and vallies, well watered, and furnished with excellent harbours. The land is rich; but a great part of it is covered with woods, which abound in wild fowl, and yield great quantities of excellent timber. The neighbouring sea is well stored with fish.

There are three other small islands belonging to the French in these seas, viz. St. Martin, St. Bartholomew, and Deserada, or Desiderada, i. e. the Desirable Island. St. Martin lies a little to the north-west of Bartholomew, which is ten leagues north of St. Christopher's. Deserada, situate about twenty miles from Guadalupe, is said to produce the best cotton of any of the French islands. It had its name from Columbus, being the first land he discovered in his second voyage to America, anno 1493. St. Martin is of no consequence; but St. Bartholomew's, though encompassed with formidable rocks, yet produces tobacco and cassava, with some excellent woods, and lime-stone.

L E T T E R VII.

I HAVE dropped several hints, respecting Education in many places in those papers. I have given thee several sketches concerning it: the rebuke I received in thy letter yesterday, hath caused me to think thereon again; first, suffer me to thank thee for thy reproof; I deserve it, for my yielding to any custom, contrary to what I early imbibed, shews a want of a proper guard over myself, and probably may make room for more dangerous straying: I might be enslaved unknowingly; I might introduce a custom to corrupt the prince; for changes of custom, be they ever so immaterial at first, bring about the greatest revolutions: whereas a firm adherence to customs, although perhaps it subjects us to some trifling inconveniencies, nevertheless, preserves order and good government through many generations. The people of China are a living lesson. I hope in my travels hitherto, I have, through thy faithful hands, benefited my country, by shewing examples of what is worthy among other people, and ought to be pursued; and on the other hand, what is reprehensible, and ought to be avoided. Before thou makest them public, I know thou wilt candidly correct whatever errors, through weakness of judgment and inability, I have committed. I told thee with what seeming indifference the mother treats her offspring here when delivered of a pleasing burthen, and have slightly recited the carelessness of parents to improve their natural genifuses, or instill true principles of happiness into their tender minds: not only careless in this respect, but parents load their young capacities with frivolous and often dangerous lessons: they force them all very near into the same track; of course they disgust numbers by this treatment, give them a dislike to learning and improvement, mostly an insurmountable antipathy. I told thee the boys are all trained according to the fancy of the parent; the children are not esteemed (as with us) the property of the state. A man begins with teaching his son his letters, spelling and reading, generally with harshness, and the frequent use of the rod; the child quickly beholds learning as an evil, and attends to it with fear, but dislike; when he has waded thus far, he is sent to school, or a tutor is hired for a small salary to attend him at home; he is now obliged to learn Latin and Greek, uninformed of the rules and combinations of his own language; ignorant of the history of his own country, he labours to gain the rules for true reading of those languages he does not hear spoken, and cannot comprehend what use they can be of to him: he reads fabulous accounts of the Heathen deities, tales abounding with shocking filthiness and the most extravagant conceits, the histories of ancient manners and times when the worshippers of such powers lived, or the refused declamations and productions of their orators or more worthy writers, tracls far above his conception: he therefore repeats his lesson to avoid punishment, he escapes what he dreads, flies to his darling play, mixes with his equals, in age, ignorance and principles, forgets what he has reported, thinks on it no more, but makes preparation in proper time for his succeeding task. After a certain course of reading in this manner, he is sent to a superior school, called a college, and here he experiences the same treatment, save that he is under less restriction, and may be idle with less impunity; his years increased, the desires of youth are seconded by his companions, he spends the time formerly dedicated to boyish play in immorality, in vices and debauchery, to shew his claim to manhood, and his being freed from school discipline: he, after spending a stated number of years in this manner, is authorized to pursue the practice of certain learned professions, divinity, physic or law. Now it is easy to perceive the imperfection of such an education, although it is scarce possible to imagine, notwithstanding the defects, what a number of truly learned and sensible men are among this people; but on the other hand if we consider the numbers who are a disgrace to learning by the looseness of their morals and misapplication of their talents, or promoted through interest to the highest posts of the learned profession, the numbers who are unfit for them, have lost by their drudgery through the appointed courses, the time they otherwise might have successfully employed in the acquirement of business more suited to their genius and capacities, in which they might have figured with credit to themselves and usefulness to the public. I say, considering this, a man would almost commiserate the knowledge of learning among them, the use arising from a knowledge of the Greek and Latin languages is very great undoubtedly, as most excellent histories have been written in them, by the people who spoke these languages of old; moreover, the testimonies they bring to confirm our faith, they are also so well understood by the learned in all the countries of Europe, that an Englishman can convey every force of his meaning to the learned men of another country, without the danger of his performance suffering by translation from the tongue to that of another people. This utility, nevertheless, cannot justify the practice of condemning all young men to the study of them, and often of unjustifiably branding an inaptitude of learning them, with the odious terms of stupidity and ignorance; although frequently the youth thus pointed at possess more true sense and understanding than the vain reader of many volumes; if parents are strict in regard of pursuing a certain route of study for the youth of the male sex, they entirely relax in respect to that intended for the females; their education is a round of trifles of a less serious complexion, which instead of adding the least improvement to the human mind, serves only to debase it beneath insignificance itself; to a sober, staid mind, the lessons, by reiteration, in time may may make some impression on young men, but females are not considered as requiring any improvements from learning, if they can read and write it is sufficient: I would not wish you to suppose I would have them taught the learned languages, except there was a capacity in a certain situation found, as in the queen, who ruled in this country, when our forefathers failed for the Indies. In lower stations, a woman has, I think, a more delicate and difficult part to act than the man; she should be frank, yet modest, tender, yet inflexible; patient and obliging; attentive, generous and careful, provident and truly wise to conduct herself with agreeableness in her family, and to gain the affections and love of her neighbours and strangers. Suffer me here to make one observation, although perhaps, you have made it already from what I have written, but for fear I have not been precise or clear enough, I will insert it, as it strikes me, and as I wish it might appear to you. The people of this country do not by any means understand in what education consists, neither to what end it ought to be directed. The ancient Greeks and Romans, although pagans, appear to have entertained much truer notions and better comprehensions concerning this duty; they wisely considered that education was only giving the mind a bias to what was good, and rendering it incapable of an evilection according to their ideas of moral rectitude: to fulfil this their scheme, they endeavoured to instil into their pupils minds the knowledge of several sciences or arts according to the capacity of the instructed, whether philosophy, government, commanding armies, oratory, or the fine arts of statuary, painting, &c. the result they expected was, comfort to the possessor, and utility to mankind, but their blindness in religion caused a lame, a weak morality, and philosophy substituted a false or burdensome and uncertain rule for pursuing right, and shunning evil. Nevertheless, through the application of the instructors, many shining, great and noble characters were exhibited, although far short of such as are blessed with the light of revelation, and trained with care, have appeared; and would still more commonly shine forth, as weak prejudices would be almost entirely extirpated from Europe, were it not for the mistakes hourly committed in education. The moderns confine their wishes to a superficial education, what they stile a knowledge of men and books, that is, an intimacy with all that has been wrote by antiquity, without the practice of a single document handed down by it, and a shameful dissimulation before, and distrust of all mankind, to govern your conduct by a certain well-known behaviour, and by a supple compliance to make a shipwreck of all innocence and virtue, to procure wealth and power, without sincerity, to make every man imagine you his friend. Although this has been the direct tendency of modern education, I cannot find it has been positively pointed out by any writer on that subject, until a lately deceased nobleman laid it down as a scheme for his son's pursuit in a series of letters: a nobleman famed for his accomplishments, and good natural parts: I have read them; I enquired minutely into the character of the writer, and was assured he was moral and upright; the author of some very pious tracts, but I fear through an effort of human policy, he was betrayed into the tenets he so warmly inculcates under the title of the Graces, the youth he wrote to was of a studious temper, a retired disposition, an awkwardness of behaviour, arising from a despair of pleasing, where characters of a different and more trifling kind shone, added perhaps to an indolence to pursue such poor endowments. The father seeing with the eyes of a sensible parent his son's defect, and how hurtful his appearance to what he wished his son might prove, an useful member of society; and well judging the youth's sober temper and good sense, actuated as I said before, with human policy, he advises him into criminal measures depending on his son's virtue and good sense, to stop him at that ease, affability and freedom, just necessary to fit him for society, and for practising to effect the profession he intended him for,—a statesman,—for him alone the letters were designed, and even here on too loose principles for a parent to write, to even such a son. It is however, a palliation when such rules are made public, and the authority of so great a man pleaded in defence of such precepts: the son died: Some years after the father died also: the son's widow makes the correspondence public, and every one buys up the works of so great a man: they are read, and without consideration admired; every youth is required to read them. Thus sheltered by this authority, parents have laid a plan for debauching the yet few remaining principles of virtue their offspring might possess. The sprightly and the stupid alike read them: one perceives not the tendency of the writer, the other gladly embraces so venerable a sanction for his irregularities. Why was such a book suffered to appear? I know you will say, because the liberty of the people is such it could could not be refused publication, or when published no one dare suppress it.

I find I am, notwithstanding my frequent resolutions to write to thee on this or that subject alone, frequently obliged to quit it entirely, and pursue some other different topic; and I believe whoever writes of these people, or has any thing to do with them, will be reduced to the same circumstances, for they are variously actuated by the most different whims imaginable, you can scarcely still their tempers, except a certain generosity is pretty generally to be found among most of them, even among the abandoned; their thieves shall commit a crime with a degree of heroism, while this principle is more effectually hid among those of higher life, by the pains taken to vitiate their education. You will be surprised, perhaps, to hear that they have a writer on education who approaches, in his doctrine, almost to our mode of training youth, save the use of public schools on our principles; his name is Locke. He has written various tracts, and is universally admired and boasted of by his countrymen; but I fear seldom read, I am sure much less followed. I have bought his works, and mean to bring them home; they will fully compensate for my toils; and although in my first letter I was doubtful what to say concerning my voyaging here, I am now well satisfied, since I have procured the writings of so learned, so good a man.

Translation of a Letter from the Rajah of Tanjour to his Vakeel, dated the 6th, and received at Madras, the 8th of March, 1777.

“COL. STUART arrived in the fort on the 25th of February. An hour after sun-set; I sent Vencad Row Gadi to some distance to meet him, and he escorted him to major Browne's house in the little fort, where he breakfasted, and came to wait on me, being attended to my Durbar by Vencad Row Gadi. I went to the Tank before the palace to meet him, we embraced, after which I took him by the hand, led him up into the Durbar and seated him on a chair; I then took Mr. Cochrane and his four other attendants by the hand, and having given them seats, I paid my compliments to his Dubash, Bramin, and Moorish servants: Bachana and Lala then came with others of my people, and paid their respects to colonel Stuart, and many compliments passed between them. When he passed the Nabob's boundaries and crossed over the Coleroon into my country, the amuldars and farmers, with dancing girls, and music, saluted him, and presented him with beetle and with fruit, and gave him whatever provisions and necessaries he wanted without receiving the value of them; they built places for his reception, erected pandals, and fixed plantain trees near the doors.— They did the same at Thirai and other places; he found upon the banks of the Coleroon two chubdars and two hircarabs who attended him all the way.

“The colonel addressed himself to me, and told me that he was much rejoiced at the attention paid him by my people, to which I answered, the country is yours, the amuldars are yours, you therefore have no occasion to pay me a compliment, as you was coming to your own house only.

“The colonel then gave me the governor's letter, and desired me to peruse it at leisure. I in return presented him with a dress, an ornament to hang about his neck worth 1000 pagodas. After which I gave dresses to Mr. Cochrane and the other European attendants, together with all his servants according to their different ranks. I likewise sprinkled them with rose-water, and presented them with flowers, after which I took the colonel by the hand, and led him back again to the Tank; he desired that I would not come in far, and went home to the house, in which Nasiph Chawn formerly resided, being accompanied thither by Vencad Row Gadi. This house had a pandal built to it, and was fitted up for him, having plantain trees about the door. In the evening I prepared victuals for 200 people, and sent it to his house with flowers and perfumes.

“On the second day, he sent Vencad Row Gadi, to request that I would send away all my attendants, and admit a visit from him. I accordingly did so, excepting Bachana and Vencad Row Gadi, whom I kept with me, and received him and his two Dubashes. An account of the conversation he then held with me goes inclosed. After the conversation the colonel went home; for three or four days after I did not see him. One day I was indisposed, the second day he entertained all the Europeans; during that time I sent Vencad Row Gadi to his house every day with my compliments, and ordered him fruit, flowers, &c. and he returned different messages to me by Vencad Row Gadi, to which I returned answers. He then sent me other messages including threats and promises. On Monday the third instant, I sent for the colonel, and had a long conversation with him. As every thing was at his disposal, and as I was subject to him, I considered that if I did not obey him in some measure, the consequences might be fatal; I therefore determined to take such measures as were consistent with the times, and with the share of authority he possessed, knowing, that if this time escaped, heaven would be favourable to me in future, and that all my evils will have an end. I accordingly gave colonel Stuart the copy of a letter to be sent to the governor, of which I send a copy to you, which you will take care to make the proper use of: The different parts of this letter which I consented to, were not done with my approbation, but in consequence of the great trouble which was given me. One paragraph it contains, is to be given in case the company approve of it, and not otherwise. With regard to my disputes with the nabob, they are all to be referred to the company and the parties are to follow their decision. Before the contents of this letter were agreed to, ten different copies were torn, colonel Stuart always endeavouring to make me write what he thought proper: he used great pains to make me write, that I thought myself mistaken in the opinions I wrote in the letter of five pages sent to the governor, and desiring that he would forgive me: This I positively refused, and told him that I was determined every thing that was passed should stand; at last I gained this point, for he was silent upon it. He then desired me to write, that it was not in my power to pay the nabob's pishcah. This likewise I positively refused; I told him, that through the company's meditation, I promised to pay the pishcah due to the nabob, who ought to have restored Arnee and Hahnamentagoody to me. He said, "why do you make objections to things that tend to promote your own interest?" I answered, that I did not wish to receive any advantage by the pishcah, I will do nothing unjust, nor write any thing improper. To this he returned no answer.

"In this manner, retaining evil in his heart, he wrote a copy of two or three things, which he took great pains to make me sign an address to the governor; but I told him resolutely, that I never would consent to any such things while I lived. These being expunged, I made a copy of such as I expected no evil consequence from in future, and have addressed them in a letter to Mr. Stratton, and the colonel hath forwarded it to him.

"If the governor sends and inquires any thing from you, pray tell him, what can we do? we endeavour to please you and obtain your favour. As you have sent a great man, like the colonel, to Tanjour, we have consented to these things: it is yours to take such means as will save me from any future troubles; as the colonel desired only to be obeyed, and said that he would not even receive ten fanams, we thought proper to do so.

"You will inform the governor of as much as he ought to know: while the colonel continues here as my friend, do not let the bad things he does be known, if it should, he will suspect me, and give me trouble in every thing. You will, therefore, without letting any thing be exposed, make known things to those who ought to know them. You are wise—what need I say more?"

Account of a Conversation held by Colonel Stuart with the Rajah of Tanjour, and which was sent by him to his Vakeel with the letter of the 6th of March, 1777.

"ON the 25th he came to visit me, received a dreis and went home; on the 26th he again waited upon me, and had a conference with me alone. He began with telling me, that he did not come to speak in behalf of the nabob or of Mr. Benfield, and that he came to assist me; I do not (says he) like others, hold a mean employ, I am a powerful officer. After he had explained to me his consequence, he desired that nothing he said should transpire. He then chewed something, and began among many improper things to say as follows:

"You must write a letter to the governor, and tell him that lord Pigot and Mr. Stratton the governor, had frequently wrote to you, desiring that you would pay the government's share of the crop to the nabob, and that you would after the month of June, pay to him in four weeks, and at four different payments, the sum of four lacks of pagodas (about 160,000.) on account of the balance due to him.—

"That it was out of your power to pay the pishcah due to the nabob." That whatever money there was in the country according to the nabob's account shall be paid by you. You must likewise acknowledge, in a letter to the governor, that the letter of five sheets which you writ to him, and the arguments it contained, were improper, that you made a mistake, that he must not make the letter known, and that he must forgive you for having writ it.

"In this manner he proposed many bad things, and desired me to write them, promising that if I complied, the governor and council would be my sincere friends, and if not, that I would experience many difficulties. To this I opposed different arguments arguments and objections, to which he said, I will give you one thing, which if you write you may give your letter to me, if not keep it. Accordingly, to oblige him, Bachana began to write what he dictated, and he wrote half a side. After this a long dispute was held between the colonel and me, concerning the nabob's balances, at last he began to threaten me for not complying, told me the bad consequences of a refusal; and throwing himself into a passion said, that mischief would ensue if I would not write what he dictated. That he was going away, and desired that the half page which had been written should be torn. Having said this in a rage, I told him it was not proper to tear the paper; and as it was his dictum, I was afraid that he would impute the tearing of it to me. I asked him why it should be torn? that my paper ought to remain with me. After this he began to argue, and when I was answering him "he threw back Bachana's hand, and imagining that the paper would avail him something, he endeavoured to snatch it. He seized the paper, and Bachana pulled it back again. I seeing this, gave Bachana a signal not to quit it, on which Bachana took and tore the paper; one half of it continued in his hand, which the colonel again endeavoured to snatch; this likewise was seized by Bachana and torn, after which the colonel shewed no more inclination to have it.

"This being over, he looked at Bachana, threatened him, and offered to go away, I began to appease him, and said, that it was not well that the business of the kingdom should be transacted in a hasty manner; that if he was pleased to write down what he wished to be done, and deliver it to me, I would consider of it. I then presented him with flowers, and gave him leave to depart. On the next day he assembled some officers, his friends, and writ an Hindoo letter, which he sent to me by Vencad Row, having taken his promise, that his own letter should again be restored to him. When this letter was given to me I took a copy of it, and sent it back to him. This letter contained many things very improper; I desired Vencad Row Gadi, to tell him so, and inform him that they could not be written by me. For four days after he did not visit me, but plagued me with messages.

"I saw that if this was continued, something would be said which must break the apparent friendship which then subsisted. I saw besides, that he was using means to dispossess me, and to raise an old servant of mine, on some pretence, that he might answer his purpose; and he was determined to get a writing from me, authorizing him to follow these wicked inclinations. That I might not appear much in fault; that I might throw off all blame from lord Pigot; and that I might put off the evil day a little longer, I sent him the copy of a letter, which he declared good for nothing, and therefore returned it. He in this manner, for five days returned five different copies. I pretended four days illness to gain time; he waited on me the 3d of March, and said a great deal, after which I gave him a paper without signature or seal, folded in a cover only, and without a bag, which he forwarded to the governor. This likewise, when he got translated, he disputed on parts of it, and endeavoured to invent objections to it. If he had written in the same manner to Madras, do you prevent his schemes from taking effect. I have done every thing in my power. Being thus attacked by public and private enemies, I gave this paper, that I might obtain ease until the company's orders arrive. If I had not done so, my honour would not remain; and had that gone, my life would have followed. If God favours me in future, I have an able friend to assist me, and it is in this confidence I have given the paper, that I may secure the present. It was obtained from me by force, and not with my consent. I am pleased that so much is over. Should any more mischief follow, I am ready with my life to oppose it. Let all this be known to my friend through the mediator. I send a copy of the draught of a letter to Mr. Stratton, pray attend to it, let it not transpire, let it be shewn to those who ought to know it, and not according to their opinion,

"Colonel Stuart took great pains to induce me to lay some crime to the charge of lord Pigot. To this alone I would give no ear. Rather than be guilty of it, I would forfeit my life, and I therefore treated the proposal as it deserved. With regard to money, should it be more or less, it is no matter, I do not think that of consequence, but I stopped every measure that tended to throw a blame on any one."

Reasons why it never rains at Lima.

THERE are no showers of rain at Lima, but there are wetting fogs, called there garuas, which continue the greatest part of the winter; but they are never known in summer. The winds are always limited between the South and South-east; no other wind is felt at Lima.

Experience sufficiently informs us, that the wind is more violent in some regions than in others. On the tops of high mountains mountains a strong wind is felt, when very little can be in the vallies below.—This difference is not occasioned by the inequality of the earth's surface ; the same thing is observable at sea ; consequently the surface of the earth is not the place on which its greatest force is exerted.—It is also evident, that the vapours exhaled from the earth and sea, are not formed into drops of rain, till they arrive at that region of the atmosphere in which their gravity becomes equal to that of the fluid supporting them.

From these preliminary principles, I may venture, I think, to assert, that the wind exerts its greatest force in a region of the atmosphere at some distance from the earth's surface, but not in general, higher than that where the rain is formed, or where the aqueous particles unite so as to form drops of a sensible gravity. Hence it naturally follows, that in those countries where the rays of the sun, during the summer, are nearly perpendicular to the earth's surface, the winds have the power of raising the vapours to a greater height than in winter. These vapours, on their approaching that part of the atmosphere where the wind exerts its greatest force, are hurried away before they can ascend to the height requisite for the formation of drops, and consequently no rain can be produced ; for as the vapours issue from the earth, they are wasted along the lower regions of the air ; and the wind blowing always from the south, prevents their uniting ; so that they are carried along in the lower part of the atmosphere, till they are stopped by the mountains of the Andes, and there precipitate in astonishing torrents of rain.

But, during the winter, the rays of the sun acting in a more oblique direction, the vapours become less ratified, and the atmosphere considerably more condensed ; and hence those wetting fogs called Garuas, which are almost continual at Lima during the winter, are formed. From what has been said it will follow, that in any country or climate where the same winds always prevail, there can be no formal rain ; for in order to form it, either the wind must entirely cease or an opposite wind must arise, which, by checking the course of the vapours, brings them into contact with those already exhaled from the earth, and causes them to condense in proportion as they ascend, by the action of the sun, till being rendered heavier than the air by which they are supported, they precipitate in drops of rain.

History of the Fourth Session of the British Parliament.

[The importance of the Proceedings of the last Sessions of the British Parliament, being greatly diminished by the critical state of affairs in the present Session, we shall omit any prosecution of those Proceedings, and confine ourselves to give an Account of what is now transacting in Parliament, which we are enabled to do in a more full and circumstantial Manner, than can be derived from any series of News-papers.]

Thursday, November 18, 1777.

THE King came to the House of Lords, and having sent for the Commons, delivered the following speech to both Houses.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

It is a great satisfaction to me, that I can have recourse to the wisdom and support of my parliament, in this conjuncture, when the continuance of the rebellion in North America demands our most serious attention. The powers, which you have entrusted me with for the suppression of this revolt, have been faithfully exerted ; and I have a just confidence, that the conduct and courage of my officers, and the intrepidity of my forces, both by sea and land, will, under the blessing of Divine Providence, be attended with important success : but as I am persuaded, that you will see the necessity of preparing for such further operations, as the contingencies of the war, and the obstinacy of the rebels may render expedient, I am for that purpose, pursuing the proper measures for keeping my land forces complete to their present establishment ; and if I should have occasion to increase them, by contracting any new engagements, I rely on your zeal and public spirit to enable me to make them good.

I receive repeated assurances from foreign powers, of their pacific dispositions. My own cannot be doubted : but, at this time, when the armaments in the ports of France and Spain continue, I have thought it advisable to make a considerable augmentation to my naval force, as well to keep my kingdoms in a respectable state of security, as to provide an adequate protection for the extensive commerce of my subjects ; and as, on the one hand, I am determined that the peace of Europe shall not be disturbed by me, so, on the other, I will always be a faithful guardian of the honour of the crown of Great Britain.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons.

I have ordered the estimates for the ensuing uing year to be laid before you. The various services which I have mentioned to you will unavoidably require large supplies ; and nothing could relieve my mind from the concern which I feel for the heavy charge which they must bring on my faithful people, but the perfect conviction that they are necessary for the welfare and the essential interests of my kingdoms.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I will steadily pursue the measures in which we are engaged for the re-establishment of that constitutional subordination, which, with the blessing of God, I will maintain through the several parts of my dominions : but I shall ever be watchful for an opportunity of putting a stop to the effusion of the blood of my subjects, and the calamities which are inseparable from a state of war. And I still hope, that the deluded and unhappy multitude will return to their allegiance ; and that the remembrance of what they once enjoyed, the regret for what they have lost, and the feelings of what they now suffer, under the arbitrary tyranny of their leaders, will rekindle in their hearts a spirit of loyalty to their sovereign, and of attachment to their mother country ; and that they will enable me, with the concurrence and support of my parliament, to accomplish, what I shall consider as the greatest happiness of my life, and the greatest glory of my reign, the restoration of peace, order, and confidence to my American colonies.

The speech being twice read, as usual, from the woollack, and then by the deputy clerk of the crown,

Lord Percy acquainted the house, that it had fallen to his lot to have the honour of moving an address, in answer to the most gracious speech now read. He acknowledged his own insufficiency for an undertaking which called for the most zealous and energetic language that house was capable of expressing itself in. His lordship observed, an event had happened since they last sat there, which ought to give every noble lord present the most heart felt pleasure ; that was, the birth of a princess, as it was an additional security to the Protestant religion, and the enjoyment of those constitutional rights which were known to be so peculiarly the care of the amiable and virtuous sovereign on the throne, and were likely to be transmitted to the latest posterity, through his illustrious house. He then applied himself particularly to the contents of the speech, and passed the highest encomiums on the humane but firm spirit with which it was fraught. He acknowledged his obligations in common with the officers serving in America, for the very gracious testimony which has been given to their services by their royal master, and the high confidence he expressed, in the spirit and intrepidity of his forces, both by sea and land. He lamented, as a professional man, what a disagreeable situation persons serving in high commands stood in, when accidents, which it was frequently not in the power of the greatest military skill or foresight to defecy or prevent, were attributed to neglect or incapacity. He lamented the fate of those brave and able men, who were thus liable to suffer under such censures ; and whose absence in a distant country, necessarily prevented them from having an opportunity to defend themselves. From his own knowledge, he could affirm, that they were as cruel as ill-founded. It was impossible at this distance, to pass a judgment on the operations of war ; it was injudicious and unfair to estimate their propriety by the events. It was with particular satisfaction, therefore, that he perceived his majesty and his ministers, and he believed a very great majority of the nation, entertained sentiments of a very different kind. A great deal had been already done, considering what great obstacles were to be surmounted ; and he had the best founded hope, he said, that the issue would be no less prosperous, than the measures hitherto adopted were wise, and the execution of them honourable and glorious to those to whom it was entrusted.

His lordship expressed great sorrow for the occasion of the war, and the effusion of human blood, which was inseparable from such a state ; but he was convinced, how much soever his majesty, the parliament, and the nation might feel on the occasion, the temper of America made it necessary ; the people there had been deluded and misled by their leaders ; and nothing, he feared, would compel them to return to their allegiance, but a continuance of the same decisive exertions on our part, till we were fully enabled to convince them, that as our rights were indisputably supreme, so our strength was fully adequate to their full maintenance and support.

He concluded his remarks on the speech, with passing great commendations on that humane, gracious, fatherly spirit which, he said, it breathed, and the invitation it held forth to our deluded colonies, to return to their loyalty and their former constitutional connection, and attachment to this country. His lordship moved, that an humble address be presented to his majesty, to return his majesty the thanks of this house, for his most gracious speech from the throne, re-echoing back every sentence thereof.

The earl of Chesterfield seconded the motion, in a few words. He said, our commanders in America, both by sea and land, were entitled to our highest confidence and thanks, and he made no doubt that their military skill, and the native bravery, intrepidity, and discipline of the troops, would in the end prevail. He lamented the occasion of employing them; but, he observed, it became necessary.

The earl of Coventry. I have frequently, almost as often as the question has recurred, given my opinion of the impolicy of coercing America. I mean, in any or either event, practicable or impracticable; and I am sorry that the means employed, as far as they have come to the knowledge of this house, have been so many fresh confirmations, that I have not been mistaken. Not a noble lord in this house is more firmly persuaded than myself, that the supreme dominion and controul over every part and dependency of this empire, is ultimately lodged in this legislature. The very essence and being of government require such a supremacy to be lodged somewhere; and it can hardly be seriously asserted, that the controul necessary to carry on the purposes of civil government, can be either divided or vested elsewhere. This supreme power, I do venture to affirm, pervades every part of the British dominions; but, while I contend for this, I am equally convinced of the absurdity of exerting it at first, and the still greater folly of persevering in a conduct which, I fear, will sooner or later prove the destruction of this country. I now recommend what I have frequently before urged to your lordships, to consider this country and America not what they are, but what they must be.—Observe the scale both countries are laid down upon; consider the very different states they are however slowly, approaching to. Attend to the vast extent of one, and the diminutive figure of Britain; to their domestic situations; to the increase of population in one, and the inevitable decline of it in the other; the luxury, dissipation, and all their concomitant effects in this country, and the frugality, industry, and consequent wise policy of America. These, my lords, were the main grounds on which I presumed to trouble you from time to time on this subject. I foresaw then, as I continue to do still, that a period must arrive, when America would render herself independent; that this country would fall, and the seat of empire be removed beyond the Atlantic; may, my lords, so firmly persuaded am I of the event, that I always held it as a certain and natural consequence of the connection between both countries.

I should, my lords, be very sorry to be misunderstood, as if I desired to accelerate the independence of America, on account of its unimportance to this country; nothing can be, or ever was farther from my thoughts; I know its value too well: I wished for the farther enjoyment of it, till I perceived that such an expectation was founded in error: that moment arrived, the instant the question relative to the right was agitated, or at least persisted in, so as to lay a foundation for measures of coercion, so long as we could have held America as a dependency, acknowledging spontaneously her subordination and political obedience to this country, America was worth retaining; when that friendly tie was broken, we should have endeavoured to conciliate; and if that did not succeed, then have proclaimed her independent, and brought over as friends and allies those whom a contrary conduct would of necessity have made our most inveterate and powerful enemies.

But, my lords, besides those general reasons, which I have several times submitted to your consideration, others have since arisen, that give, in my opinion, additional weight to my former arguments; the chief of which is, the immediate impracticability and danger of the measures now pursuing; the imminent peril of not only the premature loss of our colonies, but, what I think infinitely more important, the destruction of this country; the precipitating us into that ruin which could not be effected but by the slow progressive operations of those political causes, which I have now alluded to; causes, which must, in all human probability, have taken place, at some very remote and distant period. Let your lordships advert seriously to the true state of this country; the critical situation, of affairs in America; the disposition of foreign powers; their ability and inclination to annoy us; the uncertainty of military events, and the numerous difficulties attending the carrying on a war at such a distance; in short, the manifold great obstructions both natural and artificial, this nation has to contend with: and I much doubt but your lordships will be strongly inclined to look forward to the very alarming and serious consequences, a perseverance such as that now recommended from the throne, may, nay I fear must, be productive of. For my part, I see nothing but ruin before us, should they be adopted. Though late, I think it is better to sit down with our present loss, than continue to multiply those perils which surround us on every side. I think the only measure which promises even a temporary preservation, is to withdraw our fleets and armies; and, by making a virtue of necessity, declare America independent.

These, my lords, being my declared sentiments from the beginning, it cannot be supposed that I will give my concurrence to any vote for the further prosecuting this ruinous, mad, destructive war: I have risen therefore, my lords, to give my direct negative to the address now moved.

The earl of Chatham. My lords, I most cheerfully agree with the first paragraph of the address moved by the noble lord. I would even go prostrate myself at the foot of the throne, were it necessary, to testify my joy at any event which may promise to add to the domestic felicity of my sovereign, at any thing which may seem to give a farther security to the permanent enjoyment of the religious and civil rights of my fellow-subjects; but while I do this, I must at the same time express my strongest disapprobation of the address, and the fatal measures which it approves. My lords, it was customary for the king, on similar occasions, not to lead parliament, but to be guided by it. It was usual, I say, my lords, to ask the advice of this house, the hereditary great council of the nation, not to dictate to it. My lords, what does this speech say? It tells you of measures already agreed upon, and very cavalierly desires your concurrence. It indeed talks of wisdom and support; it counts on the certainty of events yet in the womb of time; but in point of plan and design it is peremptory and dictatorial. Is this a proper language to be used to your lordships? Is this a language fit to be endured? Is this high pretension to over-rule the dispositions of Providence itself, and the will and judgment of parliament, justified by any former conduct or precedent prediction?—No, my lords, it is the language of an ill founded confidence; a confidence, my lords, I will be bold to say, supported hitherto only by a succession of disappointments, disgraces, and defeats. I am astonished how any minister dare advise his majesty to hold such a language to your lordships. I would be glad to see the minister that dare avow it in his place. What is the import of this extraordinary application? What, but an unlimited confidence in those who have hitherto misguided, deceived, and misled you? It is, I maintain, unlimited: it desires you to grant, not what you may be satisfied is necessary, but what his majesty's ministers may chuse to think so: troops, fleets, treaties, and subsidies, not yet revealed. Should your lordships agree to the present address, you will stand pledged to all this; you cannot retreat; it binds you to the consequences, be they what they may.

My lords, whoever gave this pernicious counsel to the king, ought to be made answerable to this house, and to the nation at large, for the consequences. The precedent is dangerous and unconstitutional. Who, I say, has had the temerity to tell the king, that his affairs are in a prosperous condition? and who, of course, is the author of those assurances, which are this day given you, in order to mislead you?

My lords, what is the present state of this nation? It is big with difficulty and danger; it is full of the most destructive circumstances: I say, my lords, it is truly perilous. What are these little islands, Great Britain and Ireland? What is your defence? Nothing. What is the condition of your formidable and inveterate enemies, the two leading branches of the house of Bourbon? They have a formidable navy; I say, my lords, their intentions are hostile. I know it. Their coasts are lined with troops, from the furthestmost part of the coast of Spain up to Dunkirk. What have you to oppose them? Not five thousand men in this island; nor more in Ireland; nor above twenty ships of the line, manned and fit for service. My lords, without peace, without an immediate restoration of tranquility, this nation is ruined. What has been the conduct of your ministers? How have they endeavoured to conciliate the affection and obedience of their American brethren? They have gone to Germany; they have sought the alliance and assistance of every pitiful, beggarly, insignificant, paltry German prince, to cut the throats of their loyal, brave, and injured brethren in America. They have entered into mercenary treaties with those human butchers, for the purchase and sale of human blood. But, my lords, this is not all; they have entered into other treaties. They have let the savages of America loose upon their innocent, inoffending brethren; loose upon the weak, the aged, and defenceless; on old men, women, and children; upon the very babes upon the breast, to be cut, mangled, sacrificed, broiled, roasted, nay, to be literally eat. These, my lords, are the allies Great Britain now has; carnage, desolation, and destruction, wherever her arms are carried, is her newly adopted mode of making war. Our ministers ministers have made alliances at the German shambles; and with the barbarians of America, with the merciless torturers of their species: where they will next apply, I cannot tell; for my part, I should not be surprised if their next league was with the king of the Gypsies, having already scourged all Germany and America, to seek the assistance of cannibals and butchers. The arms of this country are disgraced, even in victory, as well as defeat. Is this consistent, my lords, with any part of our former conduct? Was it by means like these we arrived at that pinnacle of fame and grandeur, which, while it established our reputation in every quarter of the globe, gave the fullest testimony of our justice, mercy, and national integrity. Was it by the tomohawk and scalping-knife, that British valour and humanity became in a manner proverbial; and the honours of war, and the eclat of conquest, became but matters of secondary praise, when compared to those of national humanity and national honour? Was it by setting loose the savages of America, to embroil their hands in the blood of our enemies, that the duties of the soldier, the citizen, and the man, came to be united? Is this honourable warfare, my lords? Does it correspond with the language of the poet—"The pride, pomp and circumstance of glorious war, that makes ambition virtue."

No, my lords, if success is ever to attend the British arms, Britain must recur to her former means of conquest. America will never submit to be slaughtered by foreign mercenaries. If any thing is to be effected, it must be by British levies, and British valour. In such a cause, should the raising of the British troops become necessary, I should, cheerfully co-operate. I would my lords, sell my shirt off my back to assist in proper measures, properly and wisely conducted; but I would not part with a single shilling to the present ministers. Their plans are founded in destruction and disgrace. It is, my lords, a ruinous and destructive war; it is full of danger; it teems with disgrace, and must end in ruin. Our coasts are daily insulted; our seas are torn with American privateers; we are destitute of protection; and we have lost the port of Lisbon, the only safe resort of our fleets, ships of war, and merchant-men. Should France and Spain throw off the mask, and declare against us; should we continue to prosecute the same destructive system we have been now for the three last years unhappily and madly engaged in, that truly alarming event cannot be far distant. Those powers will most inevitably profit of our want of wisdom, if we do not immediately prevent it. The moment is critical, our situation is perilous, and we should trust as little as possible to events, which, according to every probable appearance, are more likely to make against, than for us.

My lords, the house of Bourbon is ready to break with us; they abet the cause of our subjects. Now is the time, my lords, in which only we shall have it in our power to treat with America. France and Spain have done a great deal; but they have declined to do all that America has desired. America is in an ill humour; it may now be detached from its connections with those powers, if reasonable terms of accommodation are held out to them; if not, the opportunity will be lost; an opportunity, I will venture to say, we shall never again have. But your lordships will ask, supposing we were willing to treat, is America equally well inclined? To this I shall generally answer, that I think the political connection and superiority of this country with and over America is indissoluble and indisputable. I think this empire to be entire, but the peculiar rights, privileges, and immunities of its several constituent parts, to be sacred and inviolable; I was consequently against any express parliamentary avowal of that right, because I thought it impolitic and unnecessary; [He alluded to the declaratory law.] but as to America, and its views of independency, I must own, I always looked upon that country to be as much a part of Great Britain, to every purpose but that of taxation, as Devonshire, Surry, or Middlesex. When I say this, I would be perfectly and clearly understood, to reserve the colonies their municipal rights; the preservation of their charters; and above all, the right of taxing themselves; for without this last right, I can never be brought to believe that America will return to its former state; or if it should, that the colonies would have, in truth, anything they could justly call their own. I would have your lordships consider what this unlimited claim of taxation goes to, that a venal herd, at three thousand miles distance, assume to themselves the power of disposing of the fortunes and estates of a people, whose temper, abilities, and dispositions, whose wants, grievances, or material interests, they are totally ignorant of. There are many men of property in America; and of landed property too. Mr. Washington, who now commands what is called this night the rebel forces, is worth five thousand pounds a year; there are many others, men of considerable fortunes, sense, and understanding. Can it be believed, is it natural to expect that such such men of native weight, abilities, and consequence, will ever acknowledge a right of taxation, which would subject their property to the arbitrary controul and disposition of persons with whom they are totally unacquainted and unconnected? The idea is absurd. The Americans are a wise, industrious, and prudent people. They possess too much good sense, and too much spirit, to ever submit to hold their properties on so precarious and disgraceful a tenure. They see us, besides, immersed in luxury, dissipation, venality, and corruption; they perceive, that if even they were willing to contribute, to what purposes their contributions would be applied; to nothing but the extinction of public and private virtue there, as has already been the case here. The idea of taxation, my lords, I think, therefore, both unjust and impracticable; but the great bond of union, the only tax we should or ought to expect from them, that derived from their trade, must be secured. I will never consent to the American claims of sovereignty. If there be any in this house, who contend for it, I disclaim all connections with them. I shall be ever for securing the constitutional dependency of the colonies on this country; and it is principally with that view I make the present motion, which is solely directed to that point. An opening now presents itself. I would wish your lordships to embrace it. I mean to propose a cessation of hostilities, as the first step towards so desirable a work. If your lordships should approve of it, I mean to follow it with a proposition for appointing a committee to consider of such immediate measures as may empower the crown to send commissioners, vested with certain powers, to treat on specific terms; and if America should prove deaf to all reasonable overtures on our part, in which, as the basis of the whole, the preservation of the act of navigation should be one; then it will remain with your lordships to consider of the properest measures to compel them to a performance of that duty, which they would, by so unnatural a conduct, most unjustly withhold. I think I might safely pledge myself that such an offer would not fail to succeed. I know that faction reigns in some part of America, and that, probably, some who compose that faction look for independency, and nothing else. I know too that the middle colonies are more temperate, and that they, and those to the southward, if they had the security now mentioned, would gladly return to their former state. Many other objections may be raised against such a plan. It may be said, who shall offer, and where will be the security on either hand for a faithful performance, should the troops be withdrawn, or the levies disbanded? To this I answer, not by any declarations of right here, or assertions of it there, but barely by operative acts here, consented to, acknowledged and ratified by the several assemblies in America. These are my ideas, founded, I believe, on a thorough knowledge of the people of that country. I know that the war you are carrying on there is a ruinous one, and totally impracticable. I know, if you should determine to prosecute it, you must raise home levies; for I am persuaded that the colonies will never consent to treat with you, nor submit, while there is a single foreign troop in your service. His lordship then moved the following amendment:

“That this house does most humbly advise and supplicate his majesty, to be pleased to cause the most speedy and effectual measures to be taken for restoring peace in America, and that no time may be lost, in proposing an immediate cessation of hostilities there, in order to the opening a treaty for the final settlement of the tranquility of those invaluable provinces, by a removal of the unhappy causes of this ruinous civil war, and by a just and adequate security against a return of the like calamities in times to come. And this house desires to offer the most dutiful assurance to his majesty, that they will in due time cheerfully co-operate with the magnanimity and tender goodness of his majesty, for the preservation of his people, by such explicit and most solemn declarations and provisions of fundamental and irrevocable laws, as may be judged necessary for ascertaining and fixing for ever the respective rights of Great Britain and her colonies.”

On Cruelty: from moral and entertaining Dialogues, in English and French, for the Improvement of Youth. By Mrs. Vaucluse.

IN an island in the Indian sea lived a people, towards whom nature had been profuse of all the gifts which constitute human happiness. The men were robust and comely, the women beautiful and modest; both sexes had a sprightly wit, a lively imagination, and no despicable share of good sense. Their country was a terrestrial paradise. . . . No venomous or ferocious animals had ever haunted this charming abode; but the laborious ox, the indefatigable camel, the tractable elephant, the noble horse, the peaceful sheep, the faithful dog, with all the frisky herds of fawns, antelopes, deers, and stags, obsequiously quiously obeyed the lordly species, in which reason has the advantage to express itself through the organ of speech. Here the ears were charmed with the music of tuneful and sociable birds, while the sportive and fearless fish, gliding along a thousand rivulets, amused the eyes.

But pride, the fore-runner of a thousand evils, infatuated this people. They began to look upon themselves as the only inhabitants of the earth, who deserved the care of Heaven. The presents of nature seemed to them an offering due to their worth; and in this intoxication, throwing the eyes of contempt around, they imagined that the animals which their forefathers had treated as intimate friends, were born to be their slaves, and ought to be treated as such:

The spur was invented to animate the horse, the goad to excite the ox, and the whip and chain to deal round their chastisements.

The best and swiftest steed could not slacken his pace through weariness, or stumble accidentally, without having his flanks torn to pieces by the cruel iron. The ox could not endeavour to breathe under the weight of the yoke, without being pierced through by the sharp steel. The watchful dog was oft beaten from the threshold he used to guard; and the quiet sheep which inadvertently strayed from the flock, groaned all her way back under the strokes of the un pitying shepherd's crook.

This unjust people stopped not there in the despotic use of the power they had usurped. They now found no better, no nobler diversion, than that of torturing all these creatures, which they were bound to protect. They forced the fearful natives of the forests, whom their ancestors had rendered sociable, to follow again their savage life, merely for the barbarous pleasure of chasing them, and disturbing their peace.

They spread snares against the inhabitants of the air; and found more delight in seeing them vainly endeavouring to break through the unnatural prison in which they detained them, than in all the charms of their sweet melody. They no more admired the nimbleness of the fish; to see them panting in the nets, or agonizing upon the sand, was a spectacle infinitely more agreeable to their sight, or rather to their vanity; for they gloried in having the art of tyrannizing over the animals in every element.

The cries of these innocent sufferers at last provoked the divine wrath. A celestial messenger was dispatched to a sage, with orders to inform his deluded countrymen, either to behave towards the soft and mild animals with the kindness that all beings owe to each other, or to be deprived of their society and services within five days.

The sage delivered this decisive message, and left them in an astonishment, which kept them from giving vent to their indignation. At last Cabul, whose overbearing temper had got the ascendancy in their meetings; rose up and said Shall we give up the dignity of our nature for some inconveniences, which our ingenuity can easily supply? No, rather let all those so much praised animals vanish from their respective elements. . . . The giddy multitude was easily seduced. Some dared the threatened fate, and others, merely from curiosity desired it. On a sudden the sky was overspread with impenetrable darkness. Ah inexpressible consternation succeeded; when, at the return of light they looked at each other, and saw themselves divested of their magnificent robes and head dresses, barefooted, and almost entirely naked.

As they had not apprehended that this misfortune was meant in the threats of the sage, they were the more affected by it; especially the fair-ones, who could not sustain, without bitter lamentations, the loss of the ornaments with which they thought to enhance their beauty, and who had made a large provision of them; for, when they had consented to a future privation, they were far from imagining they should undergo it so soon, having renounced these vanities for their daughters rather than for themselves.

However, all that which had been the property of the animals vanished with them; as the silk, the wool, skins, feathers, pearls, and every thing made with shells, ivory, horn, and other ingredients of luxury; in short, they lost at once not only the help but also the treasures and commodities they had received, whether as gifts or inheritance from those innocent creatures they had so rashly given up.

As they uttered the dictates of a despair blended with rage, their words resounded, as it were, through an immense vacuity, and struck their own ears with a dreadful echo: for the continual though unheeded noise of those beings, who, whether or not perceptible to our eyes, inhabit the four elements, no longer modified the effect of the human voice, and all harmony was broken.

When their first amazement and confusion was a little subsided, and they found themselves obliged to submit to their destiny, they attended to the consolations which the the obdurate Cabul endeavoured to give them.

"Look yonder at these yellow sheaves bending under their precious charge," said he, "this is the reward of man's industry; he alone knows how to render the corn an agreeable and wholesome food, with which want never can assault him. Behold these grapes, which promise us a delicious juice; these fragrant olive trees, these exquisite fruits, and healthy vegetables; and dare to regret the insipidity of milk, eggs and honey.

"It is true, we are deprived of our rich vestments; but who can hinder us from weaving our cotton with gold, and adding to its whiteness a lustre above the finest silk? These mines of diamonds and precious stones will amply supply the baubles we have lost, and better become the exalted heads of the masters of this globe. As to the additional labour that we shall be obliged to undergo, it will be a salutary exercise, and even a pleasing occupation, when we shall remember that we have preserved the glory of our nature by it."

With these encouragements, and a strength not yet exhausted, they went thro' the fatigue of reaping the presents of the earth; and, though they wanted the most commodious implements, performed the different works which necessity proscribed and luxury designed with a seeming alacrity. But, when the season for ploughing arrived, their fortitude was abated; the beasts, on whom the harder part of this task had fallen, were feelingly regretted: and agriculture was no more an agreeable employment.

Whether the furrows of their own making proved not half so deep as those they had before made with the help of oxen; whether the land was become barren for want of those myriads of insects and reptiles which fatten it; the harvest repayed not their labour, and hardly afforded them provision for the year. The trees and shrubs shewed the same sterility; the fruits and herbs had lost their wonted favour; because those almost invisible and wisely created beings, who soberly feed upon them, prepared them not for receiving the best influence of the sun; but above all, because provident nature, who suits her productions to the number of her children, had retrenched an abundance unnecessary to a single species, and undeserved by ungrateful men.

The scarcity of food not only discouraged the arts among them, but also raised in their minds envy, injustice, and distrust. He who had hoarded a greater provision than his neighbour, was in perpetual fear of his encroachment upon it.

His house being no more under the guard of faithful dogs, he was obliged to add painful watchings to the fatigue of the day: for no mercenary help could be gotten, when gold afforded not the means of a subsistence which every one was afraid of wanting.

Memoirs of the Right Honourable Edmund Sexton Pery.

THE next day, Nov. 9, 1763, Mr. Pery made a fresh display of his abilities, and gave a new proof of his regard for the welfare of his country: He said "it was allowed by every person who spoke in the debate on the preceding day, that the extraordinary increase of pensions had laid a burthen upon the nation, which it could not possibly bear; and as the continuation of them must, therefore, tend to subvert the constitution, he thought it his duty to mention this, that some method might be thought of to represent the sense of the house, in the humblest manner, to his majesty, in hopes of redress. And though the mode that was proposed yesterday (by Mr. Fitzgibbons, see p. 668) for making that representation, was not generally approved, he made no doubt but that another might be found that would be so; and he was confident that every member would concur in the attempt;" he therefore proposed "that a committee might be appointed to inquire what method of representation would be most proper, and to draw up such representation accordingly."

The increase of pensions has long been a bone of contention, and administration hath constantly found mouths enough to pick it clean: It was therefore not to be expected but Mr. Pery's proposal would be opposed. One gentleman* opposed it as premature, but afterwards consented that the motion should be made; and it was carried that the house would, on Tuesday following, resolve itself into a committee, to consider the subject: but on Saturday, Nov. 12, it was postponed to Wednesday; but that full information might be had, it was ordered that the agent to the pensioners should attend, and that returns should be made of all absent pensioners who had licenses of absence, as well as those who had none.

When this important day came, Mr. Pery moved that the house should resolve itself into the committee, but as some kind of assurance had been previously given, that no pension for life or years should be granted for the future, except

N O T E.

* Mr. Tisdall, attorney-general.

on extraordinary occasions, a member thence took occasion to oppose going into the committee, till they could have a sufficient reason to distrust the assurance, and actually moved to postpone the question till the first day of July next.

This proceeding produced a kind of previous debate: Mr. Pery immediately opposed the motion in these words:

"I remember, and so I am sure does every gentleman present, that when the motion for determining the right of granting pensions by a trial at law was rejected (see p. 668) it was the unanimous opinion of this house, that pensions were such a grievance, as a committee ought to be appointed to inquire into and consider how to redress; and that the house did, accordingly, come to an unanimous resolution to resolve itself into a committee for that purpose on the next Tuesday: but as other indispensable business took up great part of that day, it was made another unanimous resolution of the house, that the consideration of the state of the pensions, and how to prevent their increase, should be undertaken this day.—But I am sorry to say, that, notwithstanding these resolutions, I have but too much reason to believe the sitting of such a committee was never intended; and I think it my duty to communicate such reason of my belief to the house. As I was coming last Monday from the Four Courts in my chair, I was stopped by a particular friend, a gentleman of great worth and consequence, who asked me whether I intended to go that day to the house? I answered that I did not, as I knew of nothing that made my attendance necessary; and that as I had been much fatigued by the business of the house and of the courts, I intended to make that a day of rest. He replied, 'You may not only take your rest this day, but every other day of the sessions, for things are now fixed, so as to admit of no alteration; no inquiry will be made into the state of the pensions, nor any thing else done, but what has been agreed upon with those who are to take the lead.'"

To this I answered with great surprise, that I could scarce think what he told me was possible; that the house had been unanimous for an examination, and had actually appointed a committee for that purpose but a few days ago; that the public expected it, and that to disappoint them in an expectation so reasonable, and on an occasion so important, would be wholly inconsistent with the dignity, as well as the duty of the house, as the members would then appear to be nothing more than state puppets, with wires in their noses, by which they were turned first one way, and then another, just as those who had the management of them thought fit."

Mr. Pery would have proceeded, had he not been interrupted by a member*, who either thought or affected to think the house had been reflected on, and its members called mere puppets. He condemned the repeating of private conversation, which he called retailing the impertinences of a busy traitor. He dwelt on the royal assurance, and agreed to postpone the enquiry to the first of July.

Mr. Pery then rose, and appealed to all if he had called the members puppets, but only said they would appear such, if what his friend said was true.

In this he was defended by another member†, who as well as three others‡ spoke for going into the committee; but it being strongly opposed by three gentlemen on the other side§, the putting off the committee was carried by 126 to 78, thereby shewing Mr. Pery's intelligence was but too true.

But although Mr. Pery had been disappointed in his public spirited intention, he was not yet disheartened. The affair of pensions he thought too important to be easily relinquished. He resolved to try it in divers modes and shapes; and on the 24th of November, 1763, he again brought it before the house by the following speech and motion:

"Mr. Speaker,

"I think one of the greatest disadvantages arising from the grant of pensions, is the enriching aliens with the treasure of our country. I shall communicate a note to this house, from which it will appear that the grant of pensions to aliens is supposed to be contrary to the sense of the nation, even by the advisers of such grant, and therefore not avowed, though made. There is a pension granted nominally to one George Charles, but really to monsieur

‡ Mr. Robert French, member for Carrick, the late right hon. Anthony Malone, member for Castle-martyr, and Mr. Thomas Le Hunte, member for Wexford.

Viri, the Sardinian ambassador, for negotiating the peace that had just been concluded with the minister of France. I must confess, sir, in my opinion, this service deserved no such recompence, at least on our part; so that, in this case, our money is not only granted to an alien, but to an alien who has no merit to plead: If it is thought a defensible measure, I should be glad to know why it was not avowed? and why, if it is proper we should pay 1000l. a year to monsieur Viri, why we should be made to believe that we pay it to George Charles? In short, sir, as pensions are indiscriminately given for all purposes, upon all occasions, and to all persons, both for lives and for years, I think it is a duty incumbent on this house to address his majesty on the occasion, and to represent to him the real state of the kingdom, which there is the greatest reason to fear has not been sufficiently done; for his majesty's paternal regard for his people is too well known for us to suppose he would permit any measure to take place, by which they were essentially injured, if he was fully apprized of its contents: I therefore move 'That an humble address be presented to his majesty, to assure his majesty of our inviolable attachment to his royal person and family; that we have the firmest reliance on his majesty's wisdom, justice, and tender regard for his subjects of this kingdom: but that we should fail in our duty to his majesty, and desert the trust reposed in us by those we represent, should we longer defer laying before his majesty the real state of this kingdom, which we have some reason to fear may not yet have been fully presented to his majesty's view. That we presume to do so from a firm persuasion, that his majesty will not believe that we are prompted to it by the spirit of faction, but impelled by the necessities of the kingdom, as that we have nothing in view but his majesty's honour, and the prosperity of our country. That during the late successful war we exerted our utmost efforts for the support of his majesty's government, and to raise such supplies as his majesty thought necessary for his service, though it was with the greatest difficulty we could even provide for payment of the interest of the sums we were obliged to borrow for that purpose: but at the same time we could not, without the greatest concern, observe (though we lamented it in silence) the great and continual increase of pension, and that a considerable part of these sums which were destined for public uses, was diverted to private purposes. That this is one great cause of the heavy debt which oppresses this kingdom, and which we can scarce ever hope to discharge, deprived as we are of these resources from trade, with which the other parts of his majesty's dominions are blessed. That any considerable addition to this burthen must depopulate this kingdom, already much exhausted of its inhabitants. That we presume, with all humility, to lay those our circumstances before his majesty, not doubting that they will excite in his royal breast those sentiments which are so natural to his princely disposition."

This motion, though as modest and respectful as it was just, did not please administration, it was strongly opposed, and passed in the negative, 194 against 55.

Mr. Pery then moved "That an address of thanks be presented to his majesty, for his gracious intentions towards this kingdom, concerning the not granting of pensions for lives and years on this establishment, signified by one of his majesty's principal secretaries of state to his excellency the lord lieutenant, and by him communicated to one of his majesty's principal servants in this kingdom, and by him to the house."

This motion met with the fate of the former: for though all preceding motions concerning pensions were argued against from this very royal assurance, yet now no mention was to be made of it, because it had not come before the house in a parliamentary way.

Not being able to prevail in those two motions, Mr. Pery proposed a third, viz.

"That an humble address be presented to his majesty, that he will be graciously pleased to recall the pension of 1000l. a year, granted to George Charles, Esq; on the 15th day of last July, for the term of 31 years, in trust for the Sardinian minister, as a reward for negotiating the treaty of peace with France and Spain."

This also passed in the negative without a division.

N. B. It may not be improper to observe that the pension list at that time amounted to 75,000l. a year, and at present it is mounted to 89,095l. 17s. 6d. per annum.

The charming Villager.

THE amiable and young Rosalinda had formerly friends. Fortune at first smiled on her, but deceived her from her birth; for, in her early years, she had no other support than heaven and her innocence. She lived in a cabin with her mother, an aged, feeble, and poor widow!

Both

Both sequestered in a tranquil valley, hidden by solitude and the tufted thicket, but still more by shame, the companion of poverty, from which even modesty is not exempt. They avoided together that cruel scorn, to which virtue, reduced to wretchedness, beholds itself exposed, from the extravagant passions and the wild pride of the human mind. The common bounties of nature constituted almost the whole expence of their repast. They lived contented, and without care of the morrow, like the birds, whose melody procured them a sweet repose.

Rosalinda's beauty was brilliant as the rose, when the freshness of the morning dew humects its leaves, and it was pure as the lily, and as the mountain snow. The modest virtues glistened in her lovely eyes, which darted only their humid rays on the pride of the flowers. Sometimes, when her mother related to her, the mournful tale of what faithless Fortune had formerly promised her, her thoughts were in agitation, and her eyes, like unto the stars of the night that sheds the dew, were seen bathed in tears. A native grace animated her whole person; her charms were veiled by a plain garment, an ornament preferable to all the pomp of dres, for real charms stand in no need of such foreign succours, and the less a fine girl is adorned, the more lovely she appears. In short, she was beauty itself, secreted among the shrubs that sheltered her, and unacquainted with herself. As a myrtle, raised out of the reach of the human eye, in the profound recesses of the Appenine, under the protection of the environing hills, diffuses its perfumes over the desert, so flourished the sweet Rosalinda, unknown to all, till forced by the supreme law of dire necessity, with patience in her heart, and gentleness in her looks, she set out to make hay in the fields of Collin.

He was the ornament of the swains, generous, opulent, and leading a rural life in all its joys and elegance, such as the poets of Arcadia have celebrated and transmitted to us from remote and innocent times—times when custom did not tyrannise over the happiness of men, but permitted them to follow nature in the bosom of peace. Collin's imagination was amusing itself with the useful scenes of his harvest, as he walked about among his haymakers, when poor Rosalinda attracted his looks. She did not know the power of her beauty, and blushing, turned out of his way. Collin was smitten with so many charms, though he saw but half of them. At that instant, love and chaste desire started up in his heart without his perceiving them: he knew not whether he ought to own the power, which an hired haymaker had acquired over him. Abashed and confounded he sighed in secret.

What a mishap (said he) that so delicate a figure, so beautiful, and so charming, on whose countenance something noble, together with goodness seems painted, should be delivered over to the rude embraces of some gross peasant. She is worthy of being allied to the race of old Damon, and she recalls to my mind the beneficent patron of my happy life, to whom I owe the beginnings of my great fortune. He is now no more; his houses, his lands, and his family, formerly gay and extensive, are dispersed, or gone into other hands. It is said, that his aged widow and his daughter abide in some obscure retreat, forced by sad remembrance and decent pride to remove from places, of which they were the ornament in more fortunate times. To this day, I have not been able to find them out: all my enquiries have been in vain. Strange desire, how I wish that she were his daughter!"

He then informed himself of every thing from her own mouth, and found that she was the daughter of his friend, the good Damon. What can express the power of those passions, which were now united in his heart, and the agitation of his different transports! his hidden flame caught fire, and blazed up in a moment! it no longer raised the blush of shame in his face, and he became less timid. He continually gazed on her with ardour and love, gratitude and pity uniting in his soul, they suddenly forced tears from him. Confused and affrighted by these sudden tears, Rosalinda displayed greater beauties; and Collin, given up to a passion which every thing justified in him, thus expressed the pious extasies of his heart.

"Art thou the precious remains of Damon; thou, whom my gratitude has so long sought after in vain? yes, thou art the person, the sweet image of my noble friend! thou art more delightful and brilliant than the spring. O amiable flower! the only young branch of that tree which raised my fortune! tell me, in what remote desert thou hast invited to smile on thee, the benign aspect of favourable heaven? how didst thou attain to that fresh and florid beauty, notwithstanding the piercing wind of poverty, and the ice of indigence freezing down thy tender years? May it now be permitted me to transplant thee in safety into a richer soil, where the sun and spring showers shall spread about their influence; and shall not thou be the pride and glory of my garden?"

how could it be, that the daughter of Damon should be necessitated to make hay in those fields, the possession of which I owe to his beneficent friendship? he was the father of the country, and his treasures, always open, were, though abundant, too little for a heart that was unbounded. Throw away that rake from a hand that was not made for such an implement. The fields, the house, the master, all are thine. if thou art pleased to add to the good things thy family has lavished on me, that which is dearest to me of all, the power of making thee happy."

The swain then ceased speaking; but his eyes expressed the triumph and transports of his soul. Rosalinda, without answering, suffered herself to be won by the irresistible charm of goodness, and, seized with a disorder not less sweet than unknown, she consented, blushing, and hastened to impart the happy news to her mother, who solitary, and full of apprehensions for her daughter, waited her return with fear and uneasiness. Astonished she scarcely believed what she heard. Joy trickled through her dried up veins, a bright ray burst upon the decline, of her days, and she enjoyed happiness equally with that of the fortunate couple, who long enjoyed the most unalterable felicity, and transmitted it down to a numerous posterity, as amiable, as virtuous as their progenitors, and continuing to be the ornament of the whole country.

Female Virtue and Greatness displayed in Principle and Conduct.

AFTER settling all his affairs at W—n borough, Mr. Trenchard went and visited lord W—y and sir James Parker. He was there when Nancy came home, and with her Miss Amherst (who from the time of being with her on her second going to Bath, remained her steady friend through life.) Mr. Pelham was determined to have nothing to say in the affair, and had told Mr. Trenchard he could not marry him, and desired he would not say any thing to him relative to it before they were married. But he did not see his way clear to forbid the match. This made Mr. Trenchard stay at E—n, lest Nancy should be unhinged! He expected this conduct of her father would affect her tender dutiful heart. It did, when her mother told her of it, but as she at the same time had hinted to her his reasons, lady Parker and Miss Amherst kindly consoling, sir James and Mr. Trenchard using their help to fortify, and her good mother gently treating her, she bore up better than he feared. He took his leave of each of these, not to return till he came to celebrate the wedding. While he was gone, Nancy's friends were taken up in some personal preparative dispositions. She had handsome presents from sir James Parker and his lady, and Miss Spence, a young lady of fortune, sister to, and who lived with lady Parker. Sir James gave her complete furniture for a room of yellow damask. Lady Parker a complete dress, a beautiful barred and flowered tabby, of a peach bloom colour, with laces, and other ornaments proper for it. Miss Spence a set of jewels, equal in goodnets to those clothes, and Miss Amherst a valuable assortment of family linen which she had ordered from London. Nancy did not at first design to purchase any new clothes or ornaments, but reserve what money she had saved for such necessary articles of household furniture as she judged would be most prudent. But Miss Amherst and her own mother advised her to buy with it her bridal clothes. She did, but all was neat and pretty, not at all showy; and such as became her modest aspect, air, and conduct.

Mrs. Pelham gave her daughter a blue satten negligee, which was trimmed with the same, edged with a silver gimp. From Mr. Trenchard she received all his moiety of his mother's jewels, clothes, linen, and curiosities, &c. which she accepted gracefully, but was resolved not to wear the jewels while his father remained unreconciled, as she thought it would only serve to aggravate his resentment.

When Mr. Trenchard returned home, he sent to London to his uncle and aunt Holt for a suit of clothes for himself, and another for his bride elect, which were sent to E—n. His was as rich as became his birth and fortune; for he would, on this occasion, appear as well as if he had married Miss D— or any lady of fortune, giving, as his reason, that the bulk of mankind pay as much regard to these things in such a situation as theirs, as to any one thing, and if he did not make a public appearance, would think he did not honour his own choice.

At this last time of going home he was the bearer of the following letter.

LETTER XXVI.

From Mrs. Pelham to Mrs. Butler.

Dear Madam,

NO doubt Mr. Trenchard will inform you, if he has not already, how matters stand between him and my daughter, and my dear Mr. Pelham and him. Nancy has acceded to his proposals, and I suppose they will be married soon. If at all, while sir William thinks as he doth, doth—the sooner the better. I am not a friend to young peoples keeping company long after they are determined. They are unfit for business, and are apt to trifle away precious time. But, O my friend, none but myself knows what I feel on the aspect of things. Mr. Pelham is silent, has told Mr. Trenchard he cannot be active, (you know by my former letter his reasons, and as I believe he acts from conscience I cannot urge him,) and declines to be present at their wedding. Sir James has tried his influence to bring him to alter his purpose, but has desisted since he found him resolved. The poor child was affected much when I told her this, nor can you or I wonder. She always was exemplary in attention to her father, and now that she needs his patronage, most to be disappointed, it is a hard thing to bear.—She is now more composed, and I hope will be tolerably easy when the time comes. I shall be glad when it is over, for till then a mother must feel for her child so circumstanced. Mr. Trenchard can tell you more of the plan than I can, for I do not chuse to enquire, and am easier, as such worthy judicious friends as sir James and his lady have the management. You cannot conceive how kind and generous they have been to all of us, to Nancy in particular, since Mr. Trenchard told them of his address. The most that I know is, that our valuable Dr. Onslow, of H—, is to perform the office, and that lord W— is to be her father on the occasion—this Dolly told me from lady Parker.—What shall I say? I never thought I could forbear forbidding a child of mine to accept any man whose parent refused consent; and yet, my dear friend, I can now say nothing against it. I dare not.—My child, I verily believe, doth in this what she thinks her duty—but what struggles has it cost her? Methinks, if Mr. Trenchard's father had such a tenderness for his son, as I think all parents ought to have, he could not treat him with the rigour he is said to express. I am sure neither Mr. Pelham or I could thus afflict our child, though we had rather he had dropped his suit. She has been so exercised that I could not tell what to think would be the upshot to her health, and therefore I consented to let her go with a lady to G—n, whence she is but just returned. I cannot say but hitherto I like Mr. Trenchard; he has behaved like a true gentleman here, and I have heard much in his favour diverse ways; but especially from Mr. Allen of York, whom Dr. Butler saw here last winter. He is personally acquainted with Mr. Trenchard, and on hearing of this very accidentally, has wrote largely to Mr. Pelham about him, and thinks we ought to be glad of such a gentleman, though his father should withdraw his help: he says, the young gentleman is far from an extravagant turn, yet is no niggard, but used to save from trifling ways of spending money, and do much good with his money to help poorer scholars, and that he knows he need not want for means to live as well as we desire. Nancy has been concerned on this last head, but she owns that since he laid before her an account of his means and plan of living, she is quite easy about that matter. After all I am distressed, so desirous as we are to live in peace with all men, to have this interruption to that felicity: but I cannot fathom the conduct of Providence; I desire humbly to submit where I cannot comprehend and counteract. I beg a line when Mr. Trenchard comes, and that you will tell me plainly your mind and Dr. Butler's on the subject. If you think it prudent, and your circumstances will allow, I earnestly desire a visit from both of you, my much esteemed and obliging friends; and am persuaded the presence of none would be more comforting to Mr. Pelham and Nancy, as I can assuredly say it would be exceedingly so to your already very obliged friend and servant,

A. PELHAM.

E—n, Jan. 1751.

Mr. Trenchard waited on Mrs. Butler with this letter, and discoursed largely with the Doctor and with her. They thought it improper for them to go to E—n till after the wedding, but Dr. Butler said, if he had been applied to, to marry them, he should not have hesitated, but believed as he was so near a neighbour to sir Wm. it was as well for them to go to Dr. Onslow; and upon the whole told Mr. T. sir James could not have made a better choice. Dr. Onslow's character for prudence and wisdom was so thoroughly established that if he married them none would open their lips. When the time agreed on was come, he returned to E—n, and by him Mrs. Butler wrote to Mrs. Pelham.

LETTER XXVII.

Mrs. Butler to Mrs. Pelham.

I Believe, my good friend, you feel I enough on the occasion; but pray endeavour to be easy: if you look anxious, what will poor Miss Nancy do? for her sake appear cheerful, and why should you not be really so? I don't know why you should be so disquieted. Let the guilty disturber of so many persons repose feel disquieted, it is the proper companion of guilt;—let him feel remorse, and repent.

I wish

I wish he may ;—I hope he will ;—it is the only way to regain his character with the best people here. You will wonder to hear me speak so plainly, and perhaps think me severe, a spirit I would not indulge. Yet do I think some things may warrant it in a degree. However, it is best to keep in the waters, lest when the flood-gate is once opened they bear all before them. It is so difficult to be angry and sin not, that I would be on my guard.—I pity you and your Nancy—but you must, as she will have such a husband soon, whose care will be, I doubt not, to soothe and alleviate her mind, and many new things will draw her attention, as getting ready for house-keeping, &c.

I could wish things were otherwise. That Sir William acquiesced at least, and that you all saw your way clear to promote the union. You ask my dear doctor's and my sentiments of the case. You shall have them honestly. We are highly pleased both with Mr. Trenchard's conduct, and with your daughter's. We are equally pleased with the match, and are glad it is so near its accomplishment. We are sorry all parties are not as pleased. Harmony is very desirable in families, but especially in these cases. It is and must be a trial to Mr. Pelham, to you, to the young couple, that it is not preserved in theirs. But what shall poor short-sighted mortals do?—Surely not arraign the conduct of Providence. Heaven does not see meet to make our comforts complete. Some bitter mixture is wrought in every sweet. Empirics who design to get custom by pleasing their patients, had as lief give honey as aloes—an anodyne to quiet, as a stimulus to arouse, tho' the case requires other management ; but judicious physicians study not the palatable, nor aim chiefly to palliate when they mean to cure. Thus the all-wise Father of mercies deals by his creature man. When he intends them some important good, he often wraps his designs in a cloud.—Some intricacies are thrown in the way, that feeble worms may not at once be dazzled with the surrounding glory, until by humbling scenes, the noxious juices which thicken the optic fluid are purged away and they can bear the full beams of providential light. I hope you, my friend, will find it so by happy experience, and ere long attest to that just acknowledgement of the skill, wisdom, and goodness of your heavenly leader, “ he hath done all things well.” He certainly doth, whether we own it or not. But it is pleasant to behold him so manifesting his hand in his dispensations to us as we may be enabled to say, “ the paths of the Lord have been mercy and truth to me.”

Our circumstances, &c. are such as make us decline at present your kind invitation ; but some time hence we intend a visit to E——n. Miss Collet and her brother, and Mrs. Collet, late Miss Harmel, and hers, would rejoice at a bare leave to go on the occasion, but I know they don't expect it. Never girls were more pleased with a match, and few love more sincerely than they do Miss Nancy. My best respects attend Sir James and family, Mr. Pelham and your daughter.—In all I am heartily joined by the Doctor.—I can only say that I am,

Yours, &c.

ISABELLA BUTLER.

Jan. 25, 1751.

Mr. Trenchard having taken leave of his friends and family, set out for E——n with little expectation of ever seeing the town while his father lived.—It affected him, but it was to enjoy his Nancy, and this balanced every thing.—He arrived there by the time of dining, and dined with Miss Amherst and Miss Nancy, at sir James's. In the afternoon another generous conflict took place between him and his intended wife. As he had half his mother's jointure which was 10,000*l.* in his hands, besides about 2000*l.* of his own, his part of his mother's, viz. 5000*l.* he insisted on settling on Nancy ; the income only to be his, until he came into possession of the Trenchard estate, so called ; and accordingly brought down the settlements ready for signing, in which was an article that if he came into possession while Nancy lived, she should have the first year 2000*l.* the second 1000*l.* and a thousand a year after, till the whole amounted to 12,000*l.* which was to be considered as her jointure ; and beside this, 300 a year for her sole and separate use during his life.—This was not too much for the lady of a sir William Trenchard whose income was so handsome, nor would he have laid it so low, if he had actually been in possession. Nancy was much against a settlement, and he was as resolutely determined to carry the point : and after some long debates she consented to leave it to three of their friends. Next day he waited on Dr. Onslow, who received him very politely, and freely consented to perform the ceremony. Nor was he at any loss on Sir William's account, as he had heard from lord W——y the reasons of his disgust. Mr. Trenchard and Dr. Onslow fixed the following Friday for the time, and the latter engaged him to bring all his company to dine with him that day. He then visited lord W. and dined at at his seat: his lordship told him that he had been to talk with Sir Wm. about the match, as he said he would: that Sir Wm. treated him very complaisantly, and they both were explicit: that he (Sir Wm.) owned to him that Nancy was an uncommon girl, both for genius, and solid accomplishments; that his lady had a high opinion of her, and that the girl behaved well so far as he knew, while she was in his family; that he blamed himself for keeping her there after his wife's death, for he might have guessed something or other would come of it not very agreeable, but that he never was so astonished as when he first talked with his son about her: Billy was so cunning, and Nancy so little in his presence, and all his people he supposed in league with them, that he never suspected this. But his son was not to be moved by threatnings to break off with her, nor by persuasives to have any other. As for himself, he could not consent by any means;—it was an absurd thing, and as much so as it would be in himself to marry his house-keeper, who also was a worthy woman. But he believed his sons would be as unwilling that should happen, as he was that the next lady Trenchard should be one of his late wife's dependants. In short, he said, if all our young gentry should act from such whimsical notions as my son doth, what sort of decorum would be kept up in the nation? we shall see a tradesman's daughter advanced to a duchess, and a cobbler's to a lady of the bedchamber. Well he must do as he will, but she shall never be lady of my bed-chamber, nor have a lodging in the meanest loft that belongs to the manor while I live: and besides, this is setting my son Jack a fine example. But if he follows it he shall turn out also. Lord W. told him, he hoped he did not mean to cast a reflection on the young lady's parentage; she was well descended: it was a family of good repute in those parts; her father a worthy divine, a fine scholar, and much of a gentleman, esteemed by the best people in the vicinity, and tho' he was not a dignified clergyman, yet it was well known he was an ornament to his profession: for this he could appeal to his neighbour Dr. Butler, to Dr. Onslow, of II and to Dr. B—, of P. and many other learned men, whose judgment he was well assured Sir Wm. would not scruple: that the late bishop, that ornament to the mitre, was known to set a great value on him: that he could not think it a disgrace to a young gentleman to be allied to such a family, nor to possess a woman of such merit as Sir Wm. had owned Miss Pelham to be. Sir Wm. said, he must think for himself; he knew his own views, and he did not chuse to be a dupe to his son's caprice: lord W— further added, he found it in vain to say more. Sir Wm. seemed so wedded to his notions, that it would do no service, and he had no business to interfere, and therefore went on to tell him that he now waited on him to acquaint him, that he intended himself the honour of standing the bride's father at the nuptials, and he hoped he did not take it amiss; he meant no slight to him, but he had long had a great respect for Mr. Trenchard, and was willing to shew it in a public manner. Sir Wm. politely said, he could take nothing amiss from his lordship, and after a few words on other topics, he took his leave, though urged to stay to dinner; for his lordship said, he could not bear to stay in a house where its heir was so unjustly discarded. As he was going out Sir Wm. said, he was sorry for his lordship's sake, that he stooped so low, though to gratify his own son; which lord W. said disgusted him so much that he could scarce keep his temper; but he was resolved when he went to shew no resentment, and replied, he was far from thinking it a stoop, and turning to Mr. Trenchard said, I have heard such an excellent character of the lady as entitles her to all the respect I can shew her, and I need not repeat that I am glad of any occasion to testify my friendship to you;—I'll answer for lady W—y, she will second my services.

Sir James and Mr. Trenchard returned to E——n at dusk; they both alighted at Mr. Pelham's; sir James took Miss Nancy aside, and reasoned with her on the settlements. He was a nice judge of those matters, knew the value of the Trenchard estate, and that it was low to what the proposer would chuse, and were it not that his own mother had so little, would have laid them higher; but he chose to shun the appearance of out doing his father. The next day the matter was determined, and the settlement signed. On Friday morning sir James, his lady, Miss Amherst, Miss Spence, Mr. Trenchard, his bride, and Miss Dolly, her sister, went to H. There lord W——y and his brother col. W——y met them; these gentlemen were charmed with Miss Pelham; the singular modesty and neatness of her dress, the beauty of her person, her easy carriage, and the propriety of her whole appearance were beyond their expectation. Mr. Trenchard was a gentleman of that true sense which forbids extravagance of speech, and therefore had forbore to launch out in her praise to those who did not know her, contenting himself with shewing his esteem and attachment by his conduct,

conduct, which is the best way of evincing genuine affection. They breakfasted together, and then proceeded to church, where they were married by Dr. Onslow; on coming out of church Mr. Trenchard was agreeably surprised with the sight of Mr. Collet (who had lately married Miss Harmel) and Mr. Harmel, in the isle; he invited them in Dr. Onslow's name to dine at his house; there the company all went, and were politely received by the doctor and his lady. Mr. Collet and Mr. Harmel had found out by Mrs. Wilson's means when and where the ceremony was to be performed, and gladly went to shew their respect to their young friends.—Mrs. Trenchard was revived to see them on their own and their sister's account. After dinner they dispersed. Messrs. Collet and Harmel set out for St—y B—y, lord W. and his brother for P. engaging Mr. Trenchard to come with his bride, and pay a visit to lady W—y some time within the month; sir James and lady, Miss Spence and Miss Dolly Pelham for E—n; Mr. Trenchard, his lady, and Miss Amherst for the seat of the latter at G—n, agreeable to the plan laid before. Mrs. Trenchard was not quite easy with it, but sir James seconding Miss Amherst's motion, and Mr. Trenchard seeming to incline to it, she did not oppose it. Mr. Pelham's taking no notice of the match, and declining even to be present or to be consulted about it, rendered it difficult for Mr. Trenchard to do otherwise: he had no house of his own to go to, and to push himself on Mr. Pelham would be making himself look abject. Lady Parker would have had them to her house, but sir James thought it would make more talk, and hurt Mr. Pelham and his daughter's character; whereas if they accompanied Miss Amherst home, it would only have the air of intended privacy, and no remarks would be made on it; then Mr. Pelham would be left to his own opinion, as to inviting them, and Mr. Trenchard would appear with more honour, and be better able to judge what course to take. Mrs. Trenchard could not feel insensible of her case. For her to leave a father's house, for him to be driven from his—it was a melancholy thought! Mr. Trenchard knew it must affect her, and was concerned on that account, but he did all he could by tender behaviour to lighten her spirits—not one word however did she express denoting the heart felt grief. They arrived at G—n Lodge just after dark, and were received in the kindest and most agreeable manner, by the friendly mistress of it; they spent the eve pretty cheerfully. Upon Miss Dolly's return home, her parents asked where Mr. Trenchard and his sister were—he told them, gone to G—n; Mr. Pelham was a little surprised, Mrs. Pelham was more grieved—the dear woman could have no ease while her daughter was thus seemingly obliged to leave one home after another, in this way; she knew Nancy was so full of dutiful affection to her parents, that it must give her very painful sensations, and that it would not be acting like herself to discover them to any one, not even Mr. Trenchard. She thought Mr. Pelham might have given Mr. Trenchard a hint at least to bring his wife home, and yet not forfeit the trust sir William asked of him. She was very uneasy, nor was Mr. Pelham quite satisfied with his own conduct in this—he was afraid Mr. Trenchard was offended, and he could not wonder if he was, and he was loth to shew any slight to a gentleman of his merit, and who had behaved so handsomely to him, and generously by his daughter. On considering every thing, he was perplexed what to do, but at Mrs. Pelham's motion, sent to his worthy patron, asking his advice. Sir James went immediately to him, and on seeing his concern, and Mrs. Pelham so distressed, he advised him to write an invitation to Mr. Trenchard and his bride, and offered his own servant should set out by the dawn of day post with the letter—the offer was thankfully received, and at the time the servant went with the following billet.

LETTER XXVIII.

Dear Sir,

I Understand that yesterday you and my daughter made your vows of conjugal duty, fidelity and affection to each other in the church of H. May the true God enable each with hearty accord to adhere to each other, and may his choicest blessings rest upon you—for this you have my earnest wishes. I was very sorry you was not pleased to return here the last evening; but perhaps I was to blame, and you thought it inconsistent with your honour to come uninvited: if I have given ground for offence, I ask pardon. I now earnestly intreat you to come here with my daughter, as soon as you can; we both are ready with affection to welcome you. Pray let my child know her mother is very much concerned about her, and cannot, she says, enjoy a moment's ease until she sees her beloved daughter. From this period we hope, dear Sir, to know no separate interest; we consider our Nancy and your Nancy as the bond of union, and we are wishing to give her our blessings. From this period may all former former difference of views, inclinations, and conduct be forgot, or what is more christian, manly, and noble, be forgiven; and we all have reason to rejoice in this issue of an affair so long perplexing to you, my child, to many of our friends, and to,

Dear children,

Your affectionate parents,

CHARLES }
ANN } PELHAM.

B—n.

By the time breakfast was over Sir James's servant arrived with it, accompanied by one from Sir James, wherein he writes thus to Mr. Trenchard: "Soon after I got home I was sent for. Mrs. Pelham was in such moving anguish that I could not bear to see her so, and therefore offered to send express, which pacified her in part, but I suppose she will have no sleep till her daughter returns.—Mr. Pelham is afraid you was offended, and would resent his conduct, but the good gentleman said, he did what he thought was best, and his mind was easy on that account, though he should be sorry to grieve Mr. Trenchard or Nancy.—You may be sure of a welcome; if Mr. Pelham says it, he means it, for he is no flatterer, though a true gentleman. Methinks, I am as impatient for your return as they are; but I shall not dictate to you, my dear Sir; you will judge for yourself, and do that which you think most comfortable for your bride, generous to her parents, and honourable to all. My kind respects to Miss Amherst, thanking her for the share we had in her acquaintance, and desiring the continuance of it. In this lady Parker joins me, and in love to your dear lady.

"I am, dear Sir,

With steady attachment,

Your most obedient,

C—n Grove.

Covent-Garden.

ON Thursday evening, the 6th inst. Mr. Murphy's "Orphan of China" was performed at this theatre, with considerable alterations. This tragedy, in its present state, opens with a scene between Etan and Selima (an additional character) as originally written, Mandane and Mirvan began the piece:—This alteration seems designed to heighten the effect of Mandane's appearance afterwards, which it does considerably; indeed the principal figure should never be brought abruptly forward, unless when the nature of circumstances renders it unavoidable, Morat,

Hib. Mag. Dec. 1777.

the preceptor and guardian of Hamet, is likewise introduced in the first act; and the concluding scene of it transposed to the latter part of the second.

The latter alteration is extremely judicious; for, in the original state of the piece; Mandane comes on immediately after Zamti, with unparalleled heroism, had given up his son to avert destruction from his prince, and upbraids him with inhumanity; but as it was impossible she could have known so immediately the sacrifice he had made, whatever her fears may have been, this was strikingly unnatural; therefore, the transposition of the scene from the first act, between Zamti and Etan, gives time for conjecture to suppose Mandane had heard how her husband had acted, and reconciles the whole to probability.

The close of the third act is greatly improved. Hamet and his parents, instead of being torn off at different sides of the stage by some whisper'd ruffians, exclaiming, Oh! my father! and oh! my child! are parted in a natural and striking manner. Mandane now quits the stage, breathing sentiments worthy of her great spirit; and Hamet retires to suffer with resignation and intrepidity.

In the fourth act Etan delivers himself up with a noble generosity, in hopes to save an unhappy family which had testified so much affection and zeal for him. Sur-rendering up after he has been made a prisoner, takes away half the merit of the action. This scene also is considerably heightened. Notwithstanding the very great opinion we entertain of Mr. Murphy's judgment and taste, we cannot help being of opinion, that he has not much improved the fifth act of this excellent tragedy. It is scarce possible a woman of Mandane's sensibility would have stood behind her husband, when she saw him taken off to suffer the torture.

With regard to the catastrophe, we think the pathos of it rather impaired than heightened by the alteration; for what can speak more to the heart, than to behold the breathless body of a faithful wife, and a husband frantic with sorrow over it? Moreover, it is training imagination to suppose that Mandane did not expire almost immediately after she had stabbed herself. It is true, death does not always ensue instantly after a mortal wound; but in the world of Fancy, absolute facts cannot be adduced to decide difficulties, and therefore we must be regulated in our judgments by probabilities.—But though we are of opinion the catastrophe stood better before, we must pronounce the Orphan of China, in both its original and altered state, a most excellent tragedy; a piece which would have have purchased its author a considerable share of fame, had he produced it in the days of Shakspeare and Otway.

Tuesday, Nov. 21, a new comic opera was performed, called, Love Finds the Way.

It is very common with Mr. Murphy to take his things from other people. He has, in this case, improved on his usual method, and taken from himself what he had before taken from several French plays. Those of our readers who know any thing of his School or Guardians need only be told that this is a part of it, to know that it is a miserable play.

The airs, duets, trios, &c. introduced as embellishments, are mostly tame and profane.—Some of the tunes to which they were adapted were pretty; but the music, on the whole, was not selected with judgment or taste.

The audience, therefore, seemed disposed, with great justice, to condemn the piece; but favour for the author, or the usual generosity of the people, produced a little clapping—and it was reprieved.

A young lady who was introduced, for the first time, under the name of Miss Courtenay, does not promise to be any thing very great, either as a performer or a singer.

On Tuesday evening the 26th inst. was performed a new pantomime entertainment, called, The Norwood Gypsies. It is giving such entertainments as those which usually go under the denomination of pantomime, sufficient consequence, merely to say that they have been introduced, that the galleries stared with amazement, or seemed mightily diverted with them. The Norwood Gypsies is not among the most absurd and childish of these exhibitions; for it has a trifling story, which is made intelligible, and the pranks of Harlequin, and the simpers of Colombine, are not mere riddles to the audience. This is saying a great deal of such a piece, which is usually below contempt; so far as the hand of an author may be said to be discernible in it.

Dr. Fisher, as he advances in titles and honour, doth not advance in excellence as a composer or compiler, and the music, on the whole, discovers neither genius nor taste. The scenes make an ample amends for the other insipidities of the piece.

Drury-Lane.

On Saturday evening, the 8th inst. Mr. Webster made his first appearance in the part of Macheath at this theatre. Mr. Webster, a few years ago, was introduced on the stage by the late Mr. Barry, and as it was supposed he had received his particular approbation and instructions, the expectations of the public were considerably raised. It is known how those expectations were answered. The fulness and harmony of his voice, and his reputation among his acquaintance, as a singer, induced the managers to try him in some musical part, and that of Comus given him, which he executed with more affectation than taste, and with more ability of execution and voice, than conduct or judgment.

His present appearance is marked with the same excellencies, and the same defects; but as the latter seem to give way to the former, as they seem to be youthful luxuriations, which time or the critics may prune, we have no doubt that Mr. Webster will be a valuable acquisition to the theatre in parts where singing is required.

The characters of Polly and Lucy were very well sustained by Mrs. Baddeley and Mrs. Wroughton.

The alterations in this opera were considerable, therefore not very injurious to the genius of Gay, even in our opinion, who disapprove all the liberties which have been lately taken with the dead, and every thing in authorship analogous to the miserable practice of botching among Taylors.

We may be also singular in refusing our approbation to Mr. Linley's accompaniments to the simple and melodious tunes of the opera, though we allow them to be composed with some taste and learning, and in general have some reference, in passion and tone, to the tunes themselves, but they broke in on probability, which is the very charm of this opera, and transported us in fancy rather into the Hay-market, than into real life.

Opera House.

Was opened on the 5th inst. with the new opera Le due Contesse, the music of which was universally admired, but the piece was of an insufferable length. Signor Jermoli has an admirable voice, and seems likely to become a favourite with the public. Signora Todi has a far better pipe than Sestini, but nothing like her acting powers. The new Comic Ballet gave general satisfaction; and the Bantis, in the new Demi Caractere dance, performed with applause.

The orchestra was led by Mr. Cramer.

Avarice and Brutality punished.

CHIOMARA, wife of Prince Ortigan, who was equally renowned for her chastity and beauty, was taken prisoner by the Romans. She was guarded, among others that were taken with her at the battle of Olympia, by a Roman officer, who was as passionately fond of money as he was of women. At first he endeavoured to persuade her to submit to his infamous embraces with the most soothing expressions; sions; but, not being able to conquer her integrity, he thought he had an undoubted right to use violence with a woman whom misfortune had reduced to slavery.

Some time after, to induce her to forget this outrage, he offered to set her at liberty, but not without a large ransom. He agreed with her for a certain sum; and in order to conceal this affair from the rest of the Romans, he permitted her to send to her friends, one of the prisoners, and appointed the bank of a neighbouring river for the place where the Princess was to be exchanged for gold.

It happened, that among the other prisoners was one of her own slaves: it was upon him the Princess fixed her eyes, and immediately the Roman officer conducted him out of the camp, by favour of the dusk of the evening. The night following, two of Chiomara's most faithful friends repaired to the place appointed, and to which the officer conducted the Princess. As soon as they had presented him with the Attic talent, which they had brought with them, and which was the sum agreed on, the Princess, in her own language, ordered those, who came to receive her, to draw their swords and kill the officer, who was busy in weighing the gold.

They obeyed, and Chiomara, delighted with the thoughts of having revenged herself on the violator of her chastity, took the head of the officer, which she herself cut off, and, concealing it under her robe, went to meet her husband Ortigan, who, after his defeat, had returned home. Before she embraced him, she threw at his feet the head of the Roman officer. Astonished to the last degree at such a sight, after pausing a moment, he asked her whose head it was, and what could induce her to an action so uncommon to her sex.

Her face was suddenly covered with the blushes of innocence, and then inflamed with the marks of revenge. She confessed the outrage she had received, and the recompense she had taken. He flew to her arms, and confessed her the most amiable of her sex. During the rest of her life, she invariably preserved the same attachment to the purity of life and manners, which constitutes the glory of the sex.

Let not the fair reader imagine, that the same revenge for violated chastity would be commendable in these times, when the most salutary laws are enacted that the most virtuous female could wish for, and which are always open to redress their grievances. What may be highly commendable in one age may be criminal in another. Chiomara had no laws to fly to for redress, and nothing but her own avenging hand could procure her that satisfaction, which she had undoubtedly a right to expect. Let unthinking libertines remember, that the fair sex long retain a just sense of their injuries, and that, tho' they may for a long time seem to have buried them in oblivion, they may receive the punishment they have merited, when they least expect it.

On Drefs.

DRESSES worn in past ages, contribute in some measure, to inform the present, not only of the taste of their ancestors, but their dispositions, and characters. Alterations in drefs are brought about by that fondness which most people have, to appear pleasingly singular; but when this change happens to be introduced by people who have little taste, the fashion is generally grotesque, and becomes a subject of laughter to futurity. Thus we are amazed, when we behold our ancestors portraits adorned with huge perriwigs, long useless cravats, &c. and are at a loss to account for the introduction of ornaments, at once both cumbrous, and inelegant. But all these changes are to be accounted for; and as a slight sketch of the causes of these different alterations of drefs in Europe, for these two centuries past, may lead some more ingenious person to examine the matter closely, I shall attempt to shew the rise of several of them.

After the rage for crusading had subsided, men began to think large beards not altogether so ornamental; and from the beginning of the 15th century, to about the middle of the 16th, they had them snitter'd into simple whickers. The long loose drefs likewise declined with the beards, and about the time of the accession of our Charles the first, the short close drefs was become almost general in Europe. I must observe, that as the house of Austria was the predominant power, all Europe was affected, not only by their politics, but their habit, which was a medium between Flemish convenience, and Spanish lightness and taste; we still behold it with pleasure in the portraits of Vandyke and Rubens. On the accession of Louis the Fourteenth, the house of Bourbon eclipsed that of Austria, and an immediate alteration took place in drefs, as well as in the different interests of Europe. The finical disposition of the people of England, at this period, caused some alteration in their drefs; a superfluity of ornament at length became an emblem of irreligion; and the portraits of our ancestors, during the civil war, are dressed plain, and their countenances carry an air of austerity. At the restoration, a sudden change took place in drefs; dress; and the plain habit was hooted down as fanatical.—Charles made his public entry dressed in a great black perriwig, in imitation of natural hair, and his courtiers following his example, natural hair at length became not only a mark of rusticity, but disaffection. This fashion underwent many alterations, equally absurd and fantastical;—for many years it was the distinguished mark of beaux; and Colly Cibber tells us, that his large flaxen perriwig was an object of envy to the men, and I dare say, the admiration of the ladies of his time. At length the graver members of the community made the perriwig a professional badge. During all this time, the women did not seem fond of enlarging the appearance of their hair by any artificial means; they made several alterations in their head-dress, and at length shaved their heads, and disfigured themselves with wigs, not only absurd, but unbecoming. I am apprehensive (from this general shaving fashion) posterity will be induced to believe, that the human head was very prolific of animalcula, and the wigs were used as a kind of preventative; but then again, I am comforted with the reflection, that no learned antiquarian of futurity will admit this opinion, when he reflects that a wig was thought to add reverence to religion, authority to law, and wisdom to physic. The fashion of ladies shaving their heads, as it was disgustingly ridiculous, so it kept its ground but a short time; and from its declension, until the accession of his present Majesty, the manner of dressing their hair was decent and becoming. About this period, an improvement was attempted, by elevating the hair with a kind of cushion, made of black silk, stuffed with wool; this, on account of its similitude to a black pudding, bore its name: some of the lower order of females, who could not procure wool, wore bran puddings; and some, fearing that bran puddings might burst, stuffed theirs with the combings of their own hair. This fashion held till the peace, when we were fortunately supplied with a numerous ingenious body of French hair-dressers, who either stimulated by public spirit or hunger, left their native country, in order to embellish the heads of our belles and beaux. As I have carried the ladies heads to the year 1763, I shall return to the gentlemen, and reduce theirs to the same period.—At the accession of George the Second, wigs underwent a very material alteration. The peruke, which adorned the coxcomb in queen Ann's reign, was now become the ornament of the Bishop, Judge, and all the graver orders of society; the army added a tail to theirs, and that order of beings called bloods, followed the example, whilst the fine gentleman ornamented his with a bag, somewhat resembling a school boy's satchel. In the head-dress of the men, there has been no material alteration since that time, except that the younger have laid aside wigs, and wear their hair with the af resaid tail, or satchel pendant to it. As the men declined wearing wigs, the women seemed to acquire a fondness for them; and while the first kept sinking from full bottoms to bobs, and from bobs to caxons, scratches, bags, &c. the second advanced from puddings to tetes, systems, bellow toupees, &c. &c. I am at a loss to account for this extraordinary change; for while the women, with an enthusiastic emulation, strove to outvie each other in false hair, they all joined in having an abhorrence to any of the opposite sex, who presumed to wear a wig, though countenanced by usage of former times. Again, the wig was supposed to add dignity and consequence to the male head it adorned; but it is now placed on the female head for different purposes, and nothing is supposed to give a more bewitching softness to a pretty female face, than a large well powdered tete, alias wig; nay, they have even introduced neck curls, for the purpose of looking more lovely, when almost the same curls, used by a Serjeant at Law, gave a sensation of disgust.—There is another observation I shall make. Naturalists agree, that nature, in the disposal of her gifts, proportions every quality or appearance in a certain positive degree, and these proportions serve to distinguish the several species of beings which form the vast catalogue of the animated world. By this rule we are led to distinguish the faculties of the brute creation, and oftentimes the human. For instance, we observe she is bountiful in furnishing the brute creation with hair, on almost every part of their bodies; because they are incapable of procuring themselves clothes; and is niggard to human creatures in that particular, from the opposite reason; we observe likewise, that the bodies of both, are furnished in every part, where hair grows, according to a certain proportion, and that it cannot increase in one part, without having a proportionable increase on every other; if that is the case, how are we to account for the present prevailing taste of our females? I fear, if they examined the matter a little nicely, they would in one week destroy what has been their ambition and labour for several years past; and, I have no doubt, but the idea resulting from such an examination tion, would raise a blush on the pallid lanthorn jaws of an antiquated virgin of fifty!

The Rose-Tree and the Tulips: An Allegorical Tale.

IN a large bed of flowers that was placed in the garden to serve for ornament, and to relax the eye from the contemplation of woods and vegetables, of fish-ponds, of hills and vallies, were planted a Rose-Tree of the most beautiful moss, and a collection of Tulips of the finest colourings. They had both their share of attractions, and the most delicate taste could have been at a loss, whether to fix its choice on the clouded beauties of the Tulip, or the silky covering and the damask die of the Rose.—No one but the wicked Gardener, Robert, could have been guilty of partiality in this case: but Robert most assuredly was; for every morning did he begin his work with paying his respects to his favourite Rose-Tree.—He watered it with the most exact attention, both at the rising and setting of the sun.—In vain did the Tulips rise up their heads—in vain did the Pink shine forth in all the variegation of colours—in vain did every flower make the most of its charms—their beauties appealed to the eyes and the other senses of Robert without effect;—he watered and clipped them, 'tis true; but it was with an indifference, that plainly shewed he looked upon it as a duty.—On the contrary, when he was engaged in the care of his dear Rose Tree, he had the smile of pleasure in his face, and his hand was guided by the gentleness of affection.—Strange this! Certainly fate must have had a hand in it.—I like Roses myself; a Rose is the Goddess of the garden; it shines among the rest of the flowers like Calypso among her Nymphs, or rather like Venus among her Graces; and therefore Robert might be in the right to pay his first attention to it; but certainly was to blame to neglect all the rest of the flowers of the garden, which often felt the ardours of the sun, when Robert had forgot to pour on them the refreshing streams of his watering-pot. But in process of time it happened, that Robert went away, and was succeeded by Philip; for we all know, that the affairs of this world are exceedingly changeable.—Now this Philip preferred the Tulip above all things; his partiality persuaded him that its colours were preferable to that of the Rose; that they shone among the rest of the flowery creation like the gold-finch among the feathered ones;—in short, the partiality of Philip was as great for Tulips, as Robert's was for his favourite Rose Tree.—The Tulips were loud in the praises of their Philip, but by the Roses he was detested:—"Ah! (cried the last) Robert, indeed, was something like a man; he knew the distinction that is due to superior merit, he always watered us the first."—"Your anger hurries you away, replied the Tulip; your judgment is certainly blinded; for never, under the sun, was there seen in my mind) so perfect a gardener as the great Philip;—and as to your Robert, he was a most narrow-minded mortal; and I think there is as much difference between him and Philip, as there is between the refreshing showers of the heavens, and the overwhelming streams of the Watering-pot."

Thus it is with human nature;—We are as much governed by a principle of self-interest as the Tulip; and we never draw our judgments from a principle of justice, but rather from those principles that take their springs from self-love: which, as Rochefoucault, the famous French Writer, has so well demonstrated, is the secret source of all our affections.

Extract from Second Thoughts, or Observations upon Lord Abingdon's Thoughts on the Letter of Edmund Burke, Esq. to the Sheriffs of Bristol. By the Author of the Answer to Mr. Burke's Letter.

SECOND thoughts are best.—So says the proverb. Nor do we think our readers will consider the present performance as an exception to this general rule. We could, however, have wished that even this gentleman had thought again before he committed his work to the press: we could have wished, for instance, that he had not suffered the order—or rather disorder—of his noble antagonist to have led him astray from the plain road of method. Had his lordship's thoughts been previously digested and methodised, our author's answer, we conceive, would have had double weight. Take, however, his excuse in his own words.

‘Observations, says our author, upon a performance which is not written with the greatest regularity and order, whatever be its other merit, will sometimes want method, will now and then be irregular. We shall follow lord Abingdon step by step.’

Perhaps too we might have wished he had been more sparing of his poetical quotations: some of which seem introduced rather for the sake of shewing the extent of his reading, than of giving weight to his argument.

There is another objection which some readers may, perhaps, make to his performance—that it is sometimes more than severe.

severe; borders on the acrimonious. But here too his lordship's example furnishes him with an excuse, that to lord Abingdon, at least, must be full and unanswerable. If the reader recollect the phrases in the use of which his lordship indulges when speaking either of the acts or of the persons that he disapproves, he will allow that his observer did not owe it to him at least to follow the rigid rules of politeness. In fact, though deviating from these rules, our author may have endeavoured to follow his antagonist 'step by step,' he has, in this instance, followed him 'haud paripassum;' or, to speak in a language which the observer thinks familiar to his lordship—has been distanced.

Justice required us to hint at these little imperfections. Justice too requires that we should point out the merits of the work.

The diction is pure: the style manly. On a subject so hackneyed, not many new thoughts could be expected. But many observations, not in themselves new, acquire almost the merit of novelty by being placed in a new point of view. His reflections on lord Abingdon's absence from the house, when the suspension bill was first brought in, are pointed and severe. In his character of Franklyn his traits are bold. His colouring has rather the force of a Rubens than the soft tints of a Titian. His remarks on the absurdity of talking of the expiring liberties of our country, and publishing, at the same time, such pamphlets as 'Letters to the Sheriffs of Bristol,' and 'Thoughts on those Letters,' are just and poignant.—His account of the secession in 1738; his reasoning on the proposal of lord Abingdon to secede in such a moment, and in such a situation, as his lordship paints, are pertinent. His distinction between the actual supremacy of parliament, and the nominal supremacy of the king; his remarks on lord Abingdon's visions about contracts, and compacts, and law, and constitution, are just. In a word, in this, as in his former work, our author has given strong marks of genius: and comparing the two works together, we may add, of a genius which the hand of time improves.

As a specimen of his style and manner, we will close this article by the concluding words of the observations; having previously given the reader our author's remark on Mr. Burke's 'great, steady, uniform principle; that whenever an act is made for the cessation of law and justice, the whole people should be universally subjected to the same suspension of their franchises.'

"Law and justice."—"By these words a common man undoubtedly means the common course of law; the common, ordinary, course of justice; of that justice, of that law, which are the common guardians of the common rank of citizens. Is this Mr. Burke's meaning? Impossible! For every cessation of these is not, ought not to be, universal. For mind—whenever these be made to cease (if Mr. Burke must have it cessation) with regard to public subjects, the usual stream of law and justice is not dried up; it is only diverted into another channel. The principle was pointed against the act in question. Apply it to the act in question. But the act was not made for a cessation of law and justice: it only altered—did not even suspend; for to suspend is not properly to put one thing in the place of another—the act only changed the common course of law and justice, with regard to men no longer within the common rank of citizens.—Try the principle again. Martial law—though not in Mr. Burke's words, a cessation of law and justice—is an alteration of common law, a suspension of franchises, with regard to men out of the common line of subjects, with regard to soldiers. But shall the whole people be universally subjected to martial law? Mr. Burke, whatever be his affection for his "great, steady, uniform principle," will not answer yes.

"The alarm of such a proceeding," adds Mr. Burke (taking his principle to be granted) "would operate as a sort of call of the nation."—"As to my part, I have heard so many calls of the nation of late, without any answer being made to them," subjoins the noble commentator, "that I fear the nation has either lost its hearing or its voice."

'Now mark a plain man set both right—How it may be in national parlance, those who are conversant with nations best can tell; but, to be sure, in common parlance, except in theatrical soliloquies, a man does not very often call to his self.—The caller then may be faction, the callee this deluded nation. Here is the whole case—the latter has lost its hearing: the former, happily for this country, its voice.'

Our author's conclusion is in a style of the severest ridicule.

'Lord Abingdon and Sir Edward Newenham have solemnly offered us their blood, have told us they are ready to seal their sentiments and their principles with their blood. The censure, which his lordship's severity threw upon the chief justice, does not here recoil upon his self. Lord Abingdon, if he be at present no warrior, is at least least willing to become one. Good!—"Are there not wars?" says honest Jack Falstaff—"Is there not employment?—Doth not the king lack subjects? Do not the rebels need soldiers?" They have only to realize their golden promises. "If they choose to fight their battles in their own persons, nobody prevents their setting sail to America in the next transports."

* Should the present hell-governed proscription still continue, should our government still be found in the hands of devils, should this destructive civil war still proceed, and Lord Abingdon and Sir Edward Newenham yet use none of their blood as sealing-wax: what reader will not think of the false school-boy, who swears to his mother's waiting-maid that he will die at her dear feet, and pour out the last drizzling drop of his blood to serve her? who will not say of such vain braggarts, what the player in the prologue to "the School for Scandal" says of its author?

"For your applause all perils he'll go through:

He'll fight—that's write—a cavalliero true!
'Till every drop of blood—that's ink—be spilt for you."

Considerations on the Propriety and Expediency of the Clergy acting in the Commission of the Peace.

THE question proposed to be considered, is a question of some importance, as it immediately affects executive justice in the dispensation of law to the people at large, and as it concerns the credit of a respectable body of men, who are in some of our counties admitted to share in the civil department, while in others they are indiscriminately proscribed.

It is too frequent in the occasional discussion of this question in common conversation to observe a bigotted attachment on the one side, and an invincible prejudice on the other. It is the design of this short essay to consider dispassionately the arguments and reasonings of both parties; neither tenaciously to support the part of the clergy, nor unwittingly reject their services by withholding that trust and confidence in the execution of justice, which upon consideration of the whole matter shall appear to be safely placed in the hands of some of them, jointly with the proper persons of the laity.

The general diffusion of learning, and of a liberal independent spirit, which disdains the little limits of any profession, are two considerations particularly deserving of attention. The laws of our country, and the prescribed forms made use of in all legal proceedings, are now familiarized in our own language, no way dependent on the hieroglyphics of court-hand, or the jargon of Norman French. In the writings of lawyers we may see just arrangement of matter; with all the advantage of classic elegance of language, and these without any abatement in the great articles of precision and accuracy. Decisions in the superior courts, and the opinions of the most eminent of the robe, are not given in the mere form of a definitive sentence, or the peremptory language of assumed self consequence, but are ever accompanied with grounds and principles upon which such decisions and opinions are founded. These circumstances, seconded by many judicious abridgments and digests, and familiar readings upon questions of law, have spread abroad a knowledge which was heretofore more particularly confined to the advocate and the judge. Law now makes a part of the studies of every man of letters.

This general recital of the present improved state of knowledge will admit of the eligibility of several of the laity to the office of a justice of the peace, who heretofore might be presumed to be less qualified; and, without being understood to intimate that the clergy ever made a monopoly of valuable learning, (for their learning was confined to the puerilities and quibbles of school divinity,) the argument will extend equally to both parties.

It may be observed, that, as far as an academical education may be presumed to have lain a foundation for the necessary qualifications of a good magistrate, whether they respect literature in general, or a knowledge of our own municipal institutions, or the enlargement of the mind in judging of men and things, the country gentleman and the country clergyman enjoy these advantages in common. If any peculiar influence of the priesthood should be objected against the clergy, that influence on their judgment should seem to arise from the constitution of their particular church, and the objectors would do well to remove the impediment: for the person taught is surely as much interested in the matter and the manner, as the teacher, or their separate departments are set at a greater variance than the very nature of things will admit. Christianity, I will presume to say, neither teaches nor connives at any sentiment unfriendly to good government, or the proper duties and circumspection becoming the just, upright, and impartial magistrate. The quaint observation echoed by a late ingenious sceptic, that priests of all religions are the same, is founded neither in truth nor good manners. To the jaundiced eye, all things things appear alike, or Mr. Hume would have seen, that, with more propriety and plausibility, he should have observed that priests of no two religions are the same.

It, after the important circumstance of education, the objector should catch at a thread, and chuse to say that birth or family preserve any appearance of propriety;—it may be returned, that it is frequent to observe that the gentleman and the clerk have one common stock or ancestry, that the same blood runs in the veins of both. Their inheritance therefore may be equal in all things, property alone excepted. They will, however, have the same stimulations to preserve their escutcheon unfulfilled, and deliver it down to their posterity, improved in something more than the addition of a few years.

In this last argument there is, indeed, the exception of property; an exception which shall be attended to in its full force.

Property is very wisely considered by our laws as a necessary security against malpractices in the administration of law and justice, and here, indeed, there is frequently a great disparity. The possessions of each (even where the clergyman happens to have no personal or inheritable property) are, however, held under the same tenure by law. Presentation, institution, and induction, giving the same title as descent or purchase. So far, therefore, as dependence is concerned in respect to the tenure or title, neither are under the influence of the other, and they are equally answerable for their own acts and deeds.

The law requires a certain qualification, of small amount in value; and, subject to that condition, the appointment is discretionary in the crown. Solon confined the office of public magistrates to persons “in easy circumstances; for it had been enacted by a special law of his, that they who could only pledge their life for their conduct, should not be admitted to the administration of public affairs. To attach the magistrates elect more firmly to their duty, it was enacted, that, besides an estate in Attica, they should have children, or that they should promise to marry.”—[Sabbathier's Institution of ancient Nations, by Stockdale, vol. 1st. p. 69.]. The institutions of the Athenian lawgiver seem to have dictated in the true spirit of legislative wisdom: and so far as the attachments to the best interest of a family, as part of the commonwealth, can operate over and besides the legal qualification of property, the laity and the clergy have one common feeling, and one common interest.

It has been argued, that the clergy, in expressing any desire to be admitted into the commission of the peace, do only shew a desire for power, which, of itself, indicates a reasonable suspicion of the abuse of it. But, in reply, it need only be said, that some of the gentry, by their unwillingness to receive them on the bench, do more certainly prove that themselves are unwilling to part with the power they are possessed of, or to have any sharers in it. And, indeed, as far as presumption will justify any conclusion, the supposed forwardness of the one, and the unwillingness of the other, look much the same way, and prove equally against both.

The clergy, say some, are not by law made returnable upon juries, nor subject to the sheriffalty, and other civil incumbrances. If the constitution has so ordered their exemption, they are as well entitled to it, as are the gentlemen of the law to their freedoms from the like and several other public offices. And the argument, surely, is not (in the case of the commission of the peace) wished to exclude lawyers from the bench; men who are professedly distinguished and invited to it in the very words of the commission, in the more early acts of parliament, and who are, it may be justly presumed, the fittest of all men to sit there.

But these exemptions are not in all cases in their favour; so that any jealousies conceived on account of some privileges, may have been taken up too hastily, and entertained too eagerly. Church power is subservient to the civil government: whatever it may have been, it is now in tolerable subordination, in practice at least, if not in its ostensible constitutions; and it would confessedly be more for the honour and credit of both, if the ecclesiastical constitutions in all things breathed the spirit of the civil state, and were in a great variety of cases totally annihilated. But it was said, that the exemptions of the clergy were not, in all cases, in their favour; for, though the law allows a clergyman to act as a justice of the peace, and excuses him from serving on juries, or in the office of sheriff, it gives him his vote as a freeholder, citizen, or burgess, in common with others: but a resolution of the House of Commons, and custom in general, do not allow him to be returned to parliament, notwithstanding the peculiar representation to which he is eligible, the Convocation, is happily become a Caput Mortuum to all intents and purposes.

The clergy are further said to live in a continued hope and expectation of better preferment, and therefore look up to the rich and great with that servility which too often is expected to earn it. In many cases this is too true. It is not to be denied that there are clergymen who would, and who actually do, thus degrade themselves, and thereby scandalize their profession. But this degradation is not peculiar to them. Among country gentlemen, or persons classing themselves under that denomination, are to be found some who are as much the humble servants of great men, as are others; and, if their situation is in itself more independent, such degradation is the more unpardonable. Those who make themselves the dupes to the low arts of carrying an election, or who make wreck of their integrity and uprightness to preserve and cultivate an interest in a venal borough, are unworthy of any trust, be their station what it may. As hirelings, they may receive their reward; but they are deservedly despised and condemned by every man who has any pretensions to the character of a gentleman, or of a good citizen.

As at all times it is unjust to throw any imputation on any body of men, because of the tricks or knavery of individuals among them, so it is unfair to plead the merit of an individual in support and justification of his whole order. But the general obligations of country-magistrates to the labours of Dr. Burne, for his services in the way of method and arrangement, deserve as general acknowledgement as those of Lord Viscount Dudley and Ward, and Mr. Cuuningham.

The objection which seems to carry with it the greatest appearance of argument remains to be considered. It may be advanced, and it is sometimes said, that the admission of the clergy into civil offices of any kind, is foreign from the gospel idea of their ministry, and in its nature is inclined to draw them too much into the concerns of this world. The present writer can answer for himself, that such end is most abhorrent from his design. He does not wish to see any man aim to serve two masters. The ministers of the gospel are men, they are citizens of the world; and, if they preserve their integrity in their necessary concerns with it, they will effect most good by mixing in reputable engagements and intercourses with mankind. And of all other employments government and agriculture are the most useful and most honourable. An active spirit must be employed to preserve itself from deviations from the paths of innocence and virtue, and the peculiar duties, offices, and studies of the clergy do not require of them the confinement of the cloister, or that they should lead the ignoble, debasing, and useless lives of monks. In order that they may be as burning and shining lights among men, they must keep up an intercourse with them, and amidst the variety of temptations presented to them in the course of their warfare, hold fast their integrity, and be faithful stewards of the counsels of God, and the several talents committed to their care.

The interests of civil government affect them equally with other men: and a person whose acquirements, behaviour, and conduct, give him respect in his neighbourhood, and are the grounds of his authority in it, can very essentially extend his usefulness by the additional character of the magistrate. It is not pleaded that the clergy should follow the vain pursuits of pleasure and dissipation, become familiar to the world at large, but increase their usefulness towards mankind in the serious departments and relationships of active life, and the cultivation of science and knowledge, all which tend to the civilizing the human mind, and the making it more ready to receive the awful impressions and sanctions of religion.

It is not the wish of the writer to see the clergy generally admitted into the commissions of the peace from any high notions of the doctrine of alliance between church and state. With some persons he may possibly hazard a censure by renouncing, on behalf of his brethren, every such pretension. All that he thinks justly deducible from his conclusions, is, that the clergy ought not to be indiscriminately proscribed because of their profession: that improper persons among them may gain admittance when the door is once opened, does not prove that therefore it should be for ever kept shut against all of them.—The use or abuse of the measure must be referred to those in whose hands ancient usage has lodged a discretionary power; and this discretion may be as judiciously exercised in receiving some from among the body of the clergy, as we may frequently observe it in respect to the gentry of this kingdom.

Who may be the writer of this paper it little concerns the public to know; so far, however, that public ought to be told, that he is both a clergyman and a magistrate; and that, after much serious consideration, he is satisfied in the rectitude of his endeavouring to be as useful in his generation as his talents and opportunities will permit.

An Attempt at Squaring the Circle. By Geometricus Mechanicus. In a Letter to a Friend, who required some Explanations of Terms made use of by him in his Mechanical Geometry.

My Dear Sir,

WHAT you seem to hold for a real distance, viz. the chord of an arch, is precisely what I call in my Geometry, the imaginary distance, or if you please, the shortest distance imaginable: but you are to observe such distance was never capable of being sensibly and justly expressed, neither by number nor by line actually exhibited, of any determined length: and the tangent of the same arch is in a like predicament, which makes me call the arch itself the real, true, substantial, mean proportional, between its ostensible but inadequate representatives, the chord and tangent, or the sine; wherefore your attempting by abstract mathematicks to find this mean proportional, which you think so easy, betwixt two such indefinite extremes, is what I think I may call castle-building without a foundation:—but which is needless or useless in real Geometry: in which the real distance is the shortest that can possibly be exhibited sensibly on the face of the earth or globe, which is the proper object of real Geometry.

This shortest distance is always an arch of a great circle, and is properly expressed in quantity, by the parts or proportion it bears to the whole or one: Wherefore instead of the first lesson I learned in abstract mathematicks, viz. “As punctum mathematicum is the original beginning of all things; consequently must be the beginning of Geometry.” Which words I never could be reconciled to, nor to the definition of a mathematical point, which followed; nor any other definition of such point that ever I since met with was to me satisfactory. Wherefore instead of creating imaginary magnitudes, wanting real existence for the subject of Geometry, I hold as most expedient for the foundation of my Geometry as well as Philosophy, the uncreated one, as the original beginning of all things, consequently the creator of the terraqueous globe already formed, and strictly the proper subject of Geometry, and bearing the characteristic of its fabricator, the master, which is one; he laid the foundation thereof geometrically in length, breadth, and depth: the length is one, the breadth one, and the depth one, and those three one; the length multiplied by the breadth, the product is one superficies, which again multiplied by the depth produce the solid magnitude one; a real substantial magnitude, positively existing independently of mere imagination, but necessarily acting on our senses visibly and palpably, our bodies being part and parcel thereof, naturally affords us an idea of the extension of body, in inches, feet, cubits, fathoms, &c. and altho’ I don’t yet pretend to adjust the precise proportion of those parts to the whole or one, of which they are parcel, with that exactness pretended to in the art of creation from nonentities:—yet I think we are sufficiently capable of adjusting this proportion near enough for all our useful purposes of Geometry, or mere Mensuration. However for the gross Mechanical Geometry which is the object of the art of navigation, we need not the knowledge of this precise relation or proportion betwixt the minute parts and the whole or one; but we may proceed analytically as I mention in my essay for finding the Longitude page 23.

Thus the length of the globe being one, and divided into 180 equal parts commonly called degrees, measured on the arch of a great circle, each of those parts divided into 60 lesser divisions and called geometrical miles or minutes of a great circle, without regarding for the present, how many cubits, &c. of the measure of a man may be found by experience in a geometrical mile, I say without this we may serve our present purpose of Mechanical Geometry.

Thus the length of the globe taken in miles is 180, multiplied by 60, equal 10800 miles, and the breadth being the same; if 10800 be multiplied into itself, the product is 116,640,000 geometrical square miles for the superficial content of the globe, which is easily proved by carefully considering my scheme for dividing the surface of the globe into geometrical square miles, as described in page 14 of my above said essay.

Now, I say if the half of this last mentioned sum, viz. 58,320,000 may not be admitted for the square of a great circle of the globe, because it is on the face of a globe, and it was expected to square an imaginary plane circle; Why then I say the whole superficial content of the globe, divided by 4, is the square of the imaginary plane of a great circle of the globe, as our Geometricians in abstract mathematicks have already demonstrated, viz. 29,160,000 square miles.

I am, respectfully, dear Sir,
Yours, &c.

Dublin, Nov. 21, 1777.

Irish Parliamentary Intelligence.

Monday, November 3.

THE house proceeded to appoint a committee to try the Newry election, on the petition of Sir Richard Johnson, Bart. and John Bowes Benson, Esq; against Col. Robert Ross, and Isaac Corry, junior, Esq; the sitting members; and a committee of thirteen; and two nominees were chosen and sworn.

The hon. Mr. Butler having challenged the right hon. Henry Flood, and it coming to the ears of the speaker, he insisted on Mr. Flood's giving his honour not to proceed in the affair, which being given, Mr. Recorder answered for Mr. Butler, (who was absent) and the business of the house went on.

Mr. Secretary Heron, laid before the house his majesty's answer to the address of the house, filled with the warmest expressions of the king's affection to his Irish subjects; and Mr. Henry Coote moved for an address in reply to his majesty's answer.

It was agreed, on the motion of Mr. Dillon, (after a very warm debate on point of order and rule of parliament) to postpone the trial of the county of Clare election, from the 6th to the 12th instant, in consideration of the absence of Mr. Hugh Dillon Massey, one of the sitting members, who was in London, attending his daughter in her sickness. The house divided on the question, and the numbers being equal, Mr. Speaker gave the casting vote for postponing.

Writs were issued for electing members for Innishfree, the borough of Wicklow, the borough of Cavan, and the borough of Baltinglass; some accounts received, and others ordered in.

Tuesday, November 4.

The house did not meet.

Wednesday, November 5.

The house met and went to church to hear a sermon on the day, by the rev. dean Pery; but did no other business.

Thursday, November 6.

Motions of course, and ordering of accounts, took up part of this day; the only points on which there was any debate were, the report of the committee on the Newry election; a motion of Mr. Barry Barry; and the censuring some witnesses for non-attendance.

The petitioners against the Newry election having brought no kind of evidence to support their charge, the committee declared the sitting members duly elected; and they also pronounced the petition to be frivolous, but the house on the question refused to agree with the committee on that resolution.

Mr. Foster urged strongly the agreement, but Mr. Gardiner, Mr. Annesley, Sir Richard Johnson, Mr. Fitzgerald, and Mr. Mason, taking the opposite side, and col. Ross, one of the sitting members, declaring that he was satisfied with the conduct of the petitioners in declining to give farther trouble to the committee, the petition was suffered to remain uncensured.

Mr. Barry Barry, not being satisfied with two articles of public expence, asked for a return from the privy-council, of the report of its committee, on which was grounded the payment of the money to Mr. Supple and Mr. Hackett. This being opposed as improper, the privy counsellors being sworn to secrecy, by Mr. Prime Serjeant and Mr. Leigh, was as strenuously maintained by Mr. Barry, Mr. Recorder, Mr. Daly, Mr. Gratian, and some others, till at length Mr. attorney-general explained the two expences, by declaring Mr. Supple had been ordered a sum out of the concordatum, as a recompence for his sufferings in prosecuting to conviction sundry atrocious offenders, whose accomplices had afterwards given him seventeen wounds, and left him for dead; and the money paid to Hackett, was for his travelling charges and expences, as king's messenger, on his journeys to London. On this information the motion was withdrawn.

There was also some small altercation on a motion of colonel Browne, to take into the custody of the serjeant at arms some witnesses, on the county of Clare election, who had neglected to appear that day, as ordered by the house; but it being urged that that order had been discharged on the putting off the trial till next Wednesday, that gentleman changed his motion, and it was ordered, that those witnesses who did not attend on Wednesday, should be taken into custody without any farther order.

The address in answer to his majesty's reply to the former address of the house was voted, and ordered to be presented to-morrow at two o'clock.

Petitions for aid for public works were presented, and the house adjourned.

Friday, November 7.

The house ballotted for a committee to try the merits of the election of Callen, who was sworn accordingly, the nominees, Mr. recorder for the petitioners, and Mr. Warden Flood for the sitting members.

Several petitions were presented, and a committee was appointed on the motion of Mr. Foster, to enquire into the state of the pavement of the city of Dublin, the conduct of the commissioners appointed by the act, and the expence of 39,000*l.* in an attempt to pave the streets of this city.

A petition of the merchants of Londonderry, relative to the failure of flax-seed, was presented by Mr. Hugh Hill.

The house then adjourned, and went with the address to his majesty.

Saturday, November 8.

After having ballotted for a committee to try the merits of the county of Tipperary election, on the petition of Daniel Toler, Esq; and having received some petitions, and ordered new writs for the borough of Killybegs, Newtown-Limavady, and Monaghan, Mr. Barry Barry moved, that an humble address be presented to the lord lieutenant, to request his excellency would order the memorial of James Supple to lord Harcourt, and the order of council for referring the said memorial to be laid before the house. On the preceding day, he had mentioned some informations relative to Mr. Supple's affair, which were contrary to those alledged by a right hon. gentleman (Mr. Beresford.) He said, he had been told, the sufferings of Mr. Supple happened one and twenty years ago; at that time this person lived at Killarney, in the county of Kerry, and being amorous, he quarrelled with a gentleman about an affair of gallantry, and used such language as provoked the other to give him a good drubbing; for this Supple prosecuted him, and recovered damages. Some short time after, being at Limerick, several of the gentleman's friends (in a manner, to be sure, unjustifiable) broke forcibly into his chamber, and drawing their swords, began to sew at him, in which operation they pricked his skin in several places. This produced a fresh prosecution, in which Supple recovered 1300*l.* against some who appeared, and prosecuted those who fled to an outlawry. Now this being the real account of this man's sufferings, there appear very shallow grounds for any claim to a recompence out of the public money. Such damages had been given as a jury thought were adequate; and what right had he to expect 1394*l.* 10*s.* from Concordatum? He did not apply during the administration of the duke of Bedford, lord Hertford, lord Halifax, or lord Townshend; but, at length, in that of lord Harcourt, after a lapse of upwards of 20 years, he applies and receives such a sum. This creates a suspicion, that this grant was obtained for other causes than the pretended sufferings of this Mr. James Supple. So this is certainly a good ground for enquiry to the house, which Mr. Barry desired to obtain by way of address.

The hon. Mr. Beresford imagined the hon. gentleman had been misinformed in some circumstances, for he could assure him, that so long ago as the administration of the duke of Bedford, Mr. Supple had applied for a proclamation against those who had assaulted him; and a proclamation was issued, offering a large reward for apprehending them.

Mr. Barry replied, he wanted to see the memorial, to know what Mr. Supple had alleged that could warrant his application for 1394*l.* 10*s.* after he had received 1300*l.* damages for the assault.

Mr. Fitzgerald doubted whether that memorial could be produced, as the lord lieutenant had no power over the privy council, being only first there, and not the master of the rest.

Mr. Prime Serjeant declared, he would never wish to withhold any information; but the house was always to judge whether the information, moved for by a member, was proper for the house to ask. This present one, he thought, was improper, as it might tend to embroil the house with the privy council, who were under the seal of an oath; that they should proceed with some delicacy towards the council; and besides it was not certain that any such memorial existed; and that the great names signed to the warrant of the council, for paying that money, were the best security that it had not been paid without sufficient deliberation, and for proper purposes.

Mr. Fitzgerald spoke again, and said he did not think the affair sufficiently important to warrant the weighty mode of an address of the House.

Mr. George Ogle said, he thought the most trifling proceeding of Concordatum sufficiently important to merit an enquiry, and if gentlemen disliked the mode proposed, he wished they would be so candid as to point out any other;

for that it was indifferent to him by what means he got at the knowledge required, to that it was attained.

Mr. William Alexander English inveighed strongly against the prodigality of the last administration, and that those who could squander public money to underlings, a few even the greedy maw of administration had been stopped, deserved to be stigmatized, how great soever their names might be.

Mr. Grattan said, he now perceived they were to have no information; for oaths, conscience and delicacy are pleaded as bars to it. When the exceedings of Concordatum were so great, if any are enquired into gentlemen are told the privy-council are sworn to secrecy; but he did not think they were won to rapine. When gentlemen talk of lavishing public money, they are told of conscience; and when they want to examine how it is lavished, they are reminded of delicacy; perhaps, indeed, this affair of Mr. Supple's is very delicate. Perhaps a right hon. gentleman hath a tender connexion; perhaps another person afflicts his tender concerns, makes himself useful, procures the completion of his tender wishes, then is rewarded for the most infamous pandarism, with the public money; and lest any enquiry should be made, conscience and delicacy are pleaded.

Mr. Attorney-General said, those gentlemen were much mistaken who thought reviling the last would be pleasing to the present administration. He paid some respectful compliments to the memory of Lord Harcourt; and in regard to the present question, he thought no more information would be obtained than was at present before the House. Mr. Supple was a man near seventy years old; he had been a witness for the crown, and was greatly injured on that account. That he had incurred great expences since the damages had been decreed him; he had been obliged, through fear of appearing again at Limerick, to remove the cause into the King's-bench by writs of certiorari. Some of the parties had been out-lawed, and then commenced suits to reverse their outlawries, which put him to very heavy charges. He instanced the necessity of protecting crown witnesses from the murder of Mr. Power, and another person, for their being active against the White-boys. And therefore thought the present motion insidious and frivolous.

Mr. Ogle replied, he should never consider any address of the House as insidious, nor any enquiry into the expenditure of public money as frivolous.

The Right Hon. Henry Flood launched out greatly in the praise of the late Lord Harcourt, and was against the motion.

The Right Hon. Thomas Conolly said, he ever opposed the extravagance in past administrations; and if he saw any in this, would be as much against it: But he thought this mode of enquiry wrong—for they might call witnesses to their bar to find the truth.

Mr. Foster was of opinion this mode must be wrong; for as all application for money on concordatum were made to the lord lieutenant, and privy council, that of Mr. Supple was doubtless in the same file; and the lord lieutenant had no power to order any paper which belonged equally to the council.

Mr. Serjeant Carleton said, the memorial was not on any record, and therefore probably did not exist.

Mr. Dennis Daly observed, that 1000*l.* is the sum allotted for concordatum, but it had amounted to 60,000*l.* and if some enquiry was not made, there was no knowing where it would stop. The simple question then is, Is the house to have an account of the expenditure of the public money, or not?—I. not, the privy council, not the commons, hold the purse of the nation. If the house is to enquire, what is the proper mode; and how should they go about it?

Mr. Prime Serjeant said a mode might be found, but he did not point out any. He only added, that no evidence had been produced to invalidate the account first given of the case of Mr. Supple.

Mr. Daly again requested that some proper mode of enquiry might be struck out. And Mr. Dillon said, since the account of Mr. Supple's case had been so oppositely stated by the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Attorney General) and his hon. friend (Mr. Barry) tho' he had an equal opinion of their veracity, he knew not which to believe, but must conclude that one or other of them had been imposed upon by misinformation. Now in this doubt, he knew no mode of coming at the truth so well as by this motion.

Mr. Recorder argued that great names, however respectable, could be no warranty they were not deceived, or ought to hinder an enquiry into the shameful squander of public money. He instanced the heads of the law signing to an unconstitutional opinion about ship-money, and a lord chancellor running about to procure their prostituted votes. And he also instanced a right reverend bishop telling his king he had a right to all his subjects' had.

Mr. Barry Yelverton said, he had several times resolved not to speak to this question, but could not, as the debate had taken such a turn, content himself to the giving a silent vote. He acknowledged the present administration afforded a pleasing dawn, but he should never consider men, but measures. Concordatum, he said, was a compact between that house and government, and every exceeding was a proper object of enquiry; and so was every encrease of salary, some of which had been shamefully augmented from 10*l.* to 1200*l.* a year—Places with large profits and no duty. And thought this motion very improper.

Mr. Grattan thought that the strong opposition to this motion was a proof that there was something in Mr. Supple's case that could not stand examination. Gentlemen had said that no evidence had been produced to invalidate Mr. Supple's memorial. But was this fair arguing? Suppose a large sum on Concordatum appeared to be granted John Doe and Richard Roe, ought the house to produce evidence that those names were non-entities? Must they be put to prove negatives? Ought not rather Mr. Supple be put to the proof of what he asserts? In short, he never knew arguments so clumsily defended.

Mr. Thomas Burgh said, facts indeed were clumsy arguments, and not easily confuted. Such facts had been produced against the motion. Mr. French also spoke on the same side, and the house divided on the question. Ayes, 43. Noes, 109.

Tellers for the Ayes, Mr. Barry and Mr. Daly. Tellers for the Noes, Mr. O'Hara and Mr. Gamble.

Monday, November 10.

This day several new petitions were received, others reported, and a committee struck to try the merits of the county of Roscommon election, on the petition of Arthur French, Esq; but no debate.

Tuesday, November 11.

The heads of the bill, to allow further time for persons in office to qualify, were committed, reported, and ordered to the Lord Lieutenant.

Fresh petitions were preferred.

Mr. Barry moved, that the proper officer do lay before the house the particulars of the charge of exprestes, and other services, for which the sum of 583*l.* 19*s.* 9*d.* h. is charged as paid to George King, on Concordatum.

Mr. Prime Serjeant seemed to doubt if there was any proper officer.

The Right Hon. Mr. Beresford spoke at first against the motion, and Mr. Barry replied; but Mr. Prime Serjeant said the inquiry was very proper; and the debate took a quite different turn from Mr. Attorney General, launching out greatly in the eulogium of Sir John Blacquire. He was answered by General Cunningham, who said he had once a good opinion of the gentleman, but for a long time had changed it into a bad one:—not as a man, but a minister; for, as a private gentleman, had he promised him twenty shillings, he would not have taken nineteen shillings and sixpence for it. But, as a minister, he could prove that he had exercised great profusions in military contingencies and King's letters.

Mr. Attorney General still continued his panegyric; and Mr. Daly replied in support of what the General had said. Mr. Caulfield answered, that panegyric had nothing to do in this question; and that it was wrong to awake their feelings as men, on purpose to stifle them as representatives of the people. If this enquiry was denied, and Concordatum permitted to be exceeded—what was that less than telling the house, you shall hold the purse of the nation, but we will spend the money? But the house ought to insist on their rights, and not be subject to the dictates of Great-Britain, who, disgraced by her triumphs over America, might be soon so weakened, that, so far from protecting us, she would have enough to do to defend herself.

The question being put, was carried without a division.

Mr. Barry then moved, that the proper officer should return the particulars of stationary ware, for which 5,582*l.* 5*s.* had been paid on Concordatum; carried.

He then moved, that the proper officer should lay before the house particulars of the damages and losses sustained by Mr. James Supple, for which which 2394l. 15s. 6d. h. was paid on Concordatum.

This motion was carried nem. con. as a new, and unexceptionable mode of enquiry had been adopted.

Wednesday, November 12.

A committee was struck to try the merits of the petition of Sir Lucius O'Brien, against Hugh Dillon Massey, Esq; sitting member for the county of Clare.

A new writ was ordered for the borough of Gowran, in the room of Mr. James Agar, now Lord Clifden.

John Cunningham, a witness on the Clare election, was ordered into custody of the serjeant at arms, for non-attendance.

The house was cleared of all but members, and the Right Hon. Henry Flood complained that the Hon. Mr. Butler had challenged him; Mr. Butler being present, was called on by the Speaker, and made submission for the breach of privilege.

A motion was made by Mr. Barry for a return of the oath of a privy-counsellor, which, after a short altercation, was withdrawn.

Thursday, November 13.

An address of congratulation was voted to his Majesty, on the birth of a princet.

Several petitions were presented, and reports made, and a committee appointed (on the motion of Mr. Latouche) to consider the widening of Dame-street. No other business was done, nor any debate.

Friday, November 14.

No other business was done, but receiving petitions and reports; and then the house went up to the Castle with the address to his Majesty, on the happy delivery of the Queen.

Saturday, November 15.

The house struck a committee for trying the county of Fermanagh election. William Irvine, Esq; petitioner; Sir Arthur Brooke, Bart. and Mervyn Archdall, Esq; sitting members.

Three resolutions were agreed, on the motion of Mr. Grattan, respecting the excess of expenses beyond the revenue.

Mr. Barry moved to resolve, "that no article in the public accounts, of which there is any doubt, shall be allowed, unless the committee of accounts shall be satisfied that the same was actually expended for the public service."

Mr. Mason, who had been chairman of that committee, moved, as an amendment, to add, "But it does not appear from the report of the committee of accounts there is any article on which such doubt has been entertained."

Mr. Daly moved another amendment to that amendment, by inserting the words as yet, before the word appear.

These motions produced a long debate on the propriety of each, in which there was nothing very remarkable or striking. Mr. Daly withdrew his amendment, and Mr. Barry perceiving his motion would not be carried without Mr. Mason's addition, which he thought destroyed his intention, would not hazard a negative, and withdrew his motion also.

Monday, November 17.

A committee was struck for trying the county of Kilkenny election. The Right Hon. Henry Flood, petitioner, against the Hon. Edmund Butler, one of the sitting members.

The house divided on the question, whether Mr. James Cuffe, who had been chosen for the county of Mayo, and the borough of Donegall, should make his election for the county, there being a petition against him. The question passed in the negative;

Ayes, 81. | Noes, 87.

Mr. Grattan moved to resolve, That the present expenses of government ought to be greatly retrenched. On this a debate began, which, though carried on with great warmth for near six hours, afforded no amusement; as almost all the arguments were founded on arithmetical calculations, and every speech interwoven with puzzling numerical reasonings.

The gentlemen who defended the original motion were Mr. Grattan, Mr. Martin, Mr. Charles Henry Coote, Sir Edward Newenham, Mr. Barry, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. George Ogle, Mr. Yelverton, Mr. Cadwell, Mr. Cruikshanks, Mr. Brownlow, and Mr. William-Thomas Mansell. Mr. Prime Serjeant moved for the previous question, which motion was defended by that gentleman, Mr. Thomas Burgh, Mr. Henry Flood, Colonel Burton, Colonel Browne, Mr. Conolly, Mr. Foster, Mr. Walter, Mr. O'Hara, and Mr. Corry. The house divided on the previous question;

Ayes, 62. | Noes, 131.

Tuesday, November 18.

After six witnesses on the Clare election were ordered into custody for non-attendance, Mr. Foster took the chair of the committee of supplies.

Mr. Attorney General moved to resolve the debt of the nation at last Lady-day was 839,871l. 2s. 8d. 3f.

This was opposed by Mr. Barry; for the national debt on that day, as returned by the Accountant General, was only 825,426l. 7s. 2d. h. so that the committee of accounts had added near 1500l.

How this difference happened, was the subject of debate, which was so puzzling and intricate, and so complexed with figures, that the particulars would be as tiresome to our Readers, as they were to the Hearers. All that we can mention is, that the Vice-treasurer's account exceeded that of the Attorney General, because the latter gave no credit for payment till the King's letters came over, whereas the former advanced money on the Lord Lieutenant's warrants previous to the arrival of these letters. The debate now turned on the propriety of so advancing money, and Mr. Yelverton moved to strike out all sums paid in consequence of King's letters, which, as they were commisioned by the lords of the treasury, were illegal; but it was carried against him; and the Prime Serjeant striking out a sum charged on the military account, the motion was carried; as also one for keeping 12,000 troops, for the defence of this kingdom.

ODE on CHRISTMAS-DAY.

THE day is come, salvation is at hand,
Man's great salvation, man's immortal
joy,

The gladsome tidings spread thro' all the land,
And ev'ry heart and ev'ry tongue employ:
Let saints of light enhance the glorious theme,
Let mortals blest and hail th' auspicious morn;
To-day a Christ, a Deity supreme,

To-day a Christ, a Deity, is born.
To man is born, to man in man reveal'd,
With man's redemption on his forehead seal'd.

He's come, he's come, th' immortal king of kings,

He's come, great shepherd of the human fold;
He's come with healing mercy on his wings,
Give ear ye deaf, and all ye blind behold:

Behold the lamb, the son of righteousness,
The dying Saviour, the eternal three!
Behold the price of everlasting bliss!

The price of worlds, of man's eternity!
Eternity, man's hope, man's all above,
Eternity, a purchase made by love!

Bow down ye heav'ns, to him your homage pay,
To him who gave your blazing orbs to shine,
Whose glory guides and gilds returning day

With light, with heat, and fulgency divine;
Whose influence exalts the rising mind,
Whose wisdom charms and captivates the soul,
Whose bounty acts thro' nature unconfin'd,

And gives to life and harmony the whole.
To whom let worlds their hallelujahs raise;
To whom be glory and immortal praise.

To a young LADY, on her Marriage.

WHILE the unthinking Fair with passion
doat

On the gay plume, or military coat;
While the fond heart, or giddy fancy's smit,
With slaught'ring chief, or the more slaught'ring
wit;

You, madam! sway'd by reason's sacred voice,
Make the humane philosopher your choice;
Wisely bestowing on the man of truth,
The charms of beauty, innocence, and youth.
Virtue with temper, wit with candour join'd,
Honour that flows from rectitude of mind;
The head judicious, heart sincere and true,
Distinguish him, whom heav'n reserv'd for you.

The royal sage, unrival'd in renown,
Whose wisdom shone far brighter than his crown,
Has more than once this certain judgment giv'n—“A prudent wife 's the bounteous gift of heav'n.”

The heav'nly gift your spouse receives with pride,

Views the good wife in the dear blooming bride:
While you with pleasure may his worth regard,
And sing this maxim of our famous bard—

“A wit's a feather, and a chief's a rod;

“An honest man 's the noblest work of God.”

Your prudence in your well-judg'd option's shewn,
Rewarding merit, you enhance your own;
That union, sure, completely blest must prove,
Founded on virtue, just esteem, and love!

Happy, thrice happy, may you be through life!
He the best husband, you the kindest wife!

Accept these gratulations, void of art;
My hand transcribes the language of my heart.
Nor wait I for Apollo's tuneful aid,
Nor inspiration of Pierian maid,
Nor Hymen call, to bless the nuptial day,
Nor ardent wishes in few words convey.
Soft, light, and easy, be the marriage yoke!
May the next cent'ry see the chain unbroke!

WINTER: A POEM.

NOW furly Winter, from the frigid North,
Comes full array'd, attended by his train;
Vapours and rains, and stormy winds severe,
With nipping frosts, and snows of virgin white;
He throws his shades of darkness all around,
O'ercasts the sky with clouds of sable hue,
And choaks the air with lurid fogs and mists;
Which prove so hurtful to the aged race
Of Adam our grandfire, and mother Eve,
The cause of all our woe—for ere the knew
And felt the pains of sin, infirmities,
The woes of human life were then to man
A crowd of ills, of direful ills unknown!
O! wretched man! once happy, free from guile,
From care; the bane of earth's happiness,
And gloomy sorrow, anguish, and despair!
But not contented with thy blissful state,
Soon found the way to stray from Paradise,
Where peace and joy eternally reside,
And seek a world, the mansion of distress;
Whose smoothest paths are not without some thorns;

Which, if man touch, they'll prick him to the soul.

But hold my muse—resume again thy theme
Of dreary Winter, subject of your song,
Who now presages o'er this wretched land
Sterility, and sable ruin dire;
The verdant meads, once deck'd with flow'rets gay;

The spangle lawns, and yellow fields of corn;
The fragrant garden, orchards, groves, and bowrs,

Compleat one scene of desolation wild.
Hark! how the brooks in headlong torrents roll!
Which cease to murmur as they glide along,
And raise a sound melodious to the ear:
They flow in surges swell'd by heav'n rains
That fall incessant from the humid sky,
And as they bellow, spreading all around
A foaming deluge o'er the barren plains;
And scarce the Sun peeps thro' the clouded East,
Whose cheering ray illume the dusky day,
Foment and nourish, strengthen and revive,
The products of fair Nature's fertile womb,
Substantial proofs ungrateful man receives
Of bounteous Heav'n's pure eternal love.
Now snows descend, and robe the fields with white;

The shepherd hastens to his humble cot,
Where round him croud his little prattlers dear,
To welcome home their fond indulgent fire,
While gentle Phœbe, partner of his heart,
Throws on the turf, and joyfully prepares
The rustic meal to cheer her weary spouse,
And pour new life into his fainting soul;
His tender flock, deserted and forlorn,
Dejected rove along the mucid lawn,
Unmindful of their rural sport and play;

Some

Some lie in clusters near the thorny hedge,
 And sip the snow and crop the welked plant;
 While others seek the covert of some shade
 To hide them from the gelid rains and winds,
 And down the valley or the steepy dale,
 All clad with snows, the lowing heifers stray;
 While o'er their heads the potent tempest hurls,
 And from the mountains roll the floods of ice;
 Yet, vicious man! O wanton wretch! to please
 To gratify his brutish appetite,
 Will dare to rouse the fury of the bull*,
 Sole lord and master of the spacious plain.
 Can this be pleasure, O ye sons of vice!
 To torture those who never gave you cause,
 To act such cruelty? Is this the kind,
 The just reward you give for all their toil?
 Know then, thy actions and thy barbarous deeds
 Have plac'd you far below the brutal race.
 See from the thicket starts the peery hare,
 Still doubting whither to pursue her way;
 With many a pang she treads the virgin snow,
 And ev'ry step betrays her mazy flight.
 The downy songsters, hasting from the sprays,
 No longer fill the groves with melody;
 Nor herald larks salute the dawning day,
 Nor soaring chaunt their early matins sweet:
 All to the plains with rapid wing descend,
 And pick their scanty fare—while from the brooks
 With hasty steps, the fisherman retires,
 And seeks his hut, the seat of calm content:
 A treasure great, which misers ne'er possess'd;
 A blessing choicer than the wealth of kings;
 And like all blessings, it must come from Heav'n.
 The city swarms with people from afar,
 The crowded shops with commerce now resound,
 And in the streets, echoing thro' the lanes,
 The noise of coaches rends the parting air.
 Ye blooming nymphs, pride of Hibernia's isle!
 Whom gen'rous pity and true love inspire,
 Be gracious still to patronize our trade,
 That no distress be known among our looms;
 And ages yet unborn shall celebrate
 Your matchless worth, and virtues justly praise;
 And in the volume of immortal truth,
 Your fame recorded shall for ever live.
 Now tumult's hush'd, dull night resumes her throne,
 The swains and lasses croud the ruddy fire;
 Some sing the song, some raise the merry joke;
 So joyously the tedious hours beguile,
 While beaus and belles to balls and plays resort,
 Talk much of love and wisdom of the age,
 What vast improvement's daily made in dress;
 Or in the taverns great mechanics sit
 Discour'ing high on matters of the state,
 And planning rules to rectify the same.
 But ah! how many inbleak prisons lie
 Bereft of aid, oppress'd with sickness sore,
 And through the want of necessary food,
 Unpy'd sink beneath the pale of woe:
 O mortals! whom kind providence has blest'd
 With affluence, with ease and sanity,
 Where's now the love humanity demands?
 What's all your wealth without sweet charity?
 A virtue noble, godlike, heav'nly born:
 The man who wants it is not fit to live—
 All nature's now involv'd in balmy sleep,
 No noise is heard to violate repose,
 Save what the winds and howling tempests raise:
 Be this the season which the peaceful muse
 For meditation chuses as her own;

While man perplex'd with visionary dreams,
 Let me, exempt from deep corroding care,
 In useful study spend the tacit night,
 And contemplate my fill—and when my soul,

FOREIGN

FOREIGN TRANSACTIONS.

Constantinople, Sept. 17.

MR. Stachief, the Russian minister here, has received an express from Peteribourg, but it is not thought that he has yet got the final determination of the court of Russia to the last declaration of the Ottoman ministry; this he expects to receive by another courier, who is expected to arrive soon with very important dispatches. In the mean time it does not seem as if that minister thought they would be agreeable to the Porte, as he had advised the Russian subjects, and particularly the merchants, to get all their affairs into such order, that they may, in case of necessity, be able to leave the Turkish dominions on the shortest notice.

Lisbon, Sept. 24. The day before yesterday, the queen dowager (consort of his late majesty) after taking leave of the king, queen, and royal family, set off with a large retinue in a calash drawn by six horses, for Madrid. She is only going on a visit to her brother, the king of Spain, and not to retire into that kingdom, as has been reported. Don Nettler goes with her, who is charged with the last ratification of the treaties between the two courts, relative to their American settlements. Pombal begins to appear again, but not at court, or any of the public meetings. The affairs of that minister are settled; the court hath taken possession of his treasures, and he has only a pension to subsist on; thus is the public clamour at last suppressed.

Madrid, Oct. 14. The court is not yet determined whether it will go into mourning for the death of the infant don Philip, eldest son of the king. The royal treasury will save by the death of this prince, an annual pension of 120,000 ducats, which was his allowance. This prince was declared incapable of succeeding to the throne, on account of an invincible weakness of understanding.

Florence, Oct. 14. An account has been received from Radico-fani, (an ancient town near the confines of the Roman State) that on the 5th of this inst. a severe shock of an earthquake had been felt there, and in the adjacent mountains, which had done great damage: Some houses were thrown down, and the mountains were split, and separated so as to render the high road in some places, impassable; trees were torn up by the roots, and a wall, which surrounded a convent of Franciscan friars, sunk perpendicularly into the ground. For some days before a subterraneous noise had been heard, which alarmed the inhabitants, many of whom abandoned the town, and lived in tents. The same noise continued after the shock, which, according to the common opinion, indicates some emotion in the mountain, where formerly there was a volcano. The great duke was at Siena, six posts distant from Radico-fani, at the time the earthquake happened. His royal highness immediately sent persons thither, by whom he received the above account.

Warsaw, Oct. 22. Numan Bey, the Turkish envoy, seems disposed to pass the winter here; he has received accounts from the pasha of Chochzim, that 15,000 Turks are arrived near that fortress, which added to the 15,000 which were sent thither before, forms an army of 30,000, besides a third corps, which is placed on the other side the Danube. The Russians, on their part, are daily reinforcing themselves on the Neister, whither most of the troops they had in Poland are arrived.

Warsaw, Nov. 1. Every thing seems to announce a war between Russia and the Porte, and it is even said hostilities have been begun in Crimea, but that is uncertain; our accounts from Moldavia are more to be depended upon, and they contain an event which may probably be the first cause of a war; the particulars are these: "The Porte having on some account, not made public, ordered Gikas the hospodar (prince) of Moldavia to come to Constantinople, he for some time evaded the orders, out of fear that the Porte might not use him very well, because he inclined too much towards the Russians, and therefore thought himself safest in his own capital, particularly as the Muscovites, who block up Crimea, were near at hand to assist him in case of need. The Porte again ordered him to come to Constantinople, or to alledge his reason for not complying; to which the Prince had the imprudence to make answer, "That being placed on the throne by Russia, of whose protection he was sure, he did not think himself obliged to acknowledge the orders of the grand seignor any longer, and consequently was under no necessity of going to Constantinople." This impolitic conduct cost him his life, for a Turkish detachment entered his capital, by surprise, and killed that prince in his palace, with whose life probably the principality itself will be no more.

Madrid, Nov. 2. We hear from Gibraltar, that the emperor of Morocco has obtained a complete victory over the rebels of the mountains of Abit-Illahac near Fez; and that having put the heads of the rebellion to death, he imposed a heavier tribute on the inhabitants of that province than the one from which they wanted to free themselves.

Cologne, Nov. 11. General Fancit, who is ordered by the court of London to raise a certain number of German recruits for the British service, arrived, on the 7th of this month, at Hanover, from whence he is to go to the different courts, to put the last hand to the conventions already agreed to on that subject. The Margrave of Brandenburg-Anspach has given leave to raise 300 men in his territories, under the title of recruits for his battalions already serving in America. All the regiments of infantry belonging to the elector of Brunswick, have received orders to provide themselves with tents, which seems to confirm the report that his Britannick majesty is determined to employ them in America. Unhappily all the German officers appear disgusted with a war at such a distance, and attended with so many disagreeable circumstances. They write from Cassel, that lieutenant-col. de Schreyvogel, of Steyn's regiment, is condemned to two years imprisonment, for having quitted the British army without leave; and col. Block, of the regiment of Marbach, who likewise returned without permission, has received orders to go and resume his his post without delay. These two officers returned with general de Heister.

Hague, Nov. 11. The States General have further prolonged the prohibition against exporting ammunition, &c. to the English American colonies, for the term of one year.

October 24.

General Haldimand, lately appointed governor of Quebec, was at court, and had a conference with his majesty; all his stores and baggage have been re-landed, and his departure postponed till next spring. Sir Guy Carleton is to continue at Quebec, to take care of the affairs of that province till his successor arrive.

The Queen's Palace, St. James's Park, Nov. 4.

Last night, about nine o'clock, the queen was happily delivered of a princess. His grace the archbishop of Canterbury, several lords of his majesty's most honourable privy council, and the ladies of her majesty's bed chamber, were present.

This great event was soon after made known by the firing of the Tower guns.

Her majesty is, God be praised, as well as can be expected; and the young princess is in perfect health.

St. James's, Nov. 7. This day the right hon. the lord mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, waited upon his majesty, and being introduced to his majesty by the Earl of Hertford, lord chamberlain of his majesty's household, Thomas Nugent, Esq; the common sergeant, made their compliments in the following address:

"To the king's most excellent majesty.

"The humble address of the lord mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common council assembled.

"Most gracious sovereign,

"We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the lord mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common council assembled, humbly beg leave to express our unfeigned joy upon the happy delivery of our most gracious queen, and the birth of another princess, an event which we consider as an additional strength to the present happy establishment in your majesty's illustrious family; and as a further security for the enjoyment of our excellent constitution in church and state.

"Long may your majesty reign the true guardian of the liberties of this free country, and be the instrument, in the hands of providence, of transmitting to our posterity those invaluable rights and privileges which are the birthright of the subjects of this kingdom.

Signed by order of the court,

WILLIAM RIX."

To which his majesty was pleased to return the following most gracious answer:

"I thank you for this dutiful address, and your loyal congratulations on the happy delivery of the queen, and the birth of another princess.

"It is my invariable object to preserve, and transmit entire, the constitutional liberties of my people, which I shall ever consider as forming the basis of my government."

They were all received very graciously, and had the honour to kiss his majesty's hand.

Admiralty Office, Nov. 18. By letters from Sir George Collier, captain of his majesty's ship the Rainbow, to Mr. Stephens, it appears, that, in order to defeat an invasion designed to be made from the eastern parts of New-England, in the province of Nova Scotia, he has proceeded from Halifax in the ship aforementioned, with the Blonde, Mermaid, and Hope sloop, under his command, to Machias, where he arrived the 13th of August; that having landed the marines from the ships the following morning, notwithstanding the rebels kept a brisk fire of musketry from each side the river, and from the fort, they advanced, and, with very little resistance, took and destroyed the fort, three magazines, consisting of flour, rice, tanned leather, hides, shoes, ammunition, &c. several small vessels, and a corn mill, with a large quantity of corn: he also took a sloop of eighty tons, laden with lumber. That, leaving the Blonde at Machias, to intercept some vessels expected from Boston with stores and provisions, he then proceeded to cruise along the coasts of New England and New Hampshire, and there took and destroyed a ship ready to sail from Sheepscut river, with a cargo of large masts for France, also three brigs, 11 sloops, and 15 schooners.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

Carlsw, Nov. 19.

A Dispute has just commenced between R. H. and M. S. Esqrs. relative to a right and priority of possession claimed by the former of the lands of Tankardstown, in the Queen's co. and the crop thereof, and the latter having advertised the same for sale on Monday last, as the proper claimant, some days previous to the time of sale, both parties took occasion to be provided with men, arms, ammunition, field pieces, &c. and kept up a constant and severe cannonading ever since, which prevented the cant from being carried into execution. During the course of Friday last one man was killed and several dangerously wounded.

D U B L I N.

December 2.

It is computed, that the expence of the several elections tried this session before parliamentary committees, will not cost the parties a less sum than 50,000l. More than half of this money will fall into the pockets of lawyers.

So many evils have arisen from the bankrupt act, where it was intended to have been of general use, that it is said it will undergo a thorough revision, the means of detecting concealments, will be rendered more easy; and some methods will be taken to prevent occasional and friendly creditors: for it has been found, that some artful men, previous to their becoming bankrupts, have passed securities for large sums, to their friends, to whom they were not in the least indebted; these securities have been brought in under the statute, and obtained their dividends, to the defrauding the real creditors of their just portion of the bankrupt's effects, which have been collusively returned the fraudulent debtor. That this is the case, cannot be doubted, when we see men who have failed for considerable sums, paying a shilling in the pound, and then commencing business with greater eclat than ever.

On Monday night a number of unthinking young bucks and bloods went in search of a young gentleman, whom they imagined to have affronted one of their party: they entered a coffee-house in Essex-street, where they supposed the object of their resentment then was; but being disappointed in their expectations, they fell with the most unmerciful violence on the windows, chandeliers, looking-glasses, tables, chairs, forms, &c. and having entirely demolished those unoffending domestic inhabitants, they sallied out in a kind of phrenzy, entered and ransacked several taverns; and proceeding to Smock-alley, they there (among other acts of violence) knocked down a servant because his flambeau was lighted, cut a chairman for having a candle in his lantern, and fractured a man's skull, whose life is since despaired of. After thus striking terror into the inhabitants of this quarter, they went to a widow woman's house on Lazor's-hill, where the supposed offender was said to lodge; they there were equally disappointed as at the coffee-house, and consequently repeated similar acts of violence: they broke the windows of the house, and destroyed the furniture, without any regard to the defenceless situation of the widow, or the loss of private property. The damages done in Essex-street is estimated at 70l. and on Lazor's-hill something less. Notwithstanding that some of these young men had their faces blackened, their names and persons are known; and we hear that examinations are lodged against a number of them by the abused person. It is now the wish of every citizen who has been informed of this transaction, that the delinquents may be brought to make public satisfaction for this outrageous breach of law. The peace and good order of a civilized city is a principal security which the public have for the enjoyment of their property: and that can never be preserved, if every person who supposes himself to be injured or affronted, is permitted to commit such acts of violence. For in that case the laws would become nugatory, private property insecure, and justice would lose its effect.

We hear from Great-Marlow, in Buckinghamshire, England, that six persons in one family, were lately poisoned by eating a species of hemlock, not commonly known in that country, which a child gathered in a waste ground, and was mistaken for a wholesome plant, which it very much resembles in leaves, smell, and taste. An apothecary administered the usual antidotes, which saved the lives to the father, mother, and eldest daughter, but the rest died in great agonies in about twelve hours.

Sunday last, a carman in the Liberty drank seven naggins of raw whitley, for a trifling wager, and soon after being carried home, expired whilst his friends were laying him on a bed.—This is not the first example of life being sacrificed to the detestable and beastly vice of intemperance in the use of a liquor so destructive of health, morals, and scanty earnings of the lower class of people of this kingdom.

Extract of a letter from the Isle of Anglesea in Wales, Nov. 27, 1777.

“One of the greatest antiquities ever seen in this isle has lately been discovered within one mile of the seat of Sir Nicholas Bayly, Bart. A man in that neighbourhood having dreamed of a sum of money being concealed there, went in search of it, and after digging about six yards under ground, found an entrance made of stone, and arched in a curious manner, which conveyed him to some steps that led to another entrance, with a door also curiously arched, within which was a large room quite circular, and capable of containing about thirty persons, round which is a stone bench about two feet high;

M m m m 2

ia

in the centre of the room stand a pillar of solid stone curiously hewn, eight feet high and six in circumference, on the top of which is placed another solid stone, entirely round and twenty-six feet in circumference; the roof is turned in the form of a dome, and supported by fourteen large stones cut in a very uncommon manner; the floor is neatly paved, and a vast number of human bones were found strewn over it. The workmanship of the whole is admirable, and most elegantly finished, and is a curiosity well worth the attention of our curious and learned antiquarians."

3.] Last Friday a duel was fought between two gentlemen at Bay, when, after discharging a pistol each without effect, they were prevented from proceeding any farther by the interposition of their seconds.

Sunday an old house in Nicholas-street, at the corner of the passage leading into Draper's-court, suddenly fell down, and buried all the poor inhabitants; with their effects, under the ruins; happily, however, they were taken up (though dangerously bruised) without the loss of any lives. The old building at the corner of the Blind-quay, where Mr. Lundy Foote formerly lived, notwithstanding repeated public notices of its dangerous condition, is still permitted to menace the passenger with destruction; nor is it now expected that any steps will be taken to remove this nuisance, till some dreadful accident will, when too late, point out the necessity.

Last week, as a poor man was leading his horse from Smithfield, loaded with straw, some vicious fellow ran out of a smith's forge in Lincoln-lane, with a red hot bar of iron, and thrust it into the straw, which taking fire, was entirely consumed.

On Monday last was determined in the Court of Exchequer, before the lord chief baron, and a respectable jury of merchants, a cause of the highest consequence to the commercial interest of this kingdom, wherein Mr. Reilly, a salesman, was plaintiff, and an attorney of the same name was defendant. The question was about a bill of exchange, of which the defendant was acceptor, and had, as appeared, been a cause of great litigation, the defendant having obtained a verdict from a former jury in his favour. The defence set up by the defendant was, that a dealing had subsisted between the plaintiff and drawer, and that the plaintiff had received a sum in part of payment of the bill, from the drawer, and had it in his power to stop the remainder; but that not having so done, the defendant thereby, and by a lapse of four years and upwards, insisted that he was discharged from the payment of his acceptance. The learned judge, in delivering his charge, declared the law respecting bills of exchange to be, that any sum received in part by the holder of a bill from the drawer or endorser, could not discharge the acceptor, who was thereby relieved, but not exonerated from payment; but that taking a part from the acceptor, would discharge the drawer and endorsers. He therefore directed the jury to find for the plaintiff the sum due, which they accordingly did, with interest and costs.

A few days since, an accidental fire broke out in the dwelling house of Mr. John Carson, of Bilschrist near Loughrea, by which upwards of four hundred pounds worth of linen, ready wove, and thread, flax, &c. was totally destroyed; he was an honest man, extremely useful to many poor people in the linen trade, and the principal part of his property being destroyed by the above fatal accident, his adverse fortune is regretted.

Francis Graham, Esq. for the further security of all the north suburbs of Dublin, during the winter, has appointed four stout men, well armed, to patrol the roads and streets every night, and will be ready at a moment's warning, on notice given to him, to apprehend at all times any robber, &c. who may be found in that side of the town.

Extract of a letter from Galway, Nov. 17.

"We have received the following account of a most execrable and premeditated murder, committed at Keylybegs, on the eastern shore of Loughcorrib, and within a few miles of Headford, on the evening of Sunday the 9th instant, by one James M'Donough, a native of the county of Sligo, but who has resided in Lecconnaught this year past, on Mr. Luke Kelly, a reputable farmer of the county of Mayo, in the neighbourhood of Bellany: The circumstances which led to this horrid deed, are thus related:—The said M'Donough, with one Jordan, an accomplice of his, having some time ago stolen two cows, the property of Mr. Kelly, were so closely pursued by him, that the cattle were traced to Lecconnaught, where on Mr. Kelly's arrival he found that the cows had been slaughtered, and their hides sold; this leading to a detection of the persons who sold the hides, Jordan was alarmed, and immediately absconded. Soon after M'Donough also made off, and crossing the ferry of Keylybeg aforesaid, there villainously lay in wait for Mr. Kelly and a man who attended him from home, who were necessarily to return that way. No sooner did Mr. Kelly and his attendant land, than they were attacked by this villain, who being armed with a hanger, first struck at the attendant, who providentially escaped the blow, and fled among a parcel of rocks, while Mr. Kelly endeavouring to defend himself, had two of his fingers cut off, and was at length killed dead by a stroke of the hanger, which clove his skull. The murderer, as if not satiated with blood, remained on the ground till near morning, searching for the poor man who had escaped him, and who hid himself in a cleft, near which he saw the villain approach often that night. Next day the man, as soon as he could venture from his cover, went to Headford, where the corpse was so miserably conveyed, but the murderer was not to be found, nor has yet been heard of."

On Sunday night last a number of journey-men skinners forced into the dwelling house and concerns of one of their employers, in Watling-street, who it seems had refused to comply with their unlawful regulations in that occupation; after destroying the implements and utensils belonging to his trade, they proceeded to cut several parcels of wool, and threw large quantities of unmanufactured skins into the Liffey. It is alleged that the damage sustained in this riotous transaction, amounted to a very considerable sum of money. A correspondent (who sent us this piece of intelligence) says, says, that notwithstanding the vigilant exertion and activity of our present Lord Mayor to preserve peace, good order and subordination among the lower class of working mechanics, yet his endeavours have not only been frustrated, but rendered useless, as the laws now in force do not inflict an exemplary penalty on the transgressors! The injured citizens have no appeal left for redress, but the humanity and wisdom of the legislature; these, and such like acts of outrage, call for their immediate interference to give equal remedy to all just complaints made by the journeymen, as well as prevent in future similar depredations on the properties and safety of the citizens of this metropolis.

19.] Sunday evening last a most daring and dangerous mob, from Swords and the adjoining country, consisting at least of five hundred, armed with guns, &c. assembled near Belcamp, and proceeded to the house of John Jarvis White, Esq; where a felon taken up by a warrant was confined, whom they demanded. On being refused, they fired above a hundred shots at the house, demolished the gates and doors, and, with the most horrid menaces of destruction if they resisted, released the culprit, whom they led through the country in triumph. Information being given, a county magistrate immediately set off, accompanied by a large party of bailiffs and a sejeant's guard, and arrived at Belcamp about twelve o'clock. The magistrate, with the bailiffs, entered the wood of Belcamp, where one party of the rioters took shelter, and (though fired upon) dislodged them from their post, which they no sooner abandoned, than they were met by another party of the bailiffs, with whom a fresh engagement began, wherein several on both sides were wounded, and some of the rioters desperately—four of them were taken here, but their leader escaped. The Justice pursued the remainder towards Swords, and came up with some of them near Clougheran church, took four prisoners, and dispersed the rest. There are eight rioters sworn against, who are safely lodged in Newgate. Such a daring outrage against the law, in the vicinity of the metropolis, and under the eye of government, demands an exemplary punishment.

Same day one of his Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the county of Dublin was called on by the officers of St. Patrick's to suppress a riotous mob, and the unlawful practice of bull-baiting on the Sabbath day. The magistrate, attended by a guard, was assaulted by the mob, who threw stones and brick-bats at him, and behaved in a most riotous and insolent manner. Two of the offenders were lodged in Newgate, and the beast was sent to the House of Industry, to remain there until the owner claims him.

On Monday the 15th, came on to be heard before the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, Aldermen and Commons, who met for the purpose, the merits of a petition, presented by Mr. Daniel, complaining of the undue election and return of Mr. Pemberton, as a representative in common-council for the corporation of Cutlers, &c. when after a very full hearing, it plainly and evidently appeared that Mr. Pemberton was duly elected, and therefore an unanimous resolution to that effect followed.

There is now in Paris a curious animal, brought from the Amazonian Mountains, South America, which seems to have been unknown to the Naturalists, as no mention is made of it by the best informed writers we have. It has the neck of a lion; a white beard, and the hands and arms of a man. The snout is divided into three different channels of different colours.

The king of Prussia it seems is still determined that the German troops taken into British pay shall not pass through his dominions bordering on the Rhine, they are therefore returned back; the reasons that monarch gives are, that Germany is already too much depopulated by the emigrations gone from thence. The governor of Embden has stopped, by order of the king of Prussia, a corps of Anspach-Baireith troops in the English service, who were on their way to Holland.

Captain Dunn, of the Success Dublin trader, waited upon Sir John Fielding with a set of the Irish acts of parliament, finely bound in thirteen volumes, with a letter from the Right Hon. Henry Bevan, Esq; lord mayor of Dublin, mentioning that the above books were presented to him by order of the Speaker of the House of Commons in that city, in consideration of his public services.

In order that the manufacturers and tradesmen of this kingdom, should derive every benefit and advantage, by the keeping of the Queen's birthday, at a time when the nobility and gentry shall be in town, his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant has been pleased to order the celebration of that day to be on Tuesday the 3d of February, when it is hoped, that every person who shall appear at the Castle of Dublin, will be dressed in the manufactures of Ireland.

Dec. 24.] Sunday night, William Beekford, Esq; apprehended Thomas Bryan, of New-street, and lodged him in Kilmainham jail, for a street robbery. And, upon information on oath, said magistrate searched a house upon the Coombe, and there found the property sworn to, and likewise several silver watches, gold rings, silver buckles, some pieces of silver coin, some unwrought silk and cotton, and several other articles of value. Such persons as have been robbed, may see them by applying to said magistrate.

Saturday last a pickpocket, about twelve years of age, was detected at the Parliament-house, and in Crampton-court, but, by mistake sent, was suffered to escape. Some short time after he was again discovered picking a gentleman's pocket at the Globe Coffee-house door, and lodged in Newgate.

They write from Paris, that the Marquis of Genlis has laid a new species of wager with his Highness the Duke of Chartres, which is, that he would go to Fontainebleau, 14 leagues distant from that city, and back again, before the Duke could make 600,000 pips with a pen on paper.

25.] Last Wednesday evening, a coach, in which were three ladies and a gentleman, over-set near the Turnpike of the Circular Road in New-street, occasioned by a wheel going over one of the heaps of dirt suffered to remain there, by which means a Mrs. Edmondson had the misfortune to break one of her thigh-bones.

Articles of Convention made between Lieutenant General Burgoyne, and Major General Gates.

ARTICLE I.

THE troops under Lieutenant General Burgoyne are to march out of their camp with the honours of war, and the artillery of the intrenchments, to the verge of the river, where the old fort stood, where the arms and artillery are to be left—The arms to be piled by the word of command from their own officers.

II.

A free passage to be granted to the army under Lieutenant General Burgoyne to Great Britain, upon condition of not serving again in North America, during the present contest; and the port of Boston to be assigned for the entry of transports, to receive the troops, whenever General Howe shall so order.

III.

Should any cartel take place, by which the army under Lieut. Gen. Burgoyne, or any part of it, may be exchanged, the foregoing article to be void, as far as such exchange shall be made.

IV.

The army under Lieut. Gen. Burgoyne is to march to Massachusetts Bay, by the easiest, most expeditious and convenient route; and to be quartered in, near, or as convenient as possible to Boston, that the march of the troops may not be delayed when transports arrive to receive them.

V.

The troops to be supplied on the march, and during their being in quarters, with provisions, by Gen. Gates's orders, at the same rate of rations as the troops of his own army; and, if possible, the officers horses and cattle are to be supplied with forage at the usual rates.

VI.

All officers are to retain their carriages, but horses and other cattle; and no baggage to be molested or searched; Lieut. Gen. Burgoyne giving his honour there are no public stores secured therein. Major Gen. Gates will of course take the necessary measures for the due performance of this article: Should any carriages be wanted during the march for the transportation of officers baggage, they are, if possible, to be supplied by the country at the usual rates.

VII.

Upon the march, and during the time the army shall remain in quarters, in the Massachusetts Bay, the officers are not, as far as circumstances will admit, to be separated from their men. The officers are to be quartered according to rank, and are not to be hindered from assembling their men for roll calling, and other purposes of regularity.

VIII.

All corps whatever of Gen. Burgoyne's army, whether composed of sailors, batteau men, artificers, drivers, independent companies, and followers of the army of whatever country, shall be included in the fullest sense, and utmost extent of the above articles, and comprehended in every respect as British subjects.

IX.

All Canadians and persons belonging to the Canadian establishment, consisting of sailors, batteau-men, artificers, drivers, and independent companies, and many other followers of the army, who come under no particular description, are to be permitted to return there. They are to be conducted immediately by the shortest route to the first British post on Lake George; are to be supplied with provisions in the same manner as the other troops, and are to be bound by the same condition of not serving during the present contest in North America.

X.

Passports are to be immediately granted, for three officers, not exceeding the rank of captains, who shall be appointed by Lieut. Gen. Burgoyne, to carry dispatches to Sir William Howe, Sir Guy Carleton, and to Great Britain, by way of New York. And Major Gen. Gates engages the public faith, that these dispatches shall not be opened. These officers are to set out immediately after receiving their dispatches, and are to travel, by the shortest routes, and in the most expeditious manner.

XI.

During the stay of the troops in Massachusetts Bay, the officers are to be admitted on parole, and are to be allowed to wear their side arms.

XII.

Should the army under Lieut. Gen. Burgoyne find it necessary to send for their clothing and other baggage to Canada, they are to be permitted to do it in the most convenient manner, and the necessary passports granted for that purpose.

XIII.

These articles are to be mutually signed and exchanged to-morrow morning at nine o'clock, and the troops under Lieut. Gen. Burgoyne, are to march out of their intrenchments at three o'clock in the afternoon.

(Signed) J. BURGÖYNE.

All the private letters from Gen. Burgoyne's army speak in the highest terms of the generosity and humanity of the Americans; particularly Gen. Burgoyne's own letter to the Earl of Derby, which was on Tuesday shewn by his lordship to several gentlemen, wherein the General particularly mentions one circumstance, that exceeds all that he had ever seen or read of.—This was, when the British soldiers had marched out of their camp, according to the articles of capitulation, to a fixed place, where they were to pile their arms, 'Not one of the American troops were to be seen.' General Gates had ordered his whole army out of sight, that not one of them should be a spectator of the shame of the British troops, nor offer the smallest insult to the vanquished. This refined delicacy, and most soldier-like politeness, reflects the highest honour upon America; and is spoken of, by all our officers, in the highest terms of admiration.

Last Friday night, about twelve o'clock, as the Rev. William Darby, chaplain to the Royal Hospital, Kilmalmain, was returning home, he was stopped by five villains near St. Catherine's church, Thomas-street, and robbed of a thirty pound bank-note, and a gold repeating watch.

26.] Last Friday was heard, before the trustees of the Linen board, two informations of James Hamilton and Henry Kirkpatrick, against Butler and Hanlon, and Pat. Long, of this city, for having sold 2000 hogsheds of flaxseed, without giving a certificate in the precise form directed by a late act of parliament. As it appeared that a fair bill of parcels was given, and that there were no honest grounds for lodging these informations, they were both dismissed, without calling a single evidence on the part of the respondents.

It is said, two of the fellows who cut and abused the Rev. Mr. Darby in Thomas-street, on Friday night last, are taken; his watch was found upon one of the villains.

Some time ago, a parcel of villains attempted to force into the house of Edward Vernon, Esq; near Clontarf, but were prevented by the almost unexampled bravery of a servant, between whom and them several shots were exchanged, by which Mr. Vernon's windows and doors were much shattered. This is the second time this house has been attacked, and was, the first time, preserved by the courage of the same man-servant's wife, who maimed an arm of one of the villains, which was put through a broken pane of glass of one of the windows, with an iron poker. The gentlemen in that neighbourhood are getting bells on the tops of their houses, as the ancient Irish used to do when Rapparees were out, so that the alarm was spread in a minute for several miles, and was a certain protection from the spoilers.

They write from Kilkenny, that on Thursday se'night was committed to the county gaol, by Francis Lodge, Esq; Thomas Phelan, of Muckully in that county, charged with riotously assembling with many others at a dead time of the night, and burglariously forcing into the house of Michael Doran, and Nelly Doran, and forcibly and feloniously carrying away Mary Doran, daughter of the said Michael Doran. Also positively charged with forcing open the house of James Doran of said place, and desperately cutting in the head, with a gun and a stick, the said James Doran.

Mr. Evans, an eminent farmer, was drowned crossing a river, a few days ago, near Enniskerry.

Paul TO THE Mayor

HIBERNIAN MAGAZINE:

O R,

Compendium of Entertaining Knowledge,

For the Y E A R 1777.

Explanation of the FRONTISPIECE.

The Genius of the Magazine (in the form of Truth, developed from her Cloud) is represented seated on a Globe, and writing the Events of War and Peace, Commerce and Plenty, which are depicted by Emblematic Cupids.

Characters of the Royal Family of France.(Continued from p. 773, of Dec. Magazine.)

Character of Monsieur, eldest Brother of the King of France.

THIS prince, according to custom, is simply stiled Monsieur, as it were, by way of eminence, the first gentleman in the kingdom. Whoever has known the Dauphin, his father, may easily form an idea of the son, as he is in miniature, or rather a diminutive copy of that coarse original, both in body and mind; though in regard to the latter, he has not so much knowledge, nor can he shew an aptitude equal to that of his father; as to the former, in outward appearance, though not so bulky as the Dauphin, it is the same awkward clownishness; his face has nothing harsh or disgusting; but he is in his person ill-shaped and clumsy, with a gait devoid of all manner of grace and dignity. Such is the outward man.—The inward one is not so easily defined: One must either have lived with him and improved every opportunity of fathoming the almost unfathomable depth, or be conversant with people, who, having had such opportunities, dare speak their mind with openness and confidence;—and this is the source of my intelligence in regard to that apparently indefinable being. Wrapt up in the borrowed mantle of unassuming simplicity, this prince is devoured by the most towering ambition. From its remaining unsatisfied, his countenance is clouded with a fixed insipid dulness, which, however, he endeavours to hide under a constrained smile; indeed, he carries the farce so far as to put one in mind of the line recorded by Hamlet on his tablets; for the man, though inwardly gnawed by his ambitious desires, will smile upon a statue, one of his life-guards, or a beautiful woman, with the same apparent air of complacency. Master of all his features, he never betrays the alteration in his countenance. If he is thoughtful, it is (allow me the quibble) with an unthinking face. What his thoughts may be about, is no mystery to those who know him. Divided from the throne by one step only, he wishes for a smile powerful enough to make the path smooth and even. In short, he already experiences the heart-ach that tortured his father for twenty years. Happy, if he does not fall like him a sacrifice to state maxims! Though there is no Choiseul, at present, to mix and prepare the aconite, courts always harbour villains enough ripe for any kind of mischief. In order to carry his political hypocrisy as far as he thinks it useful, Monsieur affects the greatest uxoriousness, and to a vulgar eye, seems to live with his dull Savoyarde, the most disgusting of all disagreeable women, in all that unanimity which is so edifying and sincere between our noble and beloved pair at Buckingham-House.——Yet all the pains the prince is at to counteract himself as it were continually, are of little or no avail. The less self-importance he shews, the more he estranges the king's affections from him; who daily mortifies him by shewing the most distinguished preference to the Count d'Artois. Whatever may be Monsieur's apparent attachment to his wife, it is well known that his most refined dissimulation could not make him overcome his natural aversion to her, not even so far as to consummate his marriage. In a word, Monsieur is busy in this alone; namely, to conceal the little wit he is master of, his immoderate ambition, his hatred to his wife, his moroseness, his despotism, and I may say, wicked inclinations. I know that the French will paint him in far more flattering colours, but time will shew who has drawn the truest likeness.

Character of Count D'Artois, second Brother to the King of France.

THIS Prince is one of those figures which best suits the abilities of so unskilled a painter as I am. The features are strongly marked, and I shall be the less embarrassed in the mixing up of the proper colours. He has nothing in common with his two brothers, but that awkward gait, which is the disagreeable consequence of the bad education they all three received. His make, like theirs, is uncouth and ill-proportioned; but he displays a great vivacity, and his countenance is open and lively. The fire of youth sparkles in his eyes, and the ensemble of his features exhibits something great and noble; yet the want of what is called the graces, throws a disagreeable shade over that pleasing light. His extreme vivacity, contrasted by his profound ignorance, and total neglect of those graceful manners which distinguish the gentleman, gives to his least motion an air of libertine effrontery, that makes him pass for a greater rake than what he really is. Hurried on by his immoderate thirst after undefined pleasure, he gives himself up to it in a manner little suitable to his rank, and the various titles of Prince, Husband, and Father. Nevertheless, even this fault may be said to spring more from his activity and natural propensity to dissipation, than from any moral propensity; for, with all his levity, he cautiously avoids entering into any contemptible or ruinous connexions. To a man, fired by a momentary circumstance, a transient amour is a sufficient allay. Although the Countess D'Artois is not better favoured by nature than Monsieur's consort, the Count is in effect a far better husband than his brother; for he is the very reverse of that dissembling Prince. Monsieur is a cunning hypocrite, who pirate like, hangs out false colours, and spreads the borrowed flag of goodness, when all is guilt and wickedness within; the Count D'Artois on the contrary, is good in reality, though appearances make against him. Passionate and fiery as he is, one would think that the honour of his acquaintance is more dangerous than to be coveted; but if, in an unguarded moment, he happens to drop any offensive or disagreeable expression, he has instantly a thousand soothing ones to heal the wound his imprudence has made; and his affability so soon dispels the transient cloud, that whoever knows him, willingly overlooks those momentary flights of passion. Unlimited kindness, as it were, seals and unseals his lips. Add to this a generosity, the offspring of natural goodness, not of proud magnificence, benevolence without ostentation, with a thousand private virtues, and you may then form a just idea of this Prince's character.

I know, and I am too impartial to conceal it, that many unjustifiable things may be laid to his charge. He is not endued with that self-esteem so necessary to every man, especially in one of his high rank; he is too fond of appearing at the head of youth, no less despicable than dissipated and thoughtless: he carries his expences even to ruinous prodigality; he is not careful and attentive enough to repress those emotions which hurt his reputation: But above all, I think him inexcusable to be the first in encouraging the extravagant taste of the Queen for dissipation; as, from that circumstance alone, there arise two very disagreeable consequences, viz. the lavish-

end, perhaps irritate him more. She thought not, she said, if he wrote dutifully and begged his forgiveness. If he wrote, he said, he would write respectfully; but to ask forgiveness, would imply a sense of guilt; and as he had nothing of that (on this head) on his mind he could not descend to act a part so insincere. She rejoined, that as to the consequences we ought to leave that; duty must not be omitted let the event be as it would; and she saw not but forgiveness might be sought in the sense she meant it, which only had reference to Sir William's apprehensions. He said if he kept up that necessary distinction, Sir William would take it rather as an insult and resent the more; however to oblige her, he would write all he could with honesty—but she might depend on it he would say nothing nor do nothing that should be inconsistent with his past conduct, or make himself or her appear abject. His wife should not be lessened to gratify his parent's ambition.

The next morning Sir James Parker his lady, and Miss Spence, sent their congratulatory compliments to the family, and an invitation to dine and spend the evening with them. Mrs. Trenchard was so desirous that the first notice Sir William had of their marriage should be from his son, that her desire prevailed with him to write immediately—he was at a loss how to dictate to his pen on an occasion so circumstanced; but after several doubts to which she made objections, as being too indifferent and breathing a spirit too independent, determined to send the following.

An Historical Account of the Proceedings of the Armies under General Howe and Maj. Gen. Clinton, extracted from the Gazette Extraordinary, dated Tuesday, December 2.

THESE advices were brought by Maj. Cuyler, first aid de camp to Gen. Sir William Howe, and are dated German Town, Oct. 10, 1777.

On the 30th of August the army under Gen. Howe landed on the West side of the Elk river, and divided into two columns; one under the command of Lord Cornwallis, the other commanded by Lieut. Gen. Knyphausen.

On Sept. 3, (Maj. Gen. Grant, with six battalions, remaining at the head of Elk to preserve the communication with the fleet) the two columns joined on the road to Christienbridge. The Hessian and Anspach chasseurs defeated on their march a chosen corps of one thousand men from the enemy's army, with the loss of only 2 officers wounded, 3 men killed, and 19 wounded, when that of the enemy was not less than 50 killed, and many more wounded.

On the 6th Major General Grant joined the army.

The whole marched on the 8th by Newark, and encamped that evening within four miles of the enemy, who moved early in the night, taking post on the heights on the eastern side of Brandywine creek.

On the 9th Lieut. Gen. Knyphausen marched with the left, as did Lord Cornwallis with the right, and both joined the next morning at Kennet's-square.

On the 11th the army advanced in two columns, that under Gen. Knyphausen to Chad's Ford, and arrived in front of the enemy about 10 o'clock; while the other column, under Lord Cornwallis, &c. having marched 12 miles round to the forks of the Brandywine, crossed both branches, taking from thence the road to Dilworth, in order to turn the enemy's right at Chad's Ford.

General Washington, having intelligence of this movement, detached Gen. Sullivan to his right, with near 10,000 men, who took a strong position, with his left near to the Brandywine, both flanks being covered by very thick woods, and his artillery advantageously disposed.

About 4 o'clock the King's troops advanced, and Lord Cornwallis having formed the line, the light infantry and chasseurs began the attack; the guards and grenadiers instantly advanced from the right, the whole under a heavy fire of artillery and musquetry: but they pushed on with an impetuosity not to be sustained by the enemy, who falling back into the woods in their rear, the King's troops entered with them, and pursued closely for near two miles.

After this success, a part of the enemy's right took a second position in a wood, from whence the 2d light infantry and chasseurs soon dislodged them; and from this time they did not rally again in force.

The 2d light infantry, 2d grenadiers and 4th brigade, moved forward a mile beyond Dilworth, where they attacked a corps of the enemy, strongly posted to cover the retreat of their army, which corps not being forced until after it was dark, the enemy's army escaped a total overthrow.

From the most correct accounts, the strength of the enemy's army was not less than 15,000 men, a part of which retired to Chester, and remained there that night; but the greater body did not stop until they reached Philadelphia. They had about 300 men killed, 600 wounded, and near 400 made prisoners.

The loss on the side of his Majesty's troops amounted to about 100 killed, and 488 wounded. Eight pieces of cannon, and a great quantity of military stores were taken from the enemy.

The army lay this night on the field of battle, and on the 12th Maj. Gen. Grant, with the first and second brigades, marched to Concord. Lord Cornwallis, with the light infantry and British grenadiers, joined him next day, and proceeded to Ash-Town within five miles of Chester.

On the same day Major M'Donell made Mr. M'Kinley, the new appointed President of the Lower Counties on Delaware, his prisoner.

Lieut. Col. Loos, with the combined battalion of Rhall's brigade, escorted the wounded and sick to Wilmington on the 14th.

On the 16th intelligence being received that the enemy were advancing on the Lancaster road, it was immediately determined to push forward and attack them : but a most violent fall of rain setting in, the intended attack became impracticable.

The enemy, apprized of the approach of the army, marched the whole night, and got to Yellow Springs, having, as is since known, all their small ammunition damaged by the rain. In their retreat they lost about 18 men killed, and some wounded.

On the 18th a detachment of light infantry was sent to the Valley Forge upon Schuylkill, where the enemy had a variety of stores, and a considerable magazine of flour, and were joined on the 20th by the guards.

Upon intelligence that Gen Wayne was lying in the woods with a corps of 1500 men, and four pieces of cannon, Maj. Gen. Grey was detached on the 20th to surprize him ; and having, by the bayonet only, forced his pickets, he rushed in upon his encampment, killed and wounded not less than 300 on the spot, taking between 70 and 80 prisoners, including officers, their arms, and eight waggons loaded with baggage and stores. One captain of light infantry and three men were killed in the attack, and four men wounded. Gallantry in the troops, and good conduct in the General, were fully manifested upon this critical service.

On the 22d the army crossed the Schuylkill, at Fat Land Ford, without opposition ; and on the 25th marched in two columns to German Town. Lord Cornwallis, with the British grenadiers, and two battalions of Hessian grenadiers, took possession of Philadelphia the next morning.

In the evening of the 26th, three batteries were begun, to act against the enemy's shipping that might approach the town. These batteries were unfinished when they were attacked by a number of galleys, gondolas, and other armed vessels ; and the largest frigate, the Delaware, mounting 30 guns, anchored within 500 yards of the town. About ten in the morning they began a heavy cannonade ; but the tide falling, the Delaware grounded, and was taken possession of by the marine company of grenadiers, commanded by Capt. Averne.

The smaller frigates and armed vessels were forced (except a schooner that was driven on shore) to return under the protection of a fort, where there were two floating batteries, with three ranges of sunken machines, to obstruct the passage of the river, the lowest row being three miles below the fort.

The enemy had a redoubt upon the Jersey shore, at Billing's Point, with heavy guns in it, to prevent these machines from being weighed up, which 300 men posted there evacuated on the 1st of October ; and Capt. Hammond immediately opened the navigation at that place, by removing a part of the chevaux de frize.

The enemy having received a reinforcement of 1500 men from Peek's Kill, and 1000 from Virginia, and presuming on the army being much weakened by the detachments to Philadelphia and Jersey, thought it a favourable time for them to risk an action. They accordingly marched at six in the evening of the 3d from their camp near Skippach-creek to Germantown, (about 16 miles,) where the bulk of the army was posted.

At three in the morning of the 4th the patrols discovered the enemy's approach, and the army was immediately ordered under arms.

About break of day the enemy began their attack ; but the light infantry, being well supported, sustained the same with such determined bravery, that they could not make the least impression on them ; and Major-general Grant advancing with the right wing, the enemy's left gave way, and was pursued through a strong country between four and five miles : but such was the expedition with which they fled, that it was not possible to overtake them.

The enemy retired near twenty miles by several roads to Perkiomy-creek, and encamped upon Skippach-creek.

They saved all their cannon by withdrawing them early in the day.

By the best accounts, their loss was between two and three hundred killed, about six hundred wounded, and upwards of four hundred taken. Among the killed was General Nash, with many other officers of all ranks, and 54 officers among the prisoners.

Since the battle of Brandywine 72 of their officers have been taken, exclusive of 10 belonging to the Delaware frigate.

On the 19th the army removed from Germantown to Philadelphia, as a more convenient situation for the reduction of Fort-Mifflin, which at present is an obstruction to the passage of the river, as the upper chevaux de frize cannot be removed until we have possession of that post ; near which the enemy having intrenched about 800 men upon the Jersey shore, Colonel Donop, with three battalions of Hessian grenadiers, the regiment of Mirback, and the infantry chasseurs, crossed the Delaware on the 21st instant, with directions to proceed to the attack of that post. Col. Donop led on the troops in the most gallant manner to the assault. They carried an extensive out-work, from whence the enemy were driven into an interior intrenchment, which could not be forced without ladders. The detachment, in moving up and returning from the attack, was much galled by the enemy's galleys and floating batteries.

Col. Donop and Lieut. Col. Minningerode being both wounded, the command devolved upon Lieut. Col. Linning, who, after collecting all the wounded that could be brought off, returned with the detachment to camp.

There were several brave officers lost upon this occasion, in which the utmost ardour and courage were displayed by both officers and soldiers.

On the 23d, the Augusta, in coming up the river with some other ships of war, to engage the enemy's galleys near the fort, got aground, and, by some accident taking fire in the action, was unavoidably consumed. The Merlin sloop also grounded ; and the other ships being obliged to remove to a distance from the explosion of the Augusta, it became expedient to evacuate and burn her also.

His Excellency concludes his letters with requesting additional cloathing for 5000 Provincials, which, by including the new levies expected to be raised in that and the neighbouring countries, will certainly be wanting.

While these important services were transacting in Pennsylvania, Lieut. Gen. Clinton meditated an incursion into Jersey; his principal motive was to attempt a stroke against any detached corps of the enemy, if one offered; or, if not, to collect a considerable number of cattle, which would at the same time prove a seasonable refreshment to the troops, and deprive the enemy of resources which they much depended on.

The result of this expedition, after a little skirmishing with small parties of the enemy, was the collecting about 400 head of cattle, including 20 milch cows for the use of the hospital, 400 sheep, and a few horses, with the loss of about 40 men, killed, wounded, prisoners, and missing.

By a letter from Brig. Gen. Campbell to Sir Henry Clinton, dated Staten-Island, Aug. 23, it appears, that the enemy effected almost a total surprize of two battalions of the Jersey Provincials on that island; but that they had suffered severely for their temerity in making the descent, Col. Dongan having come up with their rear at the very instant when the rebels were using the greatest diligence in transporting their troops to the Jersey shore; and being joined by Brig. Gen. Campbell with cannon, who took them in flank, about 150 surrendered themselves prisoners of war; and the remainder, of nearly the same number, retreating towards the extremity of the island, found means to cross over near Amboy.

Col. Buskirk's battalion being ordered to attack a party left to cover the enemy's boats, they did it with charge of bayonet, and obliged the party to retreat to the Jersey shore.

It further appears, that this descent was carried on by select and chosen troops, formed from three brigades, Sullivan's, Smallwood's, and De Bore's, and headed by their respective generals, besides Drayton's and Ogden's battalions. There were taken in all 259 prisoners, among whom are 1 Lieut. col. 3 majors, 2 captains, and 15 inferior officers. Their loss in killed cannot be ascertained, but must have been considerable *.

In a letter from Lieut. Gen. Sir Henry Clinton to Gen. Sir William Howe, dated Fort Montgomery, Oct. 9, an account is given of an attack upon Forts Clinton, Montgomery, &c. which reflects the greatest military honour on the conquerors.

The difficulties of the march over mountains, every natural obstruction, and all that art could invent to add to them, being surmounted, Gen. Vaughan's corps was ordered to begin the attack on Fort Clinton, and dislodge, if possible, the enemy from their advanced station behind a stone breast-work, having in front, for half a mile, a most impenetrable abbatis. This the general, by his good disposition, obliged the enemy to quit, tho' supported by cannon, got possession of the wall, and there waited till Lieut. Col. Campbell began his attack. The Colonel waited a favourable moment to attack Fort Clinton, which was a circular height, defended by a line for musquetry, with a barbet battery of three guns in the center, and flanked by two redoubts; the approaches to it thro' a continued abbatis of 400 yards, defensive every inch, and exposed to the fire of ten pieces of cannon. A brisk attack on the Montgomery side; the galleys with their oars approaching, firing, and even striking the fort; the men of war that moment appearing; the extreme ardour of the troops; in short, all determined the General to order the attack: Gen. Vaughan's spirited behaviour and good conduct did the rest. Having no time to lose, he particularly ordered that not a shot should be fired; in this he was strictly obeyed, and both redoubts, &c. were stormed. Gen. Tryon advanced with one battalion to support General Vaughan in case it might be necessary, and he arrived in time to join the cry of Victory!

A summons was sent to Fort Constitution; but the flag meeting with an insolent reception, unknown in any war, the General determined to chastise, and therefore an embarkation was ordered: but they found the fort evacuated in the greatest confusion, the storehouses burnt, but the cannon left unspiked.

Major-Gen. Tryon was detached to destroy the rebel settlement called the Continental Village, who burnt barracks for 1500 men, several storehouses, and loaded waggons, this being the only establishment of the rebels in that part of the highlands, and the place from whence any neighbouring body of troops drew their supplies.

Sir James Wallace was ordered up the river at the same time, to find a passage through the chevaux de frize between Polypus Island and the Main, having under his protection a large detachment from the army, headed by Major-Gen. Vaughan, from whose report, dated on board the Friendship off Esopus, Oct. 17, Gen. Howe takes occasion to applaud a very spirited piece of service performed by those two officers, who attacked the batteries, drove the rebels from their works, spiked and destroyed their guns; and Esopus "being a nursery for almost every villain in the country," the General landed and reduced every house to ashes, while Sir James Wallace burnt their shipping and small craft.

Return of the Cannon, Stores, Ammunition, &c. taken and destroyed on this expedition.

Cannon 67, from six to two pounders.

Two frigates built for 30 and 36 guns were burnt by the rebels on the forts being taken. The guns aboard them, and two galleys, which were likewise burnt, amounted to above 30. One sloop with ten guns fell into our hands. The whole loss above 100 pieces.

Powder, cartridges fitted, cannon and musquet shot, immense quantities.

Every article belonging to the laboratory in the greatest perfection. Other stores, such as portfires, match, harness, spare gun-carriages, tools, instruments, &c. &c. in great plenty. A large quantity of provisions. The boom and chain which ran across the river from Fort Montgomery to St. Anthony's Nose is supposed to have cost 70,000l. Another boom which was destroyed near Fort Constitution must likewise have cost the rebels much money and labour. Barracks for 1500 men were destroyed by Major-Gen.

Gen. Tryon at Continental Village, besides several storehouses and loaded waggons, of the articles contained in which no accounts could be taken.

In this Gazette, the letters of Lord Howe and Commodore Hotham are little more than recapitulations of the dispatches of the Generals Howe and Clinton; and as they are very long are therefore omitted, to make room for the following most important advices from Lieut. Gen. Burgoyne, which, as they relate to an event hardly to be paralleled in history, we shall preserve entire.

From the LONDON GAZETTE.

Whitehall, Dec. 15, 1777.

THIS afternoon Captain Craig, of the 47th regiment, arrived from Quebec, with the following duplicate of a letter from Lieut. Gen. Burgoyne, to Lord George Germaine, the original of which has not yet been received.

Albany, Oct. 20, 1777.

My Lord,

NO possibility of communication with your Lordship having existed since the beginning of September, at which time my last dispatches were sent away, I have to report to your Lordship the proceedings of the army under my command from that period;—a series of hard toil, incessant effort, stubborn action, till disabled in the collateral branches of the army by the total defection of the Indians; the desertion or the timidity of the Canadians and Provincials, some individuals excepted; disappointed in the last hope of any timely co-operation from other armies; the regular troops reduced by losses from the best parts, to 3500 fighting men, not 2000 of which were British; only three days provisions, upon short allowance, in store; invested by an army of 16,000 men, and no apparent means of retreat remaining; I called into council all the generals, field-officers, and captains commanding corps, and by their unanimous concurrence and advice I was induced to open a treaty with Major-general Gates.

Your Lordship will see by the papers transmitted herewith the disagreeable prospect which attended the first overtures; and when the terms concluded are compared, I trust that the spirit of the councils I have mentioned, which, under such circumstances, dictated instead of submitting, will not be refused a share of credit.

Before I enter upon the detail of these events, I think it a duty of justice, my Lord, to take upon myself the measure of having passed the Hudson's River, in order to force a passage to Albany. I did not think myself authorised to call any men into council, when the peremptory tenor of my orders and the season of the year admitted no alternative.

Provisions for about 30 days having been brought forward, the other necessary stores prepared, and the bridge of boats completed, the army passed the Hudson's River on the 13th and 14th of September, and encamped on the heights and in the plain of Saratoga, the enemy being then in the neighbourhood of Still-Water.

15th. The whole army made a movement forward, and encamped in a good position in a place called Dovogot.

16th. It being found that there were several bridges to repair, that work was begun under cover of strong detachments, and the same opportunity was taken to reconnoitre the country.

17th. The army renewed their march, repaired other bridges, and encamped upon advantageous ground, about four miles from the enemy.

18th. The enemy appeared in considerable force to obstruct the further repair of bridges, and with a view, as it was conceived, to draw on an action where artillery could not be employed: a small loss was sustained in skirmishing, but the work of the bridges was effected.

19th. The passages of a great ravine, and other roads towards the enemy, having been reconnoitred, the army advanced in the following order:

Brigadier-general Frazer's corps, sustained by Lieut. Col. Breyman's corps, made a circuit in order to pass the ravine commodiously, without quitting the heights, and afterwards to cover the march of the line to the right: their corps moved in three columns, and had the Indians, Canadians, and Provincials, upon their fronts and flanks. The British line, led by me in person, passed the ravine in a direct line South, and formed in order of battle as fast as they gained the summit, where they waited to give time to Frazer's corps to make the circuit, and to enable the left wing and artillery, which, under the command of Major-general Phillips and Major-general Reidel, kept the great road and meadows near the river, in two columns, and had bridges to repair, to be equally ready to proceed. The 47th regiment guarded the batteaux.

The signal guns, which had been previously settled to give notice of all the columns being ready to advance, having been fired between one and two o'clock, the march continued: the scouts and flankers of the column of the British line were soon fired upon from small parties, but with no effect: after about an hour's march, the piquets, which made the advanced guard of that column, were attacked in force, and obliged to give ground; but they soon rallied and were sustained.

On the first opening of the wood, I formed the troops: a few cannon shot dislodged the enemy at a house from whence the piquets had been attacked; and Brigadier-Gen. Frazer's corps had arrived with such precision in point of time, as to be found on a very advantageous height on the right of the British.

In the mean time the enemy, not acquainted with the combination of the march, had moved in great force out of their intrenchments, with a view of turning the line upon the right; and being checked by the position of Brigadier-Gen. Frazer, countermarched in order to direct their great effort to the left of the British.

From the nature of the country, movements of this nature, however near, may be effected without a possibility of their being discovered.

About three o'clock the action began by a very vigorous attack on the British line, and continued with great obstinacy till after sun-set, the enemy being continually supplied with fresh troops. The stress lay upon the 20th, 21st, and 62d regiments, most

most parts of which were engaged near four hours without intermission; the 9th had been ordered early in the day to form in reserve.

The grenadiers and 24th regiment were some part of the time brought into action, as were part of the light infantry; and all these corps charged with their usual spirit.

The riflemen, and other parts of Breyman's corps, were also of service; but it was not thought advisable to evacuate the height where Brigadier-General Frazer was posted, otherwise than partially and occasionally.

Major-Gen. Phillips, upon first hearing the firing, found his way, through a difficult part of the wood, to the scene of action, and brought up with him Major Williams, and four pieces of artillery; and from that moment I stood indebted to that gallant and judicious second for incessant and most material services; particularly for restoring the action in a point which was critically pressed by a great superiority of fire, and to which he led up the 20th regiment, at the utmost personal hazard.

Maj. Gen. Reidesel exerted himself to bring up a part of the left wing; and arrived in time to charge the enemy with regularity and bravery.

Just as the light closed, the enemy gave ground on all sides, and left us completely masters of the field of battle, with the loss of about 500 men on their side, and, as supposed, thrice that number wounded.

The darkness preventing a pursuit, the prisoners were few.

The behaviour of the officers and men in general was exemplary. Brig. Gen. Frazer took his position in the beginning of the day with great judgment, and sustained the action with constant presence of mind and vigour. Brig. Gen. Hamilton was the whole time engaged, and acquitted himself with great honour, activity, and good conduct. The artillery in general was distinguished, and the brigade under Capt. Jones, who was killed in the action, was conspicuously so.

The army lay upon their arms the night of the 16th, and the next day took a position nearly within cannon-shot of the enemy, fortifying their right, and extending their left so as to cover the meadows through which the great river runs, and where the batteaux and hospitals were placed. The 47th regiment, and the regiment of Hesse Hanau, with a corps of Provincials, encamped in the meadows as a further security.

It was soon found that no fruits, honour excepted, were attained by the preceding victory; the enemy working with redoubled ardour to strengthen their left; their right was unattackable already.

On our side it became expedient to erect strong redoubts for the protection of the magazines and hospital, not only against a sudden attack, but also for their security in case of a march to turn the enemy's flank.

21st. A messenger arrived from Sir Harry Clinton, with a letter in cyphers, informing me of his intention to attack Fort Montgomery in about ten days from the date of his letter, which was the 10th of September. This was the only messenger of many that I apprehend were dispatched by Sir William Howe and him, that had reached my camp since the beginning of August. He was sent back the same night to inform Sir Harry of my situation, and of the necessity of a diversion to oblige Gen. Gates to detach from his army, and my intention to wait favourable events in that position, if possible, to the 12th of October.

In the course of the two following days, two officers in disguise, and other confidential persons, were dispatched by different routes with verbal messages to the same effect; and I continued fortifying my camp, and watching the enemy, whose numbers increased every day.

3d October. I thought it advisable to diminish the soldiers ration, in order to lengthen out the provisions; to which measure the army submitted with the utmost cheerfulness. The difficulties of a retreat to Canada were clearly foreseen, as was the dilemma, should the retreat be effected, of leaving at liberty such an army as Gen. Gates's to act against Sir William Howe.

This consideration operated forcibly to determine me to abide events as long as possible; and I reasoned thus: The expedition I commanded was evidently meant at first to be hazardous; circumstances might require it should be devoted; a critical junction of Mr. Gates's force with Mr. Washington might possibly decide the fate of the war; the failure of my junction with Sir Harry Clinton, or the loss of my retreat to Canada, could only be a partial misfortune.

7th. In this situation things continued till the 7th, when no intelligence having been received of the expected co-operation, and four or five days for our limited stay in the camp only remaining, it was judged advisable to make a movement to the enemy's left, not only to discover whether there were any possible means of forcing a passage should it be necessary to advance, or dislodging him for the convenience of retreat, but also to cover a forage of the army, which was in the greatest distress on account of the scarcity.

A detachment of 1500 regular troops, with 2 twelve-pounders, 2 howitzers, and 6 six pounders, were ordered to move, and was commanded by myself, having with me Major-General Phillips, Major-General Reidesel, and Brigadier General Frazer. The guard of the camp upon the heights was left to Brigadiers-General Hamilton and Speicht; the redoubts and the plain to Brigadier-General Coll; and as the force of the enemy immediately in their front consisted of more than double their numbers, it was not possible to augment the corps that marched beyond the numbers above stated.

I formed the troops within three quarters of a mile on the enemy's left; and Capt. Frazer's rangers, with Indians and Provincials, had orders to go by secret paths in the woods to gain the enemy's rear, and by shewing themselves there to keep them in check.

The further operations intended were prevented by a very sudden and rapid attack of the enemy on our left, where the British grenadiers were posted to support the left wing of the line. Major Ackland, at the head of them, sustained the attack with great resolution; but the enemy's great numbers enabling them in a few mi-notes to extend the attack along the front of the Germans, which were immediately on the right of the grenadiers, no part of that body could be removed to make a second line to the flank, where the stress of the fire lay. The right was at that time unengaged; but it was soon observed, that the enemy were marching a large corps round their flank, to endeavour cutting off their retreat. The light infantry and part of the 24th regiment, which were at that post, were therefore ordered to form a second line, and to secure the return of the troops into camp.

While this movement was proceeding, the enemy pushed a fresh and strong reinforcement to renew the action upon the left, which, overpowered by so great a superiority, gave way, and the light infantry and 24th regiment were obliged to make a quick movement to save that point from being entirely carried, in doing which Brigadier-General Frazer was mortally wounded.

The danger to which the lines were exposed becoming at this moment of the most serious nature, orders were given to Majors General Phillips and Reidesel to cover the retreat, while such troops as were most ready for the purpose returned for the defence of them. The troops retreated hard pressed, but in good order. They were obliged to leave six pieces of cannon, all the horses having been killed, and most of the artillery-men, who had behaved, as usual, with the utmost bravery, under the command of Major Williams, being either killed or wounded.

The troops had scarcely entered the camp, when it was stormed with great fury, the enemy rushing to the lines under a severe fire of grape-shot and small arms. The post of the light infantry under Lord B. Clarke, assisted by some of the line, who threw themselves by order into those intrenchments, was defended with great spirit; and the enemy, led on by General Arnold, was finally repulsed, and the General wounded; but, unhappily, the intrenchments of the German reserve, commanded by Lieutenant Colonel Breyman, who was killed, were carried, and although ordered to be recovered, they never were so; and the enemy by that misfortune gained an opening on our right and rear. The night put an end to the action.

Under the disadvantages thus apparent in our situation, the army was ordered to quit the present position during the night, and take post upon the height above the hospital; thus, by an entire change of front, to reduce the enemy to form a new disposition. This movement was effected with great order and without loss, though all the artillery and camp were removed at the same time. The army continued offering battle to the enemy in their new position the whole day of the 8th.

8th. Intelligence was now received that the enemy were marching to turn the right, and no means could prevent this measure but retreating towards Saratoga. The army began to move at nine o'clock at night; Major General Reidesel commanding the van-guard, and Major General Phillips the rear.

This retreat, though within musquet shot of the enemy, and encumbered with all the baggage of the army, was made without loss; but a very heavy rain, and the difficulties of guarding the batteaux, which contained all the provisions, occasioned delays which prevented the army reaching Saratoga till the night of the 9th; and the artillery could not pass the fords of the Fishkill till the morning of the 10th.

At our arrival near Saratoga, a corps of the enemy, of between five and six hundred, were discovered throwing up intrenchments on the heights, but retired over a ford of the Hudson's river at our approach, and joined a body posted to oppose our passage there.

It was judged proper to send a detachment of artificers, under a strong escort, to repair the bridges and open a road to Fort Edward. The 47th regiment, Captain Frazer's marksmen, and Mackay's Provincials, were ordered for that service; but the enemy appearing on the heights of the Fish-kill in great force, and making a disposition to pass and give us battle, the 47th regiment and Frazer's marksmen were recalled. The provincials left to cover the workmen at the first bridge, ran away upon a very slight attack of a small party of the enemy, and left the artificers to escape as they could, without a possibility of their performing any work.

During these different movements the batteaux with provisions were frequently fired upon from the opposite side of the river; some of them were lost, and several men were killed and wounded in those which remained.

11th. Attacks upon the batteaux were continued; several were taken and retaken; but their situation being much nearer to the main force of the enemy than to ours, it was found impossible to secure the provisions any otherwise than by landing them and carrying them upon the hill: this was effected under fire, and with great difficulty.

The possible means of further retreat were now considered in councils of war, composed of the general officers, minutes of which will be transmitted to your Lordship.

The only one that seemed at all practicable was by a night-march to gain Fort Edward, with the troops carrying their provisions upon their backs; the impossibility of repairing bridges, putting a conveyance of artillery and carriages out of the question: and it was proposed to force the ford at Fort Edward, or the ford above it.

Before this attempt could be made, scouts returned with intelligence that the enemy were intrenched opposite these fords, and possessed a camp in force on the high ground between Fort Edward and Fort George, with cannon; they had also parties down the whole shore to watch our motions; and posts so near to us upon our own side of the water, as must prevent the army moving a single mile undiscovered.

The bulk of the enemy's army was hourly joined by new corps of militia and volunteers, and the numbers together amounted to 16,000 men.

Their position, which extended three parts in four of a circle round us, was, from the nature of the ground, inattacking in all parts.

In this situation the army took the best position possible, and fortified; waiting till the 13th at night, in the anxious hope of succour from our friends, or, the next desirable expectation, an attack from our enemy.

During

During this time the men lay continually upon their arms, and were cannonaded in every part; even rifle-shot and grape-shot came into all parts of the line, though without any considerable effect.

At this period an exact account of the provisions was taken, and the circumstances stated in the opening of this letter became complete.

The council of war was extended to all the field-officers and captains commanding corps of the army, and the convention enclosed herewith ensued; a transaction which I am sure was unavoidable, and which I trust in that situation will be esteemed honourable.

After the execution of the treaty, General Gates drew together the force that surrounded my position, and I had the consolation to have as many witnesses as I have men under my command, of its amounting to the numbers mentioned above.

During the events stated above, an attempt was made against Ticonderoga by an army assembled under Major-General Lincoln, who found means to march with a considerable corps from Hubbardton undiscovered, while another column of his force passed the mountains between Skenesborough and Lake George; and on the morning of the 18th of September a sudden and general attack was made upon the Carrying-place at Lake George, Sugar-hill, Ticonderoga, and Mount Independence. The sea-officer commanding the armed sloop stationed to defend the Carrying-place, as also some of the officers commanding at the posts, at the Sugar-hill, and at the Postage, were surprised, and a considerable part of four companies of the 53d regiment were made prisoners: a block-house, commanded by Lieut. Lord, of the 53d regiment, was the only post on that side that had time to make use of their arms, and they made a brave defence till cannon taken from the surprised vessel was brought against them.

After stating and lamenting so fatal a want of vigilance, I have to inform your Lordship of the satisfactory events which followed.

The enemy, having twice summoned Brigadier-general Powell, and received such answers as became a gallant officer entrusted with so important a post, and having tied during the course of four days several attacks, and being repulsed in all, retreated without having done any considerable damage.

Brigadier-general Powell, from whose report to me I extract this relation, gives great commendations to the regiment of Prince Frederick and the other troops stationed at Mount Independence. The Brigadier also mentions with great applause the behaviour of Capt. Taylor, of the 21st regiment, who was accidentally there on his road to the army from the hospital, and Lieut. Becroft, of the 24th regiment, who, with the artificers in arms, defended an important battery.

On the 24th of Sept. the enemy, enabled by the capture of the gun-boats and batteaux, which they had made after the surprise of the sloop, to embark upon Lake George, attacked Diamond-Island in two divisions.

Captain Aubrey and two companies of the 47th regiment had been posted at that island from the time the army passed the Hudson's river, as a better situation for the security of the stores at the south end of Lake George, than Fort George, which is on the continent, and not tenable against artillery and numbers. The enemy were repulsed by Capt. Aubrey with great loss, and pursued by the gun-boats under his command to the east shore, where two of their principal vessels were re-taken, together with all the cannon: they had just time to set fire to the other batteaux, and retreated over the mountains.

I beg leave to refer your Lordship for further particulars to my aid-de-camp Lord Peterham; and I humbly take occasion to recommend to his Majesty's notice that nobleman, as one endued with qualities to do important services to his country in every station to which his birth may lead. In this late campaign, in particular, his behaviour has been such as to entitle him to the fullest applause; and I am confident his merit will be thought a sufficient ground for preferment, tho' deprived of the éclat and fort of claim which generally attends the delivery of fortunate dispatches.

I have only to add, my Lord, a general report of the killed and wounded. I do not give it as correct; the hurry of the time, and the separation of the corps, having rendered it impossible to make it so. The British officers have bled most profusely and most honourably: all who have fallen were valuable; but the extensive merits which marked the public and private character of Brigadier-general Frazer will long remain upon the memory of this army, and make his loss a subject of particular regret. Those who remain wounded have been equally forward; and the general officers, from the mode of fighting, have been more exposed than in other services. Among the rest I have had my escapes. It depends upon the sentence his Majesty shall pass upon my conduct; upon the judgment of my profession, and of the impartial and respectable parts of my country, whether I am to esteem them blessings or misfortunes.

I have the honour to be, &c.

J. BURGoyNE.

P. S. The above is an exact duplicate of the dispatch sent by Lord Peterham. Captain Craig, of the 47th regiment, who has the charge of it, is an officer of great merit; and is particularly worthy of notice for having served with unabated zeal and activity through this laborious campaign, notwithstanding a wound through his arm, which he received at Hubbardton.

No. I.

October 13, 1777.

LIEUT. GEN. Burgoyne is desirous of sending a field-officer with a message to Major-general Gates, upon a matter of high moment to both armies. He requests to be informed at what hour Gen. Gates will receive him to-morrow morning.

Major-general Gates.

A N S W E R.

MAJ. GEN. Gates will receive a field-officer from Lieut. Gen. Burgoyne at the advanced post of the army of the United States, at ten o'clock to-morrow to-morrow morning, from whence he will be conducted to head quarters.

Camp at Saratoga, 9 o'clock,

P. M. October 13, 1777.

Lieutenant-general Burgoyne.

No. II.

Major Kingston delivered the following message to Major-general Gates, October 14, 1777.

AFTER having fought you twice, Lieutenant-general Burgoyne has waited some days, in his present position, determined to try a third conflict against any force you could bring to attack him.

He is apprised of the superiority of your numbers, and the disposition of your troops to impede his supplies, and render his retreat a scene of carnage on both sides. In this situation he is impelled by humanity, and thinks himself justified by established principles and precedents of state, and of war, to spare the lives of brave men upon honourable terms: should Major-general Gates be inclined to treat upon that idea, General Burgoyne would propose a cessation of arms during the time necessary to communicate the preliminary terms by which, in any extremity, he and his army mean to abide.

No. III.

Major-general Gates's proposals, together with Lieutenant-general Burgoyne's answers.

I. GENERAL Burgoyne's army being exceedingly reduced by repeated defeats, by desertion, sickness, &c. their provisions exhausted, their military horses, tents, and baggage taken or destroyed, their retreat cut off, and their camp invested, they can only be allowed to surrender prisoners of war.

Answer. Lieut. Gen. Burgoyne's army, however reduced, will never admit that their retreat is cut off, while they have arms in their hands.

II. The officers and soldiers may keep the baggage belonging to them. The Generals of the United States never permit individuals to be pillaged.

III. The troops under his Excellency General Burgoyne will be conducted by the most convenient route to New-England, marching by easy marches, and sufficiently provided for by the way.

Answer. This article is answered by General Burgoyne's first proposal, which is here annexed.

IV. The officers will be admitted on parole; may wear their side arms, and will be treated with the liberality customary in Europe, so long as they, by proper behaviour, continue to deserve it; but those who are apprehended having broke their parole, as some British officers have done, must expect to be close confined.

Answer. There being no officer in this army under, or capable of being under, the description of breaking parole, this article needs no answer.

V. All public stores, artillery, arms, ammunition, carriages, horses, &c. &c. must be delivered to commissaries appointed to receive them.

Answer. All public stores may be delivered, arms excepted.

VI. These terms being agreed to, and signed, the troops under his Excellency Gen. Burgoyne's command, may be drawn up in their encampments, where they will be ordered to ground their arms, and may thereupon be marched to the river-side, to be passed over in their way towards Bennington.

A fewer. This article inadmissible in any extremity. Sooner than this army will consent to ground their arms in their encampment, they will rush on the enemy, determined to take no quarter.

VII. A cessation of arms to continue till sunset, to receive General Burgoyne's answer.

(Signed)

Horatio Gates.

Camp at Saratoga, Oct. 14, 1777.

No. IV.

MAJOR Kingston met the Adjutant-general of Major-general Gates's army, October the 14th, at sun-set, and delivered the following message:

If General Gates does not mean to recede from the 6th article, the treaty ends at once.

The army will, to a man, proceed to any act of desperation, rather than submit to that article.

The cessation of arms ends this evening.

No. V.

Lieutenant-general Burgoyne's proposals, together with Major-general Gates's answers.

THE annexed answers being given to Major-general Gates's proposals, it remains for Lieutenant-general Burgoyne, and the army under his command, to state the following preliminary articles on their part.

I. The troops to march out of their camp with the honours of war, and the artillery of the intrenchments, which will be left as hereafter may be regulated.

I. The troops to march out of their camp with the honours of war, and the artillery of the intrenchments, to the verge of the river where the old fort stood, where their arms and artillery must be left.

II. A free passage to be granted to this army to Great-Britain, upon condition of not serving again in North-America during the present contest; and a proper port to be assigned for the entry of transports to receive the troops whenever General Howe shall so order.

II. Agreed to for the port of Boston.

III. Should any cartel take place, by which this army or any part of it may be exchanged, the foregoing article to be void, as far as such exchange shall be made.

III. Agreed.

IV. All officers to retain their carriages, bat-horses, and other cattle; and no baggage to be molested or searched, the Lieutenant General giving his honour that there are no public stores secreted therein. Major Gen. Gates will of course take the necessary measures for the security of this article.

IV. Agreed.

V. Upon the march the officers are not to be separated from their men; and in quarters the officers shall be lodged according to rank; and are not to be hindered from assembling their men for roll-calling, and other necessary purposes of regularity.

V. Agreed to, as far as circumstances will admit.

VI. There are various corps in this army composed of sailors, batteau men, a tificers, drivers, independent companies, and followers of the army army; and it is expected that those persons, of whatever country, shall be included in the fullest sense, and utmost extent of the above articles, and comprehended in every respect as British subjects.

VI. Agreed to in the fullest extent.

VII. All Canadians, and persons belonging to the establishment in Canada, to be permitted to return there.

VII. Agreed.

VIII. Passports to be immediately granted for three officers, not exceeding the rank of captain, who shall be appointed by Gen. Burgoyne to carry dispatches to Sir Wm. Howe, Sir Guy Carleton, and to Great-Britain by the way of New-York, and the public faith to be engaged that these dispatches are not to be opened.

VIII. Agreed.

IX. The foregoing articles are to be considered only as preliminaries for framing a treaty, in the course of which others may arise to be considered by both parties; for which purpose it is proposed that two officers of each army shall meet and report their deliberations to their respective Generals.

IX. This capitulation to be finished by two o'clock this day, and the troops march from their encampment at five, and be in readiness to move towards Boston to-morrow morning.

X. Lieut. Gen. Burgoyne will send his deputy Adjutant-general to receive Major Gen. Gates's answer to-morrow morning at ten o'clock.

X. Complied with.

Horatio Gates.

No. VI.

THE eight first preliminary articles of Lieut. Gen. Burgoyne's proposals, and the 2d, 3d, and 4th of those of Major Gen. Gates of yesterday, being agreed to, the foundation of the proposed treaty is out of dispute; but the several subordinate articles and regulations necessarily springing from these preliminaries, and requiring explanation and precision between the parties, before a definitive treaty can be safely executed, a longer time than that mentioned by Gen. Gates in his answer to the 9th article becomes indispensably necessary. Lieut. Gen. Burgoyne is willing to appoint two officers immediately to meet two others from Major Gen. Gates, to propose, discuss, and settle those subordinate articles, in order that the treaty, in due form, may be executed as soon as possible.

(Signed)

John Burgoyne.

Camp at Saratoga, Oct. 15, 1777.

Major Kingdon has authority to settle the place for a meeting of the officers proposed.

Settled by Maj. Kingdon on the ground where Mr. Schayler's house stood.

No. VII.

IN the course of the night, Lieut. Gen. Burgoyne has received intelligence that a considerable force has been detached from the army under the command of Major Gen. Gates during the course of the negotiations of the treaty depending between them. Lieut. Gen. Burgoyne conceives this, if true, to be not only a violation of the cessation of arms, but subversive of the principles on which the treaty originated, viz. a great superiority of numbers in Gen. Gates's army.

Lieut. Gen. Burgoyne therefore requires that two officers on his part be permitted to see that the strength of the forces now opposed to him is such as will convince him that no such detachments have been made; and that the same principle of superiority on which the treaty first began still exists.

16th October.

No. VIII.

Articles of Convention between Lieutenant General Burgoyne, and Major General Gates; for which see page 830.

To prevent any doubts that might arise from Lieut. Gen. Burgoyne's name not being mentioned in the above treaty, Maj. Gen. Gates hereby declares that he is understood to be comprehended in it as fully as if his name had been specifically mentioned.

Horatio Gates.

Minutes of a council of war held on the Heights of Saratoga, Oct. 12th, 1777.

P R E S E N T.

Lieut. Gen. Burgoyne, Maj. Gen. Phillips, Maj. Gen. Reidefel, Brig Gen. Hamilton.

THE Lieutenant general states to the Council the present situation of affairs.

The enemy in force, according to the best intelligence he can obtain, to the amount of upwards of fourteen thousand men, and a considerable quantity of artillery, are on this side the Fishkill, and threaten an attack. On the other side the Hudson's river, between this army and Fort Edward, is another army of the enemy, the numbers unknown; but one corps, which there has been an opportunity of observing, is reported to be about fifteen hundred men. They have likewise cannon on the other side the Hudson's river, and they have a bridge below Saratoga church, by which the two armies can communicate.

The batteaux of the army have been destroyed, and no means appear of making a bridge over the Hudson's river, were it even practicable from the position of the enemy.

The only means of retreat, therefore, are by the ford at Fort Edward, or taking the mountains in order to pass the river higher up by rafts, or by another ford which is reported to be practicable with difficulty, or, by keeping the mountains, to pass the head of Hudson's river, and continue to the westward of Lake George all the way to Ticonderoga. It is true, this last passage was never made but by Indians, or very small bodies of men.

In order to pass cannon or any wheel carriages from hence to Fort Edward, some bridges must be repaired under fire of the enemy from the opposite side of the river; and the principal bridge will be a work of fourteen or fifteen hours. There is no good position for the army to take to sustain that work; and, if there were, the time stated as necessary would give the enemy on the other side the Hudson's river an opportunity to take post on the strong ground above Fort Edward, or to dispute the ford, while Gen. Gates's army followed in the rear.

The intelligence from the lower part of Hudson's river is founded upon the concurrent report of prisoners and deserters, who say it was the

BRITISH and IRISH BIOGRAPHY,

FLETCHER (John) a celebrated English dramatic poet, was the son of Dr. Richard Fletcher, bishop of London: he was born in Northamptonshire, in the year 1576, and was educated at the university of Cambridge. He wrote plays in conjunction with Mr. Francis Beaumont, but what share each had in forming the plots, writing the scenes, &c. it is impossible to determine. Winstanley relates, that these two poets meeting once at a tavern, in order to form the plan of a tragedy, Fletcher undertook to kill the king, which words being overheard by an officious waiter, who had not been witness to the context of their conversation, he lodged an information of treason against them; but their loyalty being unquestioned, and it appearing that the plot was against a theatrical monarch, the affair ended in mirth. Mr. Fletcher, besides the plays which he and his friend Beaumont wrote in concert, was author of five other dramatic pieces, viz. the Faithful Shepherdess, Monsieur Thomas, the Night-Walker, the Woman-Hater, the Woman's Prize, and the Two Noble Kinsmen, in which last he was assisted by Shakespeare. He died of the plague at London in 1625, aged 49, and was interred in St. Mary Overy's church, Southwark. Mr. Edward Philips observes, that "he was one of the happy triumvirate of the chief dramatic poets of our nation in the last foregoing age, among whom there might be said to be a symmetry of perfection while each excelled in his peculiar way: Ben Johnson in his elaborate pains and knowledge of authors; Shakespeare in his pure vein of wit and natural poetic height; and Fletcher in a courtly elegance and genteel familiarity of style, and withal a wit and invention so overflowing, that the luxuriant branches thereof were frequently thought convenient to be lopped off by his almost inseparable companion Francis Beaumont."

The works of Beaumont and Fletcher, though approved of in general, have not escaped censure. Mr. Rymer, the historiographer has criticised them in a book entitled "The Tragedies of the last Age considered and examined by the practice of the ancients, and by the common sense of all ages;" and being a critic devoid of candour, has laboured to expose their faults without taking the least notice of their beauties. Nevertheless, they have been allowed to possess great merit; and it is sufficient to say, that among their admirers are the illustrious names of Denham, Waller, Johnson, Dryden, &c.

The Life of Samuel Foote, Esq.

Foote (Samuel) Esq; a well known author of the present age, was born at Truro in Cornwall. His father was member of parliament for Tiverton in Devonshire, and enjoyed the posts of commissioner of the prize office and fine contract. His mother was heiress of the Dinely and Goodere families, and to her, in consequence of an unhappy and fatal quarrel between her two brothers, Sir John Dinely Goodere, Bart. and Samuel Goodere, captain of his majesty's ship the Ruby, four thousand pounds per annum descended.

Mr. Foote received his education at Worcester college, Oxford; from whence he was removed to the Temple, being designed for the study of the law; in which it is very probable that his great oratorical talents and powers of mimicry would have shewn themselves in a very conspicuous light. The dryness and gravity of this study, however, not suiting his natural vivacity of temper, he chose rather to employ those talents in a sphere of action to which they seemed better adapted, viz. on the stage. His first appearance was in the part of Othello; but, discovering perhaps that his forte did not lie in tragedy, he soon struck out into a new and untrodden path, in which he at once attained the two great ends of affording entertainment to the public and emolument to himself. This was by taking on himself the double character of author and performer, in which light, in 1747, he opened the Little Theatre in the Haymarket, with a dramatic piece of his own writing, called the Diversions of the Morning. This piece consisted of nothing more than the introduction of several well known characters in real life, whose manner of conversation and expression this author had very happily hit in the diction of his drama, and still more happily represented on the stage by an exact imitation not only of the manner and tone of voice; but even of the very persons of those whom he intended to take off. Among these characters there was a certain physician, who was much better known from the oddity and singularity of his appearance and conversation, than from his eminence in the practice of his profession. The celebrated chevalier Taylor, the oculist, who was at that time in the meridian of his popularity, was another object of Mr. Foote's mimicry and ridicule; and in the latter part of his piece, under the character of a theatrical director, he took off, with great humour and accuracy, the several styles of acting of every principal performer of the English stage.

This performance at first met with some little opposition from the civil magistrates of Westminster, under the sanction of the act of parliament for limiting the number of play-houses: but the author being patronized by many of the principal nobility and others, this opposition was overruled, and with an alteration of the title of his piece to that of Mr. Foote's giving Tea to his Friends, he proceeded without further molestation, and represented it, through a run of upwards of forty mornings, to crowded and and splendid audiences. The ensuing season he produced another piece of the same kind, which he called an auction of pictures. In this he introduced several new characters, all however popular ones, and extremely well known, particularly Sir Thomas De Veil, then the acting justice of peace for Westminster; Mr. Cock, the celebrated auctioneer; and the equally famous orator Henley. From this time Mr. Foote continued to produce many other dramatic pieces, viz. the Knights, the Minor, the Englishman return'd from Paris, the Author, the Orators, the Liar, the Mayor of Garratt, the Patron, the Commissary, the Bankrupt, the Cozeners, &c. He has lately disposed of all his property in the Haymarket theatre, for the annual sum of sixteen hundred pounds, to George Colman, Esq; who has also agreed to pay him a handsome sum for the right of acting all his unpublished pieces.

“ Mr. Foote's dramatic works (says the ingenious author of the Companion to the Play-house) seem rather to be the hasty productions of a man of genius, whose Pegasus, though endur'd with fire, has no inclination for fatigue, than the laboured finishings of a profess'd dramatist, aiming at immortality. His plots are somewhat irregular, and their catastrophes not always conclusive, or perfectly wound up. Nevertheless it must be confessed that they contain more of one essential property of comedy, viz. strong character, than the writings of any other of our modern authors, and although the diction of his dialogue may not, from the general tenor of his subjects, either require or admit of, the wit of a Congreve, or the eloquence of an Etherege, yet it is constantly embellished with numberless strokes of keen satire, and touches of temporary humour, such as only the clearest judgment and deepest discernment could dictate; and though the language spoken by his characters may at first sight seem not the most accurate and correct, yet it will, on a closer examination, be found entirely dramatical, as it contains numbers of those natural minutiae of expression, on which the very basis of character is frequently founded, and which render it the truest mirror of the conversation of the time he wrote in.

“ It has been objected against Mr. Foote (continues the same writer) that the introduction of real characters on the stage is not only ungenerous, but cruel and unjust; and that the rendering any person the object of public ridicule and laughter, is doing him the most essential injury possible, as it is wounding the human breast in the tenderest point, viz. its pride and self-opinion. Yet I cannot think this charge so strong as the vehement opponents of mimicry would have it appear to be. Mr. Foote himself, in his Minor, has very properly distinguished who are the proper objects of ridicule, and the legal victims to the lash of satire; that is to say, those who appear what they are not, or would be what they cannot. When hypocrisy and dissimulation would lay snares for the fortunes, or contaminate the principles of mankind, it is surely but justice to the world to withdraw the mask, and shew their natural faces with the distortions and shocking deformities they really are possessed of. And when affectation or singularity overbear the more valuable parts of any persons character, and render those disagreeable and wearisome companions, who, divested of those characteristic foibles, might be valuable, sensible, and entertaining members of community, it is themselves surely who act the ridiculous part on the more extensive stage of the world; and it should rather be deemed an act of kindness both to persons themselves and their acquaintance to set up such a mirror before them, as by pointing out to themselves their absurd peculiarities, (and who is without some?) may afford them an opportunity, by amendment, to destroy the resemblance, and so avoid the ridicule: such a sort of kindness as it would be to lead a person to a looking-glass who had put on his peruke the wrong side foremost, instead of suffering him in that condition to run the gauntlet in the mail or the play-house, where he must perceive the titter of the whole assembly raised against him, without knowing on what account it is raised, or by what means to put a stop to it. In a word, if a Sir Penurious Trifle, a Peter Paragraph, or a Cadwallader, have ever had their originals in real life, let those originals keep their own counsel, remember the qui caput, ille facit, and reform their respective follies. Nor can I help being of opinion, opinion, that an author of this kind in some respects is more useful to the age he lives in, than those who only range abroad into the various scenes of life for general character. And although Mr. Foote's dramatic pieces may not perhaps have the good fortune to attain immortality, or be perfectly relished by the audiences of a future age, yet I cannot deny him here the justice of bearing strong testimony to his merits, and ranking him among the first of the dramatists of this."

The Life of Sir John Fortescue.

Fortescue (Sir John) an eminent lawyer, scholar, and statesman, whom Mr. Granger styles "one of the most learned men of his age," was descended from an ancient family in Devonshire; but there is no certain account of the time or place of his birth. He received his education, according to bishop Tanner, at Exeter-college, Oxford. He afterwards studied the municipal laws of this kingdom at Lincoln's-Inn, of which he was made one of the governors in the fourth and seventh years of the reign of Henry VI. In 1430, he was called to the degree of serjeant at law; and kept his seat upon that occasion with great splendour. In 1441 he was made one of the king's serjeants at law; and the following year was appointed chief justice of the King's Bench. He was much esteemed for the gravity, wisdom, and integrity with which he presided in that court for many years. He continued in high favour with the king, of which, in the twentieth year of his reign, he received a signal proof, by an unusual augmentation of his salary; for besides the customary allowance of a chief justice, his majesty granted him an annuity of one hundred and eighty marks out of the Exchequer; a great sum in those days. Sir John Fortescue held his office throughout the whole reign of Henry VI. to whom he firmly adhered, and whom he served with great fidelity in all his troubles: and on this account, in the first parliament under king Edward IV. which met at Westminster on the 4th of November, 1461, he was attainted of high treason, by the same act in which king Henry VI. queen Margaret, Edward their son, the dukes of Exeter and Somerset, and a great number of persons of distinction were likewise attainted. After the revolution in favour of the house of York, king Henry being obliged to fly into Scotland, together with his queen and son, was accompanied by Sir John Fortescue. And it is generally believed, that at this time he was constituted chancellor of England by king Henry. His name, indeed, is not to be found in the records as chancellor; because, as Mr. Selden says, "being with king Henry VI. driven into Scotland by the fortune of the wars with the house of York, he was made chancellor of England, while he was there." Several other writers have styled him chancellor of England; and in his book De Laudibus Legum Angliæ, he calls himself "Cancellarius Angliæ."

In the year 1463 he embarked with queen Margaret, prince Edward, and other persons of distinction, at Hamburg, and landed safely at Sluys in Flanders; from whence they were conducted to Bruges, thence to Lisle, and afterwards into Lorain.

In this exile he continued many years, retiring from place to place, as the necessities of the royal family required.—But when the earl of Warwick had obliged king Edward IV. to leave the kingdom, and had replaced Henry VI. on the throne, queen Margaret, and the adherents of the house of Lancaster, were encouraged to return to England. Accordingly, on the 14th of April, 1471, that prince, accompanied by her son Edward, Sir John Fortescue, the duke of Somerset, and others, with a small body of French forces, landed at Weymouth in Dorsetshire. Immediately after their arrival, they received the unwelcome and unexpected news that the earl of Warwick was slain, and his army defeated that very day, at Barnet, by king Edward; and that Henry was imprisoned in the tower.—This was a fatal stroke to the Lancastrian party; and queen Margaret, overwhelmed with grief and despair, took refuge with her son in the abbey of Beaulieu in Hampshire. Her spirits, however, revived, when she saw herself joined by the earl of Devonshire, the lord Wenlock, and many other persons of rank, who exhorted her still to hope for success. She then took the field, and advanced through the counties of Devon and Somerset, her army increasing on each day's march, until she arrived at Tewksbury in Gloucestershire, where she was overtaken by king Edward. A battle immediately ensued, which ended in the total defeat of the queen's troops, herself and her son being taken prisoners. About three thousand of the Lancastrians fell in this engagement; and soon after it, the gallant prince Edward was barbarously murdered. The duke of Somerset, who commanded the van of the queen's army with about 20 other persons of consequence, having retired to the abbey-church of Tewksbury, they were surrounded, dragged out, and beheaded without delay.—But queen Margaret, Sir John Fortescue, and several others, had their lives given them.

Our chancellor, seeing the affairs of the house of Lancaster entirely ruined, found it necessary to reconcile himself as well as he could to the victorious Edward IV. in order to facilitate which, which he wrote a kind of apology for his own conduct; and it is conjectured, that the king restored him to his estate. Some time after he had received his pardon, he wrote a learned book on the difference between an absolute and limited monarchy, which was published in 1714, by John Fortescue Aland, Esq; afterwards lord Fortescue. No account is transmitted to us of the remaining part of Sir John Fortescue's life, which was probably spent in an honourable retirement in the country, free from the cares, and remote from the dangers of a court. Neither is any exact account preserved of his death. We are only told, in general, that he was near ninety years of age when he died; which the circumstances of his life render very probable. His remains were interred in the parish church of Ebburton, or Ebrington, in Gloucestershire, where he had purchased an estate.

It is truly said by lord Fortescue of our chancellor; "all good men and lovers of the English constitution speak of him with honour; and he still lives, in the opinion of all true Englishmen, in as high esteem and reputation, as any judge that ever sat in Westminster-Hall. He was a man acquainted with all sorts of learning, besides his knowledge in the law; in which he was exceeded by none, as will appear by the many judgments he gave when on the bench, in the year-book, of Henry VI. His character in history, is that of pious, loyal, and learned: and he had the honour to be called the chief counsellor of the king. He was a great courtier, and yet a great lover of his country.*"

His writings evidently shew that he was a man of general learning, and of great reading for those times; since we find him quoting Aristotle, Cicero, Quintilian, Boetius, St. Austin, Aquinas, Ægidius, &c. but he was far from drawing all his knowledge from books; he gathered much from his own experience, and was very communicative with respect to the fruits of it. Sir Edward Coke, who often mentions Sir John Fortescue, tells us, that besides his profound knowledge in the law, he was also an excellent antiquary; and affirms, that there are some particular chapters in our author's treatise De Laudibus Legum Angliæ, which are so excellent that they deserve to be written in letters of gold.

* Preface to "The Difference between an Absolute and Limited Monarchy."

Letters written by Ebenezer Phill to Jonadab Travers, in the Year 1773.

PUNISHMENT in this country, O Jonadab, I think is very much mistaken; for to a people, apt from want of proper instruction either in their youth or more advanced age, on the slightest reverse of fortune, or prompted by melancholy, to put an end to their own lives, death has no horrors; nor the doubtful expectancy of it, terrors sufficient to restrain them from evil, or bind them to the observance of those laws, which are framed for the preservation of the order and well-being of societies, the frequency of execution familiarizes it to the mind; the carelessness of a state hereafter, and the ignorance concerning the true attributes of an Almighty being, help to persuade the guilty, if detected and punished, death provides a kind of peace superior to the living in want of gratifying the most unruly desires of sensuality; unawed by religion, the mind easily yields to the pleasing the senses, they from gratification will not be controuled, be the indulgence ever so dear;—time, which ought to be dedicated to more austere, but far more truly pleasant, industry and employment is necessarily sacrificed to this Dæmon pleasure—loss of business and wealth ensue, while with inability to gratify, the desires of gratification redouble; some course must be pursued to humour the demands—the unwary benighted traveller becomes an object, and seems an easy prey; the worst consequence is death—death is esteemed preferable to a denial of pleasures deemed of equal value with life; success in one or two attempts confirms his vice, he becomes more daring, more dangerous, until at length taken, he loses his life, and the state a subject who might otherwise benefit her: To remedy this, had their legislature condemned to a hard and useful labour the delinquents, a labour where they worked conspicuous, especially to the lower kind of people, the idle and sensual would be struck aptly with this idea:—"If I follow the course which condemned these wretches to unremitting labour, I shall work two fold more than I do at present, without reaping any benefit. I shall be a reproach, a sign, and a shame, instead of bearing the laudable title of an honest industrious citizen, caressed by my superiors, dear to my equals, and of use to all below me."—Moreover their punishments here are very unequal, for death attends the perpetrator of a small crime, while perjury, which, by false evidence in the courts of justice, may strip a man of all his his honest property, or deprive the innocent of his life, where detected, meets with but a slight punishment; deemed by these people too light for less dangerous crimes. The high offence it is against the majesty of Heaven, the judgment passed by revelation on perjurers, in the old law, which was tender, and whose every decision seemed robed with humanity and mildness, call for an heavier chastisement. — Their method of trying criminals is very open and fair; every means allowed them to wipe away the accusation; they are not to be found guilty by a single judge, or by certain appointed judges; the merits of their cause lie, as with us, in the bosoms of their fellow citizens: Men whose characters are looked upon as unimpeachable, and who are supposed unconnected with prosecutor or prosecuted. They are also so nice as to prevent men professing trades or businesses used to blood, to compose these juries, as those bodies of men are called; for fear they, through custom, should not humanely consider the dangerous situation of the prisoner. — Their proceedings concerning property are more complex, more unsatisfactory, very tedious, and almost inconceivably expensive; so that in bribing or seeing counsellors, they often spend more than the property they contend for is intrinsically worth. But what renders those proceedings more irksome, is, that a poor man contending with a rich adversary, is liable to fall into the hands of counsellors and lawyers; the designing part of whom, destitute of moral rectitude, sacrifice every tie, every feeling, to avarice. They employ the title of the poor unfortunate suitor to dispossess his rich antagonist, but take care in the course of business, to absorb the property among their already foully acquired wealth.

How useful would the lives of so many hardy men become, by a change of punishment, from death to perpetual works—works useful to the state.—How pleased should I behold a sturdy duellist lashed by his task-master for idleness in cleansing a street, or slowness in tugging his oar; it should break the turbulency of passions; and if his case admitted a discharge after some years painful toil, it would bring him to a more bearing, a more forgiving, and less injurious temper. Punishment and severity in it are required here by all degrees, from the base betrayer of his country to the no less base, but less powerful betrayer of his friend. But how can this project be put in practice? virtue is forgot, religion despised. A person devoted to indulgence of his sins, will not rouse from his fearful lethargy, although the apparition of his departed friend in-treat. A nation who has turned her back on the Almighty, with daring contumely spurned his laws, wallows in sensuality, and seeks in human wisdom for support, can never be supposed capable of awaking from the sleep of vice and luxury, until roused by distress, poverty, and oppression.—I have read of the Roman state while in the beginning poor, frugality and virtue ennobled almost every subject of the state; thou canst not read of a Roman without finding in him all that was valuable and truly great, consistent with their ideas of virtue, so great a crop did these two qualities produce. Conquest, to which they turned their endowments, enlarged their empire, enriched and enervated them. The poor state, occupying but a few acres in Italy, which after frequent checks from a powerful rival, could recover and assume fresh vigour and fresh courage, until she overcame all difficulties, when arrived to a great, a wondrous empire, of many nations, shook to her centre at every small attack; at length frightened and distracted in her councils, sunk into decay, into ruin, her language no more used, and her jurisdiction forgotten.

Laws should be clear, precise, and strictly executed; but here laws explain laws, variety of customs are introduced; there is no certain and determined form guarded against the constructions and various significations pleaders are pleased to put on them, while we, following the exact form prescribed by our elders, do every act of sale and donation free from error; for if it corresponds with that plain general rule, it must be binding; the publick manner in which all our business is, and must be transacted, helps greatly to preserve us from the disputes, animosities, and chicane, which embroil the people of this island; the law for every man's registering his family in the town he resides in, preserves a knowledge of the descent and relationship of each person; the necessity of making an annual will, prevents also numberless inconveniencies, which the people labour under here upon the death of a relation intestate; but the right every man has to dispose of his own property, contributes greatly to render us capable of transacting our own business, without the assistance of calling in so great a tribe of counsellors, lawyers, solicitors, &c. as in this country. But here, on a marriage, a man can so oblige his own son, that he shall not be able to dispose of the property he settles on him, but to the eldest son of that marriage, although he should turn out extravagant, undutiful, and unworthy of representation.

senting the family. Should losses reduce the lately married man, contented he must go to prison, or drag out a miserable existence in poverty, unable to dig, ashamed to beg; for who will trust him, although nominally possessed of a large estate—his death pays all his debts—he has but the use for life, and his former creditors have seized on the annual income to pay themselves. These settlements are a rich mine to the professors of the law, by posterity claiming estates which were sold by former possessors without a proper power or just title; being compelled to leave it in such a manner, to such and such certain successors, the clearing up these points, producing proofs for and against, on either hand usually wear out the property, and often the lives of the suitors; for the law here seems determinedly intent on intricacies and uncertainties.—Their parliament make new, and explain old laws, every time they meet; for through some fatality they are broke by the discovery of some flaw, or an evasion of performing all the requisites, during each recess.

A stranger would likewise, during the meeting of parliament, suppose they were an assemblage of Bramin Brangians, such as I met with in Indostan; by the many laws made to prevent the destruction of many kinds of beasts, birds, and fishes; but I am sorry to say luxury and gluttony move them thus to preserve the defenceless partridge, pheasant, hare, &c. more than humanity and tenderness; for the gluttonous and vain glorious would devour these creatures voraciously, at ever so high a price: It therefore becomes an object for many of the poorer sort of people to quit their trades and labour, and seek and destroy these so much prized victims of pride; hence a total destruction of the kinds must ensue, and loss of sport and amusement to the rich admirer of hunting and fowling. The parliament-man, therefore, spends that time in the senate enacting laws for punishing such mean and unqualified people as destroy those creatures, which he could employ better and more effectually, by restoring his countrymen to more frugality, by useful restrictions, and banishing luxury and dissipation from his native land. Let the pursuit of game be an exercise, a recreation after study or application to business; but surely it is strangely preventing he only nobleness of our nature, to make dissipation, relaxation, and their usual associate intemperance, our only business, wish, and employment.

DUTCH WEST-INDIA ISLANDS.

ST. EUSTATIA,

SITUATE three leagues north-west of St. Christopher's, is a very well cultivated island, about three leagues in compass. Besides tobacco, the inhabitants raise and export great quantities of sugar. They also breed hogs, rabbits, goats, and all sorts of poultry. The air is wholesome, but it is subject to terrible thunder-claps, earthquakes and hurricanes; and there is a scarcity of fresh-water. Before a hurricane the rain is always salt and bitter.

This island is the strongest of all the Caribbee Islands, there being but one landing place, which is commanded by a fort, and may be easily defended by a few men. The Dutch first took possession of it in 1635.

Saba, also one of the Caribbee islands, is a small pleasant island, thirteen miles north-west of Eustatia. The sea is so shallow about it, that none but sloops can come near it; nor even they, but at a small creek on the south side of the island. Most of the inhabitants are said to be shoemakers, or dealers in shoes. There is a delightful valley in the island, which produces necessaries for the inhabitants, with some indigo and cotton.

Curassao, or Curacoa, is about nine or ten leagues in length, and five in breadth; lying in $12^{\circ} 14'$ north latitude; nine or ten leagues from the coast of Terra-Firma.

The climate is unwholesome and disagreeable, and the soil unfruitful; yet the island is populous, and the industry of the inhabitants such, that it produces a great deal of sugar and tobacco. It is well supplied with provisions and commodities from Europe, and the other Dutch settlements, in which it carries on a very lucrative and extensive contraband trade with the Spaniards in Terra-Firma. The chief town and harbour is about three leagues from the south-east end of the island. The town, for its size, is one of the fairest and finest in America, and contains every thing necessary to render it commodious and agreeable, as far as the climate and soil will permit. The islands of Bonacre and Aruba are likewise considerable for their situation near the coast of Terra-Firma, which gives the inhabitants an opportunity of carrying on a clandestine trade with the Spanish settlements in Terra-Firma. On the south side of Bonacre is a good salt pond, whither the Dutch sloops come for salt, which is now become a very profitable commodity.

DANISH ISLANDS.

St. THOMAS,

The chief of the Virgin Islands, which lie to the east of Porto-Rico, has a safe, strong, and commodious harbour, which, by being open to traders of all nations, enriches the inhabitants. The island also naturally produces most of the West Indian commodities; but is much infested with muskettoes.

St. Croix, or Santa Cruz, a small island, about twenty leagues west of St. Christopher's, is under the protection of the king of Denmark; but mostly the property of some Irish gentlemen. The soil is said to be rich, producing many excellent dying and other woods, proper for house and ship-building, together with oranges, citrons, granates, lemons, the mandioca root, and the papau-tree, the fruit of which makes a most excellent sweet-meat.

Among the many islands in these seas are, Anigada, fifty miles north-west of Anguilla, and Somebrero thirty. They both abound with birds, particularly the colubrior humming-bird, of great beauty, but which has been variously described by different writers. They live on the juice of flowers, especially those of the cotton tree, smell like amber, and build their nests, which are curiously lined with cotton, down, and silk, among the thick leaves of the boughs.

Here are also painted crabs, which are said to be very good meat. Some of them have violet coloured shells; others yellow, full of purple specks; and others tawny, with red streaks. They creep down the hills in May, consuming all the herbage in their way, and after going four times to the water to wash themselves, retire to the woods; but at a certain season, the females take to the sea, and there lay their eggs, which being afterwards cast ashore, and warmed by the sun, produce young ones, that creep to the woods, and as they grow bigger climb up the rocks, where the old ones keep together in vast multitudes, and so stop up the holes that they cannot be found out.—They creep out of their shells through an opening at the tail, which is scarce perceptible, and thus lie bare and stripped of their shells, being only covered with a thin skin, which at last grows as firm as that they left.

Salt Tortuga is a barren, rugged island, situated north west from Margarita, in the latitude of $10^{\circ} 35'$ north, and so named to distinguish it from the other turtle-islands on the coast of America, on account of a large salt pond at the east end of it, within two hundred paces of the sea, where merchant ships take in loadings of salt. There is a small harbour in the island.

The island of Blanco lies north of Margarita, in $10^{\circ} 15'$ north latitude.

The Virgin Islands, including St. Thomas, are twelve in number. They are said to be in general small, barren, and inhospitable; but whether any of them, besides St. Thomas, are inhabited, and by whom, we are not told.

The BAHAMA ISLANDS.

These belong to Great Britain, are situated in the Atlantic Ocean, to the north of the island of Cuba, and not far from the coast of Florida, stretching from the north west to the south east, between 21° and 27° of north latitude. They are very numerous, and twelve of them pretty large.

Bahama, which is the largest, being about fifty miles in length, though very narrow, and gives name to the rest, lies twenty-five leagues from the continent of Florida. It enjoys a serene temperate air, with a fruitful soil, well watered every where with springs and rivelets.

Though these were the first lands discovered in America by Columbus, the Spaniards never thought of settling in them. The English knew nothing of them till 1667, when captain William Sayle, being bound to Carolina, was forced among them by a storm, which gave him an opportunity of examining them carefully, particularly that which at present is known by the name of Providence. At his return, he reported the benefit they might be of to the state; upon which, grants of them were made out to proprietors; but the government was reserved in the hands of the crown. None of them, however, are yet settled, except Providence, Lucays, and Harbour Island.

The Straits of Bahama are well known to navigators for their difficult passage; yet these islands, in time of peace are capable of great improvement in point of trade, and have always been a good retreat for disabled ships, blown from the different parts of the continent of America. In time of war the British cruisers and privateers stationed at the Bahama Islands, are more capable to obstruct and annoy the Spanish trade, homeward bound, than any that are stationed at the rest of the British colonies in America. Accordingly, New Providence, which is a very thriving colony, was of great benefit to the British trade in the late war. The chief town of the island is called Nassau.

Many

Many of these islands, through the dangers attending the navigation to them, are but little known. They are supposed to amount altogether to near five hundred; but many of them are only barren rocks.

Of the fishes found on the coast, not a few are said to be poisonous, or at least unwholesome.

The BERMUDAS, OR SUMMER-ISLANDS.

Are a cluster of islands lying in the Atlantic Ocean, in $32^{\circ} 20'$ north latitude, about seven or eight hundred miles east from Cape Hatoras, in South Carolina, which is the nearest land to them. They are said to be about four hundred in number, but most of them so small and barren as not to be habitable. How they got the name of Bermudas is uncertain; but the other is a corruption of Sommers, from Sir George Sommers, who was ship-wrecked on them in 1609. We are informed by some voyage-writers, that both the air and soil of these islands have undergone a most surprizing alteration for the worse, since they were first discovered.

The Bermudas have still considerable remains of fine cedars that serve for building of floops, with the assistance of the New England white pine, Ambergrease is often found, and whales caught on this coast; and the turtle fishing trade greatly serves to subsist the inhabitants. The governor, it is said, has ten pounds for every whale that is caught. There is a breed of black hogs here, that are thought to have been left by the Spaniards; and a white chalk-stone, which is easily chisselled, and exported for building gentlemen's houses in the West Indies. Some tobacco is raised in these islands, and they abound in excellent oranges and palmetto trees; but the water, except what falls from the clouds, and is preserved in cisterns, is brackish.

The chief island is St. George, which is not above sixteen miles in length, and three at most, in breadth. There are three clergymen in the island, who have a handsome provision. The island takes its name from the chief town.

NEWFOUNDLAND.

Newfoundland is of a triangular form, and about as big as Ireland, being two hundred and eighty miles in length from north to south, and nine hundred and thirty in circumference. There is no coast in the world better accommodated with harbours all round. Those on the east and south coasts are best known, namely Bonaville, Trinity, Capelin, and Conception bays, Torbay, St. John's Harbour, the Bay of Bulls, Fresh Water Bay, those of Biscay, St. Mary, Placentia, Bay of Fortune, or St. Peter's, and the Bay of Despair; but the most famous and considerable is the Bay of Placentia. On the north the island is separated from Terra de Labrador, or New Britain, by the Strait of Belleisle, which runs N. E. and is about twenty eight miles over in its narrowest part; on the west it has the Gulph of St. Lawrence, and on the south and east the Atlantic Ocean. The most western point is called Cape Rye, and the most southerly Cape Race, or Raz.

The climate of Newfoundland is intensely hot in summer, and insupportably cold in winter, from a variety of natural causes. Four or five months in the winter the ground is covered with snow, frozen as hard as crystal. The southern and eastern coasts seldom enjoy a very serene sky, from their neighbourhood to the Great Bank, which is almost constantly covered with a thick fog; but in the northern and western parts the sky is very clear, both in summer and winter.

The soil is in general very barren, and the country full of bleak mountains and naked rocks. The meadows and vales for the most part produce only a kind of moss. Many species of timber, however, grow here in the utmost perfection, and the firs are as fit for masts as those of Norway.—Some fruitful spots, nevertheless, are said to be met with in it, and a kind of rye which grows naturally without culture, and is very nourishing, with wild strawberries and raspberries. The island abounds with wild fowl, and with deer, hares, rabbits, foxes, squirrels, bears, beavers, wolves, otters, and other quadrupeds; and the sea is plentifully stocked with different kinds of delicious fish, besides cod, the staple commodity. The inhabitants depend mostly for bread, and other necessaries, upon the exports thither from the mother country, or (till lately) from the continent of America.

The chief and almost only trade here is in fish; of which there is such plenty on the coasts of the island, that the whole world almost might be supplied from it: all sorts being taken here in immense quantities; but the principal fishery is of cod, wherewith at least five hundred sail of ships have been usually laden every year, for France, Spain, Portugal, Italy, England, and other parts. The main fishery is on the great bank, and the other banks about this island, as also a long the coast. The great bank is a vast mountain under water, extending in length according to the most accurate sea-charts, from the forty-first ty-first degree of north latitude to 49° . $25'$. and in breadth from 42° . $30'$. to 51° . $30'$ of longitude, west from London.

The depth of water on it is from five to sixty fathom. But whatever be the figure or dimension of this bank, it is covered with a vast quantity of shells, and several kinds of fish of all sizes, most of which serve for food to the cod-fish, whose number here seems to equal the grains of sand on the bank itself. Between two and three hundred vessels have loaded here annually, for two centuries, without apparently lessening the numbers of the finny inhabitants.

The next bank is called the Green-Bank. The charts make it about a hundred and twenty miles long, and about fifty over, where broadest: it lies off the south coast of Newfoundland. There are several other banks, but not so considerable.

The Great Strand or drying place for fish, is about a league in extent, and lies between two steep hills, one of which is separated from the strand by a small rivulet, which forms a kind of a lake called the little bay, abounding with salmon.—The Great Strand may contain at once a sufficiency to load threescore ships. There is another lesser Strand for the use of the inhabitants, who fish all along the coast.—The fishing season is from spring to September. All the train oil that comes from Newfoundland is drawn chiefly from the livers of the cod. The principal towns are Placentia, Bonavista, and St. John.

The Indians of this island are a gentle, tractable people, and easily gained by good usage. They paint their bodies, and in winter are covered with skins and furs, especially round the waist. Their stature is small, but muscular and robust, their chests full, and their faces broad to a degree of deformity. The savages of this island are never found with a beard, which is mostly ascribed to a custom among them of plucking the hairs up by the roots, the moment they begin to appear. Pilfering, cunning, and duplicity are said also to be ingredients in the character of those people; nor are they ashamed when detected; or provoked, when obliged to make restitution. They are accounted more rational in their religious opinions than the Indians on the continent; to have carried some arts, particularly pottery, to much perfection; and to discover some seeds of genius for greater matters.

The first settlements were made by the English in the year 1610. By the fifth article of the last definitive treaty of peace, the subjects of France have a liberty of fishing and drying on a part of the coast of the island of Newfoundland, such as is specified in the fifteenth article of the treaty of Utrecht; also the liberty of fishing in the Gulph of St. Laurence, at the distance of three leagues from all the coasts out of the island of Cape Breton. The islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon were also ceded to them by the sixth article, to serve as a shelter for their fishermen; but they are not to fortify these islands. By the eighteenth article of the said peace, his catholic majesty desists from any pretensions in favour of his subjects, to the right of fishing in the neighbourhood of the island of Newfoundland.

CAPE BRETON.

This island, which, from the nature of its situation, is of the utmost consequence to the British colonies and fisheries in America, lies between 45 and 47° . of north latitude, and between 61 and 62° . of west longitude, being about one hundred miles in length, and fifty in breadth. It is separated from Nova Scotia by the narrow Strait of Canso, or Fronsac; and is about 20 leagues from Newfoundland.

The northern coast is all very high, and almost inaccessible; nor is it much easier to land any where on the west coast, till you come to the strait of Fronsac; but on the south east there are many good harbours, bays, and creeks, particularly that of Louisbourg, one of the finest in America, being almost four leagues round, with every where six or seven fathom water.

The climate is very similar to that of Quebec, only more subject to fogs; the air however, seems to be pretty wholesome.

The island abounds with lakes and rivers, coals, and limestone; and though a great part of it is barren, apples, pulse, wheat, and other corn, flax and hemp, are, or may be raised in it. The chief timber-trees are oaks of a prodigious bigness, pines fit for masts, ash, maple, plane, and alpin trees. There is no occasion for digging deep, or draining the waters to come at the coals here, as in other countries.

There are horses, hogs, oxen, sheep, goats, and poultry on the island, but game is scarce. The partridges are almost as big as pheasants, and not unlike them in the colour of their feathers.—The quantities of cod and other fish on the coast is almost incredible; and there is no scarcity of whales, sea-wolves, porpoises, and seals.

This island was one of our conquests in the beginning of the late war; Louisbourg, its fortress, with the island of St. John, and its other appurtenances, having been surrendered, by capitulation, on the 26th of July, 1758; but to avoid expence, and prevent the French from settling on it again, all the fortifications at Louisbourg have been demolished.

There are several islands lying round Cape Breton, among which are those of St. Peter, and Madame, or Maurepas; but the chief is St. John's, the produce of which is nearly the same as that of Cape Breton, but the soil is said to be much better. This last hath lately been made a separate government; and a town, it is said, hath been laid out in it, to be called Charlotte Town.

History of the Fourth Session of the British Parliament.

LORD Sandwich. When the matter the noble Earl has urged this night is separated from the manner and oratoric powers which has accompanied it, it will most certainly be found to contain nothing that can induce your Lordships to dissent from the address now moved. It is, in my apprehension, though urged with all possible plausibility, totally destitute of any thing which bears the resemblance of argument. The noble Lord has, I presume, been much misinformed; otherwise he would never have asserted what I know myself to be unsupported by fact. I do not impute to his Lordship any intentional design to mislead; but speaking of matters within my own knowledge, I hope his Lordship will excuse me from dissenting from him, and endeavouring to set the house right on facts, which, if not contradicted, might be presumed to be true. I should not have, indeed, troubled your Lordships, if I had not looked upon myself specially called upon to explain what must have come under my own cognizance, in my official situation, as presiding at the naval department. It is rather a disagreeable task. There may be many strangers and foreigners present; and what passes here this night, in discharge of my duty, as an official man, may be waited by the next post to the continent; but the noble Lord's assertions call for explanations, on my part. Lest therefore, the public should be misled, or that it should get out into the world, that the noble Earl's confident assertions, respecting our navy, are just, I shall crave your Lordship's indulgence, for entering a little more than usual into detail.

I do not, my Lords, mean to controvert his Lordship's facts on mere memory, I speak from papers now in my hand; from authorities not to be contradicted. The noble Earl asserts, that the whole of our naval home-defence does not amount to twenty ships of the line, fit for the sea. [Contradicted.] I mean, that we had not twenty ships of the line manned for actual service; I think, I report his Lordship's words accurately. [Again contradicted]. I understood the noble Lord in that sense; but supposing the fact to be as now explained, that we had not above twenty ships of the line fit for service, it will equally answer the purposes of my argument. I tell the noble Earl that he has been misinformed; and that he should not again credit those who have, in this instance, so grossly deceived him. I have the list now before me; and I will venture to assure him, that we have double that number. We have now forty-two ships of the line in commission, in Great-Britain; thirty five of which are completely manned, and ready for sea at a moment's warning. When I say this, I would wish to speak accurately, and submit the whole to your Lordships judgment. These thirty-five ships, when their complements are full, require 20,890 men, seamen and marines included. Of this number, 18,240 are actually shipped, and the remainder are ready as soon as called for. The deficiency is composed of 2035 marines and 600 seamen, who are now at the several ports. The marines are on shore, on purpose to improve them in discipline, and the use of arms; two-thirds of them being nearly composed of recruits; the 600 seamen are distributed aboard the other seven ships, whose complements are not yet formed. Those seven ships will require 4000 seamen and marines, in the proportion of 700 marines to 3300 seamen. Of the seamen, there are 900 already on board those seven ships; so that of the forty-two ships of the line in commission, all found, provided, and well found, there are 2400 seamen and 700 marines wanting. The former can be procured at a very short notice, by the means of a press, or on an emergency, recalling the protections now out, and other justifiable means, should the exigencies of the times make such exertions necessary; and as to the marines, they would be completed by recruits, as in the instance before-mentioned. This information is supported by documents not to be disputed. The noble Earl seems to doubt of our state of preparation against any sudden attack in America. As to that, I can inform his Lordship, that our whole force serving under Lord Howe consists of ninety-three ships and vessels of war; six of these are of the line of battle; besides which, there are eighty-seven frigates, sloops, and vessels of force. The noble Earl has dwelt greatly on the ravages and insults of the American privateers, both in America and on our own coasts. As to the first, the best answer will be, the great number number of rebel vessels our ships on the American station have taken, and the very few losses we have sustained in those seas; and as to the latter, the number of frigates and armed vessels which were requisite for carrying on the naval operations under Lord Howe, I acknowledge, stript us of our frigates; but care has been taken since to remedy that evil and replace them. Thirty-four frigates and smaller vessels were before in commission, and employed on different services; ten have been built in the King's yards since, thirty in private ones, besides twenty that have been purchased from the merchants, or are retained and paid as vessels of force; making in the whole between ninety and a hundred. From these facts, I do venture not only to contend that the noble Earl has been grossly deceived, but that we have a naval force now ready for sea, should France and Spain entertain any hostile disposition towards us, much superior to any they can muster. I believe they have not any such intention; but should the worst happen, I am persuaded, from my own certain knowledge, that they have nothing able to cope with us in Europe, as our whole force now fit for, or on actual service, consists of fifty-four ships of the line, and upwards of two hundred frigates, sloops, &c.

The noble Earl asked, after giving an account of the deplorable state of our navy, with what justice I leave to your Lordships to now determine, where is the man of reputation in his profession would stake his credit on any naval force we are able to send out? I will answer his Lordship that there is such a man [Admiral Keppel] to be found, who knows the present state of the navy, and is ready to stake his credit on the issue, and willing to meet the enemies of this country, if any such there be—as brave, gallant, and experienced an officer, as respectably connected, and as nobly allied, as any in the service; a man in whom the noble Lord himself would wish to confide, and of whom he entertains the most exalted opinion.

The noble Lord says, we have lost the port of Lisbon, and that Portugal is no longer our ally: this information, I must confess, is totally new to me. I know, by the last return I have had from thence, the Invincible, a seventy-four gun ship, was in that port; and unless his Lordship has had some secret account, that he has been either lost or taken by an American privateer, I can hardly credit that we have lost the port of Lisbon; as to the other point, on which I presume his Lordship meant seriously to support the assertion,

I can answer his Lordship, that the Portuguese court has repeatedly given us the fullest assurances of their friendly disposition; have expressed an abhorrence of the unnatural conduct of our rebellious subjects: and, as a farther proof of the sincerity of their declarations, have forbid them to enter their ports; nay more, have confiscated one of their vessels for having endeavoured to disobey the proclamation, which last circumstance excited the resentment of the rebels so much, that one of their privateers, by way of reprisal, made a capture of a Portuguese merchantman, richly laden.

My Lords, from what I have now submitted to you, I am authorized to affirm, that our navy is more than a match for that of the whole house of Bourbon. I am not ashamed to say it, nor shew my front on the occasion. There are many fronts in this House, I perceive [Looking over the way] which seem now to be spread with joy and gladness; but I believe the time is not far off, when they will wear a very different aspect. I trust, we shall shortly hear intelligence from Gen. Howe, that will occasion that change. I should, my Lords, be extremely sorry, as presiding at the admiralty-board, if I permitted at any time the French and Spanish navy united, to be superior to the navy of this country; I should, indeed, be wanting in the discharge of my duty. The noble Earl, who moved the amendment, affirms, that those powers bear hostile dispositions towards us; and have given the fullest proofs of it by the underhand assistance they have afforded our rebellious subjects. I have strong reasons to believe the contrary; but supposing it to be true, would the noble Lord, under such circumstances of peril and distress, as he represents the affairs of this country to be in, precipitate us into a war with those powers? I hope not. The truth is, we have from time to time, pressed the court of France on the illicit trade carrying on in their ports with our rebellious subjects; and when it became necessary to be more explicit, made the strongest remonstrances; the consequence of which was, that immediate orders were issued, forbidding any American privateers to enter their ports with prizes. These orders have been strictly complied with hitherto. Two prizes were reclaimed, and recovered under the ordinance. It is not improbable, that some very unjustifiable transactions may have taken place, under a kind of connivance; but though it were so, no friend to his country would wish to embroil us. But a time may come, when a full reparation may be obtained, for any injurious treatment treatment we may have received from either France or Spain.

I cannot agree with the noble Lord's amendment on many accounts. What does it propose? Terms, in my opinion, the most extravagant and disgraceful; to lay down your arms, and submit to your rebellious subjects. Is this a language befitting the mouth of that great minister, who directed our victorious fleets and armies to every quarter of the globe?—Would he recommend to us to disarm, and sue for peace to the Congress, or the rebel General? [Here, as in the preceding sentence, he was desired to advert to the words of the motion, which were for not laying down our arms, or withdrawing our troops, but merely for a cessation of hostilities.] But take it in this way, my Lords, how can you treat with those as subjects, who look upon themselves as a sovereign state, and claim independence? I readily accede to what the noble Earl said, relative to his own sentiments of what appeared to him a just ground of conciliation: but will the people of America agree with his Lordship on those fundamental grounds, the sovereignty of this country, and the act of navigation? I dare say, his Lordship's most sanguine expectations do not go so high. It is a way of thinking very different from the majority of those who will this day vote with his Lordship.

To conclude, my Lords, I am happy in having an opportunity of setting his Lordship right. I am happy to have it in my power to inform your Lordships of the very respectable state of our naval home-defence; and that it should be generally known, that we have nothing to dread from France and Spain, but will be at full liberty to prosecute this war to a fair, honourable, and happy issue. I sincerely approve of the proposed address, in all its parts, and am as heartily against any measures of procrastination or delay, which the amendment certainly would effect, if agreed to.

It was the misfortune, in the beginning of this disagreeable contest, to adopt a mistaken lenity, to act timidly, to be too apprehensive that the nation would not readily concur, or be satisfied of the necessity of acting timely and vigorously. If my advice had been taken three years ago, we had not been in this situation now. I was for sending a proper force at first; but one opposed it with one sort of reason; another, with another—plausible indeed, but futile and delusive. Those apprehensions were ill founded; the mischiefs they occasioned are acknowledged, and will, I trust, henceforward be avoided. I have the most confident hopes, that the first accounts from America will be favourable; and that the most sure and certain means of ensuring a happy termination to the present rebellion, will be, by a perseverance in the measures recommended from the throne.

The Earl of Abingdon.—Unhabituated as I am to public speaking, and the formalities of parliamentary debate, I should, in any other times but these, content myself with a silent sanction to this day's motion of the great and noble Earl: but, my Lords, our danger is much, and our sensibility very little. We have been misadvised, misled, and deceived; the nation has been made to destroy itself, and, like the vulture, to prey on its own vitals, perhaps as an intended punishment by those who brought it into this state, for past offences; but a day of enquiry must come. In the mean time, let us embrace the sage counsel of that great statesman, by whose counsels this country has been already raised from despair to glory. His doctrine is for fundamental and irrevocable laws, and not for acts of Parliament, destructive of fundamental and irrevocable laws. Such acts are the laws of tyrants, and not the acts of a free and limited government. The legislature of this country cannot deprive America of life, liberty, and property; and yet all this, in subversion of our constitution, is attempted. But, my Lords, these laws must be repealed. They must be repealed, whether America be lost to this country or not; they are like Draco's laws, written in blood, and will make savages of our posterity, if not blotted out. The present motion is for peace, obtain it if you can. I fear we have already clinched the nail of our ruin; but any thing is better than the present nefarious system. My Lords, I will not trouble you any longer; this motion meets with my most hearty concurrence.

The Lord Wycombe, (Earl of Shelburne). It is with astonishment I behold the conduct of ministers; I mean a perseverance in the same contemptuous treatment of this house, the having the presumption to face the great hereditary council of the nation, without a tittle of information, or a single scrap of paper, to induce you to concur with them in the blind destructive measures they now propose. It is true, the noble Earl at the head of an high official department, has entertained us with some curious memorandums; but of what, my Lords? What he is pleased to believe, and what he would persuade you you to believe, is the present flourishing state of the British navy. I do not question the noble Lord's veracity, but I much doubt the truth of the facts I have heard now stated. I am sensible of his zeal and ability, in endeavouring to persuade your Lordships, that the information he has laid before you is what I am convinced it is not. Are those little, un-authenticated details, proper parliamentary information on which your Lordships may, as the hereditary counsellors of your Sovereign, and as the great constitutional guardians of the interests of your country, depend, deliberate and determine upon? Certainly not. Look back into your Lordships journals, till very lately, and see if this was the kind of information this House was wont to be satisfied with. If you do, my Lords, you will find that your predecessors were not contented with any thing short of the most satisfactory circumstantial, and minute details. You will find, my Lords, that the Duke of Marlborough, in the height of his most splendid victories, was not above accompanying such details, as far as respected himself, with the most explicit communications and explanations, of not only what was done, but generally gave a substantial sketch of his intended future operations. So it was with all his cotemporary officers, naval and military. Their opinions were already formed, and they did not fail to declare them in either house, as often as called upon. In point of the expenditure of the public money, the other house were still (it being more immediately within their province) more inquisitive and circumspect; and ministers, nor even papers, were not solely depended upon in either. What is the case now? Papers are with-held, on system, explanations are refused, and professional men remain silent. This, my Lords, is our present station. We are called upon to concur with ministers, for no other reason but because they desire it; and write a panegyric on their own measures; and we are desired to believe them on every fresh occasion, because they misled and deceived us on every preceding one. The noble Earl, with all the parade of office, has told us many things this night, with great confidence. I believe his Lordship would not purposely mislead us; but how do we know but the noble Earl may have been misled himself? He may have trusted to a secretary, or under secretary, who perhaps has had an interest in misleading him. The noble Lord affected a delicacy peculiar to himself, in telling us what he did. He insinuated a degree of reluctance in communicating official information; but threw off all restraint, lest the public should be misled by the assertions of the noble Lord who moved the amendment. I shall not determine which of the two accounts comes nearest the truth; but for my part, I shall never give a parliamentary credit to any information which wants the stamp of official authenticity. The noble Earl is liable, as I said before, to be imposed upon. It is only on ordinary occasions that I would even trust to office-papers; on extraordinary occasions, when any well-founded doubt or suspicion of imposition arose, I should, as had been always the case, till very lately, prevent even the noble Lord from being deceived. I would order the inferior officers in his department to the bar of this house, there to be examined and made responsible for whatever they vouched in their several stations. I remember a circumstance extremely applicable to the idea now thrown out. P. George of Denmark who presided at the board at which the noble Earl is at the head, was called upon for some explanations. His Royal Highness gave them according to the information which had been communicated to him. Doubts still remained in the house, that the Prince was deceived. The proper officers were called to the bar and interrogated. And what do your Lordships think was the effect of the enquiry? They confessed their mistake, and apologized to the house, that the official information given to the Prince, and which he imparted to the house, was taken from an anonymous pamphlet! I leave the noble Earl to make the application, and your Lordships to judge how far the two cases may be similar.

The noble Lord, I think, with great justice, has passed the highest eulogiums on a certain great naval officer [Admiral Keppel]. I believe there is not one of your Lordships entertains a second opinion of the professional and personal merit of that great man. But in his Lordship's zeal, I fear he has promised more for the Admiral than he would wish to be responsible for. He says, that officer is ready and willing to stake his reputation, as a professional man, on the present state of the British navy, in the event of a rupture with France and Spain. I question it. Is that gallant officer thoroughly informed of the whole of the arrangement, so pompously described by the noble Lord? Does he know and approve of the officers who are to serve under him and co-operate with him? Do the inferior arrangements meet with his approbation? In short, is everything which creates confidence in an officer of judgment and experience, perfect within his knowledge? I answer, the things cannot be ; and for this reason, if the public prints are to be depended upon, that gentleman has been for a considerable time out of the kingdom ; he has been at Spa, for the recovery of his health. I know with what industry these reports have been circulated for some time past ; and I know too, to borrow a phrase from a great military officer [G. Burgoyne] that there is a physical impossibility that they can be true. I grant, if the noble Earl is contented with the concession, the officer alluded to is too gallant and brave, too full of military honour and personal spirit, to decline any service, when called upon by the interests of his country, in repelling the attacks of its natural and inveterate enemies. This was precisely the case with that other most able officer, Lord Howe, who has performed services for this country scarcely paralleled in the British annals ; and has surmounted obstacles scarcely credible, in his present operations in America. The landing and relanding of troops is known to be a service attended with the greatest perils, and most liable to miscarriage ; yet this noble and gallant officer, in a series of embarkations and debarkations, with so numerous an army, has executed his task with a success hitherto unknown, in the history of such a mode of naval war. These two officers, men of such transcendent desert, were passed by, neglected and insulted ; they were denied their rank ; but nothing could quench the noble ardour they retained for the glory and interests of their country. In this sense, that one of them has accepted of a command, that the other is ready whenever called upon, I am willing to believe ; but that either one or both were, or are willing to stake their credit on the issue, is what I can never be persuaded to assent to.

The noble Earl speaks with great confidence of the expected success of our military operations, but upon what rational foundation I am yet to learn. The issue of Mr. Burgoyne's expedition is too melancholy to be made a subject of conversation ; his army, by every appearance, is destroyed ; but supposing the contrary, and that not finding it practicable to push forward, he has been so fortunate to effect retreat to Ticonderoga, or any of the other posts he left behind him : nay granting more than the modesty of administration will permit them to even so much as suggest, that by subsequent successes he has formed a junction with Gen. Clinton, and has reached New-York ; what end could this answer ? but that at the expense of many millions, and two campaigns, he has reached a place by land, which he could without the least trouble or interruption have reached by sea, in almost as many weeks I dare say there is not a professional man in this house, that neither of the noble Lords [Townshend and Amherst] whom I have in my eye, and who have served with so much credit in America, will say, that he can effect any thing more than a mere junction this campaign ; or that he will be able, though he should have penetrated to New-York, to preserve a single post behind him.

But as in the instances already mentioned, this whole war has been conducted upon little narrow principles, principles originating from factious prejudices and premeditated delusion, on purpose to procure a parliamentary sanction, to what was in itself impracticable. The General who commanded in Canada [Carleton] was consulted upon the practicability of the military operations, by way of the Lakes ; he disapproved of it, as attended with singular difficulties, and promising, though they should prove successful, very few solid advantages ; but this gentleman was still guilty of a greater offence against his employers ; he reprobated the idea, and shrunk with horror from the proposition of employing savages. The event has proved his judgment as an officer, and does honour to his feelings as a man. I do not pretend to question the military talents of General Burgoyne, though I know very little of them, or the gentleman ; but I feel with a mixture of pity and indignation, the true motives for his appointment. They were such, I fear, as will not bear the light. Administration pretend, that General Carleton being the senior officer, as soon as he set foot beyond the limits of his province, the superior command in America would have devolved on him. A poor subterfuge ! Was there no other scene of action for Mr. Carleton ? and was Mr. Burgoyne for that reason only appointed in his place ? Could not General Carleton have directed his operations into the New England provinces, and General Howe to the southward ? Was America too small to contain them ? or was General Carleton superseded in his command, lest he should command General Howe at New-York, though administration previously knew he was not to be there ? But, my Lords, besides the other great difficulties our officers have had to contend with, our troops have, I am well informed, been commanded (strange as it may sound in your Lordships ears) at home ; they have been directed in their operations, not in the field but the cabinet. The orders that have been sent out have extended even to the minutiae of

of the profession, and have furnished subjects of ridicule to the very subalterns of the army. There is a man it seems in this country [supposed to mean L. Geo. Germaine] who has so great a confidence in his military talents, as to think he can command an army, and ensure victory in his closet, at three thousand miles distance from the scene of action.

The noble Earl's modesty will not permit him to directly affirm that France has not connived at least, at the illicit intercourse carried on between her subjects and our American colonies; but he tells you, that even that connivance is at an end. Is his Lordship no better informed? If he is not, I will tell him the true state of the case; the cargoes and prizes are sold, as heretofore, but at an under value: there are American agents or brokers in all the French ports, where any commerce is carried on with our colonies, who treat with the prize-masters on their own terms; they tell the venders, you cannot dispose of your property here, there is an ordinance against it: I will give you so much. The captor is thus compelled to sell at the broker's price; and the ordinance, instead of preventing the traffic, answers only one purpose, that of enriching the French King's subjects. His Lordship then recapitulated his general reasons, relative to the latent and ultimate designs of France, the impracticability of success, and expressed his hearty concurrence in the amendment moved by his noble friend.

Unnatural Cruelty to Infants exhibited.

IN the year 1717, there lived at Brumpton a woman, whose profession was the taking off their parents hands, the children of an unauthorized passion. Her name was Sarah Welland. There was at that time no Foundling-Hospital.

The people of intrigue knew the name of this person familiarly. As her profits were considerable, she could at any time silence the clamour of a parish officer, and the despised scandal. Her custom was to receive the devoted infant from a third person, without asking any questions. She took it with a certain price, for the maintenance and care of it for life; and neither the parents nor the parish were to hear of it again.—What must have been the hearts of those who could deliver up their children to this certain destruction? The exposure of infant, among the ancient Romans, against which we so much exclaim, was far less criminal. The child, with them, might escape; but in this case the very bargain told its blood. Parents who felt no compassion or humanity themselves, could not suppose that there would be any in a stranger; and as the whole price was paid at once, the sooner the infant perished, the greater was the profit.—Happy, indeed, would this age be, if no murderers of the same stamp were found in it; for there will never be a want of unnatural parents.

One child which entered the bloody walls of Welland escaped, for she herself died that evening. The smiling innocence of the little victim pleaded even with those who had been before, perhaps, the instruments of her barbarity; they had no interest in its death; they carried it, therefore, to persons who had at that time, the poor under their care. The deserted infant was taken from house to house, and it was supported by charitable contributions till there should be a vestry. The wary overseer postponed that business a fortnight, which would have come on the day following: by this delay the parish had a chance to be freed from an incumbency; but the child was to live. The nameless infant had escaped the only hands from which it could fail of meeting compassion. Its throat bled with a wound inflicted by its father; but it was not a mortal one. All were charmed with the babe, and were struck with commiseration. Those who had not fortunes, declared that if they were rich they would adopt it; but such as had the power of adoption, found the inclination less fervent: even they, however, contributed their shillings towards its support. The vestry met at last, and the child was living. The officers took it under their protection, and the world heard no more of it. Pity is a short-lived virtue, the incident was soon forgot; and if any thought about the infant, they, probably, imagined it devoted to another destruction.

Nine years after this a Mr. Frazer, a man of honour and humanity, beheld a boy naked upon one of his barrenest mountains: he was sitting, his eyes were swimming in sorrow, though a single tear had not fallen from them. They were turned up to heaven with resignation, but with almost a spirit of reproach; in his hand was a root of grass, his only visible food.

The master of the place, touched with pity, ordered him to his house.—He put him on the habit of the Highlands, employed him in his service, and called him Frazer. He was asked how he came upon the mountain on which he was discovered, and by what means he was reduced to so miserable a condition.—To these inquiries he could make little or no answer. He knew nothing of father, or mother, or friend, or place of birth. His first remembrance was of an ancient woman, with whom he had lived in a cabin; her death had sent him from one to another another of the Highlanders; and at length the loss of his only remaining friend had left him totally destitute.

Mr. Frazer found in the boy, as he grew up, sense, spirit, and the most lively gratitude. He took him from the meaner services of his family, and employed him near his own person.—Few saw him; but all who did said they perceived in him something very singular.—His behaviour was modest; his words were full of sagacity. He had been near twenty years in the service of this second father, rather than master, when the last rebellion broke out in Scotland. His master took the wrong side, and there was no doubt of his being followed by his adopted son. He was in the two actions that proved successful, and had so much distinguished himself in both, that he was marked for particular favour. In the last engagement his hand was not less active, but he fought against the duke of Cumberland. A single arm could not command success in opposition to so much conduct, joined with so much resolution. He fled among the routed Highlanders, and in an hour was in a place of safety; a retreat in which neither friend could be likely to find, nor enemy to reach him; in which he could neither be forced nor betrayed. In this place as he was leaning upon his sword, and resting against a tree, he saw two persons enter with precipitation; the one an old man flying, the other a young one in pursuit of him. What astonished the youthful warrior was, that they both appeared to be of the victorious party.—He stood a moment, full of wonder, expecting they would fall together upon him: but they only attended to each other. The old man finding his feet would not give him security, turned upon his pursuer, and put himself in a posture of defence. Frazer was too much a hero to look upon so unequal an encounter unmoved. As the old man was on the brink of destruction, he threw himself between them. “I know nothing of your quarrel,” said he to the younger combatant, “but let me dispute it in the room of your adversary. He is not a match for your vigour and youth.” No more words passed. The old man stood aside, and his champion conquered.

The person whom he had saved made him all possible acknowledgments. He told him that he would return the obligation by preserving him:—he proposed taking him back in the evening and changing his dress, promising also to adopt him for his son. He concluded with the highest eulogiums on his valour and generosity, and observed, at the same time, that it was a pity a young man of so much honour should be a rebel. Frazer answered him in this manner—

“The Scots do not fight against their king

because they are disloyal, but because they are commanded by those whom they serve. Their lairds have a right to their duty; and they are taught from their infancy to believe that their first virtue is obedience to them.” Here he paused, wiped away a tear, and then proceeded—“None had so much right to compliance as mine; nor could I have accepted of your proposed friendship, had I not seen him fall. Now I am free, and if you will be a protector to a friendless orphan, you shall find me as faithful to you, as I have been to him.”

The gentleman, whose life he had saved, was extremely moved by this speech. There was something in the manner of delivery, more than in the words themselves, which charmed him: he embraced him, took him back with him, changed his dress, brought him to England, and, by the weight of his interest at court, procured him a free pardon.

With this man of honour Frazer lived as his son: the family consisted of themselves and a daughter, a lady of forty-seven, not more distinguished by the amiableness of her temper, than by an air of melancholy which never forsook her countenance. The father told her often the story of his rescue. “The wretch,” said he to her one day, “who dishonoured you, sought my life for the resentment I had shewn against his inhumanity. What I have said,” continued he, turning to Frazer, “must reach no other ear; but I look upon you as a son: this is the cause of that lady’s melancholy; she was deluded by the promise of a marriage; she had a child, whom its abandoned father caused to be destroyed and he would have added my murder to that of his son’s had not you prevented it, because I sought, twenty-eight years ago, to bring him to justice. How long will revenge live in the minds of some men!”

As they spoke together upon the subject, they compassionated the infant. Frazer was strangely moved by the recital. “Perhaps,” said he, “if my memory would reach to my infant years, something like this was mine.” He then related the strange obscurity of his birth; and shewed a scar upon his throat, which an inhuman hand had (he continued) given it before the time of his earliest remembrance.

They left him without ceremony, and returned in a moment. The old man then addressed himself to him in this manner; “Listen attentively to intelligence at once both pleasing and unwelcome. The person from whose sword you saved me, was your father;—there is your mother;—kneel to her for a blessing.”

What a catastrophe for tragedy! one can hardly avoid looking upon the righteous par-tride

ricide as the appointment of divine Providence.

Some Account of a new Species of Mortification lately observed by Percival Pott, Esq; F. R. S. and Surgeon to St. Bartholomew's Hospital; and the happy Discovery of the extraordinary Efficacy of Opium in the Cure of it, made by the said Gentleman, after the Bark had failed.

MR. Pott describes the above disorder, as "making its first appearance on the inside, or at the extremity of one of the smaller toes, by a small, black, or bluish spot: from this spot the cuticle is always found to be detached, and the skin under it to be of a dark red colour.—Its progress in some is slow; in others rapid, and horribly painful: it generally begins on the inside of each small toe, before it is visible either on its under or upper part; and, when it makes its attack on the foot, the upper part of it first shews its distempered state, by tumefaction, change of colour, and sometimes by vesication; but wherever it is, one of the first marks of it is a separation or detachment of the cuticle.

"The common method of treating this distemper is by spirituous fomentations, cataplasms actually and potentially warm, by dressings of the digestive kind, as they are called, animated with warm pungent oils and balsams, &c. and internally by the Peruvian bark."

This method, Mr. Pott says, he has seldom or ever known to succeed. He has tried the bark, he says, as fully and fairly, and as variously as any man has or can; but, in the species of mortification above described, he cannot ascribe to it a merit which it does not deserve.

He proceeds, after describing the various ways in which he has used the bark, to relate the case which led to the discovery of the virtues of opium in the following words:

"Some time ago I had a patient labouring under this complaint, who could not be prevailed on to take the bark in any form whatever. I made use of every argument, but to no purpose: fomentation, poultice, and the usual dressings, were applied in the usual manner; the disease advanced some days more, some days less, and, at the end of a fortnight, the small toes were all completely mortified, the great one became blackish, the foot much swollen, altered in colour, and the disease seeming to advance with such hasty strides, that I supposed a very few days would determine the event. The pain in the foot and ankle was so great, and so continual, as totally to deprive the patient of sleep. On this account, and merely to procure some remission, I gave two grains of opium at night, which not having the desired effect, I repeated it in the morning. Finding, during the following day, some advantage, I repeated the same dose night and morning, for three days; at the end of which time the patient became quite easy, and the appearances on the foot and ankle were visibly more favourable. Encouraged by this, I increased the quantity of the medicine, giving one grain every three or four hours, taking care to watch its narcotic effect, and to keep the belly empty by clysters. In nine days from the first administration of the opium, all the tumefaction of the foot and ankle totally subsided, and the skin recovered its natural colour, and all the mortified parts plainly began to separate; in another week they were all loose and casting off, the matter was good, and the incarnation florid.

"During the whole of this time, I continued the use of the opium, varying its quantity as circumstances required, but never gave less than three or four grains in twenty-four hours.

"When the sloughs were all cast off, the bones separated, and I had only a clean sore to dress and heal, I gradually left off the medicine.

"I am very willing to acknowledge, that, however well pleased I might be with the event of this case, yet I really regarded it as accidental; so much so, that, having very soon after another opportunity, I did not care to trust to opium alone, but joined the bark with it. The event was equally fortunate. But although I had joined the cortex with the extractum Thebaicum, and did therefore attribute the success to their united powers; yet the effect was so very unlike to what I had ever seen from the bark without opium, that I could not avoid seriously and often reflecting on it, and determining to use it by itself, whenever another opportunity should offer. I did so, and succeeded in the same happy manner, though under the very disagreeable circumstances of seventy years of age, a broken, distempered constitution, and the disease making a hasty progress."

The following Paper is supposed to have been written by a celebrated American Philosopher, at Paris, for the purpose of borrowing Money for the Use of the United States of America. It has been translated into the French and Dutch Languages and printed; and it is now circulating in Holland, Flanders, &c.

IN borrowing money a man's credit depends on some or all of the following particulars.

First. His known conduct respecting former loans, and his punctuality in discharging them.

Recess

Secondly.

Secondly. His industry.

Thirdly. His frugality.

Fourthly. The amount and the certainty of his income, and the freedom of his estate from the incumbrances of prior debts.

Fifthly. His well founded prospects of greater future ability, by the improvement of his estate in value, and by aids from others.

Sixthly. His known prudence in managing his general affairs, and the advantage when they will probably receive from the loan which he desires.

Seventhly. His known probity and honest character, manifested by his voluntary discharge of his debts, which he could not have been legally compelled to pay.—The circumstances which give credit to an individual ought to, and will have their weight upon the lenders of money, to public bodies or nations. If then we consider and compare Britain and America, in those several particulars, upon question, “To which is it safest to lend money?” We shall find,

1. Respecting former loans. That America, which borrowing ten millions during the last war, for the maintenance of her army of 25,000 men, and other charges, had faithfully discharged that debt, and all her other debts, in 1772. Whereas Britain, during these ten years of peace and profitable commerce, had made little or no reduction of her debt, but on the contrary, from time to time, diminished the hopes of her creditors, by a wanton diversion and misapplication of the sinking fund, destined for discharging it.

2. Respecting industry. Every man is employed; the greater part in cultivating their own lands; the rest in handicrafts, navigation, and commerce. An idle man is a rarity; idleness and inutility are disgraceful.—In England the number of that character is immense; fashion has spread it far and wide; hence the embarrassments of private fortunes, and the daily bankruptcies arising from an universal fondness for appearance and expensive pleasures; and hence in some degree, the mismanagements in public business; for habits of business and ability in it are acquired only by practice, and where universal dissipation and the perpetual pursuit of amusement are the mode, the youth, educated in it, can rarely afterwards acquire that patient attention and close application to affairs, which are so necessary to a statesman charged with the care of national welfare. Hence their frequent errors in policy; and hence the weariness at public councils, and backwardness in going to them; the constant unwillingness to engage in any measure that requires thought and consideration, and the readiness for postponing every new proposition, which postponing is therefore the only part of business that they come to be expert in, an expertness produced necessarily by so much daily practice. Whereas in America men bred to close employment in their private affairs, attend with ease to those of the public, when engaged to them, and nothing fails through negligence.

3. Respecting frugality; the manner of living in America is more simple and less expensive than that in England: plain tables, plain cloathing, and plain furniture in houses prevail, with few carriages of pleasure: there, an expensive appearance hurts credit: in England it is often assumed to gain credit, and continued to ruin. Respecting public affairs, the difference is still greater. In England, the salaries of officers, and emoluments of office are enormous. The king has a million sterling per annum, and yet cannot maintain his family free from debt. Secretaries of state, lords of treasury, admiralty, &c. have vast appointments. An auditor of the exchequer has sixpence in the pound, or a fortieth part of all the public money expended in the nation; so that, when a war cost forty millions, one million is paid to him. An inspector of the mint, in the last new coinage, received as his fee 65,000l. sterling per annum; to all which rewards no service these gentlemen can render the public is by any means equivalent. All this is paid by the people, who are oppressed by taxes so occasioned, and thereby rendered less able to contribute to the payment of necessary national debts. In America salaries, where indispensable, are extremely low, but much of the public business is done gratis. The honour of serving the public ably and faithfully is deemed sufficient. Public spirit really exists there, and has great effects. In England it is universally deemed a non-entity, and whoever pretends to it is laughed at as a fool, or suspected as a knave. The committees of congress, which form the board of war, the board of treasury, the board of foreign affairs, the naval board, that for accounts, &c. all attend the business of their respective functions, without any salary or emolument whatever, tho' they spend in it much more of their time than any lord of the treasury or admiralty in England can spare from his amusements. A British minister lately computed, that the whole expence of the Americans, in their civil government over three millions of people, amounted to but 70,000l. sterling, and drew from thence a conclusion, that they ought to be taxed, until their expence was equal in proportion to that which it costs Britain to govern eight millions. He had no idea of a contrary conclusion, that if three millions may be well governed for 70,000l. eight millions may be as well governed for three times times that sum, and that therefore the expence of his own government should be diminished. In that corrupt nation no man is ashamed of being concerned in lucrative government jobs, in which the public money is egregiously misapplied and squandered, the Treasury pillaged, and more numerous and heavy taxes accumulated, to the great oppression of the people. But the prospect of a greater number of such jobs by a war, is an inducement with many to cry out for war upon all occasions, and to oppose every proposition of peace. Hence the constant increase of the national debt, and the absolute improbability of its ever being discharged.

4. Respecting the amount and certainty of income, and solidity of security, the whole thirteen states of America are engaged for the payment of every debt contracted by the congress, and the debt to be contracted by the present war is the only debt they will have to pay; all, or nearly all the former debts of particular colonies being already discharged. Whereas England will have to pay not only the enormous debt this war must occasion, but all their vast preceding debt, or the interest of it; and while America is enriching itself by prizes made upon the British commerce, more than it ever did by any commerce of its own under the restraints of a British monopoly, Britain is growing poorer by the loss of that monopoly, and the diminution of its revenues, and of course less able to discharge the present indiscreet increase of its expenses.

5. Respecting prospects of greater future ability, Britain has none such. Her islands are circumscribed by the ocean; and excepting a few parks or forests she has no new land to cultivate, and cannot therefore extend her improvements. Her numbers too, instead of increasing from increased subsistence, are continually diminishing from growing luxury, and the increasing difficulties of maintaining families, which of course discourages early marriages. Thus she will have fewer people to assist in paying her debts, and that diminished number will be poorer. America, on the contrary, has, besides her lands already cultivated, a vast territory yet to be cultivated, which being cultivated, continually increase in value with the increase of people; and the people, who double themselves by a natural propagation every twenty-five years, will double yet faster by the accession of strangers, as long as lands are to be had for new families; so that every twenty years there will be a double number of inhabitants obliged to discharge the public debts, and those inhabitants being more opulent, may pay their shares with greater ease.

6. Respecting prudence in general affairs, and the advantages to be expected from the loan desired. The Americans are cultivators of land, those engaged in fishery and commerce; reſw, compared with the others. They have ever conducted their several governments with wisdom, avoiding wars, and vain expensive projects, delighting only in their peaceable occupations, which must, considering the extent of their uncultivated territory, find them employment still for ages. Whereas England, ever unquiet, ambitious, avaritious, imprudent, and quarrelsome, is half of the time engaged in a war, always at an expence infinitely greater than the advantage to be obtained by it, if successful. Thus they made war against Spain in 1739, for a claim of about 95,000*l*. (scarce a groat for each individual in the nation) and spent forty millions sterling in the war, and the lives of fifty thousand men; and finally made peace without obtaining satisfaction for the sum claimed. Indeed, there is scarce a nation in Europe against which she has not made war on some frivolous pretext or other, and thereby imprudently accumulated a debt that has brought her on a verge of bankruptcy. But the most indiscreet of all her wars is the present against America, with which she might, for ages, have preserved her profitable connection, only by a just and equitable conduct. She is now acting like a mad shopkeeper, who, by beating those that pass his doors, attempts to make them come in and be his customers. America cannot submit to such treatment, without being first ruined; and being ruined, her custom will be worth nothing. England, to effect this, is increasing her debt, and irretrievably ruining herself. America, on the other hand, aims only to establish her liberty, and that freedom of commerce which will be advantageous to all Europe; and by abolishing that monopoly which she laboured under, she will profit infinitely more than enough to repay any debt which she may contract to accomplish it.

7. Respecting character in the honest payment of debts. The punctuality with which America has discharged her public debts was shewn under the first head; and the general good disposition of the people to such punctuality has been manifested in their faithful payment of private debts to England since the commencement of the war. There were not wanting some politicians who proposed stopping that payment until peace should be restored, alledging that in the usual course of commerce, and of the credit given, there was always a debt existing equal to the trade of eighteen months. That the trade amounting to five millions sterling per annum, the debt must be seven millions and an half; that this sum paid to the British merchants would operate to prevent that distress intended to be brought upon Britain, by our stoppage of commerce with her. For the merchants receiving this money, and no orders with it for farther supplies, would either lay it out in the public funds, or in employing manufacturers, to accumulate goods for a future hungry market in America, upon an expected accommodation; by which means the funds would be kept up, and the manufacturers prevented from murmuring. But against this it was alledged that injuries from ministers should not be revenged on merchants, that the credit was in consequence of private contracts, made in confidence of good faith; that these ought to be held sacred, and faithfully complied with; for that whatever public utility might be supposed to arise from a breach of private faith, it was unjust, and would in the end be found untrue; honesty being, in truth, the best policy. On this principle the proposition was universally rejected; and though the English prosecuted the war with unexampled barbarity, burning our defenceless towns in the midst of winter, and arming savages against us, the debt was punctually paid; and the merchants of London have testified to the parliament, and will testify to all the world, that from their experience in dealing with us, they had, before the war, no apprehension of our unfairness, and that since the war they have been convinced, that their opinion of us was well founded. England, on the contrary, an old corrupt, extravagant, and profligate nation, sees herself deep in debt, which she is in no condition to pay; and yet is madly, and dishonestly, running deeper, without any possibility of discharging her debt, but by a public bankruptcy.

It appears, therefore, from the general industry, frugality, ability, prudence and virtue of America, that she is a much safer debtor than Britain; to say nothing of the satisfaction generous minds must have in reflecting, that by loans to America they are opposing tyranny, and aiding the cause of liberty, which is the cause of all mankind.

The History of Mrs. Ravage.

To the Editor of the Liberator Magazine.

S I R,

I N what manner to tell you my unfortunate story I know not; shame and confusion forbid me to whisper it even to the winds, but a just concern for the felicity of others, has operated upon my humanity, and forces the melancholy secret from my heart.

You must know I am a woman of some birth; I had once a little beauty, and—what was infinitely more important in the eye of the world—a very affluent fortune. At the age of twenty-one, I married the most amiable of men, with whom I lived in an uninterrupted course of happiness for six and thirty years; during that period we had four sons and three daughters, who are all provided for, both fortunately and splendidly in the world, and enjoy the fullest sweets of opulence, in the midst of the most perfect content.

About nine months ago,—O that I had not survived to recollect the time that now brings scorpions to my imagination, and murders the most distant beam of comfort with a glance—the man with whom I had lived so happily and so long, fell ill of a fever and died in ten days. My distraction at his death was inexplicable, yet when my after conduct comes to be mentioned, I shall be suspected of dissimulation, if I say I was concerned for it at all:—believe me, however, I felt every thing a woman endued with a most exquisite sensibility could possibly experience on so tender and afflicting an occasion, and was reduced so low by the conflict my mind had undergone, that when the physicians prescribed the Bath waters, it was universally thought I should not hold out to the end of the journey.

Providence, however, which designed that I should stand a warning to my sex, to the surprise of my whole family, worked a miracle almost in favour of my health, and in about three months I was so perfectly recovered, that I came up to town, and seemed not only to have left every trace of my indisposition behind, but the principal marks of my age too: in short, every body complimented me on the spirit in my looks, and raked the latent embers of vanity, which had a long, long time lain smothered in my heart, with so much success together, that upon a secret consultation with my own wishes, I actually imagined I might yet be prevailed upon to change my condition, and make a second venture on the smooth ocean of that state which rendered my life such a blessing in the first. The moment a sensation of this nature comes into the breast of an old woman, it clings to her like the asp of Cleopatra, and most commonly stings her to death.—For my own part, tho' I felt a secret repugnance at the notion of another husband, yet the idea was rivetted close to my fancy, and I even sometimes endeavoured to persuade myself that this honest aversion, which in spite of me, my conscience would retain, was nothing but a prejudice of education or custom, which it was highly meritorious to subdue. My memory was racked for instances where women in my circumstances had married a second time, with handsome young fellows too, yet lived extremely happy, notwithstanding the vulgar 2nd and abominable supposition, that nobody could entertain a passion for a woman in years. Nay, I found even texts of scripture in support of my favourite opinion, and absolutely forced myself to believe that I was obliged, by the very principles of religion, to make another choice.

While I was thus debating, my son Edward, who is a colonel in the army, brought a young fellow of his acquaintance to sup at my house.—I do not know how it was, but I fancied he was the handsomest man I had ever seen in my life; his conversation too was so elegant, and he paid so profound a deference to my opinion, that I did not sleep—shame upon my antiquated eye-lids—a single wink the whole night. But why need I trespass on your patience?—Major Ravage repeated his visits, began to find he was far from disagreeable, and, in short, made an offer of his hand, in such terms as I was wholly unable to resist: without making the least inquiry into his character or circumstances, I consented to be his at an age when I should have acted a more becoming part in waiting upon my grand-children, and flattered myself that his affection might be engaged to my person, at the very moment I might have known it to be entirely created by my purse. My poor first husband imagining, that, as I had been a faithful wife to him, I should be a tender mother to his children, left me in possession of 50,000*l.* and a jointure of 3000*l.* a year; every six-pence of which, as far as I could, I, nevertheless, unnaturally settled on the villain who had taken advantage of my second childhood, the morning after the celebration of our nuptials.

My children, you may be sure, were justly offended at this preposterous marriage; they were so; but to get out of the way of their reproaches, I quarrelled with them alternately, and forbade them ever to appear in my sight: I had too soon, alas! occasion for their assistance and relief: a fortnight had scarce passed, when Major Ravage, without saying a single syllable, set out for Bath with a tradesman's wife in the city, and about an hour after his departure, an upholsterer came in, demanding the possession of my house and goods, having bought every thing that morning of my husband.—I will not attempt to describe my astonishment, my fury, and my distress: it was too much for nature to support, and I fell lifeless on the floor.—Not to tire your patience, Sir, upon examining into every thing, and sending to the Major, he flatly refused either to give me a shilling, or ever to cohabit with so stale a parcel of mortality (these were his decent expressions) again. While I was in this situation, my eldest daughter came and conducted me to her house, and generously soothed me in the tenderest manner, but wounded me a thousand times more by her goodness, than she could possibly have done by seizing that opportunity to vent the most merited complaints against me.—I am now going to sue for a separate maintenance, and shall convince the grey-headed sucklings of my sex, that an old woman, who marries a young fellow, if she ever should meet with a worthy one, can never expect to be treated with any tenderness or regard; and that, on the other hand, if she consents to marry a villain, she can look for nothing but an endless scene of poverty and contempt. Where she is most fortunate in her choice, neglect and ridicule must be her portion; and where she happens to be otherwise, the public scorn of the world will be aggravated by a continual round of private misery and distress.

I am, yours, &c.

I am ashamed to write my name at length.

Strange Notions of certain maiden Ladies.

To the EDITOR.

SIR,

THERE are people to be frequently met with in the world, who are so fond of hearing themselves talk, and have so good an opinion of their own understanding, and so absolute a contempt for that of others, whose sentiments do not coincide with their own, that it is utterly impossible to make any impression upon them in conversation. They know perfectly, before you have said five words, that you are going to utter a great deal of nonsense, and therefore desire to be excused if they are not at leisure to listen to it. At the same time, they are never tired with their own babble, and think it impossible any body else should.

Some such persons as these I have now in my eye; and as I despair of ever obtaining a patient hearing from them, I beg leave, through the channel of your useful Magazine, to lay my sentiments before them at full length, whether they will or no.

The circumstances of my case, Sir, are as follow: I have a little girl about twelve years old, who is often with an elderly maiden aunt, for the sake of a very good school at next door. Now, Sir, though this is a matter of some convenience to me, yet her aunt, and others of her female acquaintance, are often giving her lectures concerning her conduct in life, which makes me very uneasy. I have sometimes made remonstrances to her about them, but to no manner of purpose. All that I get upon these occasions is, "Pray, brother, mind your own business;—why, do you take me for a fool, brother?"—and other speeches in the same style. The favourite topic of discourse with my sisters and her select friends, is the prodigious digious number of unhappy marriages which they know of, and the absolute impossibility of happiness in the married state.—“They have several indispensible maxims amongst them upon this subject, the truth of which they will no more bear to have called in question, than their own sense and sovereignty.—The principal of these are—“That men are brutes—that they have not sagacity enough to be governed—that they should never pretend to know any thing which their wives have a mind to comprehend better than they—that they are by no means competent judges of what is fit for their wives to do—how should they?—that they (the men) are only fit to look after their dogs and horses—how should they know any thing else?—that a woman who marries a man whom she cannot govern is a fool—that there is nothing can make a marriage tolerably happy, but a good jointure and a coach and six; or, at least, a very handsome post-chaise.”

“Juliet, (said her aunt one day to my little girl) as we were all going to church together, you must never mind what the men say; they are filthy abominable creatures; and if they had not worked ruffles and laced cloaths to recommend them, they could never be endured.—If ever you marry, Juliet, continued she, I charge you never to marry a man who does not keep a coach; who has not the best pew in the church, and who cannot make you finer than any body else; for the finer and richer you are; the more you will be respected; and if you are not rich and fine, who do you think will take notice of you, or care a farthing about you?”—

“Fie, sister, replied I; how can you talk so improperly to the child, and especially now we are going to church?”

“Why now, brother, answered she, you are always spoiling the good one is endeavouring to do.—Why, brother, you don’t know how forward young people are now a days. I am sure it is a very wise custom in Roman Catholic countries, to shut up girls in nunneries; it prevents a thousand unhappy marriages; and I wonder how our government came to lay them aside.”

In this manner does my sister and her female conclave harangue perpetually, without the least seeming distrust of their own wisdom and sagacity, and without any controul. Suffer me now, Sir, in my turn, to deliver my sentiments, if not to their conviction, which I almost despair of, for the consideration at least, of those among the younger and more unwary of their sex. To them I would reason in the following manner, and all I request in return, is a patient and attentive hearing.

There is a certain temper of mind as necessary to constitute happiness, as there is a certain temper of body to constitute health.

This temper, or frame, or disposition, consists in a due regulation and government of the passions, and in their subjection to the laws of virtue and religion. To expect happiness while every wild desire and capricious humour are permitted to domineer, and to take their full swing, is just as unreasonable as to expect health in strong convulsions, or in a fit of distraction. The indulgence of irregular passions, may, for a time, be attended with some agreeable sensations, but they will, generally, be succeeded by others which are painful:—perhaps too painful to be endured. Had my good sister and her wife friends read their Bible to so much purpose as to see the necessity of subduing their passions, of correcting their tempers, and of submitting to that order and oeconomy which God hath established throughout the creation, they would not have thought men such monsters as they now do; they would not have supposed, as they now do, that female government is absolutely requisite for the peace and welfare of society. Had they but taken proper notice of the graces and decorations there recommended to women, they would have paid less attention to their caps and their cloaths. Had they learnt from thence the true value of humility, they would not have imagined that happiness consisted in having the best pews in a church; and they would have despised the pitiful idea of being admired for their rich silks and extravagant trimmings, or in triumphing over their inferiors in a coach and six.

My sister, and some of her elderly friends may perhaps, wrinkle up their noses at these reflections: and indeed, as they are too far advanced in life to make any addition to the number of happy or unhappy marriages, there is little more to be desired of them than the laudable endeavour (in which they are considerably interested) to get the better by all possible means, of their ill nature and envy, originating unquestionably—from repeated disappointments.—With regard to some of their young female hearers, it is much to be wished, that they would not allow themselves to be carried away by ill humour and misrepresentation. We are not all—bad as the world is—insensible to the graces of the mind.—There would not be so many unhappy marriages, if the nature of the nuptial contract was sufficiently considered. Now and then, it is true, a fair enchantress may reign and tyrannize, with power pontifical, in consequence of her outward charms; but there are few invested with such plenitude of sway, and their supremacy is seldom of a long duration. We are not, in general, so dazzled with a moderate share of beauty, as not to see the distortions and deformities of the mind. My sister, I know, is ready to say, “Have you no no worthless creatures of your own sex?"—I freely own we have: and I must, with equal freedom, say, that women of a certain turn, similar to her own, are wonderfully expert at finding them out, wonderfully disposed also to recommend them to their young female acquaintance, if they are distinguished in the world by their rank and fortunes, their families, and their connections.—Now if people will come together upon wrong principles and with preposterous views, what chance can there possibly be for happiness?—When I, therefore, hear ladies of this complexion, blessing themselves for having never been seduced into matrimony, and making vows and protestations against it, I am thankful too, and heartily wish they may keep their vows inviolate. The good and happiness of the married state results from its harmony, order, and regularity; from the affection, good understanding, good nature, and virtuous dispositions of the contracting parties. If Miss when she is out of her Teens, does not get the better of her pride, vanity, peevishness, and ill humour, she is no more fit for the performance of the conjugal duties, than she was when scratching and pinching her school-fellows before she entered into them.

By what I have said, Sir, I do not mean to insinuate my apprehensions that the lectures of these tabbies will tend to make their young pupils look upon the marriage state in a formidable, forbidding light, as they themselves professedly do; but they are, I think, directly calculated to give a violent wrench to their minds, and to make them totally incapable of appealing to the best advantage in the character of wives.

Letters from Lord Chesterfield, to Alderman George Faulkner, just published. Being a Supplement to his Lordship's Letters.

To George Faulkner, Esq;

Bath, November 11, 1752.

My good Friend,

YOU judged very rightly (as you always do) in thinking that I have the greatest esteem for the works of the Bishop of Cloyne, and you acted very kindly (as you always do too) in sending them to me. I have since received them from the bishop himself, but feloniously printed in London by Tonson and Draper, and, like most stolen goods, strangely altered and disguised, as well by larger and whiter paper, as by ink of the blackest dye. I always expect your packets with impatience, and receive them with pleasure; but that pleasure would be much more complete, if some productions of your own now and then accompanied the excellent ones which you send me of other people. I must freely tell you that you have been long enough the celebrated and successful man-midwife of other people's conceptions, and it is now high time that you should take up the other end of the business, and beget, conceive, and bear fruit yourself. The most illustrious of your predecessors did so. The Stephens's, the Alduses, and many others, acted as man-midwives to the greatest authors; but then they acted as men too, and begot, as well as delivered: and indeed there is such a relation and connexion between those two operations, that it is next to impossible that one who has been so able as you have been in the one, should be deficient in the other. You have moreover one advantage which the greatest of your typographical predecessors had not. They were never personally acquainted with Horace, Virgil, Cicero, and others whose productions they brought to light, but were obliged to exhibit them in the always-imperfect, often-deformed state in which they found them, in ragged and worm-eaten vellum and parchment.—Whereas you have been always at the fountain head; you have not only printed and read, but you have heard Swift, Berkeley, and all the best authors of the Irish Augustan age. You have conversed with, you have been informed, and to my knowledge, consulted by them. Should you ask me, my friend, what sort of work I would particularly point out to you, I can only answer, consult your genius, which will best direct you: if it does not lead you, or rather hurry you, whether you will or not, into poetry, do not attempt verse, but take the more common manner of writing, which is prose. Cicero himself had better have done so. A Typographia Hibernica, which no man in the kingdom is more capable of doing well than yourself, would be a useful work, and becoming your character. I do not recommend to you any ludicrous performance; they must flow naturally, or they are good for nothing; and though, were it only by your long and amicable collision with Sheridan, Delany, Swift, and others, you must be very strongly impregnated with particles of wit and humour, yet I take your natural turn to be grave and philosophical. A collection of Anas would admit of all subjects, and, in a volume or two of Swiftiana, you might both give and take a sample of yourself, by slipping in some Faulkneriana; the success of which would, I am persuaded, engage you to go further. Biography should, in my mind, be your next step, for which you appear to be thoroughly qualified, by the clear and impartial accounts, which your hebdomadal labours give of the deaths of all people of note. History would soon follow, which in truth you have been writing these many years, though perhaps without thinking so. What is history but a collection of facts and dates? Your Journal is a collection of facts and dates; then, what is your Journal but history? Our friend, the chief baron, with whom I have often talked upon this subject, has always agreed with me, that, in the fitness of things, it was necessary you should be an author; and I am very sure that, if you consult him, he will join with me in exhorting you to set about it forthwith. Whenever you assume that character, I claim a very strong dedication with the first copy of the work, as an old friend, which, joking apart, I sincerely am, and

Your humble servant,

CHESTERFIELD.

LETTER III.

To the same.

Blackheath, September 15, 1753.

My worthy Friend,

THOUGH I am very sorry for your quarrels in Ireland, by which I am sure the public must suffer, let who will prevail; I gladly accept your kind offer of sending me the controversial productions of the belligerent parties. Pray do not think any of those polemical pieces too low, too grub-street, or too scurrilous to send me; for I have leisure to read them all, and prefer them infinitely to all other controversial performances. I have often wished, and wish it now more than ever, that you were in parliament, where, in my opinion, your coolness, gravity, and impartiality would greatly contribute to calm if not to cure those animosities. Virgil seems prophetically to have pointed at you, in his description of a person qualified to sooth and moderate popular tumults.—These are the lines, which will perhaps be more intelligible to us both in Dryden's translation, than in the original:

If then some grave and pious man appear,
They hush their noise, and lend a listening ear;

He sooths, with sober words, their angry mood,

And quenches their innate desire of blood.

I am not very superstitious; but I am persuaded that, if you were to try the Sortes Virgilianæ, you would open the book at that very place. That incomparable and religious prince, King Charles the first, consulted them with great faith, and to his great information.

There is one thing which I would much rather know, than all the contending parties in Ireland say or write against each other, and that is, your real sentiments upon the whole; but all that I know of them is, that I never shall know them; such is your candour, and such is your caution. The celebrated Atticus seems to me to have been your prototype. He kept well with all parties, so do you; he was trusted and consulted by individuals on all sides, so are you; he wrote some histories, so have you; he was the most eminent bookseller of the age he lived in, so are you; and he died immensely rich, and so will you. It is true he was a knight, and you are not, but that you know is your own fault; and he was an epicurean, and you are a stoic.

For the next seven weeks pray direct your packets to me at Bath, where I am going next week, as deaf as ever your friend the Dean was, and full as much, though not so profitably,

Your friend and servant,

CHESTERFIELD.

Pray make my compliments to your friend Mr. Bristow when you see him.

LETTER IV.

To the same.

London, April 13, 1754.

My worthy Friend,

THESE things never happened to your prototype Atticus, even in the height and rage of the civil dissensions at Rome; and yet I will venture to affirm that he neither was, nor could be, more prudent, cautious, and circumspect, than yourself. But there is a chance, a fatality, which we cannot define, that attends particular men and particular times. Pompey the Great was publicly insulted upon the Roman stage, and the actor obliged to repeat that part a second and a third time; and you, my friend, it seems, have been most unaccountably, and unjustly I will add, disturbed for a slight omission in your weekly historical labours. I have, upon this occasion, searched for precedents among all the best Greek and Latin historians, and I cannot find that the drinking of any one political health recorded by any one of them. Perhaps the Greeks and Romans had not parts enough to invent those ingenious toasts which make so shining a figure in the late annals of Ireland, and possibly it might not occur to them that the health of any particular day or event long past, could, with any propriety, be drank, or perhaps the injudicious historians might think the mention of them below the dignity of history; but be that as it will, it is certain that neither Thucydides, Xenophon, Livy, nor Tacitus, say one word of bumpers, toasts, political, loyal or patriot healths. You stand therefore fully justified by precedents. But, however, as wise men will, to a certain degree, conform to prevailing, though perhaps absurd customs, why should you not repair your omission by a more minute and circumstantial account of those elegant drinking bouts or Symposia than any of your co-temporary historians have yet thought fit to give? Why not relate, circumstantially, the convivial wit and urbanity of those polite computations, the serious, the jocular, the ironical and satirical toasts, the numbers of bottles guzzled down and spewed up again, the political discourses and plans of government attempted, and now and then interrupted by hiccups and four eruptions, the downfall of heroes weltering in their vomit, and, in short, the exact detail of those Noces Atticæ. The style of your late friend the Dean, of which you are master, seems admirably adapted to this descriptive part of your historical works, and one way or other you would please all your readers by it. The performers themselves must be glad to see their achievements recorded and transmitted to posterity. Their enemies perhaps (such is the malignity of the human heart) would not be sorry.—— Only sober people would or could object to it; and they are too few, and too inconsiderable to deserve your attention.

The riot at the play house was so extraordinary a one, and lasted so long, that I cannot imagine where the civil magistrate, assisted by the military force, was all that time. I am sorry for Sheridan's loss, but I carry my thoughts much farther; and I consider all these events, as they may in their consequences affect you; the precedent seems a dangerous one, and proximus ardet Euclægon. I take the playhouse to be the shop of the proprietor, and the plays he acts his goods, which those that do not like them, are not obliged to take, and need not go to his shop, but those who can enter it forcibly, destroy his scenes, benches, &c. are perhaps a more dangerous sort of 'shop-lifters. Now consider, my friend, the near relation that there is between your shop and Mr. Sheridan's. You have, I believe, printed all that he has ever acted, and a great deal more. If therefore these vigorous correctors of the theatre, should take it into their heads to be likewise the correctors of your press, what might be the consequence?

I will not anticipate by conjectures so gloomy a scene, but I will only say, with the bishop of St. Asaph, our enemies will tell the rest with pleasure.

Pray send me your bill for the innumerable pamphlets, sheets, and half-sheets which you have been so kind to transmit me from Dublin. I have, being very idle, read them all, and cannot say that many of them entertained me; but all together they gave me serious concern, to find a people that I love so divided and distracted by party feuds and animosities, of which in the mean time the public is the victim. That Providence and your own prudence may protect you, is sincerely wished by,

Your faithful friend, and servant,

CHESTERFIELD.

LETTER V.

To the same.

London, Jan. 16, 1759.

My worthy Friend,

I FIND with pleasure, that you do not forget your old friends, though become useless to you, to themselves, and to the whole world. Dr. Lawton's lectures, which I received from you last week, were a most welcome proof of it. I have read them with all the satisfaction that I expected, from my knowledge and esteem of the author. His design is laudable, and his endeavours able, but yet I will not answer for his success. His plan requires much study and application, and, consequently, much time; three things that few people will care to bestow upon so trifling an accomplishment as that of speaking well; for in truth, what is the use of speaking, but to be understood, and if one is but understood, surely one speaks well enough of all conscience. But allowing a certain degree of eloquence to be desirable upon some occasions, there is a much easier and shorter way of coming at it than that which Dr. Lawton proposes; for Horace says (and Horace you know can never be in the wrong) Fecundi calices quem non fecere disertum? Now if a man has nothing to do but to drink a great deal in order to be eloquent (that is as long as he can speak at all), I will venture to say that Ireland will be, what ancient Greece was, the most eloquent nation in the world without Dr. Lawton's assistance, and even without loss of time or business. I must observe to you by the way, that the Roman Calix was not a certain stated measure, but signified a glass, a tumbler, a pot, or any vessel that contained wine; so that ly the rule of pari pro toto, it may perhaps be extended to a copper, which contains a torrent of this potable eloquence. However, make my compliments to Dr. Lawton, and return him my thanks for the flattering mention he has made of me, in his excellent work; I with I deserved it as well, as he did something which he has not got.

I am your faithful friend,

CHESTERFIELD.

add, people will not throw away their present handy and portable octaves, for expensive and unwieldy quartos. How far indeed the name (you are so much superior to quibbles, that you can bear and sometimes even smile at them) of quartos may help them off in Ireland I cannot pretend to say. After all this, I am very seriously,

Your faithful friend and servant,

CHESTERFIELD.

LETTER VI.

To the same.

London, February 7, 1768.

My worthy Friend,

WHAT mean all these disturbances in Ireland? I fear you do not exert, for I cannot suppose that you have lost that authority, which your impartiality, dignity, and gravity, had so deservedly procured you. You know I always considered Virgil's pietate gravem virum as your prototype, and, like him, you have allayed former popular commotions, and calmed civil disturbances. You will, perhaps, tell me that no dignity, no authority whatsoever, can restrain or quiet the fury of a multitude drunk with whisky. But then if you cannot, who can? Will the multitude, enraged with whisky, be checked and kept within bounds by their betters who were full as drunk as they are, only with claret? No. You are the only neutral power now in Ireland, equally untainted by the outrageous effects of whisky, or the dull stupefaction of claret; and therefore I require from you, Ne quid detrimenti capiat Respublica, Capeffe Rempublicam?

Do you really mean to turn my head with the repeated doses of flattery which you have lately sent me? Consider that long illness has weakened it, and that it has now none of the ballast which yours has to keep it steady. It is so apt to turn of itself, that the least breeze of flattery may overset it. But, perhaps, there may be some degree of self-love in your case; for in truth, I was the only lord lieutenant that you ever absolutely governed; but do not mention this, because I am said to have had no favourite.

Let me advise you, as a friend, not to engage too deep in the expence of a new and pompous quarto edition of your friend Swift. I think you may chance to be, what perhaps you would not choose to be, a considerable loser by it. Whosoever in the three kingdoms has any books at all, has Swift, and unless you have some new pieces, and those too not trifling ones to

LETTER VII.

To the same.

London, July 1, 1762.

My worthy Friend,

FROM my time down to the present, you have been in possession of governing the governors of Ireland, whenever you have thought fit to meddle with business; and if you had meddled more with some, it might, perhaps, have been better for them and better for Ireland. A proof of this truth is, that an out governor, no sooner received your commands, than he sent them to the in governor, who, without delay, returned him the inclosed answer, by which you know what to do.

I send you no news from hence, as it appears by your journal, that you are much better informed of all that passes, and of all that does not pass, than I am; but one piece of news I look upon myself in duty bound to communicate to you, as it relates singly to yourself. Would you think it, Mr. Foote, who, if I mistake not, was one of your Symposion while you was in London, and if so the worse man he, takes you off, as it is vulgarly called; that is, acts you in his new Farce, called the Orators. As the government here cannot properly take notice of it, would it be amiss that you should shew some spirit upon this occasion, either by the way of stricture, contempt, or by bringing an action against him; I do not mean for writing the said farce, but for acting it. The doctrine of scribere est agere was looked upon as too hard in the case of Algernon Sidney; but my Lord Coke, in his incomparable notes upon Littleton, my lord chief justice Hale, in his Pleas of the Crown, my lord Vaughan, Salkeld, and in short all the greatest men of the law, do, with their usual perspicuity and precision, lay it down, for law that agere est agere. And this is exactly Mr. Foote's case with regard to you;—therefore any orders that you shall think fit to send to me, in this affair as to retaining counsel, filing a bill of, Faulkner versus Foote, or bringing a common action upon the case, which I think would be the best best of all, the case itself being actionable, shall be punctually executed by

Your faithful friend and servant,

CHESTERFIELD.

LETTER VIII.

To the same.

London, January 4, 1763.

My worthy Friend,

MANY thanks to you for your letter, many thanks to you for your Almanack, and more thanks to you, for your friend Swift's Works, in which last, to borrow an expression of Cibber's, you have outdone your usual doings; for the paper is white-ish, and the ink is black-ish; I only wish that the margin had been a little broader; however, without flattery, it beats Elzevir, Aldus, Vascosan, and I make no doubt but that, in seven or eight hundred years, the learned and the curious in those times, will, like the learned and the curious in these, who prefer the impression of a book to the matter of it, collect with pains and expence all the books that were published ex Typographia Faulkneriana. But I am impatient to congratulate you upon your late triumph: you have made (if you will forgive a quibble upon so serious a subject) your enemy your Foot-stool; a victory which the divine Socrates had not influence enough to obtain at Athens over Aristophanes, nor the great Pompey at Rome, over the actor who had the insolence to abuse him under the name of Magnus, by which he was universally known, and to tell him from the stage, Miseriis nostris Magnus es.—A man of less philosophy than yourself, would, perhaps, have chastised Mr. Foote corporally, and have made him feel that your wooden leg which he mimicked, had an avenging arm to protect it; but you scorned so inglorious a victory, and called justice and the laws of your country to punish the criminal, and to avenge your cause. You triumphed; and I heartily join my weak voice to the loud acclamations of the good citizens of Dublin upon this occasion. I take it for granted that some of your many tributary wits have already presented you with gratulatory poems, odes, &c. upon this subject: I own I had some thoughts myself of inscribing a short poem to you upon your triumph; but, to tell you the truth, when I had writ not above two thousand verses of it, my Muse forsook me, my poetic vein stopped, I threw away my pen, and I burned my poem, to the irreparable loss not only of the present age, but also of the latest posterity.

I very seriously and sincerely wish you a great many very happy new years, and am

Your most faithful friend and servant,

CHESTERFIELD.

I like your messenger, young Dunkin, mightily; he is a very sensible, well-behaved young man.

LETTER IX.

To the same.

London, May 22, 1766.

My worthy friend,

YOU reproach me gently, but with seeming justice, for my long silence; I confess the fact, but think that I can, in some degree at least, excuse it. I am grown very old, and both my mind and my body feel the sad effects of old age. All the parts of my body now refuse me their former assistance, and my mind (if I may use that expression) stutters, and is as unready as any part of my body. Under these circumstances, it is no wonder that I delayed writing to such a critic and philosopher as you are. However, I will not truit to your indulgence.

I thank you for the book you sent me, in which there is great labour and great learning; but I confess that it is a great deal above me, and I am now too old to begin to learn Celtic.

Your septennial patriotic bill is unfortunately lost here, and I humbly presume, to the great joy of the patriots who brought it in, to whom one may apply what has hitherto been charged as a blunder upon our country, that they have got a loss. It is not the case with a Habeas Corpus act, if they can ever get one, and were nobody wiser than I, you should have one to-day; for I think every human creature has a right to liberty, which cannot with justice be taken from him, unless he forfeits it by some crime.

I cannot help observing, and with some satisfaction, that heaven has avenged your cause, as well and still more severely, than the courts of temporal justice in Ireland did, having punished your adversary Foote in the part offending. The vulgar saying, that mocking is catching, is verified in his case; you may, in your turn, mock him, without danger to your adopted leg.

Adieu, my good friend; be as well as ever you can and as serenely cheerful as you please. I need not bid you grow rich, for you have taken good care of that already, and if you were now to grow richer, you would be overgrown, and, after all, ad modum in rebus. I am very seriously, and truly,

Your faithful servant,

CHESTERFIELD.

A C A R D.

LORD Chesterfield sends his compliments to his good friend Mr. Faulkner, hungers and thirsts after him, and hopes that he will take some mutton with him at Blackheath, any day or days that he has leisure.

Blackheath, Aug. 13, 1766.

LETTER X.

To the same.

London, July 7, 1767.

My worthy Friend,

I AM to thank you, and I heartily do thank you, for your kind and welcome present. You have clothed your own friend the Dean very richly, and suitably to his merit, and your own present dignity; but after all, the poor Dean pays dear for his own fame; since every scrap of paper of his, every rebus, quibble, pun and conversation joke is to be published, because it was his. It is true his Bagatelles are much better than other people's; but still many of them, I believe, he would have been sorry to have published. How does your new dignity agree with you? Do you manfully withstand the attacks of claret? or do you run into the danger to avoid the apprehension? You may set the fashion of sobriety if you please, and a singular one it will be; for I dare say that in the records of Dublin, there is no one instance to be found of a sober high sheriff. Remember Sir William Temple's rule, and consider that every glass of wine that you drink beyond the third, is for Foote, the only enemy that I believe you have in the world. I am sure you have a friend, though a very useless one, in

Your faithful servant,

CHESTERFIELD.

English Theatre.

Covent-Garden.

WEDNESDAY evening the 10th of December, a new Tragedy called PERCY, written by Miss Hannah Moore, was performed at this Theatre.—The characters are,

Douglas,	Mr. Wroughton,
Lord Raby,	Mr. Aickin,
Sir Hubert,	Mr. Hull,
Harcourt,	Mr. Robson,
Edric,	Mr. Whitfield,
Percy,	Mr. Lewis,
Elwina,	Mrs. Barry,
Bertha,	Mrs. Jackson.

The story is as follows:

Percy and Elwina had entertained mutual passion from their childhood.—Lord Raby, Elwina's father, countenanced their flame, and even promised to give the final sanction of his approbation, by consenting to their marriage. In this state of matters Percy leaves England, smit with the holy frenzy of recovering Palestine from the Saracens.

During his absence Lord Raby takes umbrage at some trifling insult from the domestics of Percy, and determines never to give him his daughter; to put this also out of his power, he compels Elwina to marry Lord Douglas, between whom and Percy a deadly and rooted enmity subsisted. Notwithstanding Elwina's aversion to the match, her conduct, when a wife, is such as the breath of slander cannot fully; but a coldness and melancholy hanging about her, awakened the jealousy of Douglas, who knows of her former passion for Percy.

At this period Sir Hubert arrives from the Holy Land, and calls at Lord Raby's Castle, to inform him of the success of the Christian arms against the Infidels. Elwina is present at the interview, and has the agony to hear, amongst the names of the slain, that of her beloved Percy mentioned. Unable to sustain the shock, she drops senseless into her father's arms. Before she has recovered Lord Douglas appears, and has the mortification to hear her sigh out Percy's name the moment she recovered the use of speech. Douglas is incensed beyond measure at the cause of Elwina's sorrow, and, with the nice feeling of a great spirit, disclaims the idea of a rival even in the tomb. Percy, who had been supposed dead, returns home; and never expecting any obstacle to visiting his mistress, boldly comes to her father's castle. She receives him with rapture at their first interview; the surprise of finding him still living, having extinguished the remembrance of the duty she owed to her husband. Their interview is short but pathetic;—she discovers her marriage, which nearly deprives Percy of reason; however, when he learns the necessity she was under of complying with the commands of her father, he is in some measure appeased, and consents to leave the castle, with a resolution of never visiting Elwina more. In the infancy of Percy and Elwina's passion she worked a scarf, which, according to the romantic spirit of the times, he wore over his armour in battle. This scarf she had repeatedly asked him for, as she thought it an injury to her husband's honour, to suffer any token of affection to continue continue in the hands of another. Unfortunately Douglas intercepts a letter to her from Percy, in which this scarf is mentioned. Incensed to the last degree, he determines to seize Percy and put him to death. They meet and fight; but Percy overpowered by the number of Douglas's domestics, is made prisoner.

The Scottish earl is for some time so blinded with passion, that he is about to plunge a poignard in the breast of his rival. However, honour at last resumes her seat, and he returns him his sword. They both retire to determine the quarrel by single combat, and leave Elwina in dreadful suspense for the event.

During their absence, Bertha comes and informs Elwina that Douglas was killed; but that such was his jealousy, that he had bound all his followers by a solemn oath, in case of his death, to compel his wife to take poison. Far from being shocked at this fatal intelligence, she receives it with tranquillity and pleasure, as if her life was necessary to atone for her having been the innocent cause of Douglas's death.

At this moment, to her utter astonishment, Douglas appears with the fatal pledge in his hand, which Elwina had once given Percy. He tells her that her lover is dead, and that he has brought her the scarf as a proof of it; that he spread a false report merely to heighten the agony she must feel from disappointment. The wretched Elwina hears him with all the majesty of silent sorrow, and prepares to meet her fate with fortitude: in the mean time lord Raby and Edric expostulate with Douglas; inform him, that Elwina was guiltless; that she and Percy had long been lovers, and that the scarf, which so excited his jealousy, had been given long since, when lord Raby himself countenanced their passion. This immediately brings him to a sense of his error, and he is just going to stop the sentence he had passed, when Bertha comes to acquaint him that Elwina had taken poison, and had lost her reason.

Elwina then appears distracted, and expires at her father's feet. Douglas in sorrow and remorse stabs himself, and his father-in-law concludes the piece with this melancholy acknowledgment of being himself the cause of so much misery.

The author has conducted the fable, and unfolded the incidents of her piece so artfully, that the attention of the spectator is suspended and kept alive to the end of the play.

The language is equally poised between the two extremes of meanness and turgidity. In general it is simple and elegant, and sometimes rises to an uncommon elevation by energy of sentiment, and by those strokes of genius which warm and animate an audience.

Drury-Lane.

On Thursday evening, the 18th inst. a new tragedy called "The Roman Sacrifice," was performed at this theatre. The fable of this play is founded on the account we have of the patriotism of Brutus, who sacrificed his sons for having conspired with Tarquin against the liberties of Rome.

History assigns no reason but ambition, and a dislike of republican severity, for the defection of the sons of Brutus. But Mr. Shirley, (author of Edward the Black Prince) in this instance, like a poet, imagined himself to be more in the secrets of nature than the historian, and accounts in part for it, by privately marrying one of the young men to Tarquinia, the daughter of the exiled king.

This licence might have been excused, in compliance with the present clamour for incidents and business, if it had not betrayed the author's absolute inability to interest his audience on the great and immediate subject of the play. For Tarquinia, and not Brutus, is the figure brought forward: and Mr. Shirley, while he discovers some talents in the nature and artifices of love, seems totally unacquainted with Roman virtue, and incapable of delineating the character of Brutus. Mr. Henderson, in representing him, makes bad worse; for the author has given him too much to say, and Henderson says it in a declamatory, parading manner.

Brutus's character was a gloomy, silent, determined patriotism, founded on personal hatred to Tarquin; and the opposition between his principles and feelings, between his virtue and ambition as an indignant patriot, and his tenderness as a father, might have been delineated by a Shakespeare or an Otway, but not by any of the modern mechanical manufacturers of plays.

On the whole, if this play should become one of the manager's stock, our contempt of an English audience will be considerably increased.

The Man of Pleasure.

A Man of Pleasure is a child of folly, an unbridled animal, a court savage, the dupe of fancy, slave of vice, and foe of reason.

He is the fork of dissipation, the crutch of avarice, and bane of innocence.

Softened to effeminacy on the loss of maternal indulgence, and flushed with the polish of superficial embellishments, he shudders at the rigid discipline of virtue, and shrinks at the thought of ascending the hill of manly science, though for the reward of Angels.

He treads upon ice, tramples upon property, deines the brute, and dances blindfold upon a precipice.

His breath is contagious, his friendship a snare, self his centre, and his creed annihilation.

The Woman of Pleasure.

A Fine Woman of Pleasure is an Angel imbruted, the pink of fashion, the mirror of vanity, and vortex of mischief.

She has a syren's voice, a crocodile's tears, and a peacock's pride.

Like a sun-beam in the clouds, she is gay, sickle, and delusive; common as air, inconstant as the wind, and consuming as fire.

She is like a poisonous variegated flower, raised in a hot-bed, and grafted on a rose-bud.

Though smooth as oil to the mouth, she is hellebore to the brain, and arsenic to the bowels.

Like the insidious spider, she extends her net, sucks to death unwary fugitives, and triumphs in the destruction of thousands.

She resembles a light-painted frigate, without helm or ballast, with colours streaming, and an unsound bottom, under full sail to destruction, where froth, stench, and darkness, close the scene.

Original Bon Mots of the late Mr. Foote.

As a specimen of his humour and quickness of imagination, we submit the following bon mots to the perusal of the reader.

WHEN Foote was at Brighthelmstone he interested himself in favour of a candidate in opposition to Sir Watkin Williams Wynne, who was espoused by a lady of considerable rank. Foote being rebuked by her ladyship, and seeming to be affected with contrition, said, "I beg your ladyship's pardon, and am convinced of my error, for Sir Watkin is the best qualified of any man I know for representing a county in Wales, as he is very mountainous, and extremely barren."

When Garrick was at Brighthelmstone, he sent Sir John Mills to get him a lodging. Foote meeting him, and being informed of his errand, told him he might get David a lodging, but as to a kitchen, that would be quite superfluous, as he never dressed any victuals at home.

When Foote was in very distressed circumstances, he was applied to by a bookseller to write "A System of Cookery." "Egad," said Sam, "you are mistaken, I know nothing about eating in theory; but as to practice, I think I could back myself even against Handel."

About this time Foote was one night at the Bedford coffee-house, when Frank Delaval joked him about wearing boots. "Egad," said Foote, "I would convince you any where else, that they are very far from being superfluous."

Foote having lost a considerable sum at Tom's coffee house, he was reprehended by his particular friend, Mr. G—h—n, for his indiscretion, insinuating that he had not lost his money fairly. A few nights after, Mr. G—h—n lost a much larger sum to the same set. It was Sam's turn now to triumph.—"I presume, Mr. G—h—n, you lost your money very fairly, though you cut in with some of the most notorious sharpers about town—but there is nothing like being in the secret."

Sir Richard Atkins (who was by Foote called the Waggoner's Whip, on account of his being very tall, very thin, and stooping very much) when he kept Fanny Murray, was publicly known to be a very great bubble to her. Frank Delaval and Foote being over a bottle, the subject turned upon Sir Richard's weakness in being such a dupe to such a woman. "Oh," said Foote, "there is nothing surprizing in it; he is not indeed a supple Jack, but you know he is a very supple Dick."

When Nancy Parsons quitted the duke of Grafton, deserted Penton, and went abroad with the d— of D——, a gentleman at the St. James's coffee-house could not help observing what an abandoned devil she must be, "Oh," said Foote, "there is nothing in it, you know she has the benefit of the clergy on her side."

When Miss Chudleigh appeared at the masquerade at Ranelagh in the character of Iphigenia, almost in a complete state of nudity, Foote complimented her upon being the most perfect living Venus de Medicis he had ever seen in public; upon which she turned upon her heel, and said he was the most impudent wretch upon earth. "Had I," he replied, "appeared here quite naked, considering the difference of our sexes, we should scarce be upon a par in point of impudence."

When Foote heard that lord K——y had in a pet destroyed all his music, and declared he would never write or play a note again as long as he lived, Foote said, "his lordship is quite right, there is more harmony harmony in the box and dice than in all the cantatas and overtures in the universe."

Upon Sam's hearing that Mr. W-de, the Master of the ceremonies had abdicated his throne, on being detected in an intrigue, he laughed heartily, saying, "he is unfit for that office, since he is so bashful as to be ashamed of an amour, which is looked upon by all men of the Ten as securing a reputation for fine fellows, and the strongest recommendation to the ladies."

A certain black-legs, famous for cogg-ing a die, being just returned from New-market, said there had been great sport. "What then," said Foote, "I suppose you were detected, and kicked out of the hazard room."

Foote's most predominant passion was the purchasing of nick-nacks. He generally went once a week to Deard's to recruit his cabinet. Ld. T---d coming in one day whilst he and Mrs. Jewel were there, his lordship said, "Faith, Foote, you must have the greatest collection of trinkets of any man in Europe; I never come this way but I see your carriage at the door."—"Yes, my lord, (pointing to the lady) you see I am quite in the jewel way."

Lady C---y being once in company with this wag, asked him how he could preserve his countenance in such whimsical situations. "Indeed, my lady, that is a question I have long since wished to ask your ladyship."

Doctor L---n being one night, after he had been at Foote's theatre, at the Bedford coffee-house, was so ignorant of his own portrait, that he seriously asked Foote who was the doctor he had handled so severely. "Do not you know?" replied Foote, "he comes here very often, much resembles you, and always lets his stockings hang about his heels."

The late Mr. Ap---ce, who was a very singular man, told Foote one day at dinner, that the ministry had quite overlooked him, and that he thought if Foote would bring him upon the stage, he was sure government would certainly take notice of him. Upon this hint Foote wrote the Author, and Ap---ce was so much resolved that his own character should be known in that of Cadwallader, that he lent the mimic a suit of cloaths he had been very conspicuous in at court. Somebody hinted that he did not use his friend well, thus to expose him. "You are quite mistaken, I do it at his own request, in order to make his fortune."

When Lovejoy broke out, soon after the conflagration at Bradley's, Foote was asked what he thought of this trafficker in blifs? Foote replied, "he imagined that Lovejoy would soon be burnt out, though in a different way." "How so?" said captain D---, "why with burnt champagne and brimstone."

No man was more afraid of Foote than Jack Harris, that well-known pimp under the Rose. He applied to Sam, and intreated him for God's sake, not to bring him on, and reminded the wit of his past services. "That you are an excellent pander, in a certain line, I allow; but you may make yourself easy, I have higher game in view, pimps, parasites, and panders in the most elevated ranks, from the bench of ---s down to the t---y bench."

When Foote heard of Tenducci's marriage, he said his wife must be very fond of a man, when she would marry the representative only of one. And when it was reported that she was pregnant.—"Well," said Sam, "that fellow is in great luck to get journeymen so easily, when even the taylors, who are but the ninth parts of men, will not work for legal wages."

Being asked his opinion of lord Chesterfield's Letters, he replied, "they comprized a fine system of duplicity, deception, and adultery. That his lordship, who seems to have studied the graces with great attention, has entirely forgot that they never appear so beautiful as when accompanied by virtue; that if the graces should be found in a brothel they would lose all their attractions, and that in the hot-bed of adultery they would be scorched to deformity."

When Foote read David Hume's pamphlet concerning Rousseau, and came to the tender scene where they cry and sob in one another's lap, he exclaimed, "here is a new sect established of the crying philosophers. It will be in its greatest perfection in infancy, and in dotage it may sit pretty easily: but in perfect manhood, in the vigour of life, it is a system that never will be adopted but by fribbles and macaronies."

Upon seeing Nan C-tl-y in Comus, he said, "she was finely bronzed for the character, but it was a pity the managers had not put her in a part which by nature she was cut out for, this was Moll Brazen in the Beggar's Opera."

When Foote was at Versailles, some years ago, he was introduced to the late king, and asked to attend the petits soupers of Madame Pompadour. This lady being informed of Foote's talents, he was desired to take off some of the most remarkable courtiers, whose oddities were well known. He mimicked these gentlemen men so well, that the king continued laughing all the while, and paid him a pretty compliment upon his uncommon abilities. "Sire," said the mimic, "if I had been as well acquainted with the foibles of your courtiers, as I am with the vices of our's, I should have represented them far more naturally."

Foote meeting with an old acquaintance who had long been a limb of the law, and who had often, through the crevices of his shirt, shown his nakedness, meeting him in a decent suit of mourning, in the month of November, asked Latitat if he could congratulate him upon any lucky windfall, pointing to his fables.—"No," replied Latitat, "you know it is term-time." "Faith, that is true, it has been a long vacation for your taylor."

The late k— one afternoon at his coffee, asked the countess of Y——th, "What be dat Footes, dat makes so much noise in de Haymarket?" "Oh, Sir," replied the lady, "he is a mimic." "A mimique, we have no mimique in Germany, we have, indeed, des buffons." Just as the conversation had gone so far upon the subject, the clock struck five, and, as usual, they retired to take an afternoon's nap. This being told circumstantially to Foote by the page in waiting, he instantly said, "The countess is undoubtedly the greatest mimic in Europe, for she can take the k—— off whenever she pleases."

When Foote heard that F——d, the master of the arraigns, had brought off Lookup, who was indicted for perjury, by a flaw in the indictment, Sam said to him, whilst playing a game at whist, "By G-d, F-rd, you can do any thing after bringing off Lookup, I do not wonder you hold thirteen trumps in your own hand; the least he could do was to teach you the long shuffle for your trouble and services."

Foote never could lose an opportunity of being smart let it be at whose expence it might, or upon ever so melancholy an occasion. The late unfortunate Dr. D. belonged to a whist club, of which Foote was member.

The Doctor had had a great run of ill luck, and was, in the gamester's phraseology, Tied-up: that is he received a guinea to pay twenty, if ever he played again for above a guinea.

On the day of the doctor's execution, a gentleman called upon Foote, who had been to see the doctor go to the fatal tripod. I have been, said the gentleman, to see the unfortunate doctor meet his doom; I suppose he is launched into eternity by this time. How so, says Foote, you know he was Tied-up long ago.

When the affair of M——e * and Tib. T——se at Paris, with respect to Paiba the Jew was agitated, a gentleman observed at the Smyrna, what a scandal it was for the British L——re, to have two of their members imprisoned, for a robbery, and that robbery committed on a Jew. "Oh, said Foote, that very circumstance purges away their crime, and makes them orthodox; besides, should any peddling itinerant Jew pretend to call in question the conduct of the son of the Grand Signior?"

When Foote heard that M——n was to appear in the character of Sir John Brute, he said, "there was nothing extraordinary in that, as he was well assured, that in the course of the season he was to come out in lord Townley, lord Foppington, Sir Fopling Flutter, Sir Harry Wildair, and the Fine Gentleman in Lethe, and that he was to dance a minuet at his own benefit."

Mrs. Woffington one day asked Quin in her coquettish manner, how she looked?—"Charmingly, by G—d, Pegg."—"Charmingly, adorably, divinely—I expected from a man of so much gallantry." "Why then, if you will have the truth—You look damnably," and turned upon his heel. Mrs. Woffington presently after, meeting Foote, told him of Quin's unpoliteness.—"It is very lucky, for as his brutality is now come to the utmost pitch, there must be a change, and it cannot fail of being for the better."

Foote being at a private concert, where lord Sandwich played the kettle drums, he was asked by one of the connoissenti what he thought of his lordship's performance?

Why, said the wag, I think he would do finely to beat up for recruits for the marine service; and this would be a greater proof than he ever gave of his skill in nautical affairs.

Anecdote of General Lee.

DURING the time of the attack on Sullivan's Island, Gen. Lee was one day reconnoitring the communication made by the bridge of boats between that place and the continent. As the balls whistled about he observed one of his aid du camps shrink every now and then, and by the motion of his body seemed to evade the shot. "Sdeath, Sir," cried Lee, what do you mean, do you dodge? Do you know that the king of Prussia lost above 100 aid du camps in one campaign. "So I understand, Sir," replied the officer, but I did not think you could spare so many."

Wednesday, November 19.

THE house ordered in heads of a bill for completing the circular road.

The house went into a committee of supply, and some debates ensued on the resolution moved for by Mr. Attorney General, for the augmentation of 3046 men being continued for two years, so that the military establishment may be 15046, so soon as the 4000 men spared to his majesty, on the present exigency of affairs, shall be returned.

Some gentlemen did not think the resolution was so worded, as to ascertain the 4000 men being paid by Great Britain; the gentlemen in office insisted the words referred to the whole transaction. Several amendments were made and withdrawn: at last the committee divided, on a motion of the Hon. James Brown, to recite the compact with Great Britain, for paying those men whilst out of Ireland; but most gentlemen thinking such amendment unnecessary, it passed in the negative, by a majority of 83. And the original resolution was carried.

The committee then granted the following sums:

To the Speaker, ———	4000
To the Linen Manufacture, for two years, ———	8000
To the Accountant-general, ———	500
To Henry Gore, Esq; ———	300
To the Clerks of the House, ———	500
To Mr. Higgins, assistant Clerk, ———	300
To the Serjeant at Arms (Mr. Coddington) ———	1000
To the committee-clerks (Mr. Melvin and Mr. Winstanley) ———	350
To Abraham Bradley, for printing the public accounts, ———	112
To Hurton Bradley, for distributing votes, ———	50
To the two front door keepers, ———	100
To the two back door keepers, and 11 messengers, ———	200
To Mr. Winstanley, for extraordinary trouble, ———	50
To the Examiner of the Customs (Mr. John Wetherall) ———	200
To the three Clerks of the corn premiums, ———	300
To Henry Smyth, Esq; deputy paymaster of do. ———	100
To Sir Roger Palmer, Bart. paymaster of do. ———	1200
To the Rev. Mr. Stirling, for his father's Journals, ———	100
To extra-clerks, on the election committees, ———	300
To the Protestant Charter Schools, ———	12500
To the Dublin Society, ———	10000
To the Foundling Hospital, ———	8000
To G. Melvin, for extraordinary trouble, ———	250
To Benj. Higgins, for ditto, ———	100
Granted this day, ———	49,512

Thursday, November 20.

The committee of Supplies proceeded to consider the several petitions presented to the house, and referred to them, and voted the following grants, viz.

Appendix, 1777.

To St. Patrick's hospital, to assist lunatics, ———	£.2945
To building churches, ———	6000
To James Magee, small-beer brewer, ———	200
For the circular road, ———	1500
For the pier of Donaghadee, ———	1705
For the Marine Society, ———	1500
To Dr. Achmet, ———	500
For the new offices, on the Inns-quay, for public records, ———	3000
To the House of Industry, ———	4000
For the new Four-courts Marshalls, ———	1335
For Carlingford Harbour, ———	500
For the Ballast-office Wall, ———	1500

For Youghall harbour, ———	300
For building Newgate, ———	1000
To Taylor and Skinner, for making surveys of the high roads, ———	300
To A. Bradley, for printing the Journals, ———	3023
For Cork harbour, ———	1000
To the Hibernian School, ———	1500
Granted this day, ———	38,444

The petitions of Mr. Peter Heverin, the Corporation of Drogheda, Mr. Wade the chymist, the Blue-coat hospital, Mr. Johnston of Derry, Mr. Rouvier the oculist, Mr. Dempsey of Lough-shinney, For widening the Merchant's-quay, For repairing Waterford Cathedral, For the Pier of Portcarriga, For the Grand Canal, and of the Rev. Dr. Carr, were all negatived.

Friday, November 21.

A new writ was ordered for the borough of Armagh.

The committee of supplies sat and finished its business, which was to resolve that a supply be granted to his Majesty of a sum not exceeding 1,416,883l. 6s.

In this quantum was included the interest on 171,000l. which was intended to be borrowed to pay off the arrear, and it was also brought down to Sept. 29, 1777. This was opposed by several gentlemen, as an innovation, since the committee of accounts had reported no lower down than March 25, 1777. And several thought that 100,000l. was enough to be borrowed.—Mr. Barry moved for the lesser sum, and the committee divided, but it was carried for the larger sum by a majority of 78.

Resolved, That a further supply be granted of 1000l. a year, for two years, to the charter-schools.

Also, 1000l. a year, for seven years, for the inland navigation.

Saturday, November 22.

An account of the quantity of provisions exported from Cork, for six months preceding Michaelmas day, was ordered, on the motion of Mr. Brown.

It was agreed, in respect to the witnesses on the contested elections, that persons who caused the witnesses to be summoned, should pay to each of them, at the rate of 4d. per mile, travelling charges, and 4s. 4d. per day, from their arrival in Dublin, till discharged by the committee.

Mr. Longfield said, that he had a petition, signed by a number of the principal inhabitants and traders of Cork. He introduced his motion with

with a modest, and at the same time, an elegant preface, adding that he was happy to honourable a commission was so easy a duty. He adverted to the commercial interests of Ireland, and deduced from thence how nearly and materially they were connected with Cork, and that whilst one was admitted to be a national source of wealth, the other must be held in the highest estimation. He observed, that in Cork, foreigners find the convenience of liberty and profit, without being disgusted either by avarice or pride: the latter, he said, was an evil in Spanish government: pride prohibited them from exporting corn to Sicily, by which their commerce was so narrowed, and their finances injured. By the trade of Cork, he said, a stream of wealth flowed into this kingdom from the remotest parts of the world, and that an embargo on that trade, if continued, would bring ruin on the principal branch of our commerce: He therefore moved, that he might have leave to present a petition stating the grievances Cork laboured under from the present embargo on provision: and concluded with saying, that on the gracious reception this petition might meet with from the house, the removal of those grievances solely depended.—The petition was accordingly presented and read, and ordered to be referred to the committee of enquiry into the state of the exports from this kingdom.

Mr. Provost presented a petition of a similar nature from the inhabitants of the city of Cork; which trade, he said, by the late embargo, was now got into another channel, and that Russia, Denmark, Sweden and Holland, now supplied those markets from whence great profit formerly flowed to us. He said, there were more provisions in this kingdom than government had occasion for; and therefore, that to prohibit exportation was impolitic, because it injured the community, without government being a gainer. He said, the people of Cork were ever modest in their conduct; that, in their present petition, they touched not upon a very delicate question: they complained indeed of a grievance which affected their commerce—but they did it in a state of humiliation, and asked for redress from the representatives of the people. He said, the victualling trade, upon a medium, amounted to $300,000 annual pounds, and that if an interruption was for any length of time given to it, the whole might in time be entirely lost. He observed, that he had the honour to represent the city of Cork for 17 years, and during that time he never knew the inhabitants, until now, approach either the throne or parliament in the language of complaint; that if their petition was a fault, it was their first, and they therefore should be forgiven; but that gentlemen should observe it was the united voice of the people, feeling where their necessities pinched. As to himself, he observed that he thought it his duty to attend to that part of the people whom he represented, and that he was influenced to that conduct by principle—by habit; that as his Majesty's principal secretary of state, he had a right to enquire into this grievance—and if, by ill advice, our Sovereign had been induced to lay an embargo, to the injury of his people, he thought it his duty to stand up and convince the house that such an embargo was a loss to government, as well as an oppression on the most commercial part of Ireland—and that, in its effect, new enemies were raised to our commerce, pregnant with the most ruinous consequences to the commercial and landed interest of this kingdom.

The petition was referred to a committee.

Mr. Provost got up again and said, that no man, in or out of office, was more ready to strengthen his Majesty's hand, at the present alarming crisis, than he was: but the question now is, whether that matter has not been carried too far.

A debate then ensued, on a motion to commit to the custody of the serjeant at arms, two persons, for not attending an election-committee, according to the order of the house, which was carried on a division of 98 to 16.

The report of the committee of supplies was then made and read.

Mr. Barry moved to insert, "in pursuance of his Majesty's message, delivered to this house by Lord Harcourt," in that part relative to the sending 4000 troops abroad, which passed in the negative, without a division.

Instead of the supply being 1,416,883l. the Hon. James Browne moved to subtract the poundage and pells fees, which would go into the treasury, and leave the sum, 1,416,572l. 18s.

This brought on a tedious debate, in which calculation followed calculation, and additions, subtractions, and divisions, were the only principal argument. The speakers were, Mr. Barry, Mr. Yelverton, Mr. Grattan, Mr. John Toler, and Mr. Browne, for the motion; and Mr. Forster, Mr. Flood and Mr. Prime-serjeant, against it. The house divided, 42 for the motion, and 11 against it.

The committee of ways and means was then ordered for Monday.

Monday, November 24.

A committee was appointed to try the merits of the Dungarvon election, on the petition of Godfrey Green.

The committee of ways and means (Mr. Forster in the chair) sat till 12 o'clock, and went through the grants for the taxes, which were now just the same as in the last sessions, without any addition. The business was very tedious, and no debates arose, except a very short one, on a motion of Mr. Brown to annul the stamp duties, and compensate for them by two-pence per gallon on all foreign, and one penny on all home made spirits, which was rejected without a division.

Tuesday, November 25.

The business of this day was equally tedious, the whole list of duties, reported from the committee of ways and means, was read by the Speaker, and agreed to without the least dispute. The money-bills were ordered in.

Wednesday, November 26.

The clerk of the crown and hanaper attended, and at the table amended the return for the borough of Callen, by, erasing the names of Mr. Henry Flood and Sir Hercules Langrishe, and inserting in their rooms those of the Hon. Pierce Butler

Butler and George Agar, Esq; Mr. Agar immediately took the oaths and his seat.

Mr. Foster presented the four money-bills, which were severally read and committed for to-morrow.

A petition from the several merchants and importers of flax-seed in the city of Dublin, praying an amendment of the act respecting that commodity was presented by Mr. Recorder.

Mr. Barry reported from the committee, on the Tipperary election, that Francis Mathew, Esq; was duly elected. Thus the petition of Daniel Toler, Esq; fell to the ground.

Mr. Grattan proposed a motion, "To resolve, that to provide for the arrear down to September 29, when the report of the committee of accounts goes no lower than to the Lady-day preceding, is a practice that ought to be carried into precedent," but the question of adjournment being moved, it was carried on a division of 92 against 28.

Thursday, November 27.

The four money bills were severally committed, and not a single word said against any part of either of them. No other business was done.

Friday, November 28.

The house balloted for a committee to try the Maryborough election, John Tydd, and Hunt Welsh, Esqrs. petitioners, and Sir John Parnel, Bart. and Lord Jocelyn, sitting members.

The four money-bills were reported, and Mr. Forster was ordered to wait on the Lord Lieutenant with them, and request they may be transmitted into Great Britain in due form.

The house, in a committee, Mr. Gardiner in the chair, made some progress in the heads of a bill to prevent frauds in selling bread, flour, butchers meat, potatoes; &c. in the county of Dublin, and are to proceed the first Monday after the recess.

On a complaint made by Sir Henry Cavendish, that one of the Roscommon witnesses had been arrested, the house first ordered he should be discharged, and then ordered the attorney and sub-sheriffs of Dublin to attend the house.

Saturday, November 29.

Col. Ross brought in the heads of a bill to amend and explain the acts relative to the hempen and flaxen manufacture.

The sheriffs and sub-sheriffs of Dublin, with Bartholomew Conroy, attended, on the affair of arresting Alan Hanly, a witness on the Roscommon election. It appeared that Conroy had refused to withdraw the action, though repeatedly desired by the sub-sheriff, on account of the order of the house, for which it was moved he should be committed to Newgate; but on his submission on his knees, he was forgiven.

Monday, December 1.

A message was sent to the Lords, that they would permit the Earl of Roden, and Lord Viscount Carlow, to be examined on the Maryborough election.

Made some progress in the committee (Mr. Solicitor General in the chair) on the heads of a bill for licensing hawkers and pedlars.

Mr. Grattan made his motion to resolve, "That to provide for an arrear down to September 29, where the report of the committee of accounts goes no lower than Lady-day preceding, was a practice that ought not to be drawn into a precedent."

Mr. Mason moved an amendment, by prefixing the words "it is now proper and necessary to declare."

The gentlemen who spoke in favour of the motion were, Mr. Grattan, Mr. Martin, Mr. Barry, Mr. Yelverton, and Mr. George Ogilvie. And those who opposed it, were Mr. Mason, Sir Hercules Langrishe, Mr. Edward Fitzgerald, Mr. James Foy, Mr. Warren, Mr. Provost, Mr. Beamish, Mr. O'Hara, and Mr. Leigh. The arguments on both sides were little more than repetitions of what had been said on a prior day, on the subject of retrenchments. The amendment was carried without a division, and the main question passed in the negative by a majority of 82, there being 53 ayes, and 135 noes.

Colonel Burton then reported from the committee on the Fermanagh election, that Mr. Archdall, and Sir Arthur Brooke were duly elected.

Sir Edward Newenham said, that the house had been disputing about matters of small importance, in comparison to what he had to lay before them, that he heard a noble lord in another kingdom had tendered a proposition, to heal the distracted state of this once powerful empire, that he was sorry it was negatived, as those who opposed it, would sorely repent it. He requested the indulgence of the house. Addressing himself to the Speaker, he said, his indulgence he need not claim, as he had, since he had presided in that chair, given attention as well to the inexperienced, as experienced senator; that whenever matters of great national concern have happened, or that any disputes relative to the rules and orders of parliament have been left to the decision of the chair, they have been decided with judgment, justice, and virtuous integrity.

He said, he saw many gentlemen in the house, who must remember, that in a former session, and on a certain subject, then in debate, he declared, from authentic American correspondence and information, that unless things were restored to the state they were in, prior to the fatal period of 1763, a separation from America would take place; that some men were pleased to slight that information, but recent facts have verified the assertion; that he had given the same information to a noble lord, high in office, to transmit it to the British minister, who neglected it, seeming to insinuate that he was copying others, who gave information only to be paid for it, which mean supposition checked his ardour, as it wounded him in the tenderest point. That he had much confidence in the present administration; however, as he never did, nor ever would hold communication with ministers, he laid ministerial communication aside, and called on Parliament, and thro' it, the whole nation; and, if his Majesty could be there present, he would call on Royalty itself to attend to a matter of the last importance to the very existence of these nations. He declared that he had received an account, on the best information, that the nature of the case and circumstance of the times would admit of, that about the beginning of last month, America's ultimatum had arrived with American deputies at the court of Paris, and that, agreeable to his information, the ultimatum was in the following words. [Sir Edward dashed the members to write down his words, that no mistake should hereafter happen] "Should the armies of the United States be discomfited, or any other circumstance occur, that could indicate a conquest thereof, then, and in that case you are to agree, and the United States will agree, that on receiving the promised assistance from France, in men and shipping, France shall have, and enjoy for the space of thirty years, to be computed and completed from the signing of these articles, the same exclusive trade with America, that Great-Britain formerly enjoyed."

He requested the house to reflect on the situation of these nations, and to adopt some move to save their own country, and not to lose their precious moments in disputing about a fifth half-year, or numerical calculations; but, with deference to members of greater abilities, and more parliamentary knowledge, he would only offer two or three articles to their consideration. Should the armies of the United States be discomfited, or any other untoward circumstance occur, that can indicate a conquest thereof, a war with France would be inevitable: what then would be the situation of these kingdoms? Our fleet, and by our vessels on Saturday last, our army, would be mostly on the other side of the Atlantic. He observed, that the French could easily, from their West India islands, send a sufficient fleet and army to keep the force we had there, sufficiently employed, and perhaps to bar the returns of our native soldiers; and that if England now could not subdue America's sons, how much more difficult would it be, when they were openly supported by the united force of France and Spain! He farther noticed, that in the late war we had allies, we had the plains of Germany, we had a viruous and intelligent ministry, who had the confidence of the people,—we had a powerful fleet in the East and West-Indies,—we had thirteen great colonies, from whose generous ports we could obtain ten thousand sailors, which would sufficiently balance the strength of our enemies; but that at present we had only two islands, one now rendered nearly defenceless,—an exhausted treasury,—a misinformed ministry,—an insulted and deceived nation; consequently, a divided and jealous people, to oppose against the united powers of the house of Bourbon. That he could paint more of the real dangers of these kingdoms, but thought it unnecessary, as they were obvious to every man who had the use of, or dared exert his own reason, in this tremendous hour of his country's fate. He mentioned, that the gentleman who gave him the information, was a gentleman of large fortune, power and consequence in his own country; that he gave him leave to make what use he thought proper of it; therefore he gave (though he might have sold it to a British minister) it to the representatives of the people; that the gentleman's desire was, that Great Britain and Ireland (his native country) should anticipate France in preserving that inexhaustible source of trade—the American trade. He said that his friend had given him much other information, which he feared never had, or ever would, except through the channel of that house, reach the royal ear, through Chat mist, which now surrounds the throne; he said that few men in either kingdoms knew any thing of the internal resources, or American affairs. He appealed to several gentlemen near him, that he had given them an account where the battle would be fought between General Burgoyne, and one Arnold; that he mentioned the very villages where the stores lay, and that the militia would attempt to retake Ticonderoga, and this he declared to several members seven weeks before the mutilated gazette appeared. He asked if they would be surprised if a French fleet of six or eight sail of the line, with between 5 and 600 landsmen, collected from the islands of Bourbon and St. Mauritius, would, before October next, attack our settlements on the Coromandel coast, or in the bay of Bengal; that from his authority he mentioned, that an English sloop of war (which he believed was called the Pomona) was sunk by a French frigate within a league of a British island, and that every man perished—not a man was saved, though within sight of two or three merchant ships, who could have saved many of the brave British tars; but, agreeable to Gallic policy, and Gallic perfidy, they remembered the murderer's adage, "That the dead could tell no tales."

He observed, that in this age of dissipation, of luxury, effeminacy and corruption, and he feared, of fatal security, few gentlemen gave themselves time to look into the causes or future consequences of events, that for his part, he wished to save those two islands, perhaps we might save Canada, Nova Scotia, the islands of Cape Breton and Newfoundland, the Floridas, and the infant settlements on the river Mississippi, our sugar colonies, and particularly, that nursery of British seamen, the Newfoundland fishery; which, in his opinion, could only be done by a timely and speedy treaty of peace, as offered by Lord Chatham, formed upon a generous, liberal, and extensive foundation; that he would not, at present, offer any motions upon a subject of such vast importance, but leave it with the house for a few days to turn in their thoughts, when he hoped every member would divest himself of all partiality, except for the defence of his own country, and join their wishes to that of a patriotic lord on the other side of the water, which is,—Peace with America, and war with all the world beside. He then begged the house to spurn the channel of ministerial interference, and anticipating another parliament in another kingdom, prove themselves the first political succourers of both countries, and at once, by a committee from parliament, approach the throne in the genuine spirit of their great forefathers. He hoped, in disclosing this intelligence, he discharged his duty to his country and king, and so far faithfully fulfilled the important trust committed to his care by that body of independent and virtuous men, who seated him in that house. He declared, that he would readily concur in a vote of credit credit for 100,000*l.* as he was confident, that from his opinion of one particular member in administration not a shilling of it would be used, except in cases of real domestic danger; but, if he thought a guinea was to be spent in the unnatural American war, he would be against it.

Tuesday, December 2.

The house did not sit an hour, the only business done was to receive the petition from the insolvent debtors, which Mr. Gardiner presented, and said, his intent was to extend relief to debtors, who had been a year or upwards in actual confinement.

Another petition was presented by Col. Brown, by which it appeared, that orders to attend election committees had been perverted into protections, for a man arrested on the 26th inst. had been discharged in consequence of an order to attend a committee, which was not to be struck till Jan. 21. Mr. Godfrey James, the agent who procured it, was ordered to attend.

Wednesday, December 3.

Ordered, That the defaulters on the last ballot, be called over on Saturday, and the house to be called on Monday.

Two petitions from the Hon. John Stratford, and the Hon. and Rev. Francis Paul Stratford, complaining of two undue elections, for the borough of Baltinglass, were presented, and ordered to be heard on the 16th of February.

Heads of a bill to continue the encouragement of the importation of flax-seed from the Baltic, were committed, reported, and sent to the Lord Lieutenant, by Col. Ross.

Thursday, December 4.

Mr. Godfrey James attended, and was examined relative to applying for an order for William Burke, to attend the county Mayo committee, by the directions of George Fitzgerald, Esq; one of the petitioners. Mr. Fitzgerald, at his examination, said he had given such directions, because he had been informed Burke had overheard some conversation between Colonel Browne and Mr. Cuffe, that affected this petition. But Col. Browne denied his having any knowledge of Burke, or any such conversation being past.

Mr. Beresford moved a resolution, that would have subjected such members, as had served already on committees of elections, to serve again; but the motion was destroyed, by the previous question being carried.

Heads of a bill to enable John Preston, of Ballynter, Esq; to borrow 11,000*l.* on his estate; and, heads of a bill for insolvent debtors, were ordered in.

Friday, December 5.

Ordered, on a motion of Col. Browne, that a committee be appointed to enquire into the abuse of procuring the Speaker's warrants, to attend on select committees, for the purpose of screening debtors from justice.

Committed, the Hawkers and Pedlars bill; report to be received to-morrow:—made some progress on the heads of a bill to punish offenders by hard labour. To proceed on Thursday.

Mr. Yelverton moved to resolve, "that the expences of the nation, ought, in ordinary cases, to be limited to its income."

Carried in the affirmative, nem. con. and then the house adjourned.

[To be continued.]

The MUSIC of the MORNING.

NOW, scarce o'er the mountain's summit,
Grey-ey'd dawn begins to peep;
Scarce yet has the peaceful landscape
Shaken off the bonds of sleep.

When, by chanticleer's shrill clarion
Rous'd, the lark forsakes the lawn,
And aloft, in air, melodious
Hails the joy-inspiring dawn.

Now she sits through fields of æther,
Tuning loud her prightliest lay;
Wak'd by it, from ev'ry covert,
Hark, what music hails the day!

Blackbird, tuneful thrush and linner,
Now resume their lively notes;
Bullfinch, Redbreast, titmouse, sparrow,
And ten thousand warbling throats.

Sweet too, on the dewy sheep-walk,
Now resounds the shepherd's strain;
Whilst the merry sons of labour,
Carrol blythsome o'er the plain,

Sleep, avaunt, thou lifeless sluggard,
O'er the couch thy poppies shed,

Where intoxicated Revel,
Tir'd, reclines his drowsy head.

Let me join the charming concert
Of the morn's melodious throng;
Come, my Mute, shake off thy slumbers,
Join the universal song.

Prize, ye silly dupes of fashion,
Midnight routs, and masques, and balls;
Think no music half so charming,
As your Ranelagh's or Vauxhall's.

So, let painful riot please you,
Art's dull efforts lull your ear,
Be mine, the wholesome joys of morning,
Mine, the songs that Nature cheer.

To Miss TRUEMAN, of Lurgan.

B. OM of beauty, pride of May,
Prightly, charming, young and gay,
Come bedeck'd in love's array,
And thy charms divine display.

In that sweet enchanting face,
Heaven's fair image let me trace,

Sprung from more than mortal race,
Belle, mule, virgin, nymph and grace.

On that pure expanse of snow,
On those cheeks where lillies blow,
Where the roses blooming glow,
Lips, from whence does nectar flow;

On those eyes so killing bright,
Flashes darting forth of light,
Let me feast my ravish'd sight,
And enjoy supreme delight.

Turn to taste of joys divine,
And make thine celestial mine;
Let, lovely Ruth, O let me join
My transported soul with thine!

THE ELECTION: A FABLE.

To CANDIDATES.

ELECTIONS, as they ought to be,
For years were absolutely free;
And members by the wise were taught
To be as honest as they ought.

At length, among the brutal tribe,
A Fox first introduc'd a bribe.
No vice is long without its brother,
One bribe soon introduc'd another:
These set a hundred more a flying,
For bribes are fam'd for multiplying.
The poison through the fairest spread,
And Liberty hung down her head:
The story of its introduction
I'll here unfold for your instruction.

A Monkey, of a scheming head,
Was to the barber's calling bled;
Four trees of Elbert nuts he claim'd,
And hence a Freeholder was nam'd.
Beneath the shelter of his trees
He lather'd brutes, and liv'd at ease;
Beneath, one day, appear'd a Goat,
To lose his beard and gain his vote.
The Monkey soon began to shave,

And talk politically gave:
The Goat, a brute of much discerning,
Applauds his wisdom and his learning,
And then insinuates the case—
'm Candidate for such a place;
Accept these dozen peaches, pray,
I'm shav'd extremely well to-day.)
The other Candidate, you know,
Is your's and all the nation's foe:
Hope you'll such a rogue oppose—
'll be your friend, if I am choic.

The Monkey promis'd—bit a peach—
And only wish'd to lather each.
The other Candidate—a Fox—
Came with a train of dunghill Cocks;
The Monkey shav'd him neat and trim,
And whisk'd the hairs on ev'ry limb:
The Fox two dozen peaches gave,
Then swore the Goat was but a knave;
The Goat, my wishes to defeat,
Tries he,) reports that fowls I eat;
Let it, friend, be understood,
That I abhor the sight of blood;
True what such as him pretend,
Ink you they'd on my steps attend:

Then since you know your friends from foes,
I beg you will the Goat oppose.
He promis'd as he did before,
And kept his word a little more,
For twelve is less than twenty-four.
He gave the artful Fox his vote,
And thus was call'd to by the Goat:
Stay, barber; you're mistaken, stay;
You know you shav'd my beard to day.
Why what you say (cries Pug) is true;
But, faith, I shav'd the Fox since you;
The peaches, Sir, the peaches—Oh!
I've eat them long enough ago;
These twelve you gave me, Sir, eat well,
Nor could his twenty-four excel,
In taste I mean—but, Sir, in number,
One dozen must to two knock under;
Besides, you know as well as I,
They mean to sell, who aim to buy;
And who, that must his freedom lose,
Think ye, the smallest price would chuse?

Q. X.

A MORNING THOUGHT.

AWAKE, my soul! and let the birds inspire
Thy groveling thoughts with pure celestial fire;

They from their temperate sleep arise and pay
Their thankful anthems for the new-born day.

The tuneful lark, already mounted high,
With cheerful notes salutes the eastern sky;
Aurora's beauties in his song does wait,
And calls the blushing dame to hear his lays.
But man, arising from refreshing rest,
Feels a dark void in his ungrateful breast;
Regardless of the blessings he receives,
His reasoning powers of their best joys bereave;
Surveys the cheerful sun's re-kindling flame,
Nor lists one thought to him from whom it came.

ODE on WINTER.

NOW hoary Winter, with its stormy blasts,
Comes loursing with its sable eye-lids clad;
No more the sun his heat reviving casts,
Nor nymphs with swains in sportive play be glad.

But nipping frosts, with acute gusts of wind,
Unwholesome fogs, and damps, corrupt the air:
The mighty billows now no rest can find,
But fill the souls of mariners with fear!

Raging and swelling to a mighty size,
With force vehement smite the craggy rock,
Now they run low—see how they touch the skies!
With easy sport the ships of burden mock.

Obeying all the mighty Maker's will,
At whose great word they all from nothing came,
At whose command they rage, or mute, lie still,
Who ever was and ever is the same.
